ACTES AND MONVMENTS OF MATTERS

most speciall and memorable, happening in the Church, with an vniuersall historie of the same.

Wherein is set forth at large the whole race and course of the Church, from the primitiue age to these latter times of ours, with the bloody times, horrible troubles, and great persecutions against the true Martyrs of Christ, sought and wrought as well by Heathen Emperours, as now lately practised by Romish Prelats, especially in this Realme of England and Scotland.

Now againe, as it was recognised, perused, and recommended to the studious Reader, by the Author, Master John Foxe: the sixth time newly imprinted, with certaine additions thereunto annexed: Anno 1610. Mense Octobri.

AD DOMINVM IESVM CHRI-
STVM SERVATOREM CLEMENTISSI-
MVM, EVCHARISTICON

Ioannis Foxi.

COnfecto nunc opere, quod tuis primùm auſpicijs ac voluntate aggreſſus (ſumme & adorande Ieſu, idemque Seruator clementiſſime) inchoaui, quodque tuo demum beneficio ac fauore exegi atque abſolui, præter omnem certam opinionem & vires meas: ſupereſt itaque pro officio meo, vt animula hæc, ceu pro votiua tabula, gratias, ſi non quantas debeat (vtinam enim id poſſet) at quantas queat maximè, munificentiſſimæ tuæ perſoluat maieſtati: quæ tam miſerum homuncionem, vel ſyphar potius hominis, in laboribus tot tantiſque iſtis, qui vel aſellum quemuis ἀχθοφόρον poſſent conficere, tumultuantem, benigno ſucceſſu ac ſolatio tam clementer ſuffulſerit. Quanquam autem de operis difficultate nihil hic cauſari attinet, quæ vix æſtimari à multis poterit: tua tamen non ignorat omnipotens maieſtas, huius, qualecunq; ſit, negotij confectio quibus quanque non ferendis curis, vigilijs, moleſtijs conſtitit: Quibus nullo modo pares futuri eſſemus, niſi fauentis gratiæ tuæ numen affulſiſſet, ac ſaſe quodam modo admiſcuiſſet operi. Quidni enim fatear ac teſter ingenuè, quod re ipſa experti ſumus? Perſenſimus enim, peneque oculis ipſis conſpeximus, ſingularem excelſæ dexteræ tuæ ἐπιρροὴν, non modò in ſucceſſu negotij prouehendo, ſed in vita etiam ſpirituque inter labores conſeruando. Tui igitur muneris eſt (clementiſſime Ieſu) quòd opus tuis ſuſceptum auſpicijs huc vſque prouectum ſit. Nos viciſſim, quod noſtri ſit officij, gratias clementiæ tuæ, cùm noſtro priuatim, tum publico quodammodo eccleſiæ tuæ nomine, agimus. Vel hinc enim cernimus quanti cauſam Martyrum tuorum æſtimes, quando eorum illuſtrando nomini tanta faueas propenſione. Quanquam verò ſi nulla hic extaret eorum recordatio, non poſſent non omnibus modis eſſe illuſtriſſimi, quorum ſint nomina vitæ tuæ libro inſcripta. Et tamen voluit hoc modo tua declarare maieſtas, nobiſque innoteſcere hominibus, quàm honorificum ſit pro tui nominis gloria fortiter dimicantes occumbere, quorum tu vitam à cinere ac rogo ſic vindicas, ſic cauſam tueris, ſic dignitatem illuſtras, vt eandem multo cum gloriæ fœnore abs te recipiant clariorem, quàm ſi ipſi nunquam alioqui perdidiſſent. Habet ſiquidem peculiare hoc ſibi militiæ tuæ ratio, longe à mundo hoc diuerſum, quòd in caſtris tuis militantes ſiue viuant, tibi viuant, ſiue moriantur, multò clareſcant a funere felicius, quàm ſi vixiſſent maximè.

Auxilium Christi in concinando hoc opere.

Sic Cranmerum videmus, Ridleum, Latimerum, Iohannem Hooperum, Bradfordum, cæteroſque eiuſdem decuriæ pugiles, quanto maiore occubuiſſe cum gloria in acie tua depugnantes, quam ſi relicta ſtatione in qua erant collocati, ſaluti ipſi ſuæ cauſam tuam poſtpoſuiſſent. Quæ enim gens, quæ lingua, quæ natio, quæ temporum vetuſtas, quæ hominum poſteritas eorum non cantabit laudes, non virtutem agnoſcet, non magnitudinem admirabitur? Quis Wicleuum vnquam, aut Cobhamum natum fuiſſe exiſtimaſſet, niſi tua in cauſa tam egiſſent ſtrenuè? Quanto honori illud Huſſio Bohemenſi, noſtroque Tindallo fuit, quòd vitam in Euangelij tui cauſa perditam, magis abs te recipere, quàm ipſi retinere maluerint? Spectemus è diuerſa parte aduerſarios tuos, quorum tam multas eſſe conſtat cædes, iniurias, crudelitates aduerſus tuos, multaque item occultè & ſceleſtè ab ijſdem perpetrata, quæ nunquam ſperabant fore palam: Et tamen quid vnquam in angulis & tenebris ab illis eſt deſignatum tam occultè aduerſus Eccleſiam, quod non in apricum tua produxit producetq; prouidentia? atque ita produxit, vt vnde ipſi laudis ſibi conceperunt animo opinionem, inde ſummum ſibi ipſis dedecus pepererint & contumeliam, quam nec vita effugere, nec morte vnquam finire poterint. Quis Guiſios, Boneros, Storios, Gardineros, tanquam execranda hominum nomina nunc non nouit? non exhorret? quis eorum facinora obliterabit dies, aut ſepeliet memoria? Et quid hos in tanta multitudine hoſtium tuorum recenſeo? Cui vnquam proſpere ceſſit tuo rebellare numini, aut hoſtem ſe eccleſiæ tuæ profiteri? Papæ nomen quàm erat aliquando in his terris celebre & glorioſum? Nunc quid putidius, quid probroſius? Cardinalitium faſtigium cœperunt primò admirari homines, multaque proſequi reuerentia: Sic Monachorum & Nonnarum collegia ſuum quondam habebant plauſum apud plebem ſimplicem & credulam. At poſtquam ſpreta veritate tua cœperunt graſſari contra te, tuorumque homicidæ fieri, eò tandem ſunt prolapſi (exceptis paucis quos tua exemit gratia) vt reliqua fex nihil aliud iam eſſe præter vocabula quædam ad ignominiam relicta videatur.

Felix ac glorioſum pro Christo mortem oppetere.

Papæ nomen nunc probroſum.

Cardinalium Monachorum, Nonnarum nomina ad ignominiam nunc relicta.

Hæc nimirum (ſanctiſſime domine ac deus noſter) iuſtiſsimi iudicij tui ſunt præludia, ex quo haud difficile æſtimare ſit, quidnam in altero illo expectaturi ſint, quos in hoc ipſo ſeculo, hoc eſt in ſuo ipſorum regno, tanta accumules infamia & dedecore. Sed omiſſis his, ad ſanctos tuos redeamus Martyres, quorum nomine, meritò à nobis perenne velut ſacrificium laudis & gratiarum tuæ debetur, ſimul & habetur, bonitati. Primùm, quòd in eccleſiæ tuæ cauſa dimicantibus tam fortem & alacrem ſpiritum omnibuſque tormentis maiorem aduerſus parricidas Papiſtas ſubminiſtraſti. 1

Debetur & hoc priuatim meo quoque nomine ſingulari tuæ pietati, quòd vitam toties alioqui nutantem, in hac tanta, quantam tu ſolus nouiſti, laboris immenſitate conſeruatam tuo volueris beneficio. 3

Verùm illud imprimis omnes debemus pariter effuſiſſimo tuo in nos amori, quòd beatorum Martyrum tuorum, quos mundi huius ad flammas & cineres adegerit peruerſitas, cauſam & innocentiam velut è cinere recollectam, in lucem denuò notitiamq; eccleſiæ tuæ reuocare ac patefacere dignatus ſis. Etſi enim dubium non eſt, quin in ſupremo illo iudicio tuo, quum virtutes cœlorum mouebuntur, omnis eorum ad amuſſim 4 excutietur causa ante tribunal tuum, est tamen aliquid hîc quoque in ecclesia tua, causam ipsorum, facta, vitæque virtutes cæteras non ignorari. Tunc autem ad illos vberior gloria, ad nos interea maior redundabit fructus, quando ex ipsorum rectè factis, integritate, innocentia, fide ac patientia constare poterit, non quid ipsi solùm fecerint, sed quid & nobis eorum sit exemplo faciendum.

Deploratio nostrorum morum & temporum.

Sed hic rursus (dulcissime Iesu) opus est benigno fauoris tui præsidio. Nos enim qui filij Martyrum tuorum sumus, quosque maximè maiores nostros imitari conueniebat, nunc nihil ferè parentum tenemus, præter vitæ solam hanc, quam suo partam sanguine reliquerunt, libertatem: qua etiam ipsa nimium abutimur intemperanter, vt iam periculum sit, ne non filij modò Martyrum, sed ne fratres quidem ipsorum haberi mereamur. Quantum enim intersit discriminis, quamque prorsus disconuenit ordine toto nostra consuetudo ab illorum vestigijs & disciplina, pudet profectò referre. Sed quid ego tibi referam, cuius nihil non perspicit maiestas ac intuetur? Quanto illis studio ac curæ fuit amore tui, cætera quæq;, adeoq; seipsos ad vitæ etiam contemptũ abdicare, mundum cum omnibus desiderijs flocci facere, voluptates tanquam nugas spernere? Nec sinebant pericula vndiq; imminentia opibus congerendis, multoq; minus honoribus cumulandis vacare. Contrà verò, nostra nunc vita, studium, omnisq; adeò contentio, quid nisi mundum spirat, quid aliud quàm perpetuum quoddam fluxarum rerum, opum, ac honorũ aucupium videtur & ambitus? At illi quam præclarè secum actum putassent, si vel viuere modò licuisset. Ideoq; multi fuere eorum, qui Mariæ Reginæ facultates & possessiones omnes aduſque extremum assem obtulerunt, dummodo solam ipsis remitteret conscientiam. Et quæ nos tanta hæc habendi intemperies exagitat, quibus nec vnus nec mediocris victus possit esse satis? Sine modo, sine fine, opibus, sacerdotijs, censuiq; dilatãdo inhiamus. Quanto ambitu amicos fatigamus & inimicos, non vt viuamus solùm, verùm vt sublimes viuamus & honorati? De fide, de mansuetudine eorum, tolerantia, simplicitate, ac patientia incredibili, quid dici satis potest? Quanta cõstantia, qua animi alacritate perpessi sunt quicquid infligebatur, vindictam omnem deo remittentes, cui & causam commendabant? Nulla vis eos aduersariorum deijcere, nec minæ frangere, non ludibria mouere, non pericula, non tormenta vlla consternere, nec delinire blanditia potuerunt.

Quanta degeneratio nostrorum nunc hominum, ab exemplis superiorum Martyrum.

Componamus nunc nostram cum his mollitiem. Sed pudor prohibet. Nam quæ tam leuis nos tentationis aura afflare possit, quæ non illico præcipites ac transuersos rapiat in auaritiam, in fastum, voluptates, turpitudinem, vindictam, & in quid non malorum? Quæ tam leuis obijci poterit iniuriola, pro qua non cœlum terræ miscemus, mariáque turbamus ab imo? Ex quo in promptu est colligere, quantum ab eo absumus, vt mortem simus vnquam, tua causa subituri, si quando res Martyrium flagitet, quum nec affectus quidem istos tuo amputare iussu velimus. Quapropter vt Martyrum quidem illorum causa gratias agimus nomini tuo sancto: ita nostra vicissim causa deprecamur, vt qui largitus sis ipsis vincendi facultatem, nobis itidem pia eorundem exempla imitandi felicitatem aspires: sicque ecclesiæ tuæ affulgeat tua gratia, necubi seducti huius mundi illecebris, socordiores ipsi in retinenda Euangelij tui victoria, quàm illi in comparanda strenui, videamur. Postremò, quoniam historiam hanc tuo nutu ac voluntate aggressi, in ea re operam studiumq; posuimus, quo facta gestaque sanctorum tuorum (sanctissime Iesu) ad nominis tui gloriam, & in commodum ecclesiæ publicum emergerent, adde nunc labori fructum, simulq; historiæ tutelam in te recipias magnopere petimus: cui & opus ipsum, totumque meipsum, quem tot modis tuæ misericordiæ debeo, toto corpore & anima, totisque viribus commendo, dedico, consecroque; cui omne cadat genu, omnisque vox & lingua confessionis gloriam per omnes ecclesias tribuat personétque. Amen.

Necessaria precatio.

TO THE RIGHT VERTVOVS, MOST EXCELLENT AND NOBLE PRINCESSE, QVEENE ELIZABETH, OVR DREAD LADIE, BY THE grace of God, Queene of England, France and Ireland, Defender of Christs faith and Gospell, and principall Gouernor both of the Realme, and also ouer the said Church of England and Ireland, vnder Christ the Supreame head of the same, &c Iohn Fox her humble subiect wisheth daily increase of Gods holy Spirit and Grace, with long raigne, perfect health, and ioyfull peace to gouerne his flocke committed to her charge, to the example of all good Princes, the comfort of his Church, and glorie of his blessed name.

CHRIST the Prince of all Princes, who hath placed you in your throne of Maiestie, vnder him to gouerne the Church and Realme of England, giue your roiall Highnes long to sit, and many yeeres to raigne ouer vs, in all flourishing felicitie, to his gracious pleasure, and long lasting ioy of all your subiects: Amen.

When I first presented these ACTS and MONVMENTS vnto your Maiestie (most deare Soueraigne, Queene ELIZABETH, our peaceable SALOME) which your Maiesties rare clemencie receiued in such gentle part: I well hoped that these my trauels in this kind of writing had bin well at an end, whereby I might haue returned my studies againe to other purposes after mine owne desire, more fit then to write histories, especially in the English tongue. But certaine euill disposed persons, of intemperant tongues, aduersaries to good proceedings, would not suffer me so to rest, fuming and fretting, and raising vp such miserable exclamations at the first appearing of the booke, as was wonderfull to heare. A man would haue thought Christ to haue bin new borne againe, and that Herod with all the Citie of Ierusalem had been in an vprore. Such blustring and stirring was then against that poore booke, thorow all quarters of England, euen to the gates of Louaine: so that no English Papist almost in all the Realme thought himselfe a perfect Catholike, vnlesse he had cast out some word or other to giue that booke a blow.

Whereupon, considering with my selfe what should moue them thus to rage, first I began with more circumspect diligence to ouerlooke againe that I had done. In searching whereof, I found the fault both what it was, and where it lay: which was indeed, not so much in the booke it selfe (to say the truth) as in another certain priuie mysterie and working of some: of whom Ioannes Auentinus shall tell vs in his owne words, and shew vs who they bee: Quibus, inquit, audiendi quæ fecerint pudor est: nullus faciendi, quæ audire erubescunt. Illic, vbi opus, nihil verentur: hic, vbi nihil opus est, ibi verentur, &c. Who being ashamed belike to heare their worthie stratagems like to come to light, sought by what meanes they might, the stopping of the same. And becaus they could not worke it per brachicum seculare, by publike authoritie (the Lord of heauen long preserue your noble Maiestie) they renewed againe an old wonted practise of theirs: doing in like sort herein as they did sometimes with the holy Bible in the daies of your renowmed father of famous memory king Henry the eight; who when they neither by manifest reason could gainestand the matter contained in the booke, nor yet abide the comming out thereof, then sought they by a subtill deuised traine to depraue the translation, notes and prologues thereof; bearing the king in hand and all the people, that there were in it a thousand lies, and I cannot tell how many moe. Not that there were such lies in it in very deed: but because the comming of that booke should not bewray their lying falshood, therefore they thought best to begin first to make exceptions themselues against it: playing in their stage, like as Phormio did in the old Comedie, who being in all the fault himselfe, began first to quarrell with Demipho, when Demipho rather had good right to lay Phormio by the heeles.

With like facing brags these Catholike Phormiones thinke now to dash out all good bookes, and amongst others, also these Monuments of Martyrs. Which godly martyrs, as they could not abide being aliue, so neither can they now suffer their memories to liue after their death, lest the acts of them being knowne, might bring perhaps their wicked acts and cruell murthers to detestation: and therefore spurne they so vehemently against this booke of histories, with all kind of contumelies and vprores, railing and wondering vpon it; much like as I haue heard of a company of theeues, who in robbing a certaine true man by the high waies side, when they had found a piece of gold or two about him more then he would be acknowne of, they cried out of the falsehood of the world, maruelling and complaining what little truth was to be found in men.

Euen so these men deale also with me: for when they themselues altogether delight in vntruths, and haue replenished the whole Church of Christ with fained fables, lying miracles, false visions, miserable errors contained in their Missals and Portuses, Breuiars, and Summaries, and almost no true tale in all their Saints liues and Festiuals, as now also no great truths in our Louanian bookes, &c. Yet notwithstanding, as though they were a people of much truth, and that the world did not perceiue them, they pretend a face and Zeale of great veritie: And as though there were no histories else in all the world corrupted, but onely this historie of Acts and Monuments, with tragicall voices they exclaime and wonder vpon it, sparing no cost of Hyperbolicall phrases to make it appeare as full of lies as lines: &c. much after the like sort of impudencie as sophisters vse sometimes in their Sophismes to doe (and sometimes is vsed also in Rhetorike) that when an argument commeth against them which they cannot well resolue indeed, they haue a rule to shift off the matter with stout words and tragicall admiration, whereby to dash the opponent out of countenance, bearing the hearers in hand, the same to be the weakest and slenderest argument that euer was heard, not worthy to be answered, but vtterly to be hissed out of the Schooles.

With like sophistication these also fare with me, who when they neither can abide to heare their owne doings declared, nor yet denie the same, which they heare to be true, for three or foure escapes in the booke committed (and yet some of them in the booke amended) they neither reading the whole, nor rightly vnderstanding that they read, inueigh and maligne so peruerslie the setting out thereof, as though neither any word in all that story were true, nor any other storie false in all the world besides. And yet in accusing these my accusers, I doe not so excuse my selfe, nor defend my booke, as though nothing in it were to bee sponged or amended. Therefore I haue taken these paines, and reiterated my labours in trauelling out the storie againe; doing herein as Penelope did with her web, vntwisting that she had done before: Or as builders doe sometimes, which build and take downe again, either to transpose the fashion, or to make the foundation larger. So in recognising this History I haue imploied a little more labour, partly to enlarge the argument which I took in hand: partly also to assay, whether by any paines taking I might pacifie the stomacks, or satisfie the iudgements of these importune quarrellers: which neuertheless I feare I shall not doe, when I haue done all I can. For well I know that all the heads of this hissing Hydra will neuer be cut off, though I were as strong as Hercules. And if Apelles the skilfull Painter, when he had bestowed all his cunning vpon a piece of worke, which no good artificer would or could greatly reproue, yet was not without some controlling Sutor, which tooke vpon him Vltra crepidam, much more may I looke for the like in these controlling daies.

Ne sutor vltra crepidam.

Neuertheless committing the successe thereof vnto the Lord, I haue aduentured againe vpon this storie of the Church, and haue spent not onely my paines, but also almost my health therein, to bring it to this. Which now being finished, like as before I did: so againe I exhibit and present the same vnto your Princely Maiestie, blessing my Lord my God with all my heart: first for this libertie of peace and time which through your peaceable gouernment he hath lent vnto vs for the gathering both of this and other like bookes, tractations and monuments requisite to the behoofe of his Church, which hitherto by iniquitie of time could not be contriued in any Kings raigne since the conquest, before these Alcyon daies of yours.

Secondly, as we are all bound with publicke voices to magnifie our God for this happie preseruation of your roiall estate: so priuately for mine owne part, I also acknowledge my selfe bound to my God and to my Sauiour, who so graciouslie in such weake health, hath lent me time, both to finish this worke, and also to offer the second dedication thereof to your Maiestie: desiring the same to accept in worth the donation thereof, if not for the worthines of the thing giuen, yet as a testification of the bounden seruice and good will of one, which by this he here presenteth, declareth what he would, if he had better to giue.

Profit to be taken by examples of Christian martyrs. Gods workes to be obserued in histories. What vse commeth by reading of Histories.

And though the storie being written in the popular tongue, serueth not so greatly for your owne peculiar reading, nor for such as be learned: yet I shall desire both you and them, to consider in it the necessitie of the ignorant flocke of Christ committed to your gouernment in this Realme of England. Who, as they haue bin long led in ignorance, and wrapt in blindnesse for lacke especially of Gods word, and partly also for wanting the light of historie, pity I thought but that such should bee helped, their ignorance relieued, and simplicitie instructed. I considered they were the flocke of Christ, and your subiects, belonging to your account and charge, bought with the same price, and hauing as deare soules to the Lord as other. And though they be but simple and vnlearned, yst not vnapt to be taught if they were applied. Furthermore, what inconuenience groweth of ignorance, where knowledge lacketh, both I considered, and experience daily teacheth.

And therefore, hearing of the vertuous inclination of your Maiestie, what a prouident care and zeale full of solicitude you haue, minding (speedily I trust) to furnish all quarters and countries of this your Realme with the voice of Christs Gospel, and faithfull preaching of his word, I thought also not vnprofitable to adioine vnto this your godly proceedings, and to the office of the ministerie, the knowledge also of Ecclesiasticall historie, which in my mind ought not to be separate from the same: that like as by the one the people may learne the rules and precepts of doctrine: so by the other they may haue examples of Gods mightie working in his Church, to the confirmation of their faith, and the edification of Christian life. For as we see what light and profit commeth to the Church by histories in old times set forth of the Iudges, Kings, Machabees, and the Acts of the Apostles after Christs time: so likewise may it redound to no small vse in the Church, to know the Acts of Christs martyrs now since the time of the Apostles.

Besides other manifold examples and experiments of Gods great mercies and iudgements in preseruing his Church, in ouerthrowing tyrants, in confounding pride, in altering states and kingdomes, in conseruing Religion against errours and dissensions, in releeuing the godly, in brideling the wicked, loosing and tying vp againe of Satan the disturber of commonweales, in punishing transgressions as well against the first Table as the second: wherein is to be seene Idolatrie punished, blasphemie plagued, contempt of Gods holie name and Religion reuenged, murder with murder rewarded, Adulterers and Wedlock breakers destroied, periuries, extortions, couetous oppressions, & fraudulent counsels come to nought, with other excellent works of the Lord: the obseruing and noting wherof in histories, minister to the readers therof wholesome admonitions of life: with experience and wisdome both to know God in his works, and to worke the thing that is godlie: especially to seeke vnto the sonne of God for their saluation, and in his faith onely to find that they seeke for, and in no other meanes. The continuance and constancy of which faith, the Lord of his grace and goodnes grant to your noble Maiesty, and to his whole beloued Church, and al the members of the same, to euerlasting life:

Amen.

Me verò, neſcio quo pacto, longe diuerſa quidem hactenus exercuit vitæ ratio; quippe cui nec fortunæ illam fœlicitatem, in cuius complexibus tam multos ſuauiter foueri video, nec otij amœnitatem experiri, vix etiam per omnem vitam deguſtare in continuo laborum ac negotiorum feruore ac contentione contigerit. Quanquam de fortuna parum queror quam ſemper contempſi, quin neque de laboribus multum dicturus, ſi modò labores ij, tantum vel prodeſſe vel placere cæteris poſſent hominibus, quantũ me priuatim atterunt incommodántq;. Nunc ad meæ infœlicitatis cumulum accedit inſuper, quòd in eo argumenti genere laborandum fuit, quod præter lugubrem rerum ipſarum materiam, præter linguæ inamœnitatem, præter tractandi difficultatem, quæ vix nitorem recipiat orationis, eò porro autorem ipſum redigit anguſtiæ, vt neque falſa narrare ſine iniuria hiſtoriæ, nec verum dicere ſine magna ſua inuidia odióque multorum liceat. Nam cùm in eo hiſtoriæ argumento mihi verſandum fuit, quod non ad ſuperiorum modò temporum res geſtas alteq; repetitas pertineat, ſed hanc ipſam ætatem noſtram, noſtræq; gentis nunc homines etiamnũ præſentes, viuóſq; ſic attingat, ſic perfricet, ſic deſignet, quemadmodum in hoc materiæ genere neceſſariò faciundũ fuit: quæſo, quid hic mihi aliud expectandum ſit, niſi poſtquam fruſtra me defatigando, valetudinem attriuerim, oculos perdiderim, ſenium acciuerim, corpus exhauſerim, demum, vt poſt hæc omnia multorum me hominum odijs, ſibilis, inuidiæ ac calumniæ exponam? In tot iſtis aſperitatibus cùm nihil me tutum præſtare poterit, non Cæſar, non Monarchæ, non Rex, non Regina, non vlla huius mundi præſidia, præter ſolam diuini numinis potentem dexteram: principiò igitur, atque ante omnia huc ceu ad tutiſſimum aſylum me recepi, huic me librúmque commendaui & commendo. Tum vero inſuper in eodem domino tuum illum candorem (docte piéq; Lector) eamq; tuam humanitatem appellare volui, qua ex humanioribus literis ſtudijſque te ſcio præditum, quo noſtris his ſudoribus tuæ approbationis accedat calculus; aut ſi approbationem non mereamur, ſaltem ne fauoris deſit benignitas: cui ſi approbatum iri hanc hiſtoriæ noſtræ farraginem ſenſerimus, cæterorum iudicia obtrectatorum leuius feremus.

Nam alioquì non defuturos ſat ſcio qui varijs modis nobis faceſſent moleſtiam. Habebit hîc Momus ſuos morſus, Sycophanta ſuos ſibilos, nec deerit Calumniatori ſua lingua & aculeus, quem infigat. Hic fidem detrahet hiſtoriæ: Ille artificium in tractando, alter diligentiam, vel in excutiendis rebus iudicium deſiderabit. Illi forſan operis diſplicebit moles, vel minus diſpoſita ſeruataque temporum ratio. Et ſi nihil horum fuerit, attamen in tanta religionis pugna, in tanta iudiciorum, capitum, ſenſuum varietate, vbi ſuæ quiſq; fauet ac blanditur factioni, quid tam affabrè aut circumſpectè enarrari poteſt, quod placeat vniuerſis? Quin & iam nunc muſſitari etiam audio a nonnullis, qui longa ſeſe teneri dicant expectatione, quoad hæc tandẽ (Legenda noſtra, vt appellant; Aurea) euulganda ſit: qui ſi noſtram primùm in eo tarditatem reprehenſam velint, næ ego ſuaues iſtos homines viciſſim rogatos velim, vt ipſi prius in edendis ſuis ſe præbeant expeditiores, quã alienã inceſſant lentitudinem.

Deinde, ſi tardius exeat ipſorum opinione volumen, meminerint prouerbiali præcepto, lentam eſſe feſtinationem oportere: Et bos dicitur laſſus fortiùs pedẽ figere. Egimus in hac quidẽ re pro virili noſtra: egimus ſpero & pro officio, ſi non ſatis pro tẽporis modo expeditè, at egimus certè pro valetudine; addã porro, egimus ſupra valetudinem. Quin & illud ipſorum venia adijcere liceat, egiſſe nos maturiùs quàm ipſis forſan expediet, qui in hunc nugantur modum: certè maturatiùs egimus, quam tanti momenti & magnitudinis negotio conueniebat, quod accuratiorem in digerendis rebus moram curamque poſtulabat, cùm a nobis vix integros datos eſſe menſes octodecim præparandæ materiæ, comportandis componendiſque rebus, conferendis exemplaribus, lectitandis codicibus, reſcribendis his quæ ſcripto mandata erant, caſtigandis formulis, concinandæ hiſtoriæ, & in ordinem redigendæ, &c. nouerunt ij qui teſtes adfuerint, & temporis conſcij, & laboris ſocij. Quod ſi autem Legendæ ſuæ aureæ titulum huc eò accomodant, quòd illius exemplo hanc ſimiliter fabuloſam putent hiſtoriam, hincq; odioſo vocabulo eius præiudicent veritati, quid his reſpondeam aliud quã quòd ingenuè ſuam ipſi prodant calumniam, quam ne editione quidem libri differre queant, prius de rebus dijudicantes quam nouerint. Atq; interim quidem illud bene habet, quòd ipſis tandem aliquando Aureæ ſuæ legendæ pudeat tam fabuloſæ. Et tamen fabellis illis non puduit mundum tam diu lùdificare, periculum etiam inentantes his, ſi qui Legendæ illi, hoc eſt, mendaciſſimis illorum nugis, auderent detrahere. Quare nihil magis eſſe poſſit impium, quàm ſacroſanctam eccleſiæ fidem fabulamentis huiuſmodi confictiſque præter omnem veri fidem delirijs commaculare; tamen ineptiſſimi iſti nugatores ex ſuo ingenio cæteros quoſque ſcriptores metientes, nec ipſi verum adferre ſatagunt, nec afferentibus alijs fidem habendam putant, cuncta videlicet ſuis aureis ſomnijs ſimilia exiſtimantes? Quin apage cum Aurea tua legenda, nugator impudens; quem ego librum, cum omnes eum ſcimus, nec ipſe ignoras prodigioſis mendaciorum portentis & vaniſſimis vndique commentis ſcatere, ne cum Homeri quidem fabulis conferre velim: tantum abeſt vt eum verè ſerijs grauibuſque eccleſiæ hiſtorijs quicquam commune habeat. Quid? an quia Papistis illis tuis & impuris monachis sic libuit in ridiculis miraculorum suorum portentis in epitre, tu protinus nullam grauem historiæ authoritatem putas in ecclesia admittendam? Quin eadem lege & de Eusebij ecclesiastica, & tripartita Sozomeni & Socratis cæterorúmque historijs iudicemus. Sunt præter hæc & alia quædam de Sanctis & Diuis conscripta miracula, quæ propius ad Legendam hanc accedunt, & tamen ne quaquam eo loco apud nos habentur, vt Legendæ illi papisticæ annumerentur, etiam quæ suspectissimæ sunt fidei Quanquam de scriptoribus cæteris meâ nihil interest censuram ferre. Quòd ad hanc verò nostram τῶν μαρτύρων attinet, testatum id velim vniuersis, datam esse à nobis operam sedulò, ne quid vsquam inesset operi fabulosum, aut eiusmodi, quod vel a nobis fictum, vel quod Legendæ illi aureæ (magis dicam plumbeæ) non vndique foret dissimilimum. Id quod res ipsa & natiua historiæ facies testari poterit, cuius tota textura ex ipsis Episcoporum Archiuis atque Regestris, partimque ex proprijs martyrum ipsorum literis hausta ac conflata videri poterit. In qua historia etsi neque id exigam vt singula hic pro oraculis habeantur, at dedimus tamen pro virili operam, vt si non plenè assequeremur, accederemus tamen quàm proxime ad veterem illam historiæ legem, vt duas res, præcipuas historiæ pestes, vitaremus, timorem videlicet & assentationem: quarum altera sæpe minus dicit, altera semper plus addit quàm par est, narrationi. Sed huius rei fidem ex ipso magis opere, quam ex mea commendatione astrui honestius est. Habet enim veritas ipsa simplicem suam & natiuam faciem, quam non erit difficile non muccosis naribus lectori, ex ipso vel orationis habitu, aut rerum aspectu, siue alijs circumstantiarum notis deprehendere. Sed vereor ne hîc quoque, quemadmodum cæteris in rebus, locum habeat veteris prouerbij experientia: faciunt quippe mendaces vt ne vera etiam dicenti fides habeatur. Cum hactenus in Martyrologicis sanctorum legendis vitísque describendis mendacia, ac nugacissimæ somniorum fictiones pro veris legantur narrationibus, fit vt & cæteræ eiusdem argumenti materiæ eandem pariter suspicionem subeant, vt vix iam quicquam legi diciue in ecclesia cum fide queat. Verùm huic malo cùm mederi nequeamus, satis erit, quod nostrarum erat virium id nos præstitisse. Quod superest, diuinæ curandum prouidentiæ relinquamus. Atque de certitudine veritatéque historiæ hæc hactenus: quæ vtinam ne tam vera quidem certáque esset, quàm isti videri volunt, at falsa potius, consimilísque huic, quam dicunt, Aureæ ipsorum Legendæ, aut Vitis patrum, aut Festiuali, aut Dormi-secure; cæterísq; Papisticis istis τῶν τῶν λεγομένων λεγομένων foret. Nunc verò martyrum horum non à nobis ficta, sed inflicta à vobis supplicia, atroxque cædes veriorem hanc comprobant historiam, plurésque suæ veritatis testes habent quam vellemus ipsi qui historiam scripsimus. Venio iam ad alteram criminationis partem, quæ de Calendario fortassis obijcietur. Audio enim & hic mihi obstrepere non tacitas modò sententias, sed apertas papistarum quorundam voces, quibus iniquè a me factum videbitur, quòd antiquatis atque ex Calendario explosis veteris ecclesiæ Diuis, Martyribus, Confessoribus, Virginibúsq;, nouos eorum loco Martyres ac Confessores infulciam. Primùm, nulli ego veterum Diuorum hoc facto præiudicatum velim. Neque verò ideo inter Diuos a me referuntur isti, quòd inferuntur in Calendarium. Hanc ego apotheosin mihi nunquam sumpsi, quam sibi tam confidenter sumpsit Gregorius nonus. Porro, neque eò spectat hoc Calendarium, vt nouam aliquam festorum dierum legem præscribam ecclesiæ: Tum multò minus cultum sancti alicuius instituo. Festorum dierum iam plus satis erat in mundo. Vtinam dominicum solum sabbatum dignè, atque vt par est, transigeremus. Habeãt per me suum papistæ Calendarium. Habeat & ecclesia suos sanctos, tum recentes tum veteranos, modò probatos, modò interim ijdem ne colantur, modò quàm sint vetusti, tàm verè etiam sancti sint.

Verùm enimuero cum non dubitauit sua etiam ætatæ Hieronymus multos existimare eorum gehennæ ignibus cruciari, quos multi passim pro sanctis haberent in ecclesia: quid hîc tum diceret Hieronymus, si modò superstes papisticam hanc sanctorum colluuiem & Calendaria, tot Papis, tot Episcopis, & Abbatibus oblita cerneret?

Quanquam à me quidem non aliter Calendarium hoc institutum est, nisi vt pro Indice duntaxat, suum cuiusque Martyris mensem & annum designante, ad priuatum Lectoris seruiret vsum. Et tamen si in templis etiam fas sit singulorum mensium dies proprijs sanctorum nomenclaturis consignare; quî minus liceat id mihi in veris istis facere Martyribus, quod ipsi in suis pseudomartyribus, tanta sibi licentia, ne dicam impudentia, permiserunt? Si non pœna, sed causa Martyrem faciat, cur non vnum Cranmerum sexcentis Becketis Cantuarienſibus non conferam, sed prætulerim? Quid in Nicolao Ridleo videtur cum quouis Diuo Nicolao non conferendum? Qua in re Latimerus, Hoperus, Marsheus, Simpsonus, cæterique Christiani martyrij Candidati, inferiores summis maximísque illis papistici Calendarij Diuis, imo multis etiam nominibus non præponendi videantur? Interim nullius ego boni sanctíque viri (modò qui verè sanctus sit) causam lædo, nec memoriam extinguo, nec gloriam minuo. Et si cui hoc displiceat Calendarium, meminerit, non in templis collocari, sed domesticæ tantum lectioni præparari.

Sed missis hisce aduersariorum calumnijs, ad te, docte candidéque Lector (quoniam hæc ad te instituta est epistola) tempus est vt recurrat oratio, cuius in his rebus iudicium vt pluris æstimo, ita egeo magis hîc quoque patrocinio. Scio enim in vasta hac congerie reperies nonnulla, ad quæ meritò corruges frontem. Neque vero fieri facilè potuit, præsertim in tanta operis præcipitatione, vt cuncta ad amussim atq; ad vnguem perfectè adeo elimarentur, quin alicubi vel ex lassitudine dormitaret scriptor, vel per incuriam excideret authori alquid, vel ex festinatione eueniret, quod cani solet in prouerbijs nimium præ studio properanti, cæcos nimirum producenti catulos. In quibus quidem excutiendis rebus magis nobis venia tua quam censura imploranda est. Quamobrem paucis hæc apud te, docte simul & humanissime Lector, ante operis ingressum libuit προοιμιάζεσθαι, vt si quid inter euoluendum occurrerit, non omnibus perfectum numeris, non ad Cleantis lucernam elucubratum, non ad exquisitum Theologorum acumen expressum, aut minus alioqui acutisimis tuis dignum naribus, cogites hæc non tuis auribus data esse, sed meæ, hoc est, crassioris turbæ hominibus, a quibus facilius leguntur libri quam iudicantur. Aut si ne id quidem grauissimæ tuæ sententiæ fecerit satis, liceat illa mihi vti lege, qua semper permissum est, opere in magno scriptori obrepere somnum. Quod si verò tuam hac in re facilitatem impetrauero, minus laborabo quid cæteri obstrepant, Græci memor prouerbij, cuius & ipsos commeminisse velim: μωμήσονται με θεασόμενοι ἢ μιμήσονται.

TO THE TRVE AND FAITHFVLL CONGREGATION OF CHRISTS VNIVERSALL CHVRCH, with all and ſinguler the members thereof, whereſoeuer congregated or diſperſed thorow the realme of England; a Proteſtation or Petition of the Author, wiſhing to the ſame abundance of all peace and tranquillity, with the ſpeedie com-ming of Chriſt the Sponſe, to make an end of all mortall miſerie.

Salomon the peaceable prince of Iſrael, as we reade in the third of Kings, after he had finiſhed the building of the Lords Temple (which he had vij. yeeres in hand) made his petition to the Lord for all that ſhould pray in the ſaid Temple, or turne their face toward it. And his requeſt was granted, the Lord anſwering him, as we reade in the ſaid book, cap. 6. I haue heard (ſaith he) thy prayer, and haue ſanctified this place, &c. Albeit, the infinite maieſtie of God is not to be compaſſed in any materiall walles, yet it ſo pleaſed his goodnes to reſpect this prayer of the King, that not onely hee promiſed to heare them which there prayed, but alſo repleniſhed the ſame with his owne glory. For ſo we reade again in the book aforeſaid: Et non poterant miniſtrare propter nebulam, quia repleuit gloria domini, domum domini: 3. Reg. 7.

Vpon the like truſt in Gods gracious goodneſſe, if I ſinnefull wretch, not comparing with the building of that Temple, but following the zeale of the builder, might either be ſo bold to aske, or ſo happie to ſpeed, after my vij. yeeres trauell about this Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtory, moſt humbly would craue of almighty God, to beſtow his bleſſing vpon the ſame, that as the prayers of them, which prayed in the outward Temple, were heard: ſo all true diſpoſed minds, which ſhall reſort to the reading of this preſent hiſtorie, containing the Acts of Gods holy Martyrs, and Monuments of his Church, may by example of their life, faith and doctrine, receiue ſome ſuch ſpirituall fruit to their ſoules through the operation of his grace, that it may be to the aduancement of his glory, and profit of his Church, through Chriſt Ieſus our Lord: Amen.

But as it happened in that Temple of Salomon, that al which came thither, came not to pray, but many to prate, ſome to gaze and ſee newes, other to talke and walke, ſome to buy and ſell, ſome to carpe and find fault, and finally, ſome alſo at the laſt to deſtroy and plucke downe, as they did in deed: For what is in this world ſo ſtrong, but it will be impugned? what ſo perfect, but it will be abuſed? ſo true, that will not be contraried? or ſo circumſpectly done, wherein wrangling Theon will not ſet in his tooth? Euen ſo, neither doe I look for any other in this preſent hiſtory; but that amongſt many well diſpoſed Readers, ſome Waſpes neſt or other will bee ſtirred vp to buzze about mine eares. Such a dangerous thing it is now adaies to write or doe any good, but either by flattering a man muſt offend the godly, or by true ſpeaking procure hatred with the wicked. Of ſuch ſtinging Waſpes and buzzing Drones I had ſufficient triall in my former edition before; who if they had found in my booke any iuſt cauſe to carpe, or vpon any true zeale of truth had proceeded againſt the vntruths of my ſtory, and had brought iuſt proofes for the ſame, I could haue right well abid it. For God forbid, but that faults whereſoeuer they be, ſhould be detected and accuſed. And therefore accuſers in a common-wealth, after my mind, do ſerue to no ſmall ſtead.

But then ſuch accuſers muſt beware they play not the dog, of whom Cicero in his Oration ſpeaketh, which being ſet in Capitolio to fray away theeues by night, left the theeues, and fell to barke at true men walking in the day. Where true faults be, there to bay and barke is not amiſſe. But to carpe where no cauſe is, to ſpie in other ſtrawes, and leape ouer their own blocks: to ſwallow Camels, and to ſtraine Gnats: to oppreſſe truth with lies, and to ſet vp lies for truth: to blaſpheme the deare Martyrs of Chriſt, and to canonize for Saints, whom Scripture would ſcarce allow for good Subiects; that is intollerable. Such barking curs, if they were well ſerued, would be made a while to ſtoope. But with theſe brauling ſpirits I intend not at this time much to wraſtle.

Wherefore to leaue them a while, till further leaſure ſerue me to attend vpon them, thus much I thought in the meane ſeaſon, by way of proteſtation or petition, to write vnto you, both in generall and particular the true members and faithful congregation of Chriſts Church, whereſoeuer either congregated together, or diſperſed thorow the whole realme of England; that forſomuch as al the ſeeking of theſe aduerſaries is to doe what they can, by diſcrediting of this hiſtory with ſlanders and ſiniſter ſurmiſes, how to withdraw the readers from it: this therefore ſhall be in few words to premoniſh and deſire of all and ſinguler of you (all well minded louers and partakers of Chriſts Goſpel) not to ſuffer your ſelues to be deceiued with the big brags, and hyperbolicall ſpeeches of thoſe ſlandering tongues, whatſoeuer they haue or ſhall hereafter exclame againſt the ſame: but indifferently ſtaying your iudgement till truth bee tried, you will firſt peruſe, and then refuſe: meaſuring the vntruths of this hiſtorie, not by the ſcoring vp of their hundreds and thouſands of lies which they giue out, but wiſely weighing the purpoſe of their doings, according as you find, and ſo to iudge of the matter.

To reade my books I allure neither one nor other. Euery man as he ſeeth cauſe, ſo like as he liſt. If any ſhall think his labour too much in reading this ſtory, his choice is free either to reade this, or any other which he more mindeth. But if the fruit thereof ſhall recompence the readers trauell, then would I wiſh no man ſo light eared, to be carried away for any ſiniſter clamour of aduerſaries, who many times depraue good doings, not for the faults they find, but therfore find faults becauſe they would depraue. As for me and my hiſtory, as my will was to profit all and diſpleaſe none: ſo if skill in any part wanted to will, yet hath my purpoſe bin ſimple, and certes the cauſe no leſſe vrgent alſo, which mooued me to take this enterpriſe in hand.

For firſt, to ſee the ſimple flock of Chriſt, eſpecially the vnlearned ſort, ſo miſerably abuſed, and al for ignorance of hiſtorie, not knowing the courſe of times, and true deſcent of the Church, it pitied me, that part of diligence ſo long to haue bin vnſupplied in this my countrie Church of England. Againe, conſidering the multitude of Chroniclers and Storie-writers, both in England and out of England, of whom the moſt part haue bin either Monkes or Clients to the ſee of Rome, it grieued me to behold how partially they handled their ſtories. Whoſe painefull trauell albeit I cannot but commend, in committing diuers things to writing, not vnfruitfull to bee knowne, nor vnpleaſant to be read: yet it lamented me to ſee in their Monuments the principall points, which chiefly concerned the ſtate of Chriſts Church, and were moſt neceſſarie of all Chriſtian people to bee knowne, either altogether pretermitted, or if any mention thereof were inſerted, yet were all things drawne to the honour ſpecially of the Church of Rome, or elſe to the fauour of their owne ſect of Religion. Whereby the vulgar ſort, hearing and reading in their writings no other Church mentioned or magnified, but only that Church which here floriſhed in this world in riches and iollity, were drawne alſo to the ſame perſwaſion, to thinke no other Church to haue ſtood in all the earth, but only the Church of Rome.

The partiall dealing of ſtorie writers.

In the number of this ſort of writers, beſides our Monks of England (for euery Monaſtery almoſt had his Chronicler) I might alſo recite both Italian, and other countrie authors, as Platina, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, Martinus, Antoninus, Vincentius, Onuphrius, Laziardus, Georgius Lilius, Polyd. Virgilius, with many moe, who taking vpon them to intermeddle with matters of the Church, although in part they expreſſe ſome truth in matters concerning the biſhops and See of Rome: yet in ſuppreſſing another part, they play with vs, as Ananias & Saphira did with their money, or as Apelles did in Pliny, who painting the one halfe of Venus comming out of the ſea, left the other halfe vnperfect. So theſe writers, while they ſhew vs one halfe of the biſhop of Rome, the other half of him they leaue vnperfect, and vtterly vntold. For as they paint him out on the one part gliſtering in wealth and glorie, in ſhewing what ſucceſſion the popes had from the chaire of S. Peter, when they firſt began, and how long they ſate, what Churches, and what famous buildings they erected, how far their poſſeſſions reached, what lawes they made, what Councels they called, what honour they receiued of Kings and Emperors, what Princes and Countries they brought vnder their authoritie, with other like ſtratagems, of great pomp & roialty: ſo on y other ſide, what vices theſe popes brought with them to their ſeat, what abominations they practiſed, what ſuperſtition they maintained, what Idolatrie they procured, what wicked doctrine they defended contrary to the expreſſe word of God, to what hereſies they fell, into what diuiſion of ſects they cut the vnity of Chriſtian religion, how ſome practiſed by Simonie, ſome by Necromancie and Sorcerie, ſome by poiſoning, ſome indenting with the diuell to come by their papacie, what hypocriſie was in their liues, what corruption in their doctrin, what warres they raiſed, what bloudſhed they cauſed, what treacherie they trauerſed againſt their Lords and Emperours, impriſoning ſome, betraying ſome to the Templaries and Saracens, in bringing other vnder their feet, alſo in beheading ſome, as they did with Fredericus and Conradinus, the heires and offſpring of the houſe of Fredericus Barbaroſſa, an. 1269. Furthermore, how mightily almightie God hath ſtood againſt them, how their wars neuer proſpered againſt the Turk, how the iudgements of the godly learned from time to time haue euer repugned againſt their errors, &c. of theſe and a thouſand other moe, not one word hath bin touched, but all kept as vnder Benedicite in auricular confeſſion.

This partiall dealing and corrupt handling of hiſtories, when I conſidered, I thought with my ſelfe nothing more lacking in the church, then a ful and a complete hiſtorie, which being faithfully collected out of al our Monaſtical writers and written Monuments, ſhould containe neither euery vaine written fable, for that would be too much, nor yet leaue out any thing neceſſary, for that would be too little: but with a moderate diſcretion taking the beſt of euery one, ſhould both eaſe the labor of the Reader from turning ouer ſuch a number of writers: and alſo ſhould open the plaine truth of times lying long hid in obſcure darkeneſſe of antiquitie. Whereby all ſtudious Readers, beholding as in a glaſſe the ſtate, courſe, and alteration of religion, decay of doctrin, and the controuerſies of the Church, might diſcerne the better between antiquitie & nouelty. For if the things which be firſt (after the rule of Tertullian) are to be preferred before thoſe that be latter, then is the reading of hiſtories much neceſſarie in the Church, to know what went before, and what followed after. And therfore not without cauſe Hiſtoria, in old authors is called the witnes of times, the light of veritie, the life of memorie, teacher of life, and ſhewer of antiquitie, &c. Without the knowledge whereof mans life is blind, and ſoone may fal into any kind of error, as by manifeſt experience we haue to ſee, in theſe deſolate latter times of the Church, when as the biſhops of Rome vnder colour of antiquitie haue turned truth into hereſie, and brought ſuch new found deuices of ſtrange doctrin and religion, as in the former age of the church were neuer heard of before, and all through ignorance of times, and for lacke of true hiſtorie.

Primum quodque veriſſimum eſt: Tertul.

For to ſay the truth, if times had been well ſearched, or if they which wrote hiſtories had without partialitie gone vpright betweene God and Baal, halting on neither ſide, it might well haue been found, the moſt part of all this catholick corruption intruded into the Church by the Biſhops of Rome, as tranſubſtantiation, eleuation, and adoration of the ſacrament, auricular confeſſion, forced vowes of Prieſts not to marrie, veneration of images, priuat and ſatisfactorie maſſes, the order of Gregories maſſe now vſed, the vſurped authoritie, and Summa poteſtas of the See of Rome, with all the rout of their ceremonies and weeds of ſuperſtition ouergrowing now the Church; all theſe (I ſay) to be new-nothings lately coined in the mint of Rome without any ſtampe of antiquity, as by reading of this preſent hiſtorie ſhal ſufficiently, I truſt, appeare. Which hiſtory therfore I haue here taken in hand, that as other ſtorie-writers heretofore haue imploied their trauel to magnifie the church of Rome, ſo in this hiſtorie might appeare to all Chriſtian Readers the Image of both Churches, as wel of the one as of the other; eſpecially of the poore oppreſſed and perſecuted Church of Chriſt. Which perſecuted Church, though it hath been of long ſeaſon trodden vnder foot by enemies, neglected in the world, not regarded in hiſtories, & almoſt ſcarſe viſible or known to worldly eies, yet hath it bin the true Church only of God, wherein he hath mightily wrought hitherto in preſeruing the ſame in al extreme diſtreſſes, continually ſtirring vp from time to time faithfull miniſters, by whom alwaies hath been kept ſome ſparks of his true doctrine and religion.

Image of both Churches.

Now forasmuch as the true Church of God goeth not lightly alone, but is accompanied with ſome other Church or Chapell of the diuell to deface and maligne the ſame, neceſſarie it is therefore, the difference betweene them to be ſeene, and the deſcent of the right Church to be deſcribed from the Apoſtles time. Which hitherto in moſt part of hiſtories hath been lacking, partly for feare, that men durſt not: partly for ignorance, that men could not diſcerne rightly betweene the one and the other. Who beholding the Church of Rome to be ſo viſible & glorious in the eies of the world, ſo ſhining in outward beautie, to beare ſuch a port, to carry ſuch a traine and multitude, and to ſtand in ſuch high authority, ſuppoſed the ſame to be only the right Catholicke mother. The other, becauſe it was not ſo viſiblie knowne in the world, they thought therefore it could not be the true Church of Chriſt. Wherein they were farre deceiued. For although the right Church of God be not ſo inuiſible in the world, that none can ſee it; yet neither is it ſo viſible againe, that euery worldly eie may perceiue it. For like as is the nature of truth; ſo is the proper condition of the true Church, that commonly none ſeeth it, but ſuch onelie, as bee the members and partakers thereof. And therefore they which require that Gods holy Church ſhould bee euident and viſible to the whole world, ſeeme to define the great ſynagogue of the world rather then the true ſpirituall Church of God.

The deſcent of Chriſts Church from the Apoſtles time deſcribed.

How the true Church of Chriſt is viſible and not viſible.

In Chriſts time who would haue thought but the congregations and councels of the Phariſies had been the right Church? and yet had Chriſt an other Church in earth beſides that; which albeit it was not ſo manifeſt in the ſight of the world, yet was it the onely true Church in the ſight of God. Of this Church meant Chriſt ſpeaking of the Temple, which hee would raiſe againe the third day. And yet after that the Lord was riſen, hee ſhewed not himſelfe to the world, but onelie to his elect, which were but few. The ſame Church after that increaſed and multiplied mightily among the Iewes, yet had not the Iewes eles to ſee Gods Church, but did perſecute it till at length all their whole nation was deſtroyed.

After the Iewes, then came the Heathen Emperours of Rome, who hauing the whole power of the world in their hands, did what the world could doe, to extinguiſh the name and Church of Chriſt. Whoſe violence continued the ſpace of three hundred yeeres. All which while the true Church of Chriſt was not greatly in ſight of the world, but rather was abhorred euery where, and yet notwithſtanding the ſame ſmall ſilly flocke ſo deſpiſed in the world, the Lord highly regarded and mightilie preſerued. For although many then of the Chriſtians did ſuffer death; yet was their death neither loſſe to them, nor detriment to the Church: but the more they ſuffered, the more of their bloud increaſed.

In the time of theſe Emperours, God raiſed vp then in this Realme of Britaine diuers worthy Preachers and Witneſſes, as Elnanus, Meduinus, Meltiuianus, Amphibolus, Albanus, Aaron, Iulius, and other moe. In whoſe time the doctrine of faith without mens traditions was ſincerely preached. After their death and martyrdome, it pleaſed the Lord to prouide a generall quietneſſe to his Church, whereby the number of his flocke began more to increaſe.

The antiquity of the Church here in England, with the deſcent of the ſame.

In this age the followed here in the ſaid land of Britain, Faſtidius, Niuianus, Patricius, Batchiarius, Dubricius, Congellus, Kentigernus, Helmotus, Dauid, Daniel, Sampſon, Elnodugus, Aſaphus, Gildas, Henlanus, Elbodus, Dinothus, Samuel, Ninius. and a great ſort mo, which gouerned y Church of Britain by Chriſtian doctrin a long ſeaſon; albeit the ciuil gouernors for the time, were were then diſſolute and careleſſe, as Gildas very ſharply doth lay to their charge, and ſo at length were ſubdued by the Saxons.

All this while about the ſpace of foure hundred yeeres, Religion remained in Britaine vncorrupt, and the word of Chriſt truely preached, till about the comming of Auſten and of his companions from Rome, many of the ſaid Britaine Preachers were ſlaine by the Saxons. After that began Chriſtian faith to enter and ſpring among the Saxons, after a certaine Romiſh ſort, yet notwithſtanding ſomewhat more tollerable, then were the times which after followed, through the diligent induſtrie of ſome godly teachers, which then liued amongſt them: as Aidanus, Finianus, Coleman Archbiſhop of Yorke, Beda, Iohn of Beuerlay, Alcuinus, Noetus, Hucharius, Serlo, Achardus, Ealredus, Alexander Neckam, Negellus, Fenallus, Alfricus, Sygeferthus, and ſuch other: who, though they erred in ſome few things, yet neither ſo groſſely, nor ſo greatly to be complained of in reſpect of the abuſes that followed. For as yet, all this while, the errour of tranſubſtantiation and eleuation, with auricular confeſſion, was not crept in for a publike doctrine in Chriſts Church, as by their owne Saxon Sermon, made by Aelfricus, and ſet out in the ſecond Volume of this preſent hiſtory may appeare, pag. 1402. During the which meane time although the Biſhops of Rome were had here in ſome reuerence with the clergie: yet had they nothing as yet to doo in making lawes touching matters of the Church of England: but that onely appertained to the Kings and Gouernours of the land, as is in this ſtorie to be ſeene: page 714.

Tranſubſtantiation not yet receiued for a publicke doctrine.

And thus the Church of Rome albeit it began then to decline apace from God, yet during all this while it remained hitherto in ſome reaſonable order, till at length after that the ſaid Biſhops began to ſhoot vp in the world through the liberalitie of good Princes, and eſpecially by Mathilda a noble Duches of Italie. Who at her death made the pope heire of all her lands, and indued his ſee with great reuenewes. Then riches begat ambition: Ambition deſtroied religion, ſo that all came to ruine. Out of this corruption ſprang forth here in England (as did in other places more) another Romiſh kind of Monkery, worſe then the other before, being much more drowned in ſuperſtition and ceremonies, which was about the yeere of our Lord, 980. Of this ſwarme was Egbertus, Aigelbert, Egwine, Boniface, Wilfrede, Agathon, Iames, Romaine, Cedda, Dunſtane, Oſwold, Athelwold, Athelwine Duke of Eaſtangles, Lanfraucke, Anſelme, and ſuch other.

Monkery, when it began to raigne in England.

And yet in this time alſo through Gods prouidence, the Church lacked not ſome of better knowledge and iudgement, to weigh with the darkneſſe of thoſe daies. For although King Edgar, with Edward his baſe ſonne being ſeduced by Dunſtane, Oſwold and other monkiſh clerks, was then a great author and fautor of much ſuperſtition, erecting as many Monaſteries, as were Sundaies in the yeere: yet notwithſtanding, this continued not long. For eſtſoones after the death of Edgar came King Ethelreds and Queene Elfthred his mother, with Alferus Duke of Merceland, and other Peeres and Nobles of the Realme, who diſplaced the Monks againe, and reſtored the married prieſts to their old poſſeſſions and liuings. Moreouer, after that followed alſo the Danes, which ouerthrew thoſe monkiſh foundations as faſt as King Edgar had ſet them vp before.

And thus hitherto ſtood the condition of the true Church of Chriſt, albeit, not without ſome repugnance and difficultie, yet in ſome mean ſtate of the truth and verity, til ỹ time of pope Hildebrand called Gregorie 7. which was neere about the yeere 1080. and of pope Innocentius 3. in the yeere 1215. By whom all together was turned vpſide downe, all order broken, diſcipline diſſolued, true doctrine defaced, Chriſtian faith extinguiſhed. In ſtead whereof was ſet vp preaching of mens decrees, dreames and idle traditions. And whereas before truth was free to be diſputed amongſt learned men, now libertie was turned into law, argument into authoritie. Whatſoeuer the Biſhop of Rome denounced, that ſtood for an oracle, of all men to be receiued without oppoſition or contradiction: whatſoeuer was contrary, ipſo facto it was hereſie, to be puniſhed with fagot and flaming fire. Then began the ſincere faith of this Engliſh Church, which held out ſo long, to quaile. Then was the cleere Sunſhine of Gods word ouerſhadowed, with miſts and darkeneſſe, appearing like ſackecloth to the people, which neither could vnderſtand that they read, nor yet permitted to reade that they could vnderſtand. In theſe miſerable daies, as the true viſible Church began now to ſhrinke and keepe in for feare: ſo vpſtart a new ſort of plaiers to furniſh the ſtage, as Schoole-Doctours, Canoniſts, and foure orders of Friers. Beſides other Monaſticall ſects and fraternities of infinit varietie. Which euer ſince haue kept ſuch a ſtirre in the Church, that none for them almoſt durſt rout, neither Cæſar, King, nor ſubiect. What they defined, ſtood: What they approued, was catholick: What they condemned, was hereſie: whomſoeuer they accuſed, none almoſt could ſaue. And thus haue theſe hitherto continued or raigned rather in the Church, the ſpace now of foure hundred yeeres and od. During which ſpace, the true Church of Chriſt, although it durſt not openly appeare in the face of the world, oppreſſed by tyrannie: yet neither was it ſo inuiſible or vnknowne; but by the prouidence of the Lord, ſome remnant alwaies remained from time to time, which not onely ſhewed ſecret good affection to ſincere doctrine, but alſo ſtood in open defence of truth againſt the diſordered Church of Rome.

The true Church when it began firſt to decay.

In which Catalogue, firſt, to pretermit Bartramus & Berengarius, which were before P. Innocent 3. a learned multitude of ſufficient witneſſes here might be produced, whoſe names neither are obſcure nor doctrin vnknown: as Ioachim Abbat of Calabria, Almericus a learned Biſhop, who was iudged an hereticke for holding againſt Images, in the time of the ſaid Innocentius. Beſides the martyrs of Alſatia, of whom we reade, an hundred to be burned by the ſaid Innocentius in one day, as writeth Hermanus Mucius. Adde likewiſe to theſe, the Waldenſes or Albingenſes, which to a great number ſegregated themſelues from the Church of Rome. To this number alſo belonged Reymundus Earle of Tholoſe, Marſilius Patauius, * *Gulielmus de S. I doe but recite the principall Writers and Preachers in thoſe daies: How many thouſands there were which neuer bowed their knees to Baal, that is knowne to God alone. Of whom we find in the writings of one * Bruſnius, that xxxvi. Citizens of Maguntia were burned, an. 1390. Who following the doctrine of the Waldenſes, affirmed the Pope to be the great Antichriſt. Alſo Maſſæus recordeth of one hundred and fortie, which in the Prouince of Narbon were put to the fire, for not receiuing the decretals of Rome: beſides them that ſuffered at Paris to the number of xxiiij. at one time, anno 1210. and the next yeere after were foure hundred burnt vnder the name of heretikes. Beſides alſo a certaine good heremit, an Engliſhman, of whom mention is made in Iohn Bacon, Diſt. 2. Queſt. 1. who was committed for diſputing in Pauls Church, againſt certaine Sacraments of the Church of Rome: anno 1306.

To deſcend now ſomewhat lower in drawing out the deſcent of the Church. What a multitude here commeth of faithfull wit-neſſes in the time of Iohn Wickliffe, as Ocliffe, Wickliffe: anno 1376. William Thorp, White, Purney, Patſhall, Paine, Gower, Chaucer, Gaſcoyne, William Swinderby, Walter Brute, Roger Dexter, William Santry, about the yeere 1400. Iohn Badby: an. 1410. Nicolas Tailer, Richard Wagſtaffe, Michael Scrivener, William Smith, Iohn Henry, William Parchmenar, Roger Goldſmith, with an Anchreſſe called Mathilde in the citie of Leiceſter, Lord Cobham, Sir Roger Acton Knight, Iohn Beuerley Preacher, Iohn Huſſe, Ierome of Prage, Schoolemaſter, with a number of faithfull Bohemians, and Thaborites not to be told; with whom I might alſo adioyne Laurentius Valla, and Ioannes Picus, the learned Earle of Mirandula. But what doe I ſtand vpon recitall of names, which almoſt are infinite?

Wherefore, if any be ſo farre beguiled in his opinion to thinke the doctrine of the Church of Rome (as it now ſtandeth) to be of ſuch antiquity, and that the ſame was neuer impugned before the time of Luther and Zuinglius now of late, let them reade theſe hiſtories: or if he thinke the ſaid hiſtorie not to bee of ſufficient credit to alter his perſwaſion, let him peruſe the Acts and Statutes of Parliaments, paſſed in this Realme of ancient time, and therein conſider and conferre the courſe of times; where he may find and reade, Anno 5. Regis Richardi 2. in the yeere of our Lord, 1386. of a great number (which there bee called euil perſons) going about from towne to towne in freeſe gownes, preaching vnto the people, &c. Which preachers although the words of the Statute doe terme there to be diſſembling perſons, preaching diuers Sermons containing hereſies and notorious errours, to the emblemiſhment of Chriſtian faith, and of holy Church, &c. as the words doe there pretend: yet notwithſtanding euery true Chriſtian Reader may conceiue of thoſe Preachers to teach no other doctrine, then now they heare their owne preachers in pulpits preach, againſt the biſhop of Rome, and the corrupt hereſies of his Church.

Statut. in an. 5. Rich. 2. an. Dom. 1390.

Furthermore, he ſhall find likewiſe in Statut. An. 2. Henr. 4. cap. 15. in the yeere of our Lord 1402. another like companie of good preachers and faithfull defenders of true doctrine againſt blind hereſie and errour. Whom albeit the words of the Statute there, through corruption of that time, doe falſely terme, to be falſe and peruerſe Preachers, vnder diſſembled holineſſe, teaching in thoſe daies openly and priuily new doctrines and heretical opinions, contrary to the faith and determination of holy Church, &c. Yet notwithſtanding, whoſoeuer readeth hiſtories and conferreth the order and deſcent of times, ſhall vnderſtand theſe to be no falſe teachers, but faithful witneſſes of the truth, not teaching any new doctrines contrary to the determination of holy Church: but rather ſhall find that Church to be vnholy, which they preached againſt, teaching rather it ſelfe hereticall opinions, contrary both to antiquity, and verity of Chriſts true Catholicke Church.

Ex Statut. in an. 2. Henr. 4. cap. 15. anno Dom. 1402.

Of the like number alſo, or greater, of like true faithfull fauorers and followers of Gods holy word, we find in the yeere of our Lord 1422. ſpecified in a letter ſent from Henrie Chicheſlie Archbiſhop of Canturburie, to pope Martin 5. in the fifth yeere of his popedome, where mention is made of ſo many here in England infected: (as he ſaid) with the hereſies of Wickliffe and Huſſe, that without force of an armie they could not be ſuppreſſed, &c. Whereupon the pope ſent two Cardinals to the Archbiſhop, to cauſe a tenth to be gathered of al ſpiritual and religious men, and the money to be laid in the chamber Apoſtolicke, and if that were not ſufficient, the reſidue to be made vp of chalices, candleſticks, and other implements of the Church, &c.

Ex literis Archiepiſcopi Cant. ad Martinum 5. anno domini 1422.

What ſhall need then any more witneſſe to prooue this matter, when you ſee ſo many yeeres agoe whole armies and multitudes, thus ſtanding againſt the pope? who though they be termed here for heretikes and ſchiſmatickes, yet in that, which they call hereſie, ſerued they the liuing Lord, within the Arke of his true ſpirituall and viſible Church.

And where is then the friuolous brag of the Papiſts, which make ſo much of their painted ſheath, and would needs beare vs downe, that this gouernment of the Church of Rome which now is, hath been of ſuch an old ſtanding, time out of mind, euen from the primitiue antiquitie, and that neuer was any other Church demonſtrable here in earth for men to follow, beſides the ſaid only Catholike mother Church of Rome? when as we haue ſufficiently prooued before by the continuall deſcent of the Church til this preſent time, that the ſaid Church, after the doctrine which is now reformed, is no new begun matter, but euen the old continued Church, by the prouidence and promiſe of Chriſt, ſtill ſtanding: which albeit it hath been of late yeeres repreſſed by the tyrannie of Roman Biſhops, more then before: yet notwithſtanding it was neuer ſo oppreſſed, but God hath euer maintained in it the truth of his Goſpell, againſt hereſies and errours of the Church of Rome, as in this hiſtory more at full is to be ſeene.

Let vs now proceed farther as we began, deducing this deſcent of the Church vnto the 1501. yeere. In which yeere the Lord began to ſhew in the parts of Germany wonderfull tokens, and bloudie markes of his Paſſion, as the bloudie croſſe, his nailes, ſpeare, and crowne of thornes, which fell from heauen vpon the garments and caps of men, and rocks of women, as you may further reade in this booke, pag. 769. By the which tokens almightie God (no doubt) preſignified, what grieuous afflictions and bloudie perſecutions ſhould then begin to inſue vpon his Church for his Goſpels ſake, according as in this hiſtory is deſcribed, wherein is to be ſeene what Chriſtian bloud hath been ſpilt, what perſecutions raiſed, what tyrannie exerciſed, what torments deuiſed, what treachery vſed, againſt the poore flock and Church of Chriſt; in ſuch ſort as ſince Chriſts time greater hath not been ſeene.

Bloudie marks of Chriſts paſſion ſeene on mens garments in Germany: an. 1501.

And now by reuolution of yeeres, we are come from that time of 1501. to the yeere now preſent, 1570. In which the full ſeuentie yeeres of the Babyloniſh captiuity draweth now wel to an end, if we count from the firſt appearing of theſe bloudy markes aboue mentioned. Or if we reckon from the beginning of Luther, and his perſecution, then lacketh yet xvj. yeeres. Now what the Lord will doe with this wicked world, or what reſt he will giue to his Church after theſe long ſorrowes, he is our Father in heauen, his will be done in earth, as ſeemeth beſt to his diuine maieſtie.

Seuenty yeres of captiuity well neere expired.

In the meane time, let vs for our parts with all patient obedience waite vpon his gratious leiſure, and glorifie his holy name, and edifie one another with all humilitie. And if there cannot be an end of our diſputing, and contending one againſt another: yet let there be a moderation in our affections. And foraſmuch as it is the good will of our God, that Satan thus ſhould be let looſe amongſt vs for a ſhort time: yet let vs ſtriue in the meane while what we can to amend the malice of the time with mutuall humanitie. They that be in error, let them not diſdaine to learne. They which haue greater talents of knowledge committed, inſtruct in ſimplicitie them that be ſimple. No man liueth in that common-wealth where nothing is amiſſe: but yet becauſe God hath ſo placed vs Engliſhmen here in one common-wealth, alſo in one Church, as in one ſhip together: let vs not mangle or diuide the ſhip, which being diuided periſheth: but euery man ſerue in his order with diligence, wherein he is called. They that ſit at the helme, keepe well the point of the needle, to know how the ſhip goeth, and whither it ſhould. Whatſoeuer weather betideth, the needle wel touched with the ſtone of Gods word will neuer faile. Such as labour at the oares, ſtart for no tempeſt, but do what they can to keepe from the rocks. Likewiſe, they which be in inferiour roomes, take heed they moue no ſedition, nor diſturbance againſt the rowers and mariners. No ſtorme ſo dangerous to a ſhip on the Sea, as is diſcord and diſorder in a weale publike. What Countries and Nations, what Kingdoms and Empires, what Cities, Townes, and houſes diſcord hath diſſolued, in ſtories is manifeſt: I neede not ſpend time in rehearſing examples. The Lord of peace, who hath power both of land and Sea, reach forth his mercifull hand to helpe them vp that ſinke, to keepe them vp that ſtand, to ſtill theſe winds and ſurging ſeas of diſcord and contention among vs: that we profeſſing one Chriſt, may in one vnity of doctrine gather our ſelues into one Ark of the true Church together, where we continuing ſtedfaſt in faith, may at the laſt luckely be conducted to the ioyfull port of our deſired landing place, by his heauenly grace. To whom both in heauen and in earth be all power and glory, with his father and the holy ſpirit for euer.

Amen.

Exhortation to the Church of England.

THE VTILITIE OF THIS Storie.

SEeing the world is replenished with such an infinite multitude of bookes of all kind of matters, I may seeme (perhaps) to take a matter in hand superfluous and needlesse, at this present to set out such volumes, especially of histories, considering now adaies the world is so greatly pestered, not only with superfluous plentie thereof, but of all other Treatises, so that bookes now seeme rather to lacke Readers, then Readers to lack bookes: In which multitude of bookes, I doubt not, but many do both perceiue, and inwardly bewaile this insatiable boldnesse of many now adaies both in writing and printing; which to say the truth, for my part I do as much lament, as any man else beside: and would therefore no man should thinke that vnaduisedly or with rashnesse I haue attempted this enterprise, as one being not only doubtfull, but also both bashfull and fearefull within my selfe for setting the same abroad. And why? first I perceiued how learned this age of ours is in reading of bookes, neither could I tell what the secret iudgements of readers would conceiue, to see so weake a thing, to set vpon such a weightie enterprise, not sufficiently furnished with such ornaments able to satisfie the perfection of so great a storie, or sufficient to serue the vtilitie of the studious, and the delight of the learned. Which abilitie the more I perceiued to be wanting in me, the lesse I durst be bold to become a writer.

Multitude of bookes lamented.

But againe on the other side, when I weighed with my selfe what memorable acts and famous doings this latter age of the Church hath ministred vnto vs by the patient sufferings of the worthie Martyrs; I thought it not to be neglected, that so precious Monuments of so many matters, meet to be recorded and registred in bookes, should lie buried by my default vnder darkenesse of oblition. We thought somewhat was to be said of them for their well deseruing, and something againe of our parts for benefits by them receiued. But aboue all other things, nothing did so much stirre me forward hereunto, as the diligent consideration and speciall regard of the common vtilitie which euery man plentifully may receiue by the reading of these Monuments or Martyrologe: which historie as I haue taken in hand chiefly for the vse of the English Church: so haue I framed it in that tongue which the simple people could best vnderstand.

Now if men commonly delite so much in other Chronicles which intreat only vpon matters of policie, and reioyce to behold therein the variable euents of worldly affaires, the Stratagems of valiant Captaines, the terror of foughten fields, the sacking of cities, the hurly burlies of Realmes and people: And if men thinke it such a gay thing in a common wealth, to commit to history such old antiquities of things prophane, and bestow all their ornaments of wit and eloquence in garnishing the same, how much more then is it meet for Christians to conserue in remembrance the liues, acts and doings, not of bloodie warriers, but of milde and constant Martyrs of Christ, which serue not so much to delight the eare, as to garnish the life, to frame it with examples of great profit, and to encourage men to all kind of Christian godlinesse? As first, by reading thereof, we may learne a liuely testimonie of Gods mightie working in the life of man, contrarie to the opinion of Atheists, and all the whole nest of Epicures. For like as one said of Harpalus in times past, that his doings gaue a liuely testimonie against God, because he being so wicked a man escaped so long vnpunished: so contrariwise, in these men we haue a much more assured and plaine witnesse of God, both in whose liues and deaths appeared such manifest declarations of Gods diuine working, whiles in such sharpnesse of torments we behold in them strength, so constant aboue mans reach, such readinesse to answere, such patience in imprisonment, such godlinesse in forgiuing, thereto such courageous in suffering, besides the manifold sense and feeling of the holy Ghost, which they in their liues so plentifully tasted in their afflictions, as in reading of their letters euidently we may vnderstand. Ouer and besides this, the milde deaths of the Saints do not a little auaile to the stablishing of a good conscience, to learne the contempt of the world, and to come to the feare of God. Moreouer, they confirme faith, increase godlinesse, abate pride in prosperitie, and in aduersitie do open an hope of heauenly comfort. For what man reading the miserie of these godly persons, may not therein, as in a glasse behold his owne case, whether he be godly or godlesse? For if God giue aduersitie vnto good men, what may either the better sort promise themselues, or the euill not feare? And whereas by reading of prophane stories, we are made perhaps more skilfull in warlike affaires: so by reading of this we are made better in our liuings, and besides are better prepared vnto the like conflicts, (if by Gods permission they shall happen hereafter) more wise by their doctrine, and more stedfast by their example.

Comparison betweene worldly souldiers, and the souldiers of Christ.

To be short, they declare to the world what true Christian fortitude is, and what is the right way to conquer, which standeth not in the power of man, but in hope of the resurrection to come, and is now, I trust, at hand. In consideration whereof, me thinkes I haue good cause to wish, that like as other subiects, euen so also Kings and Princes, which commonly delite in heroicall stories, would diligently pertise such Monuments of Martyrs, and lay them alwaies in sight, not alonely to reade, but to follow, and would paint them vpon their walles, cups, rings and gates. For doubtlesse such as these, are more worthie of honor then an hundred Alexanders, Hectors, Scipions, and warlike Iulies. And though the world iudgeth preposterously of things, yet with God, the true Iudge, certes such are to be reputed in deed, not that kill one another with a weapon, but they which being rather killed in Gods cause, do retaine an inuincible constancie against the threats of tyrants, and violence of tormentors. Such as these, are indeed the true Conquerours of the world, by whom we learne true manhood, so many as fight vnder Christ, and not vnder the world. With this valiantnesse did that most milde Lambe and inuincible Lion of the tribe of Iuda first of all go before vs, of whose vnspeakeable fortitude we heare this Prophetical admiration: Who is this (saith he) which walketh so in the multitude of his strength? For soth the high Sonne of the high God, once conquered of the world, and yet conquering the world after the same maner he was conquered.

Esay 63.

The like dance did all his other Martyrs follow, to whom the ancient antiquitie of the Church did attribute so great honor, as neuer king or emperour could purchase in this world with all their images, pillers, high spires, triumphs, temples, and all their solemne feasts. In probation whereof we see, with what admiration, and almost superstition, not only the memorie, but also the reliques of those good Martyrs were receiued and kept amongst the ancient Christians. We haue also for witnesse the learned Hymnes and songs of Prudentius and Nazianzen, wherewith Pindarus did neuer so much set out his triumphs of Olympia and Nemea. I need not heere rehearse the learned Orations of eloquent Cyprian, Chrysostome, Ambrose and Hierome, who neuer shewed their eloquence more, then when they fell into the commendations of the godly Martyrs.

Whereby it is manifest, what estimation in times past was attributed to Martyrs: with what gratulation, reioyce, mirth, and common ioy the afflictions of those godly, dying in Christs quarrell, were sometime receiued and solemnized; and that not without good reasonable cause. For the Church did well consider how much she was beholding to their benefits, by whose death she vnderstood her treasures to increase. Now then if Martyrs are to be compared with Martyrs, I see no cause why the Martyrs of our time deserue any lesse commendation, then the other in the Primitiue Church; which assuredly are inferiour vnto them in no point of praise; whether we view the number of them that suffered, or greatnesse of their torments, or their constancie in dying, or also consider the fruit that they brought to the amendment of posteritie, and increase of the Gospell. They did water the truth with their blood, that was newly springing vp: so these by their deaths restored it againe, being sore decayed and fallen downe. They standing in the forward of the battell, did receiue the first encounter and violence of their enemies, and taught vs by that meanes to ouercome such tyrannie: these with like courage againe, like old beaten souldiers did winne the field in the rereward of the battell. They like famous husbandmen of the world did sow the fields of the Church, that first lay vnmanured and waste: these with fatnesse of their blood did cause it to batten and fructifie. Would to God the fruit might be spedily gathered into the barne; which only remaineth behind to come.

Comparison betweene the Martyrs of the Primitiue Church, and of the latter Church.

Now, if we aſcribe ſuch reputation to godly Preachers (and worthily) which diligently preach the Goſpell of Chriſt, when they liue not withſtanding by the benefit of time, without all feare of perſecution: how much more reaſonable cauſe haue we to praiſe and extoll ſuch men as ſtoutly ſpend their liues for the defence of the ſame? All theſe premiſſes duely of our parts conſidered and marked, ſéeing we haue found ſo famous Martyrs in this our age, let vs not faile then in publiſhing and ſetting forth their doings, leſt in that point we ſéeme more vnkind to them, then the writers of the Primitiue Church were vnto theirs. And though we repute not their aſhes, chaines and ſwords in the ſtead of reliques: yet let vs yéeld thus much vnto their commemoration, to glorifie the Lord in his Saints, and imitate their death (as much as we may) with like conſtancie, or their liues at the leaſt with like innocencie. They offered their bodies willingly to the rough handling of the tormentors: and is it ſo great a matter then for our part, to mortifie our fleſh, with all the members thereof? They neglected not only the riches and glorie of the world for the loue of Chriſt, but alſo their liues: and ſhall we then kéepe ſo great a ſtirre one againſt another, for the tranſitorie trifles of this world? They continued in patient ſuffering, when they had moſt wrong done vnto them, and when their verie hearts blod guſhed out of their bodies: and yet will not we forgiue our poore brother, be the iniurie neuer ſo ſmall, but are readie for euery trifling offence to ſéeke his deſtruction, and cut his throat. They wiſhing well to all men, did of their owne accord forgiue their perſecutors: and therefore ought we, which are now the poſteritie and children of Martyrs, not to degenerate from their former ſteps, but being admoniſhed by their examples, if we cannot expreſſe their charity toward al men, yet at leaſt to imitate the ſame to our power and ſtrength. Let vs giue no cauſe of offence to any. And if any be giuen to vs, let vs ouercome it with patience, forgiuing and not reuenging the ſame. And let vs not only kéepe our hands from ſhedding of blod, but our tongues alſo from hurting the fame of others. Beſides, let vs not ſhrinke, if caſe ſo require, martyrdom or loſſe of life, according to their example, to yéeld vp the ſame in the defence of the Lords flock. Which thing if men would do, much leſſe contention and buſines would be in the world then now is. And thus much touching the vtilitie and fruit to be taken of this hiſtorie.

TO ALL THE PROFESSED FRIENDS AND FOLLOWERS OF THE POPES proceedings, foure Queſtions propounded.

TO you all and ſinguler, which profeſſe the doctrine and religion of the Pope, your holy father, & of your mother Church of Rome, pretending the name of Catholikes, commonly tearmed Papiſts, whereſoeuer abiding in the Realme of England, theſe foure Queſtions or Problemes hereunder following I would moue, deſiring you al either to muſe vpon them, or to anſwere them at your leiſure.

Foure demands or queſtions put forth to the Papiſts.

The firſt queſtion. Eſay 11.65.

FIrſt, for ſo much as mount Sion (which God calleth by the Prophet Eſay, the hill of his holineſſe) beareth in the Scripture an vndoubted type of the ſpirituall Church of Chriſt: and for ſo much as the ſaid Eſay, chapter eleuenth, and fiftie fifth, propheſying of the ſaid mount Sion, ſaith in theſe words: Non nocebunt, neque affligent in omni monte ſancto meo, dicit Dominus, &c. That is, They ſhall not kill nor hurt, in all my holy hill, ſaith the Lord, &c. And againe in the ſame chapters, thus we reade: Habitabit Lupus cum Agno, & Pardus cum Hœdo accubabit: Vitulus, & Leo & Ouis vnà commorabuntur, & puellus paruulus ducet eos, &c. That is, The Wolfe ſhall dwell with the Lambe, and the Leopard with the kid: the Calfe, the Lion and the Sheepe ſhall feed together, and a yong child ſhall rule them. The Cow alſo and the Beare ſhall abide together with their yong ones, and the Lion ſhall eat chaffe and fodder like the Oxe, &c.

Obiection.

Upon theſe premiſſes now followeth my queſtion; How the Church of Rome can be anſwerable to this hill of Sion; ſeeing in the ſame Church of Rome is, and hath been now ſo many yeeres ſuch killing and ſlaying, ſuch crueltie and tyrannie ſhewed, ſuch burning and ſpilling of Chriſtian blod, ſuch malice and miſchiefe wrought, as in reading theſe hiſtories may to al the world appeare.

Refutation.

To this if they anſwere, and expound theſe words of the Prophet, as pertaining to the Church triumphant; thereunto I replie againe: that by the words in the ſame place and in the ſame ſentence expreſſed, that ſenſe cannot ſtand, for as much as the Prophet in the very ſame place, where he propheſieth of this peaceable dwelling in Gods holy mountaine without hurting or killing, meaneth plainly of the earth, and ſheweth alſo the cauſe of that godly peace. Becauſe (ſaith he) the earth is replenished with knowledge and ſcience of the Lord, &c. ibid. And furthermore, the Prophet ſpeaking of the ſame day when this ſhall be, addeth, ſaying: In that day the rot of Jeſſe ſhall ſtand for a ſigne to the people, for the Gentiles to be conuerted, and to ſeeke vnto him, &c. Which day in no wiſe can be applied to the Church in heauen triumphant, but only heere militant in earth.

Publike execution of lawes not forbidden in Scripture. The conditions and properties of the true Church of Chriſt. Rom. 15. Galath. 6.

Touching which place of Eſay, further heere is to be noted by the way, that by this peaceable mount Sion (which comprehendeth both the ſtates, as well eccleſiaſticall as temporall) is not reſtrained the publike penaltie of good lawes needfull to be executed vpon publike malefactors; but heere is reſtrained the fiercenelle, reuenge, crueltie, and violence of mens affections. To which affections men being commonly ſubiect by nature, through grace and working of the Goſpell are altered, reformed, and changed to another diſpoſition: from ſtoutneſſe to ſoftneſſe, from violence to ſufferance, from fiercenelle to forbearing, from pride to humilitie, from crueltie to compaſſion, from wilineſſe to ſimplicitie, from ſolemne ſingularitie to humanitie and meekeneſſe. Which vertues, if they had been in the Church of Rome (according to the rule of Saint Paul, which willeth men that be ſtronger, to beare with the infirmities of the weaker, and that in the ſpirit of meekeneſſe, &c. Rom. 15. Galath. 6.) I ſhould not haue needed now at this time to write ſuch a long hiſtorie, as this, of the ſuffering of ſo many Martyrs.

The ſecond queſtion.

MY ſecond queſtion is this; to demand of you Catholike profeſſors of the Popes ſect, which ſo deadly maligne and perſecute the Proteſtants profeſſing the Goſpell of Chriſt; What iuſt or reaſonable cauſe haue you to alleage for this your extreame hatred ye beare vnto them, that neither you your ſelues can abide to liue with them, nor yet will ſuffer them to liue amongſt you? If they were Jewes, Turkes or Infidels, or in their doctrine were any idolatrous impietie, or deteſtable iniquitie in their liues: if they went about any deadly deſtruction, or priuie conſpiracies to oppreſſe your liues, or by fraudulent dealing to circumuent you; then had you ſome cauſe to complaine, and alſo to reuenge. Now ſeeing in their doctrine ye haue neither blaſphemie, idolatrie, ſuperſtition nor miſbeliefe to obiect vnto them: ſeeing they are baptiſed in the ſame beliefe, and beleeue the ſame articles of the Creed, as ye do: hauing the ſame God, the ſame Chriſt and Sauiour, the ſame Baptiſme, and are readie to conferre with you in all kind of Chriſtian doctrine, neither do refuſe to be tried by any place of the Scripture: how then riſeth this mortall malice of you againſt them? If you thinke them to be heretikes, then bring forth, if ye can, any one ſentence which they arrogantly hold, contrarie to the mind of holy Scripture: expounded by the cenſure of moſt ancient Doctors. Or what is there in all the Scripture to be required, but they acknowledge and confeſſe the ſame? See and trie the order of their liues and doings; what great fault find you? They ſerue God, they walke vnder his feare, they obey his law, as men may do: and though they be tranſgreſſors toward him, as other men are, yet toward you what haue they done, what haue they committed or deſerued, why you ſhould be ſo bitter againſt them?

The deadly hatred of the Papiſts againſt the Proteſtãts, grounded vpon no iuſt cauſe for deſtruing.

Malice and crueltie of Papiſts againſt the countrie of Merindoll and Cabriers.

What offended the poore inhabitants of Merindoll and Cabriers, when the Biſhop of Air, the Cardinall of Turon, and other Biſhops of France, wreſting from Francis the French King a Commiſſion, ſent Minerius with his Captaine John de Gay, to deſtroy their countrey, anno 1530. who driuing the poore people there into a Barne full of ſtraw, ſet the Barne on fire, and burned vp men, women and children? And likewiſe in a Church, exerciſed the like crueltie vpon them, where were murdered the ſame time to the number of a thouſand yong and old, women, children and yong infants, beſides ſeuen whole townes, with the moſt part of the dwellers therein, being murdered and burnt in the ſaid countrie of Prouince.

Malice of Papiſts againſt the Citizens of Tholouſe in France.

Alſo before that, what offended the Citizens of Tholouſe and Auinion, when Pope Gregorie the ninth ſet Lewes the French King to warre againſt them, and againſt Raymundus their Earle, without cauſe; where alſo the ſaid King died at the ſiege?

Malice and crueltie of Papiſts againſt the Proteſtãts in the towne of Maſſy.

Or to ſpeake of latter yeeres, what hurt or harme did the poore Proteſtants in the towne of Maſſy, who peaceablie being at a Sermon, were miſerablie ſlaine and cut, men, women and children, by the Duke of Guyſe and his armed ſouldiers? beſides other infinite examples almoſt not to be numbred of like crueltie, in Calabria, Apulia, Bohemia, Germany, France, and now of late in Flanders, and in other countries moe.

Clemencie and mercie ſhewed to Papiſts in the raigne of Queene Elizabeth.

But to let other countries paſſe, let vs turne now to the peaceable gouernment in this realme of England, vnder this our ſo milde and gratious Queene now preſently raigning. Vnder whom you ſee how gently you are ſuffered, what mercie is ſhewed vnto you, how quietly ye liue. What lacke you, that you would haue, hauing almoſt the beſt roomes and offices in all the realme, not only without any loſſe of life, but alſo without any feare of death. And though a few of your Arch-clerkes be in cuſtodie; yet in that cuſtodie ſo ſhrewdly are they hurt, that many a good Proteſtant in the realme would be glad with all their hearts to change roomes and diet with them, if they might. And albeit ſome other for their pleaſure haue ſlipt ouer the ſeas; if their courage to ſee countries abroad did ſo allure them, who could let them? yet this is certaine, no dread there was of death that draue them. For what Papiſt haue you ſeene in all this land to loſe either life or limbe for Papiſtry, during all theſe twelue yeeres hitherto ſince this Queenes raigne? And yet all this notwithſtanding, hauing no cauſe to complaine, ſo many cauſes to giue God thankes, ye are not yet content, ye fret and fume, ye grudge and mutter, and are not pleaſed with peace, nor ſatiſfied with ſafetie, but hope for a day, and faine would haue a change. And to preuent your deſired day, ye haue conſpired, and riſen vp in open rebellion againſt your Prince, whom the Lord hath ſet vp to be your Gouernour.

The trayterous murdering of the Lord James, Regent of Scotland, Martyr.

And as you haue ſince that, now of late diſturbed the quiet and peaceable State of Scotland, in murdering moſt trayterouſly the gentle and godly Regent of Scotland (who in ſparing the Queenes life there when he had her in his hands, hath now therefore loſt his owne); ſo with like furie, as by your rebellion appeareth, would diſturbe the golden quiet and tranquillitie of this Realme of England, if ye might haue your willes. Which the merciſull grace of the Almightie, for Chriſt his Soones ſake our Lord, forſend and vtterly diſappoint: Amen.

The chiefe cauſe of all theſe latter perſecutions in the Church, is only the priuate quarell of the Biſhop of Rome.

Wherefore theſe premiſes conſidered, my queſtion is to aſke of you and know, what iuſt or reaſonable cauſe ye haue of theſe your vnreaſonable doings, of this your ſo mortall and deadly hatred, furie and malice you beare againſt theſe your euen-chriſtened, of theſe your tumults, coniurations, gaping and hoping, rebellions, mutterings, and murders, wherewith you trouble and diſquiet the whole world? Of all which miſchiefes, if the true cauſe were well knowne, the truth would be found doubtleſſe to be none other but only the priuate cauſe of the Biſhop of Rome, that he is not receiued, and the dignitie of his church exalted.

Touching

Touching which cause how vnreasonable and vniuſt it is, more ſhall be ſaid (the Lord willing) in replie, according as I ſhall ſee their anſwere, if it ſhall ſo pleaſe them, or any of them to anſwere this queſtion. In the meane time, this for a briefe note ſhall ſuffice: that it ſtandeth not with the Scripture, but contrarie to the Scripture, that the Biſhop of Rome ſhould ſo reuenge his owne priuate cauſe. If his title and plantation be good and of God, why doth he not referre it vnto God? And no doubt, but if it be ſo, God will maintaine it, though the whole world ſaid no. If it be otherwiſe, it will fall and be rooted out, though all the world ſaid yea. Yea the greateſt argument to proue this plantation of the Popes ſupremacie not to be of God, is, that the Pope fighting in his owne priuate cauſe, by outward and worldly force ſeeketh his owne glorie. Chriſt our Sauiour being heere refuſed himſelfe, yet neither reuenged his owne cauſe, nor ſought his owne glorie, but only the glorie and will of his Father, thus ſpeaking of himſelfe: Si ego glorifico meipſum, gloria mea nihil eſt; Pater meus eſt, qui glorificat me, &c. Ioh. 8. That is; If I glorifie my ſelf, my glorie is nothing; my Father is he that glorifieth me, &c. Euen ſo I ſay with Scripture, that if the Popes proceedings were planted of God, he would not ſo wraſtle for his glorie, as he doth. But for ſo much as he ſeeketh by ſuch crueltie and bloodſhed to exalt himſelfe, we may well argue his proceedings not to be of God, and that he ſhall be brought low, &c. Luke 18.

The third queſtion. Apocal. 13.

My third queſtion I take of the thirteenth Chapter of the booke of Reuelation. Which booke as it containeth a Prophetical hiſtorie of the Church; ſo likewiſe it requireth by hiſtories to be opened. In this hiſtorie mention is made, firſt, of a certaine beaſt comming out of the ſea, hauing ſeuen heads and ten hornes, with ten diademes of blaſphemie. Vnto the which beaſt, the dragon, the diuell, gaue his ſtrength, and great power to fight againſt the Saints, and to ouercome them, and to make fortie two moneths: of the which beaſt, one of his heads was wounded at length to death, &c.

The two beaſts in the booke of Reuelation deſcribed.

After this immediatly in the ſame Chapter, mention followeth of another beaſt, riſing out of the land, hauing two hornes like a lambe, and ſpake like a dragon, and did all the power of the former beaſt before his face, and cauſed all dwellers of the earth to worſhip the beaſt: whoſe head was wounded, and liued. Who alſo had power to giue ſpirit and life to the ſaid former beaſt, to make the Image of the beaſt to ſpeake, and to cauſe all men from the higheſt to the loweſt, to take the marke of the beaſt in their hands and foreheads; and whoſoeuer worſhipped not the Image of the beaſt, ſhould be killed, &c.

The ſecond beaſt with the hornes like a Lambe.

Vpon this deſcription of theſe two beaſts riſeth my queſtion; wherein I deſire all Papiſts, from the higheſt to the loweſt, either to anſwere, or to conſider with themſelues, what the ſpirit of the prophecie meaneth by the ſaid two beaſts. Neither is the myſterie of this prophecie ſo obſcure, but being hiſtoricall, by hiſtories it may be explained and eaſily expounded. Writing therefore to the Papiſts, as men expert in hiſtories, my queſtion is this: that ſeeing the prophecie of theſe two beaſts muſt needs prefigure ſome people or dominion in the world, of ſome high eſtate and power; they will now declare vnto vs, what people or domination this ſhould be. Which if they will do plainly and truly, according to the markes and properties of the ſaid two beaſts heere ſet forth, they muſt needs be driuen of force, inuitable to grant and confeſſe, the ſame only to agree to the Citie and Empire of Rome, and to no other: Which by theſe reaſons following of neceſſitie muſt needs be concluded.

The myſterie of the firſt beaſt riſing out of the ſea, applied.

Firſt, the beaſt which came out of the ſea, hauing the ſtrength, the ſeat, and power of the great Dragon (the Diuell, called the Prince of this world) committed to him, who alſo had power giuen ouer all tribes, nations, languages, people and countries in the earth, muſt néeds be an Empire or Monarchie of great force, paſſing all other Monarchies in the world beſides: and this muſt néeds argue the Empire of Rome and none other.

The Image of the beaſt reſembled to the Monarchie of Rome. Apocal. 13.

Secondly, in that the beaſt had ſeuen heads, and ten hornes, with ten diademes full of blaſphemie vpon them: thoſe ſeuen heads being expounded in the ſaid booke, chapter ſeuenteenth, for ſeuen hilles, notoriouſly importeth the citie of Rome, wherein were ſeuen hilles contained. The like alſo may be thought of the ten hornes, being there expounded for ten Kings (ſignifying belike the ten Prouinces or Kingdomes of the world ſubdued to the Roman Empire) with ten crownes of blaſphemie vpon their heads: all which conueniently agrée to the citie of Rome.

Of theſe fortie two months, and the expoſition thereof, reade page 90.

Thirdly, where the ſaid beaſt had power to make fortie two months, and to fight againſt the Saints, and to ouercome them, &c. thereby moſt manifeſtly is declared the Empire of Rome, with the heathen perſecuting Emperours, which had power giuen the ſpace of ſo many months, (that is, from Tiberius to Licinius, 294. yéeres) to perſecute Chriſts Church, as in the Table of the primitiue Church hereafter following, is diſcourſed more at large.

The wounded head of the beaſt in the Reuelation, what it meaneth.

Fourthly, where the Prophet ſpeaketh of the one of the heads of the beaſt to be wounded to death, and the wound afterward to be cured againe: by that ye haue to vnderſtand the decay and ſubuerſion of the citie of Rome and of Italy, which being one of the heads of the Roman Monarchie, was ſubdued by the Gothes, Vandals, and Lombards, and the citie of Rome thrice ſackt and taken, betweene the raigne of Honorius Emperour of Rome, and the time of Iuſtinian Emperour of Conſtantinople; and ſo remained this head of Rome wounded a long time vnder the dominion of the Lombards, til at length this wound was cured againe, as the ſequele of this prophecie declareth: For ſo it followeth in the foreſaid chapter of the Reuelation: And after this I ſaw (ſaith he) another beaſt riſing out of the land, hauing two hornes like the Lambe, and ſpake like the Dragon. Who practiſed all the power of the firſt beaſt before his face, and cauſed all the inhabitants of the earth to worſhip the firſt beaſt, whoſe head was wounded and cured againe, &c. And to him it was giuen to giue life to the Image of the beaſt, and to make it ſpeake: and alſo to make all them that wil not worſhip the image of the beaſt, to be ſlaine, and cauſed all from the moſt to the leaſt, both rich and poore, free men and bond men, to take the marke of the beaſt in their right hand and in their foreheads, ſo that none ſhould buy or ſell, vnleſſe he had the beaſts marke about him, &c.

The ſecond beaſt riſing out of the land, pretending the hornes of a Lambe, what it meaneth.

The deſcription of this ſecond beaſt being well viewed; it cannot be auoided, but needs muſt be applied to the Biſhop of Rome, and to none other; as by hiſtorie and order of times is euident to be proued. For who elſe repreſenteth the hornes of the Lambe of God which taketh away the ſinnes of the world, but only he? who ſpeaketh with the voice of the Dragon ſo proudly, as he? The voice of the Dragon ſpake once to Chriſt: That all the glorie of the world was his to giue to whom he would, and that he would giue it, &c. And doth not this falſe horned lambe, ſpeaking in the ſame voice of the Dragon, ſay by the mouth of Pope Gregorie the ſeuenth, that all the kingdomes of the earth were his, and that he had power in earth to loſe, and take away Empires, Kingdomes, Dukedomes, and what elſe ſoeuer mortall men may haue, and to giue them where he would? &c. Ex Platina in Vit. Gregorij 7.

Apocal. 13. The myſterie of the thirteenth chapter of the Reuelation, expounded. Ex Platina in vita Gregorij 7.

Furthermore, at what time the declining ſtate of Rome began to decay, and Italy was brought vnder ſubiection of the Lombards, then the Pope ſtirred vp Pipinus and Carolus Magnus, to take his part againſt the Lombards, and to reſtore againe the old glorie of that Monarchie to his former ſtate. And therefore who cured the wounded head of this beaſt againe, but only he? who gaue life and ſpéech to the image of the beaſt, but he? who after that by helpe of the French Kings, had ſubdued thoſe Lombards with other aliens, and had gotten the poſſeſſion of Rome into his owne hands, he ſo repaired and aduanced the fame and name of Rome, that ſince that time all perſons from the higheſt to the loweſt, both rich and poore, haue béen glad to ſend and ſéeke to Rome, yea Kings, Emperours, Quéenes and Dukes haue béen glad to kiſſe that Biſhops fét, and to lead his horſe by the bridle: So that the Maieſtie of Rome in the old heathen Emperours daies was neuer more terrible, nor glorious, nor neuer had more power to perſecute and ouercome Gods Saints, then theſe lambe-like Biſhops of Rome haue had, and haue exerciſed theſe fiue hundred yéeres in Chriſtendome. And therefore who elſe in all the world hath ſo much power to do the workes of the firſt beaſt, before his face, as he? or who but he alone? which forceth both high and low, rich and poore, free and bond, to receiue the ſeale, and to become loyall to the citie and ſée of Rome: ſo that whoſoeuer hath not the marke whereby to be knowne to hold of the Church of Rome, ſhall haue no place to buy and ſell, nor to occupie in all Chriſtendome.

Power to do the workes of the beaſt before his ſight. Apocal. 13.

Now if any Papiſt whatſoeuer, in anſwering to this my queſtion, can applie this propheticall myſterie of theſe two beaſts otherwiſe then thus, I would hartily deſire him, to take ſo much paines to ſatiſfie this doubt at his good pleaſure and leaſure. In the meane ſeaſon let this ſtand for a Corolarium, that the Biſhop of Rome by his deſcription muſt be that ſecond beaſt propheſied to come in the latter time of the Church vnder a falſe pretenſed lambe, to reſtore againe the old perſecutions of Rome, and to diſturbe the whole Church of Chriſt, as this day too truly is come to paſſe.

The fourth Queſtion.

As touching my fourth queſtion, although I could vrge you with another like propheticall place of Scripture, no leſſe euident againſt the Biſhop of Rome, taken out of the ſecond Epiſtle of S. Paul to the Theſſalonians, where mention is made of the ſon of perdition, ſitting in the Temple of God, as God, and aduancing himſelfe aboue all that is called God, &c. which place ye can by no reaſonable euaſion auoid: yet notwithſtanding to let this paſſe, I turne my queſtion to aſke this of you; Whether the religion of Chriſt be méere ſpirituall, or elſe corporall? If ye affirme it to be corporall, as was the old religion of the Iewes, conſiſting in outward rites, ſacrifices, and ceremonies of the law: then ſhew if ye can, what any ons outward action or obſeruation is required in Chriſtian

Digitized by Google

Christian religion by the Scripture, as necessary in a Christian man, for remission of sinnes and saluation, saue onely the two Sacramentall ceremonies of outward Baptisme, and of the Lords Supper: Howbeit, neither these also as they are corporall, that is to say, neither the outward action of the one, nor of the other, conferreth remission of sinnes, nor saluation, but onely are visible shewes of inuisible and spirituall benefits. And furthermore, if our God whom wee serue, be spirituall; how can his religion and seruice be corporall, as we are taught by the mouth of our Sauiour, saying: God is a spirit, and therefore they that worship him, must worship in spirit and verity, &c. Iohn 4.

Religion of Christ spirituall, and not corporall.

Now if ye grant (as ye must needs) this our Christian religion to be spirituall, and not a corporall religion, then shew, if ye can, any one point of all these things which ye striue for so much with vs, to be spirituall, but altogether corporall, and externe matters and ceremoniall obseruations, nothing conducing to any spirituall purpose, as your outward succession of bishops, garments, vestures, gestures, colours, choice of meates, difference of daies, times and places, hearing, seeing, saying, touching, talking, numbring of beades, gilding and worshipping Images, building monasteries, rising at midnight, silence in cloisters, abstaining from flesh and white meate, fasting in Lent, keeping Imberdaies, hearing masse, and diuine seruice, seeing and adoring the body in forme of bread, receiuing holy water, and holy bread, creeping to the crosse, carying palmes, taking ashes, bearing candles, pilgrimage going, ceiling, kneeling, knocking, altars, superaltars, candlesticks, pardons: In orders, crossing, anointing, shauing, forswearing mariage: In baptisme, crossing, salting, spetling, exorcising, washing of hands: At Easter, eare confession, penance doing, satisfaction: And in receiuing, with beards new shauen, to imagine a body, where they see no body: and though hee were there present to be seene, yet the outward seeing and touching of him, of it selfe, without faith, conduceth no more, then it did to the Iewes. At Rogation daies, to carrie banners, to follow the crosse, to walke about the fields. After Pentecost, to goe about with Corpus Christi play. At Halowmas to watch in the church, to say a dirige, and commemorations, and to ring for all soules, to pay tithes truely, to giue to the high altar. And if a man will be a priest, to say masse and mattens, to serue the saint of that day, and to lift well ouer his head, &c. In sickenesse to be annelled, to take his rites; after his death to haue funerals, and obites said for him, and to bee rung for at his funerall, moneth mind, and yeere mind, &c. Adde moreouer to these the outward sacrifice of the masse, with opus operatum sine bono motu vtentis, &c.

The pope turneth the spirituall religion of Christ to a corporall religion.

The whole summe of the popes Catholicke religion set forth in parts.

All which things aboue recited, as they containe the whole summarie and effect of all the popes catholicke religion: so are they all corporall exercises, consisting in the externe operation of man. Which if they can make a perfect right Catholicke Christian, then it may be said, that men may bee made perfect Christians by flesh and blood, without any inward working of faith, or of the holy Ghost. For what is in all these, but that flesh and blood of his strength is able to accomplish, though no inward strength or motion of the holy Ghost did worke?

A man may be Catholicke by the popes religion without any working of the holy Ghost.

But now the order of our religion, and way of saluation consisteth not in such corporall or outward things as these, but in other more high and more spirituall gifts, which farre exceed the capacitie of flesh and blood: of the which gifts the chiefest and onely maine cause that saueth man, and remitteth sinnes, is his faith in Christ. Which faith I thus define; for a man to beleeue by the bloodshedding of Iesus the sonne of God, his sinnes to be forgiuen, Gods wrath to be pacified, and himselfe to be iustified perfectly from all accusations that can be laid vnto him, &c. And though the papists make a light matter of this, to beleeue in Christ; and when they heare vs say, that faith onely iustifieth, they obiect to vs againe and make it a small matter to be saued, if faith only iustifie vs: yet notwithstanding, this faith, if it bee well examined, is such a thing that flesh and blood is not able to attaine thereto, vnlesse Gods holy spirit from aboue doe draw him.

The nature of true Christian religion described.

Moreouer, besides this faith, many other things are incident also to the doctrine of our saluation. Albeit as no causes thereof, but either as Sacraments and seales of faith, or as declarations thereof, or else as fruits and effects following the same. So Baptisme, and the supper of the Lord be as testimonies and proofes; that by our faith onely in Christ wee are iustified; that as our bodies are washed by water, and our life nourished by bread and wine: so by the blood of Christ, our sins be purged, and the hunger of our soules relieued by the death of his body.

Saluation of man, standeth onely in faith of Christ.

Faith in Christ no light matter to flesh and blood.

Many things incident to saluation besides faith: but not as causes thereof.

Workes of sanctification, how they come and follow faith.

Esay 58. Matth. 25.

Vpon the same faith riseth also outward profession by mouth, as a declaration therof. Other things also as fruits and effects do follow after faith, as peace of conscience, ioy in the holy Ghost, inuocation, patience, charity, mercy, iudgement, and sanctification. For God for our faith in Christ his sonne, therefore giueth into our hearts his holy spirit of comfort, of peace, and sanctification, whereby mans heart is moued to a godly disposition to feare God, to seeke him, to call vpon him, to trust vnto him, to sticke to him in all aduersities and persecutions, to loue him; and for his sake also to loue our brethren, to haue mercy and compassion vpon them, to visit them if they be in prison, to breake bread to them, if they be hungrie: and if they be burdened to ease them: to clothe them if they be naked, and to harbour them if they be houseleslle, Matth. 25. with such other spirituall exercises of piety and sanctification as these. Which therefore I call spirituall, because they proceed of the holy spirit and law of God, which is spirituall.

And thus haue ye a Catholicke Christian defined, first after the rules of Rome, and also after the rule of the Gospell. Now conferre these antitheses together, and see whether of these is the truer Christian, the ceremoniall man after the church of Rome, or the spirituall man with his faith and other spirituall fruits of piety following after the same. And if ye say that ye mixe them both together, spirituall things with your corporall ceremonies: to that I answere againe, that as touching the end of remission of sinnes, and saluation, they ought in no case to be ioyned together, because the maine cause of all our saluation and remission, is only spirituall, and consisteth in faith, and in no other.

And therefore vpon the same cause I come to my question againe, as I began, to aske whether the religion of Christ be a meere spirituall religion: and whether in the religion of Rome, as it is now, is any thing but onely meere corporall things required, to make a catholicke man. And thus I leaue you to your answere.

IN turning ouer the first leafe of this booke, which is page 2. col. 2. and in the beginning of the same columne, thou shalt find, gentle Reader, the argument of Pighius and Holus, wherein thus they argue: That forsomuch as Christ must needs haue a Catholicke church euer continuing here in earth, which all men may see, and whereunto all men ought to resort: and seeing no other church hath endured continually from the Apostles, visible here in earth, but only the church of Rome: they conclude therefore, the church onely of Rome to be the right Catholicke church of Christ, &c.

In answering whereunto, this is to be said: that forsomuch as the medius terminus of this argument both in the Maior & Minor, consisteth onely in the word (visible and vnknowne) if they meane by this word (visible) in the Maior, that Christs church must bee seene here to all the world, that all men may resort to it, it is false: Likewise, if they meane by the same word (visible) in the Minor, that no other church hath beene seene and knowne to any, but onely the church of Rome, they are likewise deceiued. For the true church of Christ neither is so visible, that all the world can see it, but onely they which haue spirituall eyes, and bee members thereof: nor yet so inuisible againe. but such as bee Gods elect, and members thereof, doe see it and haue seene it, though the worldly eyes of the most multitude cannot so doe, &c. Whereof reade more in the protestation aboue prefixed to the church of England.

Foure

FOVRE CONSIDERATIONS GIVEN OVT TO CHRISTIAN PROTESTANTS PROfessors of the Gospell, with a briefe exhortation inducing to reformation of life.

AS in the page before, foure questions were moued to the Catholike Papists, to answere them at their leisure: so haue I heere to the Christian Gospellers, foure considerations likewise, for them to muse vpon, with speed conuenient.

THe first consideration is this, euery good man well to weigh with himselfe the long tranquillitie, the great plentie, the peaceable libertie, which the Lord of his mercie hath bestowed vpon this land, during all the raigne hitherto of this our Soueraigne and most happie Queene ELIZABETH, in such sort as the like example of Gods abundant mercies is not to be seene in any nation about vs; so as wee may well sing with the Psalme in the church, Non fecit taliter omni nationi, & opes gloriæ suæ non manifestauit eis: first in hauing the true light of Gods Gospell so shining among vs, so publikely receiued, so freely preached, with such liberty of conscience without danger professed; hauing withall a Prince so vertuous, a Queene so gratious giuen vnto vs, of our owne natiue countrie, bred and borne amongst vs, so quietly gouerning vs, so long lent vnto vs, in such peace defending vs, against such as would else deuoure vs: briefly, what could we haue more at Gods hand, if wee would wish? or what else could we wish in this world, that we haue not? if this one thing lacked not, grace to vse that well which wee haue.

AS these things first are to bee considered concerning our selues: so secondly let vs consider likewise the state and times of other our countrimen, and blessed Martyrs aforepast: what stormes of persecutions they sustained, what little rest they had, with what enemies they were matched, with what crosses pressed, vnder what princes, vnder what prelats they liued, or rather died, in the daies of king Henry the 4. king Henry 5. king Henry 7. king Henry 8. queene Mary, &c. vnder Boner bishop of London, Gardiner bishop of Winchester, Cholmley, Storie, bishop Arundell, Stokesley, Courtney, Warrham. At what time children were caused to set fire to their fathers: The father adiured to accuse the sonne, the wife to accuse the husband, the husband the wife, brother the sister, sister the brother, examples whereof are plentie in this booke to be seene, pag. 751. &c.

THirdly, let vs call to mind, considering thus with our selues: These good men and worthie Martyrs in those dangerous daies, tasting as they did, the heauie hand of Gods sharpe correction, beginning commonly with his owne house first; if they were aliue now in these Alcyon daies, vnder the protection of such a peaceable prince, O what thankes would they giue to God, how happie would they count themselues, hauing but halfe of that wee haue, with freedome onely of conscience, and safety of life! Or if in case we our selues had beene in those times of theirs, so troubled and distressed as they were, spoiled of goods, hated of the world, cited in consistories, pinched in prisons, sequestred from wife, house and children, looking for nothing but death; what would we say? what would we thinke? what would we doe? Much otherwise doubtlesse, then we doe now; God grant we may doe better, for worse I thinke wee cannot if we would. Iohn Wickliffe, W. Swinderby, Thorpe, Sawtrie, with a number of godly men moe, being then glad, in frieze gownes, going barefoote, to preach where they could; if they were now aliue, how glad would they be of these daies, what paines would they take, yea what paines would they not take in preaching the Gospell, not for lucre, nor for mony, nor passing for promotions or dignities of the church? Sir Iohn Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, sir Roger Acton, with diuers worshipful gentlemen a great number, if they being in our state might enioy with vs their houses & lands, with the good fauour of their prince (as then they could not) how gladly would they haue contented themselues, though they neuer raised their rents and fines to the vndoing of their poore tenants? Likewise in the time of Iohn Hus and Hierome of Prage, the nobility and gentlemen of Bohemia, if they might haue had halfe this tranquillity which we haue, to enioy the liberty of Gods word, and true vse of the Sacraments without molestation of Romish prelats, what would they haue cared how simplie they walked in their attire, without any such monstrous pompe in pranking vp themselues, as we Englishmen in these reformed daies walke now, more like players on a stage, then Gods children in his church?

WHerefore, welbeloued, these things being so, let vs call our selues to mind, considering the times that haue beene, the times that bee, and times that may come, how we stand, and by whom we stand. If it be the fauour of God onely that doth support vs in the middest of so many enemies, let vs beware in no wise we prouoke his indignation. If it be his truth and Gospell that we professe, let vs walke in the light of his truth, and keepe our selues within the compasse of his Gospell. What the Gospell requireth, and what it abhorreth, who knoweth not? And yet who followeth that he knoweth? If Saint Paul willeth euery one to depart from iniquitie, which nameth the Lord Iesus: And if the Lord Iesus himselfe testifieth plainly, his kingdome not to be of this world, how will then the nature of that kingdome so spirituall, and our conditions so worldly match well together? To rip vp all our deformities in particular, I mind not here, neither need I, the same being so euident to al mens eyes, that who cannot see our excessiue outrage in pompous apparell, our carnall desires and vnchast demeanors, without feare of God, our careless securitie without conscience, as though there were no iudgement to come, our studies so vpon this world, as though there were no other heauen? what pride and idlenesse of life, double dissembling in word and deed without simplicitie, auarice vnsatiable, little regard to heare Gods word, lesse to reade it, least of all to follow it, euery man aspiring to worldly wealth and promotion, little or no mercie to the poore, racking of rents and fines, bribing and taking vnmeasurable? What should I speake of the contentions and vnbrotherly diuision amongst vs most lamentable to see, but more lamentable, if all were seene which may or is like to follow vpon the same? Such were the times once of the Church before the horrible persecution of Diocletian; for so we reade, such hatred and disdaine, through much peace and prosperitie of the Church, to creepe in amongst the Church-men: Reade page 69.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 1.

Wherefore, let vs be exhorted (dearely beloued) to reclaime our selues, while time doth serue. If we find the Lord so gratious in sparing vs, as he doth, let that not make vs worse, but better. It is a leaud child, which will not learne without beating. A well minding man will be good, not forced by coaction, but of voluntarie office induced. As aduersitie if it come, ought not to dismay vs: so neither prosperitie now present ought not to puffe vs vp in securitie, considering what commonly is wont to follow: As Plato well writeth: Summa atq; effrenata libertatis seruitutem plerumq; assequi esse: Of immoderat libertie, and too much securitie, followeth most commonly extreame seruitude. And as Hippocrates saith: Dispositions of bodies when they are come to the highest perfection of health, then are they most subiect to danger of sickenesse, &c. Let vs therefore hauing light giuen vs, walke like children of light.

Plat. de rep. 8. Hippocrates.

Otherwise, if we walke like children of disobedience, God hath his rods to scourge vs: if we will needs be rebels, hee hath his Pharaos and Nabuchodonosors to plague vs. Or if we will be so inordinate, and (with reuerence be it spoken, without offence to God or man) so doggish and currish, one to another, the Lord lacketh not his dogstrikers to whip vs. And would God our liues were such, that the destruction and ruine here of late seene amongst vs, may portend nothing against vs, as I trust there is no cause for vs to feare, but rather to feare the Lord and walke in his obedience, and amend that is amisse amongst vs:

Amen.

¶ The grace of our Lord Iesus blesse thee gentle Reader, that long mayest thou reade, and much mayest thou profit: Amen.

Constantinus.

¶ Pax Prædicantibus, Gratia Audientibus, Gloria Iesu Christo: Amen.

In Martyrologium Ioan. Foxi, Laurentius Humfredus.

TRistes Iliadas docti miramur Homeri:
Quas scite studuit texere τυφλὸς ἀνήρ.
Deflentur tragico multorum fata cothurno,
Hæc madidis spectant mœsta theatra genis.
Multa dolenda quidem, sed vatum somnia multa,
Fictis intexunt vera, probata nothis.
Sunt quos delectant vanæ commenta Legendæ,
Quam stabulum Augeæ rite vocare queas.
Dum vitam & mortem Sanctorum narrat, vt errat?
Vt pingit, fingit, Plumbeus ille liber?
Aurea nunc tandem prodit, noua, vera Legenda:
Egregium Chronicon, lugubris historia.
Authorem commendat opus, fic rursus adornat
Author opus: simul hæc vtraque felle carent.
Authorem specta: pius est, & tersus, & amplus,
Iudicio clarus, dexteritate, fide.
Si rem consideras, casus, cædesque bonorum
Tractat, & immeritæ stigmata sæua crucis.
Illudant alij, carpant, at Zoilus olim
Dum perijt, quid sit rodere, iam docuit.
Hic discas Lector, quam sit furiosa tyrannis
Romanæ caulæ, cornigerique gregis:
Vt lupus innocuos semper grassetur in agnos:
Vt fremat, atque auidis faucibus ossa voret.
Nonne satis fuerat Christi pia membra cremare?
Et viuos flammis perdere, nonne satis?
Nonne satis damnasse senes, pueroſque, viroſque,
Fœmellas, omni ex ordine, nonne satis?
Cur iuuat, heu, Manes scriptis lacerare iacentes,
Et Diuos Foxi dicere stercoreos?
Ah miser, ah Christi teneros compungis ocellos,
Pupillam tangis, quisquis es ergo sape.
Hæc est progenies cuius stola lota cruore
Agni, per Christum candida tota niter.
Apoc. 6. Illa sub altari querulatur, Christe quousque?
Christe veni propere, Christe quousque feres?
Extra tela tua est, & prædicat illa Tonantem:
Mors pretiosa fuit, vita perennis erit.
Quid furis ô rabiose Satan? quid spicula torques?
Quid reges acuis? quid laniásque pios?
Frustra carnifices, carcer, tormenta, faceſque.
In Cœlo regnant membra caputque simul.
Corpora sanctorum mundus consumpsit, in altum
Migrarunt animæ, nomina Foxus habet:
Nomina Foxus habet totũ celebranda per orbem,
Nomina iam nullo contumulanda die.
Nam cum Martyribus Foxus, cum numine viuent
Nomina, cumque suo stirps generosa deo.
Ad Christum precatio. Monstra, Christe, tuis portum, compescito fluctus Iactatæ naui sit sua, Christe, quies.
Sanguine fraterno posthæc ne terra madescat:
Ne pergat Foxus scribere Martyria.
Perdita decurtes sceleratæ tempora vitæ,
Tandem mortiferus transeat iste calix.
Sit finis, veniatque tuum, pater optime, regnum:
Sit tibi, sit Christo, Spirituique decus.

In Sanct. Martyrum historiam,
Abrah. Hartwelus.

ELoquio, venerande, tuo non Μάρτυρα ipsi Papa.
Sed nos: non Cœlum, Foxe, sed orbis eget,
Illorum creuisse malis læthoque putatum est
Quos nunc ipse vides degenerare greges.
Illorum, crede, historia velut ignibus antè
Calsset quod nunc friget Euangelium.
Certabitque ætas veniens milleſima, quorum
Fortia facta leget, fortia facta sequi.
Et calamo seruata tuo tot flagra, tot ignes,
Funera tot, lacrymas, damna, pericla, neces,
Nulla dies tollet, non qui malus intulit hostis:
Non quamuis omni cum Phlegetone velit.
Non renuente deo, quondam qui sæuijt hostis,
Non, renuente deo, bis violentus erit.
Bis fremat: innocuo rapietur cum grege pastor,
Grex cadet & pastor, spesque futura gregis.
Nullus restabit laceris in ouilibus agnus,
Nulla, deus, recta simplicitate pecus.
Omnia victa malis bona cedent omnibus: alma
Simplicitas fuco, perfidiæque fides:
Iniusto, falso, scelerato, sanguineoque
Virtutum sacer Euangelidumq; chorus. Bonérus.
Quid facient disce ex factis: ventura probantur præteritis.
Ni tua de cœlo veniat Clementia, cuius
Tolluntur digito parua, superba cadunt.
Et venias æterne, potens, inuicte, triumphans:
Sic, vt in Ægypto vel Babylone, veni.
Non tanti Babylone Draco Beluſque fuere,
Cultusque insani, & fœda superstitio. Ad Martyres.
Et licet Ægypti crudelia facta legentur,
Ægyptus non tam sæua minaxque fuit.
Vtraque, nec satis est, monstrum concreuit in vnum.
Et si qua ambabus tetrior hydra fuit.
Quid contra fidus præco, styliue magister?
Doctæ quid poterunt veriparæque scholæ?
Quid mitis toto laniatus corpore Martyr?
Martyre quid plenus sanguisluusque liber?
Qui truculenta liber, qui viuos vndique testes,
Factores viuos, & modò gesta canit?
Scilicet vt monstret sanctorum Ecclesia qualis,
Collecti quales ex Acheronte lupi.
Vt doceat, firmet, soletur corda piorum:
Dedoceat, vincat, excrucietue malos.
Vt tibi parta, deus, stet semper gloria, nati
Vt possit tecum gloria stare tui:
Sanguinis vt sacri, non occultanda trophæa.
Vtraque posteritas, sancta, maligna, sciat.
Hæc, venerande, tibi tanto quæsita labore,
Tot votis optata, & tot vigilata modis,
Noctibus exantlata tot, & sudata diebus,
Tot placitura bonis, obruitura malos.
Christi, non hominum, laudes sparsura per orbem
Factaque (credo) æras qualia rara feret:
Hæc, oro, tibi Summipotens nobisque secundet,
Numinis in laudem perpetuumque decus.
Inuideat Satanas, & Zoilus ilia rumpat,
Obtrectet mendax cum grege Roma suo.

In idem argumentum.

ENiterum in magnos noua commentaria vates:
Auctius & plus est, quàm fuit antè decus.
Sanctorum historias, & nostri perfida secli
Tempora, lector habes, terrificumque scelus.
Dignum certè opus est, quamuis sit grande volumen,
Quod pia turba legat posteritasque probet.
Surgit opus (fateor) maius: numerosa sophorum est
Littera, sed similis pondere & arte stylus.
Crede mihi historiam hanc quondam lectura vetustas:
Suspiciet genium (Foxe diserte) tuum.
Non tamen insani finit hæc dementia vulgi,
Hei mihi nec doctos fert patiturue viros.
Histrio, scurra, dicax, parasitus, hypocrita, mimus,
Vappa mage arrident, leno, papista, placent.
Nescis adulari, nec verum (Foxe) silere.
Scriptáque miraris non placuisse tua?

Eiusdem.

QVisq; bonus te (Foxe) colit, tua scripta celebrat,
Dant decus hoc studij tot Monumenta tui.
Te pia vita ornat, doctorum concio laudat,
Vnde ergo in libros inuidia ista tuos?
Vnde Papizantis subita hæc conuersio sectæ:
Nunc audire pudet, quod facere haud puduit.
Vnde tot Harpiæ, nempe Hardyngique Copique.
Vnde hæc Louanij garrula turba scholæ?
Causa patet: furiæ Musas, nec sacra Papismus,
Nec Christi athletas rasa farina probat.
Nec te adeò oderunt puto, sed verumque fidemque:
Heu bene nulla potest lingua maligna loqui.

In Acta Martyrum, Carmen.
Thom. Drant.

ERgone sic Papæ potuit vox improba iussu
Tam dirum mandare nefas? tot corpora tantis
Contumulasse rogis, cineres sine honore sepulchri?
Quod genus hoc hominum? quæue hunc tam barbara morem
Permittit gens vlla, pios sine lege necari,
Torque simul mactare viros meretricis ob iram?
Papa refer, quæ te rapuit rabiesque furorque,
Corpora tam diris sanctorum addicere flammis,
Funera tot miseere hominum, tot plectere ciues,
Vastare & toto diuisos orbe Britannos?
Dic quid nostrates in te committere tantum?
Illi quid potuêre, quibus tot maxima passis
Vix pars vlla manet terræ qui panditur orbis?
An tua quod nobis taxata est frausque dolusque,
Et κολυπραγμοσυνη, & amor sceleratus habendi?
An tua quod nobis vox non hominem sonat: ergo
Rite putabamus Papam cacodæmone natum?
An quod cum Christo nos conspirare dolebas?
Quod te cum Christo non conspirare videmus?
Quòd te Romanam crebris cum cornibus hydram
Prodimus, vt sceleris magni, vit ijque ministrum?
Hinc illud quod se versat dirisque minisque,
Hinc illud quòd & hos facibus fumantibus vsit.
Sis miser & nulli cuiquam miserabilis. Huius
Tu cladis tantæ pars magna Bonere fuisti:
Mactator pecudum Christi, dispersor ouilis,
Triste malum stabulis, & nil nisi pessima clades.
Vos quoque, vos omnes Ihouæ tetigisse prophetas,
Et calcasse pios, numen spreuisse benignum
Quèis ioculare fuit, crudeles ponite mentes.
Iam satis est (proh) plus satis est, resipiscite serô,
Sera nimis non vlla dies, nunc discite tandem,
Discite vel tandem moniti non temnere Christum.
Oscula libetis gnato, ne sæuiat vltor,
Et male vos sparsos deturbet tramite vitæ
At vos qui læti quiduis superastis acerbum,
Cœlicolæ, quidduis æternum licet esse beatis,
Dulce decusque Dei, Christum quia morte decora
Ornásti, clari superi, cœtusque triumphans.
Non caro non mundus, nõ vos turcæ, papa, dæmon,
Non phœbe pernox vexabit, soluè diurnus.
Et vos ô cuncti, scanso qui culmine cœli,
Vaditis ad patrem, terrena mole relicta:
Quid carcer, colaphi, compes: tormenta, cachinni,
Vultus quid nocuere truces? quid tale? quid ignes?
Scilicet vt fuluum spectatur in ignibus aurum:
Sic vos mactarunt spectata holocaumata Christo.
Interitus vester Domini, preciosus ocellis,
Horum (Foxe) pijs, dum tu sic nomina scriptis.
Et mortem, & mores longum diffundis in ævum,
Omnia dum vera repetens ab origine pandis,
Es bonus, & merito multum memorabilis ipso.
Ergo tu doctis pergis pallescere chartis
Nocturna versans lumina manu, versando diurna,
Athlas clarorum gnauus gnarusque laborum
Et studijs, dum magna cohors sua commoda captans
(Auspice non Christo) mundi venatur honores.
Vel tu Romano, vel tu sermone Britanno
Scribito præteriti vel produc temporis acta,
Patre Deo monstrante viam, data fata secutus:
Omne feres punctum, si misces vtile dulci. Ad deum de inundantibus bellorum procellis.
Magne Deus, Cœlique fator, mundique monarcha,
Quem nos terrarum tempestatumque potentem
Credimus, & solum scimus venerabile numen,
Aspicis insano vexari cuncta tumultu,
Et penitus mundum pacis de cardine volui?
Parce gregi paruo, pacem te poscimus omes.
Sis bonus (ô) Fœlixque tuis, vel parcito Christo,
Cuius membra nimis iam mundus lædit & odit.
Per tibi dilectam sponsam promissaque pacta,
Per passum Christum, per dulcia pignora passi,
Per te, te petimus, dentes confringe malorum.

IAm tua ter magnum spatijs emensa laborem
Æquora lustrauit puppis, ter littora vidit,
Foxe.
Dumque fugas, enseſq; canis, consumptaq; flammis
Corpora, consumptum corpus tibi, pallida languent
Membra, sed vtilior nobis tibi noxia soli
Indefessa manet virtus. Quin otia carpis
Mollia, iam solare tuos (diuine) labores.
Non potes, & semper mentem tibi numinis ingens
Ardor agit, reparatque nouas in pectore vires.
Ergo age quãdoquidem nobis memoranda piorum
Facta canis sacro properans indulge labori.
Iam veniet magni seriem dum colligit æui
Posteritas, quam longa tenet custodia famæ,
Dumque tui monumenta legit (venerande) laboris,
Magnanimósque duces, medioſque petita per ignes
Sydera, te ventura simul mirabitur ætas,
Et veterum sacras imitabitur æmula laudes.
Scilicet æthereas ardentia pectora flammas,
Non ignes alij, non ipsa potentia Regum,
Nec vis vlla domat ferri, non tela, nec enses.
Qualis vbi Aurora veniens è montibus Ales
Exequiale refert munus, cineréſque paternos,
Dúmq; rogum, flammáſq; parat sibi, maior, ab igne
Egreditur, quaque illa nouis volitauerit alis,
Indignæ volucres læto clamore sequuntur:
Fœlices animæ vobis super alta beatis
Sydera calcatur quicquid mortalia tangit
Pectora, nec iam noster honor, nec præmia curæ:
Nec quid agat tantis virtutibus inuida tellus.
Ecce tamen, quales poterit, persoluet honores
Posteritas, dum facta legens ingentia, vires
Miratur, plausúque fidem super astra sequetur
Victricem (Hoc siquid debent mortalibus) ipsi
Sanctorum cineres tibi se debere fatentur,
Foxe.
Tempus erit, cum tu post fata, piósque labores,
Auctus rus superos fœlix super alta videbis
Sydera iam quorum transcribis nomina famæ,
Insignes heroas, & ipse videberis illis.
Iamque patres superans mundo labente sequetur
Progenies, Cœlo se clarior exeret alto
Religio, humani generis decus, optima custos
Imperij, quam sancta fides comitatur euntem,
Et circum lætis crescet pax aurea terris:
Tum quoque diuini passim monumenta laboris,
Et sacrum florebit opus, fructúque beabit,

IN IO. FOXVM THEOLOGVM CELEBERRIMVM, cum Chriſto exultantem.

IN quiet peace thou ſleepeſt now at reſt
O learned Foxe, the Phenix of our age;
Moſt happie thou with crowne of glorie bleſt,
For euer freed from perſecuting rage:
With comfort great thou gained haſt the ſhore,
And ſtormie tempeſts now needſt feare no more.

Thy life not ſtain'd with ſpot of foule defame,
Thy learning great, who dare the ſame deny?
Thy worthie Workes abroad doe ſound thy name,
And ſhall for euer to poſterity.
So long as learning and the learned liue,
Thy Works to thee immortall praiſe will giue.

Thy famous Worke of thoſe that witneſſe bare
To Chriſt his truth, and ſeald it with their blood,
That with Alcides labors may compare,
Shall witnes ſtill thy zeale for churches good:
Shall witneſſe ſtill to ages yet to come,
Thy hatred iuſt againſt that whore of Rome.

Thy hand was alwaies ſtretched out to giue,
Thy eie from poore was neuer turn'd aſide:
What one of thee might not haue learn'd to liue?
Who in thy life ſo many waies waſt tride:
And yet the ſame didſt alwaies ſtill endure,
No change thy heart to change could once procure.

The afflicted ſoule by thee did comfort find,
The conſcience weake by thee did ſtrength attaine;
Thy Sermons ſweet raiſd vp the feeble mind,
And many a ſoule from hell to Chriſt did gaine:
Such care thou hadſt Gods mercies ſtill to preach,
Such grace thou hadſt the truth of Chriſt to teach.

Thy tongue and pen the truth did ſtill defend,
Thou baniſhment for Chriſt didſt gladly bide;
In him thou liu'dſt, in him thou mad'ſt thy end,
Moſt happie thou that hadſt ſo good a guide.
Moſt happie thou while life thou didſt retaine,
Moſt happie now that doeſt with Chriſt remaine.

Acts and Monuments of the Christian

Martyrs, and matters Ecclesiasticall, passed in the Church of Christ, from the Primitiue beginning, to these our dayes, as well in other Countries, as namely in this Realme of England, and also of Scotland, discoursed at large.

And first, the difference betweene the church of Rome that now is, and the ancient church of Rome that then was.

CHRIST our Sauiour in the gospel of S. Matth. ca. 16. hearing the cõfession of Simõ Peter, who first of all other openly acknowleged him to be the son of God, & perceiuing the secret hand of his father therin, answered again & alluding to his name, called him a rock, vpon which rock he would build his church so strong that the gates of hell should not preuaile against it, &c. In which words 3. things are to be noted. First, that Christ will haue a church in this world. Secondlie, that the same church should mightily be impugned, not only by the world, but also by the vttermost strength & powers of all hel. And thirdly, that the same church notwithstanding the vttermost of the diuell and all his malice should continue. Which prophecie of Christ we see wonderfullie to be verified. Insomuch that the whole course of the church to this day, may seem nothing else but a verifieng of the said prophecie. First, that Christ hath set vp a church needeth no declaration. Secondly, what force, what sides and sorts of men, of princes, kings, monarchs, gouernors, & rulers of this world, with their subiects publikely & priuatly, with all their strength and cunning haue bent themselues against this church. And thirdly, how the said church, all this notwithstanding, hath yet endured and holden his owne. What stormes and tempests it hath ouerpast, wonderous it is to behold. For the more euident declaration whereof, I haue addressed this present historie, intending by the fauourable aid of Christ our Lord, not so much to delight the eares of my country in reading of newes, as most specially to profit the hearts of the godlie in perusing antiquities of ancient times, to the end that the wonderfull works of God, first in his church, might appeare to his glory. Also that the continuance and procéedings of the church from time to time being set forth in these Acts & Monuments, more knowledge and experience may redound thereby to the profit of the reader, and edification of christian faith.

Matth. 16.

Three things noted in Christes words.

The order of the disposition of this historie.

For the better accomplishing whereof, so to prosecute the matter, as may best serue to the profit of the reader: I haue thought good first, beginning from the time of the primitiue church, and so continuing (by the Lords grace) to these latter yeares, to run ouer the whole state and course of the church in generall, in such order as digesting the whole tractation of this historie, into fiue sundrie diuersities of times.

The suffering time of the church.

1. First I will intreat of the suffering time of the church, which continued from the Apostles age about three hundred yeares.

The florishing time of the church.

2. Secondlie, of the florishing time of the church, which lasted other three hundred yéeres.

The declining time of the church.

3. Thirdly, of the declining or backsliding time of the church, which comprehendeth other three hundred yeares, vntill the losing out of Sathan, which was about the thousand yeare after the ceasing of persecution. During which space of time, the church, although in ambition and pride it was much altered from the simple sinceritie of the primitiue time, yet in outward profession of doctrine and religion, it was something tolerable, and had some face of a church: notwithstanding some corruption of doctrine, with superstition and hypocrisie was then also crept in. And yet in comparison of that as followed after, it might séeme (as I said) something sufferable.

The time of antichrist in the church.

4. Fourthlie, followeth the time of antichrist, and losing of Sathan, or desolation of the church, whose full swinge conteineth the space of foure hundred yeares. In which time, both doctrine and sincerity of life was vtterly almost extinguished: namely, in the chiefe heades and rulers of this west church, through the meanes of the Romane Bishops, especially counting from Gregorie the seauenth called Hildebrand, Innocentius the third, and friers which with him crept in, till the time of John Wickliffe & John Husse, during foure hundred yeares.

The reformation of the church.

5. Fiftlie, and lastly, after this time of antichrist, reigning in the church of God by violence and tyranny, followeth the reformation and purging of the church of God, wherin antichrist beginneth to be reuealed, and to appeare in his colours, and his antichristian doctrine to be detected, the number of his church decreasing, and the number of the true church increasing. The durance of which time hath continued hitherto about the space of two hundred and fourescore years, and how long shall continue more, the Lord and gouernor of all times, he only knoweth. For in these fiue diuersities and alterations of times, I suppose the whole course of the church may well be comprised. The which church, because it is vniuersall, & sparsedlie through all countries dilated, therefore in this historie standing vpon such a generall argument, I shall not bee bound to anie one certeine nation, more than another: yet notwithstanding keeping mine argument aforesaid, I haue purposed principallie to tarrie vpon such historicall acts and records, as most appertéine to this my countrie of England and Scotland.

The church of Rome.

And forsomuch as the church of Rome, in all these ages aboue specified, hath chalenged to it selfe the supreme title, and ringleading of the whole vniuersall church on earth, by whose direction all other churches haue beene gouerned: in writing therefore of the church of Christ, I cannot but partlie also intermeddle with the acts & procéedings of the same church, forsomuch as the doings and orderings of all other churches from time to time, as well here in England, as in other nations, haue this long season chiefely depended vpon the same. Wherfore, as it is much néedfull and requisit to haue the doings and orderings of the said church to be made manifest to all christian congregations: so haue I framed this historie, according to the same purpose. First in a generall description briefly to declare, as in a summarie table, the misguiding of that church, comparing the former primitiue state of the forenamed church of Rome, with these latter times of the same. Which done, then after in a more speciall tractation, to prosecute more at large all the particulars thereof, so farre forth as shall séeme not vnprofitable for the publick instruction of all other christian churches, to behold and consider the maner and dealing of this one. In the which one church of Rome foure things, as most speciall points, séeme to me chiefelie to be considered. To wit, title, iurisdiction, life, and doctrine. Wherin I haue here to declare, first cõcerning the title or primacy of the church, how it first began, and vpon what occasion. Secondly, concerning the iurisdiction and authoritie thereof, what it was, and how far it did extend. Thirdlie, touching the misorder of life and conuersation, how inordinate it is, and fourthly the forme of doctrine, how superstitious and idolatrous of late it hath beene. Of the which foure the first was preiudiciall to all Bishops, the second derogatory to kings and emperors. The third detestable to all men. The fourth iniurious against Christ.

The title of the Pope.

For first, the title and stile of that church was such, that it ouerwent all other churches, being called the holie vniuersall mother church, which could not erre; and the bishop thereof holy father the pope, bishop vniuersall, prince of priests, supreame head of the vniuersall church, and vicar of Christ here in earth, which must not bee iudged, hauing all knowledge of Scripture and all lawes contained within the chest of his brest.

The iurisdiction of the Pope.

Secondly, the iurisdiction of that bishop was such, that challenging to himselfe both the swords, that is, both the keies of the spiritualtie, and the scepter of the laitie: not onely he subdued all bishops vnder him, but also extended himselfe aboue kings and emperors, causing some of them to ly vnder his feet, some to hold his stirrup, kings to leade his horse by the bridle, some to kisse his feet, placing and displacing emperors, kings, dukes and earles, whom and when hee listed, taking vpon him to translate the empire at his pleasure; first from Græce to France, from France to Germanie, preferring and deposing whom he pleased, confirming them which were elected. Also being emperor himselfe Sede vacante, pretending authoritie or power to inuest bishops, to giue benefices, to spoile churches, to giue authoritie to binde and loose, to call generall councels, to iudge ouer the same, to set vp religions, to canonize saints, to take appeales, to bind consciences, to make lawes, to dispense with the lawe and word of God, to deliuer from purgatorie, to command angells, &c.

The properties of life in the Romish clergie.

Thirdly, what was the life and conuersation of the court of Rome, hereafter in the processe of this history followeth to bee seene and obserued.

The Doctrine of the Pope.

Fourthly, such was his doctrine in like manner, tedious to students, pernicious to mens consciences, iniurious to Christ Iesus, and contrarie to it selfe. In lawes more diuers, in volume more large, in diligence and studie more applied, in vantage and preferment more gainefull, than euer was the studie and learning of the holy scripture of God.

All which foure points well considered and aduised in this present historie set forth, I trust it may minister to the indifferent christian reader, sufficient instruction to iudge, what is of this see and church of Rome to be esteemed.

But heere by the way is to be noted, that all these deformities aboue touched of vaine title, of pretensed iurisdiction, of hereticall doctrine, of schismatical life, came not into the church of Rome all at one time, nor sprang with the beginning of the same church, but with long wearing, and continuance of time by little and litle crept vp, through occasion, and came not to full perfection, till the time partly of pope Syluester, partly of pope Gregorie the seauenth, in the yeare of our Lord 1170. partly of Innocentius the third, and finally of pope Boniface the eight in the yeare of our Lord 1300: Of the which foure popes, the first brought in the title in the yeare of the Lord 670. which was neuer in such ample wise before publikely exacted, and receiued publikely in the said church of Rome. The second brought in iurisdiction. The third, which was pope Innocent with his rable of monks and friers (as Thomas Aquine, Petrus Lombardus, Johannes Scotus) and with such other bishops as succeeded in the same see after him, corrupted and obscured the sinceritie of Christs doctrine and manners also. And lastly, pope Bonifacius the eight, and after him pope Clement the fift, ouer & besides the iurisdiction, sufficiently aduanced before by pope Hildebrand, added moreouer the temporall sword to be carried before them. And that no emperour were he neuer so well elected) should bee sufficient and lawfull, without the popes admission, in the yeare of our Lord 1200: whereby the popes power was brought now to his full pride and perfection. And thus came vp the corruption of the Romish church in continuance of yeares by degrees, and not altogither, nor at one time, as is declared, and hereafter more particularlie (Christ willing shall be expressed.

Pope Syluester the second. Pope Gregorie the seauenth called Hildebrand. Pope Innocentius the third. Pope Bonifacius the eight.

Wherefore, whosoeuer shall haue hereafter to doe with any aduersaries, about the antiquitie or authoritie of the church of Rome, let him here well consider when and how, the title, iurisdiction, and corruption of doctrine first began in the popes see. And so shal he see, that the church of Rome, as it is now gouerned with this manner of title, iurisdiction, and institution of doctrine, neuer descended from the primitiue age of the Apostles, or from their succession, Nisi tantùm æquiuocè, & non vniuocè: Like as Sancta Maria picta non est sancta Maria, & homo pictus non est homo, as the schooles do say: that is, As the picture of the holy virgine, is not the holy virgin, and as a man painted on the wall is not a man: so it is to be said of the church of Rome (the institution and doctrine of the church of Rome I meane) that although it haue the name of the church apostolicall, and doth bring forth a long genealogie of outward succession from the apostles, as the Pharisets did in Christs time bring their descent from Abraham their father: yet all this is (as I said) but only Aequiuocè, that is, in name only, and not in effect or matter, which maketh the apostolicall church in deed, for as much as the definition of the apostolicall church, neither agreeth now with this present church of Rome, nor yet the maner, forme, and institution of the said Romish church, as it now standeth with this title, iurisdiction and doctrine, had euer any succession or springing from the primitiue church of the apostles. But as Christ said by the Pharisets, that they were the children not of Abraham, but of the diuell: in semblable wise may be answered, that this church of Rome now present, with this title, iurisdiction, and doctrine now vsed, cannot be fathered vpon the apostles, neither Petrus, nor Linus, but of an other author, whom here I will not name.

Aequiuocè, That is in name onely and not in very deed.
Vniuocè. That is, both in name and also in definition and effect agreeing with the name.
The Church of Rome as now it is, is not apostolical, but only æquiuocè.

The argument of Pighius, Hosius, & Eccius for the authoritie of the church of Rome.

And here now commeth in the argument of Pighius, Hosius, and Eccius, to be answered vnto, who arguing for the antiquitie and authority of the church of Rome, reason on this manner.

Da- That for somuch as an ordinary and a knowne church visible must here be knowen continually on earth, during from the time of the Apostles, to the which church all other churches must haue recourse:

ri- And seeing then there is no other church visible, orderlie knowen to haue indured from the apostles time, but onely the church of Rome:

j. They conclude therefore that the church of Rome, is that church, whereunto all other churches must haue their recourse, &c.

Answere. Fallacia æquiuoci.

To the which paralogisme I answere thus: that this word Durans ecclesia, the during church in the Minor, hath Fallaciam æquiuoci. For although the name of the church and outward succession of Bishops haue had their durance from time of the apostles, yet the definition & matter which maketh a true apostolicall church indeed, and Vniuocè, neither is now in the church of Rome, nor yet the forme and institution of the church now vsed in Rome was euer from the apostles: which apostles were neuer authors or fathers of this title, iurisdiction, and doctrine now taught in Rome, but rather were enemies euer to the same.

The minor examined.

The maior examined.

Againe to the Maior, which standeth vpon two parts, I answer. First although the necessity of the church during from the apostles, may and must be granted; yet the same necessity was not bound to any certaine place, or person but only to faith: so that whersoeuer, that is to say, in whatsoeuer congregation true faith was, there was the church of Christ. And because the true faith of Christ must needs euer remaine in earth: therefore the church also must needs remaine in earth. And God forbid that the said true faith of Christ should onely remaine in one city in the world, and not in other as well. And therefore to the second part of the Maior is to be said, that as this true and sincere faith of Christ is not so giuen, to remaine firstly in one place or citie alone: so neither is there any one church in the world so ordained and appointed of God, that all other churches should haue their recourse vnto it, for determination of their causes and controuersies incident, &c. And thus much to the argument of Pighius and Hosius, &c.

A distinction. The church of Rome distincted into a double consideration of times. The church of Rome, how it was commended of the old doctors.

Now as touching the authorities and allegations of the auncient doctors and holy fathers in the commendation of the church of Rome, here commeth in also to be noted, that whosoeuer will vnderstand rightly their authorities, and answere to the same, must first learne to make a difference and distinction of the said church of Rome, from that it was, to that it is: for as much as the church of Rome is not the same church now, which it was then, but only Aequiuocè: otherwise as touching the very property and definition of a church, it is another church, and nothing agreeing to that it was then, saue only in outward name and place. Therfore by this distinction made, I answere the place of Ireneus, Cyprianus, and other famous doctors, commending the church of Rome as catholike and apostolicall, and say that these doctors speaking of the church of Rome which then was, said not vntrue, calling it catholike & apostolicall, for that the same church tooke their ordinary succession of bishops, ioined with the ordinarie doctrine and institution from the Apostles. But speaking of the church of Rome, which now is, we say the said places of the doctors are not true, neither doe appertaine to the same: all which Doctors neither knew the church of Rome that now is, neither if they had, would euer haue iudged any thing therin worthy such commendation.

The principall obiection of the papists against the protestants.

Answer to the obiection.

Ouer and besides, our aduersaries yet more obiect against vs, who heauing and shouing for the antiquitie of the Romish church, for lacke of other sufficient reason to proue, are driuen to fall in scanning the times and yeares. What (say they) where was this church of yours before these fiftie yeares? To whom briefly to answer, first we demaund what they meane by this, which they call our church? If they meane the ordinance and institution of doctrine and sacraments, now receiued of vs, and differing from the church of Rome, we affirme and saie, that our church was, when this church of theirs was not yet hatched out of the shell, nor did yet euer see any light: that is, in the time of the Apostles, in the primitiue age, in the time of Gregory the first, and the old Romane church, when as yet no vniuersall pope was receiued publikely, but repelled in Rome; nor this fulnesse of plenarie power yet knowen, nor this doctrine, and abuse of sacraments yet heard of. In witnesse wherof we haue the olde acts and histories of ancient time to giue testimonie with vs, wherein sufficient matter we haue for vs, to declare the same form, vsage, and institution of this our church refor-reformed now, not to be the beginning of anie new church of our owne, but to be the renewing of the old ancient church of Christ: nor to be anie swaruing from the church of Rome, but rather a reducing to the church of Rome. Whereas contrarie the church of Rome which now is, is nothing but a swaruing from the church of Rome, as partlie is declared, and more shall appeare (Christ willing) hereafter.

The church of Rome reuolted from the church of Rome.

Another obiection of the papists.

And where the said our aduersaries do moreouer charge vs with the faith of our fathers and godfathers, wherein we were baptised, accusing and condemning vs, for that we are now reuolted from them and their faith, wherin we were first christened: To this we answer, that we being first baptised by our fathers and godfathers, in water, in the name of the father, of the sonne, and of the holy ghost, the same faith wherein wee were christened then, we do retaine: & because our godfathers were themselues also in the same faith, therefore they cannot say that we haue forsaken the faith of our godfathers, &c. As for other points of ecclesiasticall vses and circumstances considered, besides the principall substance of faith and baptisme, if they held any thing which receded from the doctrine and rule of Christ, therein we now remoue our selues; not because we would differ from them, but because we would not with them remoue from the rule of Christs doctrine. Neither doth the sacrament of our baptisme bind vs in all points to the opinions of them that baptised vs, but to the faith of him, in whose name we were baptised. For as if a man were christened of an heretike, the baptisme of him notwithstanding were good, although the baptiser were naught: so if our godfathers or fathers, which christened vs, were taught any thing, not consonant to christian doctrine in all points, neither is our baptisme worse for that, nor yet we bound to follow them in all things, wherein they themselues did not follow the true church of Christ.

An answer to the obiection.

No man bound to follow the opinions of his godfathers in all points vnlesse they bee consonant in all things.

The church of Rome distincted from the church of Rome.

Wherefore as it is false, that we haue renounced the faith of our godfathers wherein we were first baptised, so is it not true that we are remoued from the church of Rome: but rather say and (by the leaue of Christ) will proue that the church of Rome hath vtterly departed from the church of Rome, according to my distinction before touched. Which thing the more euidently to declare, I will here compare the church of Rome with the church of Rome; and in a general description set forth (by Gods grace) the difference of both the churches, that is, of both the times of the church of Rome: to the intent it may be seene, whether we or the church of Rome haue more apostated from the church of Rome. And here first I diuide the church of Rome in a double consideration of time, first of those first fiue hundred yeeres which were immediately after Christ: and secondly of the other fiue hundred yeeres, which now haue been in these our latter daies: and so in comparing these two together, will search out what discrepance is betweene them both. Of the which two ages & states of the Roman church, the first I call the primitiue church of Rome, the other I call the latter church of Rome, counting this latter church from the thousand yeeres expired after the binding vp of satan, to the time of his losing againe, according to the prophesie of the twentith chapter of saint Johns Reuelation; counting these thousand yeeres from the ceassing of persecution, vnder Constantinus Magnus, to the beginning of persecution of the church againe vnder Innocentius the third, and Ottomannus the first Turcian emperour. And thus haue yee the church of Rome parted into two churches, in double respect and consideration of two sundrie states and times. Now in setting and matching the one state with the other, let vs see whether the church of Rome hath swarued from the church of Rome more than we, or no.

Two times of the church of Rome considered and examined.

The first point.

AND to begin first with the order and qualities of life; I aske here of this Romane clergie, where was this church of theirs which now is, in the old ancient time of the primitiue church of Rome, with this pompe and pride, with this riches and superfluitie, with this Gloria mundi, and name of cardinals, with this prancking dissolutenesse and whoring of the curtisans, with this extortion, bribing, buying and selling of spirituall dignities, these annats, reformations, procurations, exactions, and other practises for mony, this auarice insatiable, ambition intollerable, fleshly filthinesse most detestable, barbarousnesse and negligence in preaching, promise breaking faithlesse, poisoning and supplanting one another, with such schismes and diuisions, which neuer were more seene than in the elections and court of Rome these seuen hundred yeeres, with such extreame crueltie, malice, and tyrannie in burning and persecuting their owne brethren to death?

The enormities of life in the latter church of Rome described.

Policies and practises of Rome to get monie.

It were too long, & a thing infinit, to stand particularly vpon these aboue rehearsed. And if a man should prosecute at large all the schismes that haue been in the church of Rome since the time of Damasus the first, which are counted to the number of eightéene schismes; what a volume would it require? Or if here should be recorded all that this see hath burned and put to death since the losing out of satan, who were able to number them? Or if all their sleights to get mony should be described as processe of matter would require, who were able to recite them all? Of which all notwithstanding, the most principall grounds are reckoned at least to foureteene or fifteene sleights.

Fifteene practises of the new church of Rome to get monie.

First for annats, or vacācies of archbishoprikes, bishoprikes, abbacies, priories conuentuall, and other benefices elective. 1

Secondly, for the holding and reteining of all other spirituall liuings whatsoeuer, besides this which now the incumbent paieth for, or which he may hold hereafter. 2

Thirdly, new annats for all the same are required againe, ned to be not orderly come by, whereby it hath chanced diuers times three or foure annats to be paied for one benefice. 3

Toties quoties any one of all his spirituall liuings be, or are fal-

Fourthly, for guiing out preuentions of benefices before they fall, and many times some one preuention to be giuen to diuers and sundrie persons by the office for monies sake. 4

Fiftly, for resignations vpon fauour, which in many cases the pope challengeth to be reserued to himselfe. 5

Sixtlie, for commendams. 6

Seuenthly, for compounding with such as be absent from their charge, and giue their attendance about the court. 7

Eightly, for infinite dispensations, as to dispense with age, with order, with benefices incompatible, as if the number bee full, if the house be of such or such an order. Item dispensation for irregularitie, for whoredome and adulterie, for times of marriage, for marring in degrées forbidden, or in affinitie canonicall, for gossips to marrie, for the which it hath been séene in France a thousand crownes to be paid to Rome at one time, for dispensing with this canonicall affinitie of gossips, as we call it, the same being yet not true, but fained. Item dispensing for eating meates in times prohibited. 8

Ninthlie, for innumerable priuiledges, exemptions, graces for not visiting, or visiting by a proctor, for confirmations of priuiledges, for transactions made vpon speciall fauor of the pope, for permutations of benefices with dispensation annexed, or making of pensions, with such like. 9

Tenthly, for mandats granted by the pope, to ordinaries, whereof euery ordinarie, if he haue the collation or presentation often, may receiue one mandat; if he haue fiftie, he may receiue two mandats: & for euery mandat there comes to the pope about twentie ducats. And yet notwithstanding so many are sold, as will come buiers to pay for them. 10

Eleuenthly, for the popes penitentiarie, for absolution of cases reserued to the pope, for breaking & changing of vowes, for translation from one monasterie to another, also from one order to another, for licence to enter into certaine monasteries, to carrie about altars, with many other things of like deuice, pertaining to the office of the popes penitentiarie. 11

Twelfly, for giuing and granting of innumerable pardons and indulgences, to be read not onely in publike temples, but also to be bought in priuate houses, and of priuat persons, in diuers and sundrie respects. 12

Thirteenthly, for making notaries, and protonotaries, and other offices of the court of Rome. 13

Fourteenthly, for granting out buls and commissions of new foundations, or for changing of the old, for reducing regular monasteries to a secular state, or for restoring againe into the old, and for other infinite rescripts and writs about matters depending in controuersie, and otherwise might and ought by the ordinarie to be decided. 14

Fifteenthlie, for giuing the pall to archbishops newlie elected. By reason of all which deuices (besides the first of the annates) it hath been accounted out of the kings records in France, in the time of Ludouike the ninth (as testifieth Molineus) to the number of two hundred thousand crownes, onelie out of France paied and transported to Rome. Which summe since that time hath been doubled and tripled, besides annats and palles, which all together are thought to make the totall summe, yeerely going out of France to the popes coffers of late yeeres, ten myriades, or millions, euery myriad mounting to ten thousand crownes. Now what hath risen besides in other realmes and nations, let other men coniecture. 15

Wherefore if the gospell send vs to the fruits to know the tree, I pray you what is to be thought of the church of Rome, with these fruits of life? Or if we will séeke the church in length and number of yeeres, where was this church of Rome with these qualities then, at what time the church of Rome was a persecuted church, not a persecuting church? And when the bishops therof did not make martyrs, as these doe now, but were made martyrs themselues, to the number of fiue and twentie, in order one after another? Or when the bishops thereof were elected and exalted, not by factious conspiring, not by power or parts taking, not by monie or friends making, as they be now; but by the free voices of the people and of the clergie, with the consent of the emperour ioyned withall, and not by a few conspired cardinals, closed vp in a corner, as they be now, &c.

AND yet if there were no other difference in the matter, but only corruption of life, all that we would tolerat, or els impute to the common fragilitie of man, & charge them no further therein, than we might charge our selues. Now ouer and beside this deformitie of life, wherein they are cleane gone from the former steps of the true church of Rome, we haue moreouer to charge them in greater points, more neerely touching the substantiall ground of the church, as in their iurisdiction presumptuouslie vsurped, in their title falselie grounded, and in their doctrine heretically corrupted. In all which three points, this latter pretensed church of Rome hath vtterly sequestred it self from the image and nature of the ancient and true church of Rome, and haue erected to themselues a new church of their owne making, as first vsurping a iurisdiction neuer knowne before to their ancient predecessors. For although the church of Rome in the old primitiue time had his due authoritie & place due vnto that see, among other patriarchall churches, ouer and vpon such churches as were within his precinct, and bordering neere vnto it, as appeareth by the acts of Nicen councell: yet the vniuersall fulnesse and plenitude of power in both the regiments, spirituall and temporall, in depossing & dispensing matters of the church, not to him belonging, in taking appeales, in giuing elections, inuesting in benefices, in exempting himselfe from obedience and subiection of his ordinarie power and magistrate, with his coactiue power newly erected in the church of Rome, was neuer receiued nor vsed in the old Romane church, from the which they disagree in all their doings.

Nicen. con. cap. 6.

Victor stopped from his excommunication by Ireneus.

For although Victor then bishop of Rome, Anno 200. went about to excommunicat the east churches, for the obseruation of Easter day: yet neither did he proceed therein, neither was permitted by Ireneus so to do. And although Boniface the first likewise, writing to the bishops of Carthage, required of them to send vp their appellations vnto the church of Rome, alleaging moreouer the decree of Nicen councell for his authoritie: the bishops and clergie of Carthage assembling together in a generall councell (called the first councell of Carthage) to the number of two hundred and seuentéene bishops, after that they had perused the decrees in the authentike copies of the foresaid Nicen councell, and found no such matter by the said Bonifacius alleaged, made therefore a publike decree, that none out of that countrie should make any appeale ouer the sea, &c. And what maruell if appeales were forbidden them to be made to Rome, when as both here in England the kings of this land would not permit any to appeale from them to Rome, before king Henrie the second, because of the murther of Thomas Becket, being thereunto compelled by pope Alexander the third? And also in France the like prohibitions were expressly made by Ludouicus Pius, Anno 1268, which did forbid by a publike instrument, called Pragmatica sanctio, all exactions of the popes court within his realme. Also by king Philip named Le bel, An. 1296. the like was done, which not onely restrained all sending or going vp of his subiects to Rome, but also that no monie, armour, nor subsidie should be transported out of his realme. The like also after him did king Charles the fift surnamed the wise, & his sonne likewise after him Charles the first, who also punished as traitors, certain seditious persons for appealing to Rome. The like resistance moreouer was in the said countrie of France, against the popes reseruations, preuentions, & other like practises of his vsurped iurisdiction in the daies of pope Martin the fift. An. 1418. Item, when K. Henrie the first in England, & king Charles the seuenth in France, did both accord with the pope, in inuesting and in collation of benefices: yet notwithstanding the high court of parlement in France did not admit the same, but still maintained the old liberties & customs of the French church. Insomuch that when the duke of Bedford came with the kings letters patent to haue the popes procurations & reseruations admitted, yet the court of parlement would not agree to the same, but the kings procurator generall was faine to goe betwixt them, as is to bee seene in their registers, An. 1425. the fift day of March. In the dates of the which king Charles the seuenth, was set forth in France, Pragmatica sanctio, as they call it, against the annats, reseruations, expectatiues, & such other procéedings of the popes pretensed iurisdiction, An. 1438. Wherefore what maruel if this iurisdiction of the popes court in excommunicating, taking appeales, & giuing of benefices, was not vsed in the old church of Rome, when as in these latter daies it hath bin so much resisted?

The popes iurisdiction concerning elections examined.

And what should I speake of the forme and manner of elections, now vsed in the church of Rome, cleane conuerted from the manner of the old church of their predecessors? For first in those ancient daies, when as yet the church remained in the apostles onely, and a few other disciples, the apostles then with prayer and imposition of hands elected bishops and ministers, as by the apostles James was made bishop of Hierusalem, Paul in Creta elected Titus, and Timothe in Ephesus. Also Peter ordained Linus and Clement in Rome, &c. After which time of the apostles, when the church began more to multiplie, the election of bishops and ministers stood by the clergie and the people with the consent of the chiefe magistrat of the place, and so continued during all the time of the primitiue church, till the time, and after the time of Constantine the fourth emperour, which emperour (as writeth Platina and Sabellicus, Enead. 8. lib. 6.) published a law concerning the election of the Romane bishop, that he should be taken for true bishop, whom the clergie and people of Rome did chose and elect, without any tarying for any authoritie of the emperour of Constantinople, or the deputie of Italie: so as the custome and fashion had euer been before that day, Anno 280. And here the bishops began first to wriche out their elections and their necks a little from the emperours subiection, if it be so as the said Platina and Sabellicus after him reporteth. But many coniectures there be, not vnprobable, rather to thinke this constitution of Constantine to be forged and vntrue: First, for that it is taken out of the popes bibliothecarie, a suspected place, and collected by the keeper and master of the popes librarie, a suspected author, who whatsoeuer feined writings or apocrypha he could find in the popes chests of records, making any thing on his masters side: that he compiled together, and thereof both Platina, Sabellicus, and Gratianus take most part of their reports, and therefore may the more be suspected, &c.

Platina Sabel. Enead. 8. lib. 6.

Constantine the fourth emperor of Constantinople.

The popes bibliothecarie suspected.

The constitution of Constantine the fourth emperor of Constantinople examined.

Secondly, where Platina and Sabellicus say that Constantine moued with the holinesse of pope Benedict the first made that constitution: how seemeth that to stand with truth, when both the emperour was so farre off from him being at Constantinople, and also for that the said pope reigned but ten moneths? Which was but a small time to make his holinesse knowne to the emperor so farre off. And giue he were so holy, yet that holinesse might rather be an occasion for the emperor so to confirme and maintaine the old receiued maner of his institution, than to alter it.

The third coniecture is this, for that the said constitution was not obserued, but shortly after by the said Benedict was broken in the election of pope Conon. And yet notwithstanding albeit the constitution were true, yet the election thereby was not taken away from the people, and limited to the clergie onely, and much lesse might be taken away from the clergie, and be limited onely to the cardinals, without the consent of their prince and ruler, according to their owne rubric in their decrées, where the rubric saith: De ordinatione episcopi: Nullus inuitis detur episcopus, cleri, plebis, & ordinis consensus & desiderium requiratur, &c. That is: Let no bishop be giuen to any people against their wils: but let the consent and desire both of the clergie and of the people, and of the order, be also required, &c. And in the same Dist. also, cap. Sacrorum, we read the same libertie and interest to be granted by Carolus Magnus, and Ludouicus his sonne, not to a few cardinals onelie, but to the order as well of the clergie, as of the people, to chose not onely the bishop of Rome, but any other bishop within their owne diocesse whatsoeuer, and to the monks likewise to chose their owne abbat, setting aside all respect of persons and gifts, onely for the worthinesse of life, and gift of wisdome, so as might be most profitable for doctrine, and example vnto the flocke, &c. And this continued till the time of the foresaid Carolus Magnus & Ludouicus his sonne, An. 810. of the which two, Carolus the father receiued expressie of pope Adrian the first, full iurisdiction & power to elect & ordaine the bishop of Rome, like as pope Leo the ninth did also to Otho the first Germane emperor, An. 961. The other, that is, Ludouicus, son to the foresaid Charles, is said to renounce againe, & surrender from him selfe and his successors, vnto pope Paschalis and the Romans the right and interest of chosing the Romane bishop, and moreouer to giue and grant to the said Paschalis the full possession of the citie of Rome, and the whole territorie to the same belonging, Anno 821. as appeareth by the decrée, Ego Ludouicus, Dist. 63. But admit that fained decrée to bee vnfeinedly true (as it may well bee suspected for many causes, as procéeding out of the same fountaine, with the constitution of Constantine afore mentioned, that is, from the master of the popes librarie, of whom both Gratianus and Volaterane, by their owne confession take their ground) yet the same decrée doth not so giue away the frédome of that election, that he limiteth it only to the cardinals, but also requireth the whole consent of the Romans: neither doth he simplie and absolutely giue the same, but with condition, so that, Omnes Romani vno consilio, & vna concordia, sine aliqua promissione ad pontificatus ordinem eligerent: that is, Whom as all the Romans with one counsell, and with one accord, without any promise of their voices granted before, shall chose to be bishop of Rome. And moreouer in the same decrée is required, that at the consecration of the same bishop, messengers should be directed incontinent to the French king concerning the same.

The decree, Ego Ludouicus, dist. 63. suspected.

Election of the bishop of Rome standeth vpon the consent of the clergie, and the people of Rome.

Furthermore, neither yet did the same decree (albeit it were true) long continue. For although pope Stephan the fourth, and pope Paschalis the first, in Ludouicus time were impaised through discord without election of the emperour, yet they were faine by message to send their purgation to him of their election. And after that, in the time of Eugenius the second, which succeeded next to Paschalis, Lotharius sonne of Ludouicus, and emperour with his father, came to Rome, and there appointed lawes and magistrats ouer the citie. Whereby may appeare the donation of Ludouike, in giuing away the citie of Rome to the pope, to be feined. And after Eugenius, pope Gregorie the fourth, who following within a yeere after Eugenius, durst not take his election without the consent and confirmation of the said emperour Ludouicus. And so in like manner his successors pope Sergius the second, pope Leo the fourth, pope Nicholas the first, and so orderlie in a long tract of time, from the foresaid Nicholas the first, to pope Nicholas the second, Anno 1061. (which Nicholas in his decree beginning, In nomine Domini, dist. 23. ordained also the same) so that in the election of the bishops of Rome, commonlie the consent of the emperour and the people with the clergie of Rome was not lacking. After which Nicholas came Alexander under the second, and wicked Hildebrand, which Alexander being first elected without the emperours will and consent, afterward repenting the same, openly in his preaching to the people declared that he would no longer sit in the apostolike sée, vnlesse he were by the emperour confirmed. Wherfore he was greatly rebuked, and cast into prison by Hildebrand, and so deposed. Then Hildebrand & his followers so ordered the matter of this election, that first the emperor, then the lay people, after that the clergie also began to be excluded. And so the election by little & little was reduced to the hands of a few cardinals, contrarie to all ancient order, where euer since it hath remained.

The iudiciarie power of the pope examined.

And like as in elections, so also in power iudiciary, in deciding and determining of causes of faith, and of ecclesiasticall discipline, the state of the church of Rome, now being, hath no conformitie with the old Romane church heretofore. For then bishops debated all causes of faith only by the scriptures, and other questions of ecclesiasticall discipline they determined by the canons, not of the pope, but of the church, such as were decréed by the ancient councels, as writeth Greg. Turonensis in Francorum historia. Whereas now both the rule of scripture, and sanctions of the old councels set aside, all things for the most part are decided by certaine new decretall or rather extradecretall and extrauagant constitutions, in the popes canon law compiled, and in his consistories practised.

Georg. Turonens. in Francorum hist. lib. 10. ca. 18.

The popes iurisdiction vsurped in giuing and disposing ecclesiasticall promotions.

And whereas the old ordinance and disposition, as well of the common law, as of the sacred councels, and institution of ancient fathers haue giuen to bishops and other prelats, also to patrons and doctors of ecclesiasticall benefices euerie one within his owne precinct and dominion, also to cathedrall churches and other; to haue their frée elections and to prosecute the same in full effect, ordering and disposing promotions, collations, prouisions and dispositions of prelacies, dignities, and all other ecclesiasticall benefices whatsoeuer, after their owne arbitrement, as appeareth by the first generall councell of France 16 q. 7. cap. Omnes Basilicæ, by the first generall councell of Nice cap. 6. Also by the generall councell of Antioch cap. 9. and is to be séene in the popes decrées 9. q. 3. Per singulas. And likewise beside these ancient decrées, the same is confirmed againe in more latter yéeres by Ludouicus the ninth French king in his constitution called Pragmatica sanctio, made and prouided by full parlement against the popes exactions, in the yéere of our Lord 1228. in these words as follow. Item exactiones & onera grauissima pecuniarum, per curiam Romanam ecclesiæ regni nostri impositas vel imposita (quibus regnum miserabiliter depauperatum existit) siue etiam imponendas vel imponenda leuariaut colligi nullatenus volumus: nisi duntaxat pro rationabili, pia & vrgentissima causa, vel ineuitabili necessitate, ac etiam de expresso, & spontaneo iussu nostro, & ipsius ecclesiæ regni nostri, &c, that is: Item all exactions and importable burdens of mony, which the court of Rome hath laid vpon the church of our kingdome (wherby the said our kingdome hath béen miserablie hitherto impouerished) or hereafter shall impose or lay vpon vs, we vtterly discharge and forbid to be leuied or collected hereafter for any maner of cause, vnlesse there come some reasonable, godly, and most vrgent, and ineuitable necessitie; and that also not to be done without the expresse and voluntarie commandement of vs, and of the church of the same our foresaid kingdome, &c. Now contrarie to and against these so manifest and expresse decrées of generall councels, and constitutions synodall, this latter church of Rome of late presumption, degenerating from all the steps of their elders, haue taken vpon them a singuler iurisdiction by themselues, and for their owne aduantage, to intermeddle in disposing and transposing churches, colleges, monasteries, with the collations, exemptions, elections, goods and lands to the same belonging, by reason and example whereof haue come in these impropriations, first fruits, and reseruations of benefices to the miserable despoiling of parishes, and horrible decay of christian faith, which things among the old Romane elders were neuer knowne. For so much then did it lacke, that due necessities were pluckt from the church, that emperours, kings, and princes plucking from their owne, did rather cumulate the church with superfluities.

Impropriations and first fruits of benefices.

Againe, when such goods were giuen to the church by those ancestors, they were neither so giuen, nor yet taken, to serue the priuat vse of certaine churchmen taking no paines therein, but rather to serue the publike subuention of the néedie, as is contained in the canonicall institutions by the emperour Ludouicus Pius, set forth in the yéere of our Lord 830. The words be these: Res ecclesiæ vota sunt fidelium, pretia peccatorum, & patrimonia pauperum, that is: The goods of the church be the vowes and bequests of the faithfull, prices to ransome such as be in captiuitie or prison, and patrimonies to succour them with hospitalitie, that be néedie.

Institutiones canonicæ sub Ludouico Pio.

The words of Prosper.

Whereunto agréeth also the testimonie of Prosper, whose words be these: Viros sanctos ecclesiæ res non vendicasse vt proprias, sed vt commendatas pauperibus diuisisse: that is, Good men tooke the goods of the church not as their owne, but distributed them as giuen and bequeathed to the poore. And saith moreouer: Quod habet ecclesia, cum omnibus nihil habentibus habet commune: that is, what soeuer the church hath, it hath it common with all such as haue nothing, &c.

Adde to the worthy testimonie of S. August. ad Bonif. Si autem priuatim, quæ nobis sufficiant possidemus, non sunt illa nostra, sed paupérum, quorum procurationem quodammodo gerimus, non proprietatem nobis vsurpatione damnabili vendicamus, &c.

Aug. ad Bonifac.

Likewise vowsons and pluralities of benefices were things then as much vnknowne, as now they are pernicious to the church, taking away all frée election of ministers from the flocke of Christ.

Vowsons and pluralities of benefices.

All which inconueniences as they first came and crept in chiefly by the pretensed authoritie and iurisdiction abused in this latter church of Rome: so it cannot be denied, but the said latter church of Rome hath taken and attributed to it selfe much more, than either the limits of Gods word doe giue, or standeth with the example of the old Romain church, in these three things especiall. Whereof as mention is touched before, so briefly I will recapitulate the same.

Three points wherein the popes church erreth in his iurisdiction.

Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction falsely restrained and impropriate to the church of Rome, which ought to be generally equall to all churches christian.

The first is in this, that whatsoeuer the scripture giueth and referreth, either to the whole church vniuersally, or to euery particular church seuerally, this church now of Rome doth arrogate to it selfe absolutely and onely, both doing iniurie to other churches, and also abusing the scriptures of God. For albeit the scripture doth giue authoritie to bind and lose, it limiteth it neither to person nor place, that is, neither to the citie of Rome onely, more than to other cities; nor to the sée of Peter, more then to other apostles, but giueth it clearelie to the church, whereof Peter did beare the figure, so that whatsoeuer the true church of Christ is, there is annexed power to bind and lose, giuen and taken méerely as from Christ, and not mediatlie by the pope or bishop of Peters sée.

Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction abused and extended in the church of Rome further than the word limiteth.

The second point wherein this present church of Rome abuseth his iurisdiction contrary to the scripture and steps of the old Romane church, is this, for that it extendeth his authoritie further and more amplie, than either the warrant of the word, or example of time will giue. For although the church of Rome hath (as other particular churches haue) authoritie to bind and absolue, yet it hath no such authoritie to absolue subiects from their oth, subiection and loialtie to their rulers and magistrats, to dispense with periurie, to denounce remission, where no earnest repentance is seene before, to number remission by dates and yeeres, to dispense with things expressely in the word forbidden, or to restraine that which the word maketh frée, to diuide religion into religions, to bind and burthen consciences with constitutions of men, to excommunicat for worldly matters, as for breaking of parkes, for not ringing bels at the bishops comming, for not bringing litter for their horse, for not paying their fées and rents, for withholding the church goods, for holding on their princes side in princely cases, for not going at the popes commandement, for not agréeing to the popes election in another princes realme, with other such things mo, and more vaine then these, &c. Againe, although the scripture giueth leaue and authoritie to the bishop and church of Rome to minister sacraments: yet it giueth no authoritie to make sacraments, much lesse to worship sacraments. And though their authoritie serueth to baptise men, yet it extendeth not to christen bels: neither haue they authoritie by any word of God to ad to the word of God, or take from the same, to set vp vnwritten verities vnder paine of damnation, to make other articles of beléefe, to institute strange worship, otherwise than he hath prescribed, which hath told vs how he would be worshipped, &c.

The iurisdiction of the pope abused and vsurped in temporall matters where he hath nothing to doe.

The third abuse of the popes iurisdiction standeth in this, that as in spirituall iurisdiction they haue vehemently exceeded the bounds of scripture, so they haue impudently intermedled themselues in temporall iurisdiction, wherein they haue nothing to doe. Insomuch that they haue translated the empire, they haue deposed emperors, kings, princes, rulers, and senators of Rome, and set vp other, or the same againe at their pleasure, they haue proclamed warres, and haue warred themselues. And whereas emperors in ancient time haue dignified them in titles, haue inlarged them with donations, and they receiuing their confirmation by the emperors, haue like ingratefull clients to such benefactors, afterward stampt vpon their necks, haue made them to hold their stirrop, some to hold the bridle of their horse, haue caused them to séeke their confirmation at their hand, yea haue béen emperors themselues, Sede vacante, & in discordia electionis, and also haue béen senators of the citie; moreouer haue extorted into their owne hands the plenarie fulnesse of power and iurisdiction of both the swords, especially since the time of pope Hildebrand: which Hildebrand deposing Henricus the fourth emperour, made him giue attendance at his citie gate. And after him pope Bonifacius the eight, shewed himselfe vnto the people on the first day like a bishop, with his keies before him, and the next day in his robes imperiall, hauing a naked sword borne before him, like an emperor, in the yéere of our Lord 1298. And for so much as this inordinate iurisdiction hath not onely been vsed of them, but also to this day is maintained in Rome; let vs therefore now compare for vsage hereof to the old maner in times past, meaning the primitiue and first age of the church of the Romans. Wherin the old bishops of Rome in those daies, as they were then subiect to their emperors, so were other bishops in like maner of other nations subiect euery one to his king and prince, acknowledging them for their lords, and were ordered by their authority and obeied their lawes, and that not onely in causes ciuill, but also in regiment ecclesiasticall, as appeareth Dist.10.cap.1. & 2.Dist.97.cap.De illicita.

Popes submitted in the old time to emperours.

Also 24.q.3. So was Gregorius surnamed Magnus, subiect to Mauricius, and to Phocas, although a wicked emperour. So also both pope and people of Rome tooke their lawes of the emperours of Constantinople, and were submitted to them not only inthe time of Honorius an hundred yeres after Constantine the great, but also in the time of Martianus, Anno 451. and so further vnto the time of Iustinian and of Carolus Magnus, and also after the daies of them. In all which continuance of time, it is manifest, that the imperiall law of Martian did rule and bind in Rome, both in the daies of Iustinian, Anno 150 yeeres after, till the time of the empire being translated from Greece vnto France. Whereby it may appeare false, that the citie of Rome was giuen by Constantine the first, vnto the bishop of Rome to gouerne: for that pope Bonifacius the first writing to the emperour Honorius, calleth in the same place Rome the emperours citie. Dist. 97.cap.1. And Lotharius also emperour appointed magistrats and lawes in Rome, as is aboue mentioned. Moreouer, for further probation hereof, that both the bishop of Rome and all other ecclesiasticall persons were in former time, and ought to be subiect to their emperours and lawful magistrates, in causes as well spirituall as ciuill, by many euidences may appeare, taken out both of Gods law, and mans law. And first by Gods law, we haue example of godly king Dauid, who numbred all the priests & leuits, & disposed them into foure & tweentie orders or courses, appointing them continually to serue in the ministerie euery one in his proper order & turne, as came about: which institution of the clergie also good king Ezechias afterward renewed, of whom it is written; He did that was right in the sight of the Lord according to all things as his father Dauid had done before; he tooke away the high groues, and brake downe images: &c. 4.Reg.8. The said Ezechias also reduced the priests and Leuits into their orders, prescribed by Dauid before, to serue euerie one in his office of ministration. 2.Paralip.30.31. And this order from Dauid still continued till the time of Zacharie at the comming of Christ our Lord, being of Abias course, which was the eight order of ỳ priests appointed to serue in the tabernacle, Luke 1. To passe ouer other lighter offices translated from the priests to the kings authoritie, as concerning the ordering of oblations in the temple, and reparations of the Lords house, king Salomon displaced Abiathar the high priest by his kingly power, and placed Sadoch in his stead: 3.Reg.cap.6. Also dedicating the temple of the Lord with all the people, blessed the whole congregation of Israel. 3. Reg.8. Iudas Machabeus also elected priests, such as being without spot had a zeale to the law of the Lord, to purge the temple, which the idolatrous gentiles had before prophaned: 1.Mac.4.

Also king Alexander writing to Jonathas, appointed him chiefe priest in his countrie, 1.Mac.10. Demetrius ordained Simon and Alchimus in the like office of priesthood. Iosaphat likewise as in the whole land did set iudges; so also in Jerusalem he appointed Leuits and priests, and heads of families to haue the hearing of causes, and to minister iudgement ouer the people: 2.Paral.19. By these and many other is to be séene, that kings and princes in the old time, as well when priests were borne priests, as when they were made by election, had the dealing also in ecclesiasticall matters, as in calling the people to Gods seruice, in cutting downe groues, in destroying images in gathering tithes into the Lords house, in dedicating the temple, in blessing the people, in calling downe the brasen serpent within the temple, in correcting and deposing priests, in constituting the order and offices of priests, in commanding such things as pertained to the seruice and worship of God, and in punishing the contrarie, &c. And in the new testament what meaneth the example of Christ himselfe both giuing and teaching tribute to be giuen to Cesar: to Cesar I say, and not to the high priest. What meaneth his words to Pilate not denying power to be giuen to him from aboue?

1.Mac.10. 1.Mac 14. Iosaphat. 2.Par.19. John 19.

And againe declaring the kings of nations to haue dominion ouer them, and willing his disciples not so to do, giuing vs to vnderstand the difference betweene the regiment of his spirituall kingdome, and of the kingdome of this world, willing all worldly states to be subiect vnder the superior rulers and magistrates, in whose regiment is dominion and subiection, and not in the other. Whereunto accordeth also the doctrine of S. Paul, where it is written: Let euery soule be subiect to the higher powers, vnder whose obedience neither pope, cardinall, patriarch, bishop, priest, frier nor monke is excepted, nor exempted. as Theophylactus exponding the same place declareth, and saith: Vniuersos erudit, siue sacerdos sit ille, siue monachus, siue apostolus, vt se principibus subdãt: that is, He teacheth all sorts, whether he be priest, or monke, or else apostle, that they should submit themselues vnder their princes. &c. And saint Augustine writing ad Bonifacium, saith in much like sort: Quicunque autem legibus imperatoris, quæ pro Dei veritate feruntur, obtemperare non vult, acquirit grande supplicium: that is, Whosoeuer refuseth to obey the lawes of the emperour, which make for the veritie of God, incurreth the danger of great punishment, &c. Also in another place, writing Contra Cresconium, hath these words: In hoc enim reges sicut eis diuinitùs præcipitur, Deo seruiunt, in quantum reges, si in suo regno bona iubeant, mala prohibeant, non solùm quæ pertinent ad humanam societatem, verumetiam quæ ad diuinam religionem &c: that is, Kings according as it is inioyned them of God, do serue God in that they are kings, if they in their kingdome command those things that be good, and forbid things that be euill, such as appertaine not onely to humane societie, but also to Gods religion, &c. And yet to come more neere to the popes owne doctors, Thomas Aquine not much discrepant from the iniunction of the apostle aboue alleaged, thus describeth the office of a king: Hoc, inquit, officium rex se suscepisse cognoscat, vt sit in regno, sicut in corpore anima, & sicut Deus in mundo, &c: Let a king (saith he) vnderstand, that he hath taken this office vpon him, to be as the soule within the bodie, and as God in the world. In like agréement with the holy apostle saint Paul ioyneth also saint Peter: Be you subiect (saith he) to euerie humane creature, whether it be to the king, as most preeminent, or to other set ouer you, &c. Where the common glosse addeth thereto, To obay the same, whether they be good or euill. These places rightly pondered, let any man now iudge whether the pope hath done open wrong to the emperour, in surprising aboue the iurisdiction of his lawfull prince and magistrat, notwithstanding what soeuer his owne canon law saith to the contrarie.

Thomas de regim.princip. lib.1.cap.32.

1.Peter.2.

And as it is sufficiently hitherto prooued by Gods law, that all ecclesiasticall persons owe their due subiection to their lawfull princes, in matters as well temporall, as spirituall: so no lesse euidences may also be inferred out of mans law, and examples of the oldest fathers, to proue the same. And first to begin with the example of Gregorie the great, who in his epistle to Mauricius writeth thus: Dominus meus fuisti, quando adhuc Dominus omnium non eras: ecce per me seruum vltimum suum & vestrum respondebit Christus, &c: that is: You were then my lord, when you were not the lord of the whole empire, behold Christ himselfe shall make you answere by me, which am his most simplest seruant and yours, &c. And before him Eleutherius his predecessor bishop of Rome, writing to Lucius, K. of this realme, calleth him by the name of Christs vicar. But what needeth much confirmation of this matter, when the popes decrees and canons be full of records hereof, testifying how the ancient church of Rome not onely receiued, but also required of the emperors, lawes and constitutions to be made, touching not onely such causes, but also such persons as were ecclesiasticall. And here to omit by the way the chap. Principes seculi, also chap. Administratores, 23. quæst.5. with diuers other beside, I will recite out of the epistle of Boniface the first, to the emperor Honorius, so much as serueth for our purpose, written Dist.92.cap.Ecclesiæ, cap. Victor. Where it is mentioned that the said Bonifacius bishop of Rome sent an humble supplication to the forenamed emperor, desiring him by his authoritie to prouide some remedie against the ambitious contentions of the clergie, concerning the bishoprik of Rome. Which emperor Honorius incontinent at his request, directed & stablished a law, that none should be made bishop of Rome through ambition, charging all ecclesiasticall ministers to surcease from ambition; appointing moreouer, that if two were elected together, neither of them both should be taken, but the election to proceed further to another to be chosen by a full consent of voices, as is expressed, Dist.79.cap.Si duo.

To this I adioyne also the law and constitution of Iustinian the emperor, ratified and renewed afterward in the counsell of Paris, in time of king Ludouicus Pius. Where al bishops and priests be expressie forbidden not to excommunicate any man, before his cause was knowne and proued to be such, as for the which the ancient canons of the church would him to bee excommunicate. And if any should otherwise proceed contrarie to the same, then the excommunicate person to be absolued by the authoritie of an higher degree, and the excommunicate to be sequestred from the communion, so long as should seeme conuenient to him that had the execution thereof, as is expressed, 24.q.3. De illicita. The same Iustinian moreouer in his lawes and constitutions, how many things did he dispose and ordaine in church matters, as to haue a determinate number of churchmen or clerks in churches, const.3. Also concerning monasteries and monks, const.5. how bishops & priests should be ordained, const. 6. concerning remouing of ecclesiasticall persons from one church to another. Also concerning the constitution of the churches in Afrike. And that the holy mysteries should not be done in priuate houses; so that whosoeuer should attempt the contrarie, should be depriued, const. 57. Moreouer concerning clerks leauing their churches, const. 58. Also concerning the order and manner of funerals, const. 59. And that bishops should not keepe from their flocke, const.67. The same Iustinian granted to the clergie of Constantinople the priuiledge of the secular court, in cases onely ciuill, and such as touched not the disturbance of the bishop, otherwise in all criminall causes he left them to the iudgement of the secular court, const.83. He giueth also lawes and decrees for breach of matrimonie, const. 117, and in diuers other places. And in his const. 123. after the doctrine of saint Paul, he commandeth deth all biſhops and prieſts to ſound out their ſeruice, and to celebrate the myſteries, not after a ſecret manner, but with a loud voice, ſo as they might not onely be heard, but alſo be vnderſtood of the faithful people, what was ſaid and done. Whereby it is to be gathered, that diuine prayers and ſeruice then, was in the vulgar tongue.

And as the ſaid Iuſtinian, and other emperours in thoſe daies had the iuriſdiction and gouernment ouer ſpirituall matters and perſons, the like examples alſo may be brought of other kings in other lands, who had no leſſe authoritie in their realmes, than emperours had in their empire. As in France, Clodoueus the firſt chriſtened king at Orleance cauſed a councell of thirtie three biſhops, where thirtie three canons were inſtituted concerning the gouernment of the church, within two hundred yéeres after Chriſt: Ex primo tomo Concil. Carolus Magnus, beſide his other lawes and edicts politicall, called fiue ſynods, one at Mentz, the ſecond at Rome, the third at Rhemes, the fourth at Cabilone, the fift at Arelate, where ſundrie rites and ordinances were giuen to the clergie, about eight hundred and ten yéeres after Chriſt. The ſame Carolus alſo decréed, that onely the canonicall bookes of ſcripture ſhould be read in the church, and none other. Which before alſo was decréed Anno 417. in the third generall councell of Carthage. Item hee exhorteth and chargeth biſhops and prieſts to preach the word, with a godly intunction: Epiſcopi verò vt ſiue per ſe, ſiue per vicarios, pabulum verbi diuini ſedulò populis annuncient. Quia, vt ait beatus Gregorius: iram contra ſe occulti iudicis excitat ſacerdos, ſi ſine prædicationis ſonitu incedit. Et vt ipſi clerum ſibi commiſſum in ſobrietate & caſtitate nutriant. Superſtitiones quas quibuſdam in locis in exequijs mortuorum nonnulli faciunt, eradicent, that is: That biſhops either by themſelues, or their deputies, ſhall ſhew forth the ſod of Gods word to the people with all diligence. For as Gregorie ſaith, the prieſt procureth againſt him the wrath of the ſecret iudge, which goeth without the ſound of preaching. And alſo that they bring vp their clergie to them committed in ſobernelſe and chaſtitie. The ſuperſtition which in certaine places is vſed of ſome, about the funerals of the dead, let them exterminate and plucke vp by the rootes, &c.

Moreouer, inſtructing and informing the ſaid biſhops and prieſts in the office of preaching, willeth them not to ſuffer any to faine or preach to the people any new doctrine of their owne inuention, and not agréeing to the word of God, but that they themſelues both will preach ſuch things as lead to eternall life, and alſo that they ſet vp other to doe the ſame, and withall a godly exhortation. Ideo, dilectiſſimi, toto corde præparemus nos in ſcientia veritatis, & mox: Vt diuina donante gratia verbum Dei currat & creſcat, & multiplicetur, in profectum eccleſiæ Dei ſanctæ, & ſalutem animarum noſtrarum, & laudem, & gloriam nominis Domini noſtri Ieſu Chriſti. Pax prædicantibus, gratia obedientibus, gloria Domino noſtro Ieſu Chriſto, Amen. Furthermore, the ſaid Carolus in his conſtitutions diuideth the goods giuen to the church ſo, that in the more wealthie places, two parts ſhould goe to the vſe of the poore, the third to the ſtipend of the clergie. Otherwiſe in poorer places an equall diuiſion to be made betwéene the pouertie and the clergie, vnleſſe the gift had ſome ſpeciall exception. Ex Anſegiſo. lib. 1. cap. 80. And in the ſame booke a little after, cap. 83. the author declareth, by the ſaid Carolus to be decréed, that no eccleſiaſtical perſon or perſons from thenceforth ſhould preſume to take of any perſon, any ſuch gift or donation, whereby the children or kinſfolkes of the ſaid donor ſhould bee defeated of their inheritance duely to them belonging. Ludouicus Pius king of France, and after emperor, was ſonne to the foreſaid Charles, who being ioyned together with the ſaid Charles his father in the empire, ordained alſo with his father ſundrie acts and obſeruances touching the gouernment of the church, as in the author before alleaged may appeare. As firſt, that no entrie ſhould bee made into the church by ſimonie: againe, that biſhops ſhould be ordained by the frée election of the clergie and of the people, without all reſpect of perſon or reward, onely for the merit of life, & gift of heauenly wiſdome.

Alſo the ſaid kings and emperours forbad that any freeman or citizen ſhould enter the profeſſion of monkerie, without licence aſked of the king before, and added a double cauſe therefore. Firſt, for that many not for meere deuotion, but for idleneſſe and auoiding the kings wars, doe giue themſelues to religion: Againe, for that many be craftily circumuented and deluded by ſubtill couetous perſons, ſeeking to get from them that which they haue, Lib. 1. cap. 114. ibidem. Item that no young children or boies ſhould be ſhauen or enter any profeſſion without the will of their parents. And no young maidens ſhould take the vale or profeſſion of a nun, before ſhe came to ſufficient diſcretion of yeeres to diſcerne and chooſe what they will follow. That none ſhould be interred or buried thenceforth within the church: which alſo was decréed by Theodoſius and Valentinianus, fortie yeeres before them. Item the ſaid Carolus two and twentie yéeres before this emperour, enacted that murtherers and ſuch as were guiltie of death by the law, ſhould haue no ſanctuarie by flying into the church, &c: which alſo was decreed by Iuſtinian three hundred yeeres before this Carolus. Moreouer the foreſaid Ludouicus Pius, with his ſonne Clotharius (or as ſome call him, Lotharius) ioyned with him, among other eccleſiaſticall ſanctions, ordained a godly law, for laimen to communicate the ſacrament of the bodie and bloud of the Lord, in theſe words: Vt ſi non frequentiùs, vel ter, laici homines communicent: niſi fortè grauioribus quibuſdam criminibus impediantur: That laimen doe communicate at leaſt thrice, if not ofter, except they be let perchaſe by ſome more hainous and grieuous offences. Anſeg. lib. 2. cap. 43. Item they enacted that no goods of the church ſhould be alienated vnder the paine Leoninæ conſtitutionis. Vnto this Lotharius French king and emperour, pope Leo the fourth writeth, that Romana, lex, that is, the Romane law (meaning the law of the French emperours) as it hath hitherto ſtood in force: Ita & nunc ſuum robur propriumque vigorem obtineat, that is: So now it may continue ſtill in his vigour and ſtrength. About the yéere of the Lord 848. after this Lotharius, ſucceeded his ſonne Ludouicus the ſecond in the kingdome and empire of France, before whom the foreſaid pope Leo was brought into iudgement, and pleaded his cauſe of treaſon, and there was before the emperour quit and releaſed. Moreouer, deſcending yet to lower times, Anno 1228. Ludouicus the ninth, called holy Ludouike, made a law againſt the peſtiferous ſimonie in the church, alſo for the maintenance of the libertie of the church of France, eſtabliſhed a law or decree, againſt the new inuentions, reſeruations, preuentions, and exactions of the court of Rome, called Pragmatica ſanctio, S. Ludouici, the which ſanction was alſo practiſed long after in the kingdome of France againſt the popes collectors and vndercollectors, as appeareth by the Areſtum of the councell of Paris Anno 1463. Ex Molinæo in Commentarijs. Furthermore king Philip le Bel. 1303. ſet forth a law, called Philippina, wherein was forbid any exaction of new tithes and firſt fruits, and other vncuſtomed collections, to be put vpon the church of France. Carolus the fift named Sapiens, Anno 1369. by a law commanded, that no biſhops nor prelats, or their officials within his kingdome of France, ſhould execute any cenſure of ſuſpenſe, or excommunication, at the popes commandement, ouer or vpon the cities or townes, corporations, or commons of his realme. Ex regiſt. antiquarum conſt. chart. 62. Item Carolus the firſt Anno 1388. againſt the cardinals & other officials, and collectors of the pope, reuoking againe the power which he had giuen to them before, prouided by a law, that the fruites and rents of benefices, with other penſions, and biſhops goods that departed, ſhould no more be exported by the cardinals and the popes collectors vnto Rome, but ſhould be brought to the king, and ſo reſtored to them to whom they did rightly appertaine.

The like alſo may be inferred and proued by the ſtories and examples of our kings here in England, as king Offa, king Egbertus, Edgarus, Alnredus, Athelwoldus, Canutus, Edwardus, William Conquerour, William Rufus, Henrie the firſt, Henrie the ſecond, til the time of king John and after. Whoſe dealing as well in eccleſiaſticall cauſes, as in temporall, is a ſufficient demonſtration, to proue what iniurie the popes in theſe latter daies haue done vnto the emperours their lawfull gouernours and magiſtrates: in vſurping ſuch fulneſſe of power and iuriſdiction ouer them, to whom properly they owe ſubiection, contrarie to the ſteps and example of the old Romane biſhops their anceſtors, and therefore haue incurred the danger of a præmunire, worthie to be depriued. Although it is not to bee denied, but that eccleſiaſticall miniſters and ſeruitours haue their power alſo committed vnto them, after their ſort of the Lord: yet it becommeth euery man to know his owne place and ſtanding, and there to keepe him, wherein his owne precinct doth pale him, and not raſhly to breake out into other mens walks. As it is not lawfull for a ciuill magiſtrate to intermeddle with a biſhops or a preachers function: ſo vnſeemelie and vnorderlie it is againe that Boniface the eight ſhould haue borne before him the temporall mace, and the naked ſword of the emperour: or that any pope ſhould beare a triple crowne, or take vpon him like a lord and king. Wherefore let euery man conſider the compaſſe and limitation of his charge, and exceed no further. The office of a biſhop or ſeruitour eccleſiaſticall, was in the old law to offer ſacrifice, to burne incenſe, to pray for the people, to expound the law, to miniſter in the tabernacle, with which office it was not lawfull for any prince or man elſe to intermeddle, as we read how Ozias was puniſhed for offering incenſe, and another for touching the arke: ſo now the office of chriſtian miniſters is to preach the word, to miniſter ſacraments, to pray, to bind and looſe, where cauſe vrgently requireth, to iudge in ſpirituall cauſes, to publiſh and denounce frée reconciliation and remiſſion in the name of Chriſt, to erect and comfort troubled conſciences with the rich grace of the goſpell, to teach the people the true difference betwixt the law and the goſpell, whereof the one belongeth to ſuch as be not in Chriſt, and come not to him: the other pertaineth to the true beleeuers in the ſonne of God; to admoniſh alſo the magiſtrates erring or tranſgreſſing in their office, &c.

The office of the eccleſiaſticall miniſter.

And

The office of ciuill rulers and magistrats.

And as these properly belong to the function of the ecclesiasticall sort: so hath the ciuill gouernour or magistrate againe his proper charge and office to him assigned, which is, to see the administration of iustice and iudgement, to defend with power the right of the weake that suffer wrong, to deffend from oppression the poore oppressed, to minister with equalitie that which is right and equall to euery man, to prouide lawes good and godly, to see the execution of the same as cause moueth: especially to see the law of God maintained, to promote Christs glorie and gospell, in setting vp and sending out good preachers, in maintaining the same, in prouiding bishops to bee elected that be faithfull, in remouing or els correcting the same being faultie or negligent, in congregating the clergie, when néed is of any councell or election, to heare their learning in causes propounded, and according to the truth learned, to direct his iudgement in disposing such rites and ordinances for the church, as make to edification, not to the destruction thereof; in conseruing the discipline of the church, and setting all things in a congrue order. Briefly, the office of the ciuill ruler and magistrate extendeth to minister iustice and iudgement in all courts as well temporall as ecclesiasticall: to haue correction ouer all transgressours, whether they be laimen or persons ecclesiasticall. And finally all such things as belong to the mouing of the sword, whatsoeuer, that is to say, all outward punishment is referred to the iurisdiction of the secular magistrate, vnder whose subiection the ordinance of God hath subiected all orders and states of men.

Héere we haue the witnesse also of Hormisda bishop of Rome, which being well weied, maketh the matter plaine, that princes haue to deale in spirituall causes also, not onely in temporall: where the said Hormisda writeth to Epiphanius patriarch of Constantinople in this sort: Clara cœlestis misericordiæ demonstratio procedit, quando reges seculi causas de fide, cum gubernatione politiæ coniungunt, &c. ex Act. v. vniuers. concil. Constantini secundi, An. 528. And thus much & too much peraduenture concerning the matter of iurisdiction, in which point this new church of Rome hath swarued from the ancient church of Rome which was, as is sufficiently proued.

The third point wherein the church of Rome is altered from the church of Rome.

THe third point wherein the church of Rome hath broken and is departed from the church of Rome, is the forme of stile and title annexed to the bishop of that see. As where he is called pope, most holy father, vicar generall, & vicar of Christ, successour of Peter, vniuersall bishop, prince of priests, head of the church vniuersal, Summus orbis pontifex, Stupor mundi, head bishop of the world, the admiration of the world, neither God nor man, but a thing betweene both, &c: for all these terms be giuen him in popish bookes. Albeit the name pope, being a Greeke name, deriued of πάππας, which soundeth as much as Father in the Syracusane speech, may peraduenture seeme more tolerable, as which hath been vsed in the old time among bishops, for so Austen was called of the councell of Aphrike, Hierome, of Boniface and other. Also Cyprian bishop of Carthage was called Papa. 24. q. 1. cap. loquitur & dist. 50. cap. De eo tamen. Item Clodoueus or (as Rhenanus calleth him) Ludouicus, first christian king of France, calleth a certaine simpler bishop Papam. Hierome also in his epistle to Chromatius calleth Valerianus by the name of pope; and likewise writing to Eustachium and Fabiola, he calleth Epiphanius Beatum papam. In the apologies of Athanasius, we read oft times that he was called Papa, and Archiepiscopus. Ruffinus also lib. 2. cap. 26. calleth him Pontificem maximum. Also Aurelius president in the first councell of Carthage was called of the said councell Papa, ex cap. 4. vi. Concil. Carthag. And before this Eleutherius bishop of Rome, writing to king Lucius the first christian king in this land, calleth him in his epistle, the vicar of Christ, &c. But that any of these tearmes were so peculiarly applied to the bishop of Rome, that other bishops were excluded from the same, or that any one bishop aboue the rest had the name of oecumenicall, or vniuersall, or head, to the derogation of other bishops, or with such glorie as is now annexed to the same: that is not to be found neither in histories of the old time, nor in any example of the primitiue church, nor in the testimonies of ancient approued doctors. First, before the councell of Nice, it is euident by pope Pius the second that there was no respect had to the church of Rome, but euery church then was ruled by his owne gouernance, till the yéere of our Lord 340. Then followed the councell of Nice, wherein was decreed, that throughout the whole vniuersitie of Christs church, which was now far spread ouer all the world, certaine prouinces or precincts to the number of foure were appointed, euery one to haue his head church, and chiefe bishop, called then metropolitane or patriarch, to haue the ouersight of such churches as did lie about him. In the number of which patriarchs or metropolitans, the bishop of Rome had the first place: the bishop of Alexandria was the second; the bishop of Antioch the third; the bishop of Hierusalem was the fourth patriarch. Afterward in the number of these patriarchs came in also the bishop of Constantinople in the rowme of the bishop of Antioch. So these foure or fiue metropolitans or patriarchs, had their peculiar circuits and precincts to them peculiarly appointed, in such sort, as one of them should not deale within an others precinct, and also that there should be among them equalitie of honour, whereupon we read so oft in the decrées of the old councels, τὰ ἴσα πρεσβεῖα τῆς θρόνων, καὶ τῆς τιμῆς, that is, Equall degrée of thrones, and of honour among priests and ministers. Againe, speaking of the said patriarchs or primats, wee read in the second and third chapter of the councell of Constantinople, ἐπισκόπους τοὺς ὑπὸ ἑτέρους ἐκκλησίας μὴ ἐπιέναι, μηδὲ συγχέειν τὰς ἐκκλησίας, that is, That bishops should not inuade the diocesse of other bishops without their borders, nor confound together churches, &c. Moreouer, the old doctors for the most and best part doe accord in one sentence, that all bishops placed wheresoeuer, in the church of God, be Eiusdem meriti & honoris, & successores apostolorum, that is, To be of one merit, of like honour, and all to be successors together of the apostles. Also, he that is the author of the booke called Dionysius Areopagita, calleth all the bishops ὁμοταγεῖς καὶ ἰσοτίμους, that is, Of equall order, and of like honor, &c. All this while the bishop of Rome was a patriarch, and a metropolitane or bishop called of the first see, but no oecumenicall bishop, nor head of the vniuersall church, nor any such matter. Insomuch that he, with all other bishops, was debarred from that, by a plaine decree of the councell of Carthage, Can. 39. in these words: ὥστε τὸν πρώτης καθέδρας ἐπίσκοπον μὴ λέγεσθαι ἔξαρχον τῶν ἱερέων, ἢ ἄκρον ἱερέα, ἢ τοιοῦτόν τινα τίθεσθαι, that is, That the bishop of the first seat shall not be called the prince of priests, or the high priest, or any such thing.

Boniface 8. Extrauag. de maiorit. & obedient. cap. vnam.

And lest any here should take occasion of cauilling, to heare him called bishop of the first seat, here is to be expounded what is meant by the first seat, and wherefore he was so called, not for any dignitie of the person, either of him which succéedeth, or of him whom he is said to succéede, but onely of the place wherein he sitteth. This is plainely proued by the councel of Calcedon, chapter 28. Wherein is manifestly declared the cause why the sée of Rome among all other patriarchall sées is numbred for the first sée by the ancient fathers. For why, saith the councel, καὶ γὰρ διὰ τοῦτο τῇ πρεσβυτέρᾳ Ῥώμῃ, διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην, οἱ πατέρες εἰκότως ἀπεδέδοκασι τὰ πρεσβεῖα, that is: For that our forefathers did worthily attribute the chiefe degrée of honor to ỳ sée of old Rome, because the principall reigne or emperie was in that citie, &c. The same also is confirmed by Eusebius Cæsariensis, declaring, Quòd excellentia Romani imperii extulit papatum Rom. pontificis supra alias ecclesias; That the excellencie of the Romane emperie did aduance the popedome of the Romane bishop aboue other churches, &c. Ex Gab. Biel. Moreouer, saith the said Cæsariensis: Nicena synodus hoc contulit priuilegium Rom. pontifici, vt sicut Romanorum rex Augustus præ cæteris appellatur: ita Rom. pontifex præ cæteris episcopis papa vocaretur. That is, The councell (saith he) of Nice gaue this priuiledge to the bishop of Rome, that like as the king of the Romans is named emperour aboue all other kings, so the bishop of the same citie of Rome should bee called pope aboue other bishops, &c. By these places hitherto alleaged (and such other, many more than be here alleaged) it appeareth, that though these titles of superioritie had been attributed to the bishop of Rome, yet it remaineth certaine, that the said bishop receiued that preferment Iure non diuino, sed humano, by mans law, not by the law of God. And so is the distinction of the popes prooued false, where is said: Romanam ecclesiam non a concilio aliquo, sed a diuina voce primatum accepisse, That the church of Rome tooke not his primacie by any councell, but onely by the voice of God. And this is to be said, although it were true, that these titles and tearmes were so giuen to the bishop of Rome in the old time, yet how and by whom they were giuen, yee see. Now to trie this matter, as ioyning an issue with our aduersaries, whether these foresaid titles of soueraignetie were applied in the old time of the primitiue church to the bishop of Rome, as to be called the vicar generall of Christ, the head of the whole church, and vniuersal bishop, remaineth to be proued. Whereunto this in my mind is to be answered, that albeit the bishops of Rome (of some peraduenture) were so called by the names of higher preéminence of that citie, of some going about to please them, or to craue some helpe at their hands, yet that calling: 1 Was vsed then but of a few. 2, Neither was giuen to many. 3, Was rather giuen then sought for, of the most. 4, Was not so giuen that it maketh or can make any generall necessitie of law, why euery one is so bound to call them, as the bishop of Rome now séeketh to be taken and called, and that by necessitie of saluation, as the decrée of pope Boniface the eight witnesseth, where is said, Quòd sit de necessitate salutis, vt credatur primatus ecclesiæ Rom. & ei subesse: That it standeth vpon necessitie of saluation, to beléeue the primacie of the church of Rome, and to be subiect to the same, &c.

As touching therefore these titles and tearmes of preeminence aforesaid, orderly to set forth and declare what histories of times doe say in that matter, by the grace of Christ: 1. First we will see what be the titles, the bishop of Rome doth take and challenge to himself, and what is the meaning of them. 2. When they first came in, whether in the primitiue time or not, and by whom. 3. How they were first giuen to the Roman bishops, that is, whether of necessarie dutie, or voluntarie deuotion, whether whether commonly of the whole, or particularly of a few, and whether in respect of Peter, or in respect of the citie, or else of the worshipfull of the bishop which there sat. 4. And if the foresaid names were then giuen of certaine bishops, vnto the bishop of Rome: whether all the said names were giuen, or but certaine, or what they were. 5. Or whether they were then receiued of all bishops of Rome, to whom they were giuen, or else refused of some. 6. And finally, whether they ought to haue been refused being giuen, or not. Touching the discourse of which matters, although it appertaine to the profession rather of diuines than historicians, & would require a long and large debating: yet for so much as both in these, and diuers other weightie controuersies of diuinitie, the knowledge of times and histories must needs helpe diuines disputing about the same, so much as the grace of Christ shall assist me therein, I will ioyne to the seeking out of truth, such helpe as I may.

Cap. quando. de transl. & epis. tit. 7.

Dist. 40. cap. Si papa.

And first to begin with the names and titles, now claimed and attributed to the see and bishop of Rome, and what they be, is sufficiently declared aboue, that is, the Chiefe priest of the world, the Prince of the church, Bishop apostolicall, the Vniuersall head of the church, the Head & bishop of the vniuersall church, the Successor of Peter, Most holie pope, Vicar of God on earth, Neither God nor man, but a mixt thing betweene both: the Patriarch or Metropolitane of the church of Rome, the Bishop of the first see, &c. Vnto the which titles or stiles is annexed a triple crowne, a triple crosse, two crossed keies, a naked sword, seuenfold seales, in token of the seuenfold gifts of the holy Ghost, hee being carried pickbacke vpon mens shoulders, after the maner of the heathen kings, hauing all the empire and the emperour vnder his dominion: and that it is not conuenient for any terrene prince to reigne there, where he sitteth, hauing the plenarie fulnesse of power, as well of temporall things as spirituall things in his hands, that all things are his, and that all such princes as haue giuen him any thing, haue giuen him but his owne, hauing at his will and pleasure to preach indulgences, and the crosse against christian princes whatsoeuer: and that the emperour and certaine other princes, ought to make to him confession of subiection at their coronation: hauing authoritie to depose, and that hee De facto, hath deposed emperors and the king of France: also to absolue the subiects from their allegiance to their princes, whom kings haue serued for fourmen to lead his horse, and the emperour to hold his stirrop; that he may and doth giue power to bishops vpon the bodies of men, and hath granted them to haue prisons, without whose authoritie no generall councell hath any force. And to whom appellations in all manner of causes may and ought to be made. That his decrees be equall with the decrees of Nicen councell, and are to be obserued and taken in no lesse force, than if they had been confirmed with the heauenly voice of saint Peter himselfe. Ex fra. Barth. & alijs. Item that the said bishop of Rome hath the heauenly disposition of things, and therefore may alter and change the nature of things, by applying the substance of one thing to another. cap. Quando de transl. Epis. tit. 7. Item that he can of nothing make something, and cause the sentence, which before was none to stand in effect, and may dispense aboue the law, and of iniustice make iustice, in correcting & changing lawes, for he hath the fulnesse of power. And againe, dist. 40. cap. Si Papa: If the pope doe lead with him innumerable soules by flocks vnto hell, yet no man must presume to rebuke his faults in this world. Item that it standeth vpon necessitie of saluation to beléeue the primacie of the see of Rome, and to be subiect to the same, &c.

These things thus declared, now let vs see whether these names and titles, with the forme and maner of this authoritie and regalitie aboue rehearsed, were euer attributed of any in the primitiue time to the bishop of Rome. For all these he doth challenge and claime vnto him by old possession from the time of S. Peter. And héere a question is to be asked of our aduersaries the papists, Whether they will auouch all these aforesaid titles, together with the whole forme and tenour of regalitie to the same belonging as is afore touched, or not? If they will, let them come forth with their allegations, which they neuer haue done yet, nor euer shall be able. If they will not, or cannot auouch them all together in maner as is specified, then why doth the bishop claime them all together so stoutly, vsurpe them so falsely, and obtrude them vpon vs so strictly? Moreouer if the said our aduersaries, being conuicted by plaine euidence of history, and example of time, will yéeld vnto vs (as they must néeds) in part, and not in the whole, let vs come then to the particulars, and see what part of this regalitie they will defend, and deriue from the ancient custome of the primitiue church, (that is, from the first fiue hundred yeeres, I meane after Christ.) First, in the councell of Nice, which was the yeere of our Lord 340. and in the first canon of the said councell, we find it so decréed: that in euery prouince or precinct some one church, and bishop of the same, was appointed and set vp to haue the inspection and regiment of other churches about him, Secundùm morem antiquum, that is, After the ancient custome, as the words of the councell doe purport: so that the bishop of Alexandria should haue power of Lybia, and Pentapolis in Egypt, for as much as the bishop of the citie of Rome hath the like or same maner. And in like sort also in Antioch, & in other countries, let euery church haue his due honour, and consequentlie that the bishop of Ierusalem haue also his due honour to him reserued, so that such order be kept, that the metropolitane cities be not defrauded of their dignitie which to them is due and proper, &c. In this councell and in the same canon first and seuenth, where the bishops of Alexandria, of Rome, and of Antioch, are ioyned together in one like maner of dignitie, first there appeareth no difference of honour to be meant therein. Secondly for so much as in the said two canons after mention made of them, immediately followeth, that no bishops should be made without consent of their metropolitans, yea and that the city also of Hierusalem should be vnder his metropolitane, and that the metropolitane should haue the full power to confirme euery bishop made in his prouince: therefore it may be well suspected, that the third epistle decretall of pope Anacletus, and of pope Stephanus, with other more, are forged, wherein these bishops, & especiallie the bishop of Rome, is exempted and disseuered from the name of a metropolitane or an archbishop, to the name of a patriarch or primat: as appeareth in the decrees, Dist. 22. cap. Sacrosancta. Wherefore as wee must needs grant the bishop of Rome to bee a metropolitane or an archbishop by the councell of Nice: so we will not greatly sticke in this also, to haue him numbred with patriarchs or primats. Which title seemeth in the old time to be common to mo cities than to Rome, both by the epistle of Anacletus, of pope Stephanus, of pope Julius, and Leo, &c.

Ex concilio Nicæ. cano.

Dist. 22. cap. Sacrosancta.

The bishop of Rome called metropolitane, archbishop, patriarch, primat.

After this followed a generall councell in Aphrike, called the first councell of Carthage, An. 420. where were congregated two hundred & seuentéene bishops, among whom was also Augustinus, Prosper, Orosius, with diuers other famous persons. This councell continued the space of fiue yeeres, wherein was great contention about the supremacie and iurisdiction of Rome: the bishop whereof then was Zosimus. This Zosimus the Romane bishop had receiued the same time into the communion of the church without any examination, one that came to complaine to him out of Aphrike, named Apiarius, a priest whom Aurelius the metropolitane with the councell of Aphrike had worthilie excommunicated for his detestable conditions before. Vpon this Zosimus after that he had receiued and shewed such fauour to Apiarius, for that he did appeale to him, sendeth to the councell his messengers, to wit, Faustinus bishop of Potentine, and two priests of the church of Rome named Philippus and Asellus, with these foure requests: first, that Apiarius, whom hee had absolued might bée receiued of them againe, and that it might be lawfull for bishops or priests to appeale from the sentence of their metropolites, and also of the councell to the see of Rome.

The first councell of Carthage.

Ex conciliorum tom. 1. in sexta synod. Carthag.

Secondly, that bishops should not saile ouer importune lie Ad comitatum. Thirdlie, that if any priest or deacon were wrongfullie excommunicate by the bishops of their owne prouince, it should be lawfull for them to remooue the hearing and iudging of their cause to their neighbour bishops. Fourthlie, that Vrbanus their bishop, either should be excommunicated, or else sent vp to Rome, vnlesse he would correct those things that were to be corrected, &c. For the approbation whereof, the said Zosimus alleaged for him the words (as hee pretended) taken out of Nicene councell. The councell of Carthage hearing this, and remembring no such thing in the councell of Nice to be decreed, and yet not suspecting the bishop of Rome, to dare wrongfully to falsifie the words of that councell, writeth againe to Zosimus, declaring that they neuer read to their remembrance, in their common Latine exemplar of Nicen councell any such canon; yet notwithstanding for quietnesse sake, they would obserue the same till time they might procure the originall copies of that councell to be sent to them from Constantinople, Alexandria, and from Antioch. In like effect afterward they wrote to pope Boniface, which then succeeded Zosimus. And thirdly also to Celestinus, which shortly after succeeded Boniface.

Vrbanus episcopus Siccensis.

The popes of Rome taken with the maner in falsifying the decrees of Nicene councell.

In the meane time this foresaid councell sent their legates, Marcellus and Innocentius to Atticus patriarch of Constantinople, and to Cyrillus patriarch of Alexandria, for the authentike copies in Greeke of Nicen councell, which being sent vnto them, and they finding in the true originals no such canon, as the bishop of Rome had falsely forged, they wrote a sharpe and an handsome letter to Celestinus bishop of Rome, calling him in the said letter by the way; Domine frater: declaring to him, how they had perused all the copies of the councell of Nice, & could find no such canon as hee and his predecessours had falsely alleaged, and therewithall reciting the first canon afore mentioned, declared how the decrées of Nicen councell had committed all and singuler persons ecclesiasticall, as well bishops as other, vnto the charge of their metroplitans. Moreouer expounding the same decree, they shewed the reasons thereof.

The bishop of Rome called Dominus frater. that is, brother bishop.

Bishops of Rome procured falsifiers of Nicen councell.

Fiue reasons why matters of controuersie ought not to be had out of other countries vnto Rome.

1 For that (said they) the fathers of that councell did well foresee, to be most iust and conuenient, that all controuersies there be ended (In ijsdem locis) where they begin.

2 For that it is not to be supposed contrarie, but that the grace of God will be as prest & readie in one prouince as in an other, to instruct his ministers both prudently to vnderstand iudgeiudgement, and constantly to maintaine the same.

3 3 For that there is no néed to séeke further to any outlandish helpe, because specially that the party whosoeuer is not contented with the determination of his iudges or commissioners, may lawfully appeale either to the prouinciall or to any generall councell.

4 4 That way to be better, than to runne to any forren iudge, it must néeds be granted; because it is not like that our God will inspire his iustice and truth of examining vnto one bishop, and deny it to a multitude congregated in a whole councell.

5 Euery countrie to appeale first to his own: metropolitane, secondly to a prouinciall or generall councell.

5 Neither can it be, that any such outlandish iudgement in hearing and determining causes, can stand perfect and vpright, for that the necessary persons of witnesses, either for infirmitie of sex, of age, of sickenesse, or some other impeachment, are not able to be present, by whom the truth of the sentence should be directed. Wherefore as by these and other reasons they thought it not conuenient from them to bring their matters ouer vnto Rome: so neither was it to be found, said they, by any councell of the old fathers decréed, that any legates should be sent from Rome to them, for deciding of their matters. And therefore exhorted they the said bishop of Rome, that he would not induce Fumosum typum (or rather as I may call it) typhos seculi, in ecclesiam Christi, quæ lucem simplicitatis & humilitatis præfert ijs qui Deum diligunt, that is, That he would not induce the swelling pride of the world into the church of Christ, which church sheweth and giueth the light of simplicitie and of humilitie to such as loue to sée God, &c. In these foresaid letters moreouer is signified, how the forenamed malefactor Apiarius, whom the bishop of Rome before had absolued and receiued to the communion of the church, was afterward found culpable, and therefore the councell procéeded against him, brought him to open confession of his faults, and so inioined him due penance for his demerits, notwithstanding the absolution and inconsiderate clearing of the bishop of Rome before procéeding.

Summarie notes gathered out of the councell of Carthage against the pope.

1 In sum, out of this councell of Carthage these are to be noted. First, how glad the bishops of Rome were to receiue such as came to them for succour.

2 2 What pride they tooke by the occasion thereof, thinking and séeking thereby to haue all vnder their subiection.

3 3 To the intent to allure other to séeke to them, how ready they were to release and quit this Apiarius as guiltlesse, wich after was tried culpable by his owne confession.

4 4 How contrary to the acts and doings of the Romish bishop, this councell condemned him, whom the said bishop of Rome before had absolued, little respecting the procéedings of the Romish church.

5 5 How the bishops of old time haue been falsifiers of ancient councels and writings, whereby it may be suspected that they which shamed not to falsifie and corrupt the councell of Nice, much lesse would they sticke to abuse and falsifie the decretall epistles and writings of particular bishops and doctors for their owne aduantage, as no doubt they haue done many one.

6 6 In this foresaid councell, whereat Augustine himselfe was present, and where Aurelius president of the same was called Papa, the bishop of Rome was called erpressie in their letters, but bishop of the citie of Rome, and Dominus frater, that is, Brother bishop.

7 7 Seuenthly, the dominion of this Roman patriarch, in the said councell of Carthage, was cut so short, that neither it was permitted to them of Afrike to appeale ouer the sea to him, nor for him to send ouer his legates to them for ending their controuersies. Whereby it may sufficiently appeare, that the Bishop of Rome in those daies was not fully admitted to be the chiefe of all other bishops, nor the head of the vniuersall church of Christ in earth, &c.

8 8 We heare in this councell, fiue causes or reasons giuen, why it is not necessarie nor yet conuenient for all forren causes to be brought to one vniuersall head or iudge, as is before recited.

9 9 Lastly, by the said councell of Carthage, we heare a vertuous exhortation to be giuen to the bishop of Rome, that he would not induce into the méeke and humble church of Christ, the fuming and swelling pride of the world, as is before declared, &c. In this, or in some other councell of Carthage, it was moreouer prouided by expresse law, and also specified in the popes decrees, that no bishop of the first seat, should be called the prince of priests, or the chiefe priest, or any such like thing; but only the bishop of the first seat, as followeth more in the said decrée: Vniuersalis autem, nec etiam Romanus pontifex appelletur, that is, Be it enacted, that no bishop, no not the bishop of Rome be called vniuersall bishop, &c. And thus much concerning this foresaid councell of Carthage.

Dist. 99. cap. sedes episc.

The highest title belonging to a bishop is to be called the bishop of the first seat.

The bishop of Rome forbidden to be called vniuersall bishop.

Synodus Mileuitana.

Not long before this councell, was celebrate in Afrike an other councell, called Synodus Mileuitana, about the yéere of our Lord 442, at the which councell also S. Augustine was present, where it was decréed vnder paine of excommunication, that no minister or bishop should appeale ouer the sea to the bishop of Rome. Whereby it may appeare that the bishop of Rome all this space was not vniuersally called by the terme of oecumenicall or vniuersall bishop, but bishop of the first seat: so that if there were any preferment therein, it was in the reuerence of the place, and not in the authoritie of the person. And yet it was not so in the place, that the place importeth the citie of Rome onely, but the first seat then was called metropolitan church, as by the words of the Nicene councell, and other constitutions mo is to be séene, where the foure patriarchs were called πρωτοι, or πρωτεύοντες, or πρωτεσῶτες, as namely, by the words of the councel of Carthage may appeare, which be these: εἰ μὴ μετὰ ἐφίσματος τοῦ πρώτης καθέδρας τὸ ἴδιος ἑκάστης χώρας ἐπισκόπου: τοῦτ' ἔστιν, εἰ μὴ ἀπὸ αὐτοῦ τοῦ πρωτεύοντος κατεξαίρετον λάβῃ, that is, Except he haue some special licence or exception, by the consent of the first seat of the proper bishop in euery countrie, that is, of him that is the primat in the said countrie, &c. Also the words of the can. 39. of the councell of Carthage, before touched be these, ὥστε τὸν πρώτης καθέδρας ἐπίσκοπον μὴ λεγεσθαι ἔξαρχον τῶν ἱερέων, ἢ ἀκρον ἱερέα, ἢ τοιοῦτόν τι ποτε, that is, That the bishop of the first seat be not called prince of priests, or head priest, or else any such like. Againe Anicetus the tenth bishop of Rome, and pope Stephan and pope Felix, making a difference betweene primate and metropolitane, writeth thus: Let no archbishops be called primates, but onely such as haue the first seat, &c. Thus it is made plaine, how the bishop of the first seat, or first bishop, or primate is none other, but he which was called patriarch, and belonged not onely to the church of Rome, but to all such cities and places, where as before among the Gentiles were Primi flamines, &c. dist. 80. cap. vrbes & loca, & in illis. Where, by the way is to be noted the repugnance or contrarietie of such as craftily but falsely haue counterfeited the popes decretall epistles, which besides other great and many coniectures also hereby may be gathered. For where Clement, Anacletus, epi. 12. Anicetus and other, ioyning together the office of patriarches and primats doe diuide the same from the order of metropolitans or archbishops, alleaging therein the constitution of the apostles and their successors, that is to be found false by the canons of the apostles, by the councell of Nice, and by the councell of Antioch with other mo. For in the canons of the apostles, where in euerie canon almost, mention is made of bishops, priests, and deacons, no word is there touched, neither of any order aboue the bishop, or lower then the deacon, saue onely in the thirtie three canon, setting an order among bishops, the canon willeth the bishops of euery nation to know their first or chiefe bishop, and him to be taken for the head of them: he saith not the head of the church, or head of the world, but the head of those bishops. And where? not in Rome onely, but plainely and expresse in euery nation, for so the words purport, τοὺς ἐπισκόπους ἑκάστου ἔθνους εἰδέναι χρὴ τὸν ἐν αὐτοῖς πρῶτον, that is, The bishops of euerie nation ought to know the first or chiefe among them, &c. Moreouer, the councell of Antioch reciting the foresaid canon word for word, expoundeth the matter plainely, in stead of τὸν πρῶτον, writing τὸν ἐν μητροπόλει προεστῶτα ἐπίσκοπον: which is as much to say, as metropolitan; and in the end of the said canon, calleth him τὸν τῆς μητροπόλεως ἐπίσκοπον, Id est, metropolitanum, 6. q. 3. per singulas. Whereby it is concluded, that to be false, that Clement and Anacletus, and Anicetus be reported (but falsedlie) to put a difference betweene primats or patriarches, and metropolitans, or archbishops. Whereas by sufficient authoritie it is to be prooued, that in the old church both primats, first bishops, bishops of the first seat, patriarchs, metropolitans, bishops of the mother citie, and archbishops were all one. First, that primats and metropolitans were both one, is before declared by the canons of the apostles, and by the councell of Antioch aforesaid. Againe, that patriarchs and archbishops were all one, it is euident Ex Nouella Iustiniani. cap. 23. where the said constitution reciting the foure patriarchs (aboue mentioned) calleth them by the name of archbishops. And a little after calleth the patriarch of Constantinople, archbishop, by these words: οἱ τίνες ὑπὸ τὸν μακαριώτατον ἀρχιεπίσκοπον Κωνσταντινουπόλεως, καὶ πατριάρχην θεσίν: that is, Which be vnder the archbishop & patriarch of Constantinople. And after speaking more plainly in the matter, setteth an other order, diuers from that of Clement, Anacletus, and Anicetus, in placing these foresaid persons, first beginning with bishops, then ouer them setteth the metropolitane, and ouer him againe, the archbishop, and there staieth, making no further mention of any other aboue him: whose words be these, εἴτε ἐπίσκοπος εἴη ὁ κατηγορούμενος, τοῦ τούτου μητροπολίτου ἐξετάζειν τὰ λεγόμενα, εἰ δὲ μητροπολίτης εἴη, τοῦ μακαριώτατου, ὑφ' ὃν τελεῖ. that is, If a bishop be accused, the metropolitane to haue the examination of those things that are brought against him; if the metropolitane be accused, then the archbishop to haue the hearing thereof, vnder whom he dwelleth and pertaineth, &c.

If

Archbishop and Metropolitane not to be both one.

If any sute or supplication be brought against a bishop by a minister, first the metropolitane to haue the deciding of the matter, and if any default shall be found in the iudgement thereof, then the hearing and ending of the case to be brought before the archbishop, &c.

In this constitution of Iustinian, although the metropolitane bee placed aboue the bishop, and the archbishop aboue the metropolitane: yet notwithstanding by this is sufficientlie confuted the forged constitution of Clement, Anacletus, Anicetus, Stephanus, and Felix: who in their epistles decretall, ioine together in one forme and order, both archbishop and metropolitane, and aboue them both do place the patriarch, and aboue the patriarch the apostolicall see, to wit the bishop of Rome, as may appeare in reading the first epistle of Clement: In illis autem ciuitatibus, &c. The second epistle of Anacletus, art. 4. prouinciæ. dist. 99. ca. Nulli archiepiscop. Also the epistle of pope Stephan the first, art. 5. (where note by the way, that Gratianus referreth this place of the epistle to pope Lucius) Item the epistle of pope Felix the second, art. 12. In all which foresaid epistles, this order and difference of degrees is taken, that the first and principall place is giuen to primats or patriarchs, the second to metropolitans, or archbishops, the third to bishops, and finally aboue all these is extolled the apostolicall see of the bishop of Rome, contrary to all that which before hath beene alleaged out of Iustinian, the councell of Nice and of Antioch, &c. Whereby it may appeare, that either Iustinian in preferring archbishops aboue metropolitans, did not read these epistles decretall, if they were vnfeined: or if they were forged, they which forged the said Epistles in their names, did not well aduise that Iustinian had written in this matter before.

Thus then these titles aboue recited, as bishop, metropolitane, bishop of the first see, primat, patriarch, archbishop, that is to meane, chiefe bishop, or head bishop to other bishops of his prouince, we denie not but were in the old time applied & might bee applied to the bishop of Rome, like as the same also were applied to other patriarchs in other chiefe cities and prouinces.

Bishop Metropolitane Bishop of the first see, Primat, Patriarch, archbishop Chiefe Bishop: tearmes vsed in the primitiue time of the church.

As touching the name likewise of the high priest, or high priesthood, neither do I deny but that it hath bene found in olde monuments and records of ancient times, but in such wise and sort as it hath beene common to bishops indifferently, and not singularly attributed to any one bishop or see. Whereof testimony we haue out of the seuenth generall councell, dist. 38. ca. Omnes, where the bishops office is called Summũ sacerdotium, The hie priesthood, in these words: Substãtia summi sacerdotij nostri sunt eloquia diuinitùs tradita, i. vera diuinarum scripturarum disciplina, &c. that is, The substance (say they) of our high priesthood, is the word of discipline of holy scriptures giuen vs from aboue, &c.

Hie Priest or hie priesthood.

Dist. 83. ca. Omnes, Summus sacerdos, Summum sacerdotium.

And likewise the councell of Agatha maketh relation De pontificibus in summo sacerdotio constitutis, Of bishops set in the high priesthood, meaning not of any one, but indifinitelie and indifferently of whomsoeuer. 12. q. 3. cap. Pontifices. Also Fabianus bishop of Rome, in the yeare of the Lord 240. writing in generall to his brethren, and to all bishops and ministers ecclesiasticall, doth attribute to them the same title of Summum sacerdotium, in these words: Deus ergô, fratres, qui præordinauit vos, & omnes qui summo sacerdotio funguntur &c. God which hath preordained you brethren, & all them which beare the office of high priesthood, 3. q. cap. 1. Deus ergô. With like phrase of speech Anacletus also in his second epistle, speaking of bishops in generall, calleth them Summos sacerdotes: Vnde, inquit, liquet quòd summi sacerdotes. i. episcopi à Deo sunt iudicandi, &c. The high priests, that is, bishops saith hee. And moreouer in the same place calleth them apostles, and successours of the apostles, &c. So doth Innocentius the first, in the yeare of our Lord, 405. as appeareth dist. 61. cap. Miserum. Item Zosimus Bishop of the said cite of Rome, in the yeare of our Lord, 420. as witnesseth dist. 59. cap. 1. who speaketh De summo sacerdotio, that is, Of high priesthood, not onely of the church of Rome, but of all other churches. Urbanus the first, was bishop of Rome in the yeare of Christ 226. who in his writings alleaged by Grattan, referreth the name & place Summi pontificis, of the high bishop, not onely to the seat of Rome, but vniformely to euery bishop, as appeareth in the wordes of the dist. 51. cap, Si officia, &c.

Ex Vrba. 1. dist. 51. cap. Si officia.

And thus much as touching the name or title of high priest, or supreame bishop. Which title as I do not deny to haue beene vsed in manner and forme aforesaid: so do I deny this title and style of Summus orbis pontifex, as it is now vsed in Rome, to haue beene vsed, or vsually receiued during all the primitiue time of the church, that is fiue hundred yeares after Christ, after the manner and sort I meane of that authority and glorie, which in these daies now is vsed and is giuen to the same, vntill the time of Phocas, the wicked emperour, which was after the yeare of the Lord 608. The which title as it is too glorious for any one bishop in the church of Christ to vse: so is it not to be found in any of the approued and most ancient writers of the church, namely these, as Cyprianus, Basilius, Fulgentius, Chrysostomus, Hieronymus, Ambrosius, Agustinus, Tertullianus, but rather writeth against the same, especially of the last. And therefore not without cause it is written and testified of Erasmus, who speaking of the saide name of Summus orbis pontifex, denieth plainely, the same to bee heard of among the olde writers, whose words be these: Certè nomen hoc nondum illis temporibus erat auditum, quantum ex veterum omnium scriptis licet colligere, &c. lib. epist. 3: epist. 1. art. 37. &c: as whosoeuer readeth the same authors shall find to be true.

Summus orbis pontifex.

Summus orbis pontifex.

Ex Eras. epist. lib. 3. epist. 1. art. 73.

The like is to bee affirmed also of other presumptuous titles of like ambition, as the head of the vniuersall church, the vicar of Christ in earth, prince of priests, with such like: which all be new found tearms, strange to the ears of the olde primitiue writers & councels, and not receiued openly and commonly before the time of Boniface the third, & Phocas the aforesaid.

Vniuersalis pontifex. Caput vniuersalis eccles. Christi in terris vicarius Princeps sacerdotum, &c.

Now remaineth the name of the pope, which of his nature, and by his first origine, being a word of the Syracusane speech called παππᾶς and signifieth as much as Pater, Father, was then vsed and frequented of them in the olde time, not so as proper onely to the bishop of Rome, but common and indifferent to all other bishops or personages, whosoeuer were of worthie excellency, as is partly before declared. But now contrarilie, the generality of this name is so restrained and abused, that not only it is appropriate to the Bishop of Rome, but also distinacth and diseuereth the authority and preheminence of that bishop alone from all other bishops, for which cause it is now worthily come into contempt and execration. No lesse is to be reiected also the name of Vniuersalis or Oecumenicus pontifex, Summus orbis episcopus, Caput vniuersalis ecclesiæ, Christi in terris vicarius, Princeps sacerdotum &c. All which tearms and vocables, tending to the derogation of other bishops and patriarchs, as they were neuer receiued nor allowed in Rome (if wee beleeue Gregory) during the time of the primitiue church, so now are worthily of vs refused.

Papa.

Although it cannot be denied, but certaine were in the primitiue time, which began priuatly to pretend that proude and wicked title of vniuersall bishop, as Menna, and especially Ioannes patriarch of Constantinople, who calling a councell at Constantinople, went about to stablish and ratifie and to dignifie his throne by the consent of the councell, and the emperour of Constantinople, and obteined the same; as appeareth in the first generall councell of Constantinople, act. the first, where both Menna is named Oecumenicus patriarcharum, and also Ioannes in the said councell is titled Oecumenicus patriarcha: ex concil. general. 5. cap. Domino. Concerning the which title although it was then vsed in Constantinople through the sufferance of the emperours, beeing then willing to haue their imperiall citie aduaunced: yet notwithstanding this foresaid title, all this while was not in the citie of Rome. And in Constantinople it stood not then in force (Iure aliquo diuino) but onely by mans lawe. And thirdly it was then but onely Verbalis titulus: hauing no true domination vpon all other churches, or any reall subiection belonging to the same; Forasmuch as neither the bishop of Rome, nor anie of the west churches were subiect or did acknowledge seruice vnto them, but rather did repugne the same: namely Pelagius the second, and Gregorious the first both bishops at that time of Rome, which Pelagius writing to all Bishops, saith plainely in these words: that No patriarch should take the name of vniuersality at any time, because that if any be called vniuersall, the name of patriarch is derogate from all other. But let this be far, saith he, from all faithfull men, to will to take that thing to him, whereby the honor of his brethren is diminished. Wherfore the said Pelagius chargeth all such bishops, that none of them in their letters will name any patriarch to be vniuersall, least hee take from himselfe the honour due to him, while they giue that which is not due to another. What can be more euident than these words of Pelagius, who was Bishop of Rome next before Gregorie, Anno 583. In like manner or more plainelie, and more earnestlie writeth also Gregorie of this matter in his register, proouing and disputing that no man ought to be called vniuersall bishop. Moreouer, with sharpe wordes and rebukes detesting the same title, calling it new, foolish, proud, peruerse, wicked, prophane, and such as to consent vnto it, is as much as to denie the faith. Hee addeth further and saith, that Whosoeuer goeth about to extoll himselfe aboue other bishops, in so doing followeth the fact of Sathan, to whome it was not sufficient to be counted equall or like vnto other angells. In his epistles how oft doth hee repeat and declare the same to repugne directly against the gospell, and auncient decrees of councels: affirming that none of his predecessours did euer vsurpe to himselfe that style or title, and concludeth that whosoeuer so doth, declareth himselfe to bee a forerunner of antichrist, &c. With this iudgement of Gregorie well agreeth also the words of S. Augustine, lib. 3. cap 3. de baptismo, where reciting the words of Cyprian, he thus saith: Neque enim quisquam nostrum se episcopum episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannico more ad obsequendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit, &c. that is, For none of vs doth euer set himselfe to be bishop of bishops, or after a tyrannicall manner doth subdue and bring vnder his fellowes vnto the necessitie of his obedience, &c. By these words of Cyprian, and Augustine, it is manifest that in their time was no supremasie, or vniuersall title among bishops receiued, nor that anie great respect was had to the bishop of Rome (as Pius the second saith, epist. 201.) before the councell of Nice. And after in that councell the sayd bishop of Rome had no further authoritie to him limited, than onely onelie ouer his prouince, and places suburbane, bordering about the citie of Rome. Against whose primacie diuerse cities also did resist long after that, as the church of Rauenna, Mediolanensis, and Aquilegiensis. Also the Greeke churches long resisted the same, so did the churches of Asia, Rutenicæ, Molcouiticæ, Valachicæ, and other mo.

But to returne againe to Gregorie, who confirming the sentence of Pelagius his predecessor aboue mentioned, had no small conflicts about this title matter, both with the patriarch, and with the Emperour of Constantinople, as witnesseth Antonius, and other, &c. The history is thus. After that John beeing made of a monk, patriarch of Constantinople, by his flatterie and hypocrisie, had obtained of Mauricius the emperour to be extolled aboue other bishops, with the name of vniuersall patriarch, and that he would write to Gregorie bishop then of Rome, for his consent concerning the same: Gregory abiding still in his constancy, did set himselfe stoutly against that antichristian title, and would giue no place. At the same time the Lombards had inuaded the countrie of Italie, and the citie of Rome, the Emperor keeping then at Constantinople, and setting in Italie an ouerseer called Exarchus, to rule in Rauenna. Gregorie perceiuing the Emperor Mauricius to be displeased with him about the matter afore touched, writeth to Constantina the empresse, arguing and declaring in his letters, that presumption and pride of him to be vniuersall patriarch, was both against the rule of the gospel, and decrees of the canons, namelie, the first canon of ẏ Nicen councell, and the nouelti e of that newfound title to declare nothing else, but that the time of antichrist was neere. Upon this, Mauricius the Emperor taking displeasure with him, calleth home his souldiers againe from Italie, and inciteth the Lombards against the Romans: who with their king Agilulphus, therupon contrarie to their league made before, set vpon the city of Rome, and besieged it a whole yeare togither, Gregorie yet notwithstanding still remaining in his former constancie. After these afflictions thus ouerpast, Eulogius patriarch of Alexandria, writeth to the said Gregory in his letters, naming him vniuersall pope: vnto whom Gregorie refusing the same, answereth againe as followeth.

The letter of Gregory to the Patriarch of Alexandria.

The answere of Gregorie to Eulogius patriarch of Alexandria.

BEhold: in the preface of your epistle directed to me, ye haue vsed a word of a proud name, calling me vniuersall pope, which I pray your holines you will cease hereafter to doe, for that is derogated from you, whatsoeuer is attributed to another more than right and reason requireth. As for me I seeke not mine aduancement in words, but in manners: neither do I account that any honor, wherein the honor of my brethren I see to be hindered: for my honor I take to be the honor of the vniuersal church: my honor is the whole and perfect vigour of my brethren. Then am I honoured when to no man is denied the due honor which to him belongeth. For if your holines cal me vniuersall pope, in so dooing you deny your selfe to bee that, which ye affirme me to be; vniuersall: but that God forbid. Let these words therefore go, which do nothing but puffe vp vanity, and wound charity, &c.

Dist. 99. cap. ecce.

Gregory refuseth the name of vniuersall pope.

It were too long here to infer all such letters and epistles of his, concerning this matter, written to the Emperor Mauricius and Constantina the Empresse, but that shal more largely appeare hereafter (Christ willing) in the bodie of the historie, when we come to the yeare and time of Gregorie, which was well nigh about fiue hundred yeares after Christ. In the meane season this is sufficient to declare, how the church of Rome with the forme and manner of their title of vniuersal supremacie now vsed and maintained, hath vtterly swarued from the ancient steps of the primitiue church of Rome.

Now let vs see what the aduersarie side hath to obiect againe for the title of their vniuersalitie, or rather singularitie. And first here commeth in a blinde cauillation of a certaine sophister, who glosing vpon the words of Pelagius aboue recited, laboureth to colour the plaine text with a subtile meaning, as though the sense of the canon were this, not to deny there the state of supremacie: Sed negari ibi aliquem posse esse vniuersalem Episcopum, sub eo sensu duntaxat, quòd esset cuiusque ecclesiæ proprius rector, ita quòd nullus alius esset episcopus, &c. that is, But to denie there, that anie may bee vniuersall bishop after this sense and meaning onely, so that he should be the proper pastor of euerie church alone, and that there should be no other bishop beside himselfe, &c. Thus goeth this sophister about to dash out this text, but he cannot so discharge the matter. For neither did John the patriarch then seeke anie such thing, to be bishop and proper pastor of euerie church alone; nor if he had, the councell of Chalcedon and the emperor Iustinian would neuer haue agreed thereunto. Neither is it true, that this gloser denieth Pelagius, heere to forbid the primacie or supremacie of that patriarch, which indeed is the onely intent of Pelagius in that canon, witnessing as well other historiographers, as namely, Anton. tit. 12. cap. 3. par. 13. and also the glose ordinarie vpon the same canon, &c.

A sophisticall cauillation vpon the words of Pelagius and Gregory answered.

Out of the same fountaine springeth the like or verie same reason of late renewed by a certaine new start English clerke in these our daies, who answering to the places of Gregorie touching the said matter, laboureth to auoid the cleare authoritie of him, by a like blind cauillation, saying that John bishop of Constantinople, by this title of vniuersall bishop, vnderstood himselfe onely to be a bishop, and none else. And that Gregorie in resisting him, had none other meaning but the same. And to proue this to be the verie meaning of Gregorie, he recited the words of Gregorie written to the said John archbishop of Constantinople as followeth: Qui enim indignum te esse fatebaris, vt episcopus dici debuisses, ad hoc quandóque perductus es, vt despectis fratribus episcopus appetas solus vocari: that it to saie, For thou (John bishop of Constantinople) which sometime didst grant thy selfe vnworthie the name of a bishop, art now come to this, that thou dost seeke to be called a bishop alone, &c. Upon this word Episcopus solus, this gloser would ground a surmise, that Gregorie did find fault with the archbishop, not for anie primacie which he sought for aboue other bishops, but onelie for that he coueted to be a bishop and pastor alone in euery church, in such sort, as there should be no other bishop nor pastor else, but himselfe onely. But as is saide, that was neuer the archbishops seeking, nor the matter of Gregories reprehension. For the said Archbishop of Constantinople went not about to be bishop alone (which was too much absurd, and also impossible) but to bee vniuersall alone: not to take awaie the office from other, but the honour from other: not to depose them, but to despise them. And therefore saith Gregory, Vt despectis fratribus, not Depositis fratribus: so that this word Solus, here noteth a despising of other, not a deposing of other, and importeth a singularitie in condition aboue other, and not the office or substance of ministration without other, that is, to be vniuersall among manie, and not be one alone without anie, nor to diminish the number of them, but onlie to increase the honour to himselfe. For the more euident probation wherof (although the thing of it selfe is so euident, that it needeth no proofe) what can be more plaine, than the words themselues of Pelagius and Gregorie: wherewith they charge him for running before his brethren, for chalenging superiorittie aboue them, for diminishing their honour, by taking more honour than to him was due, for following the angell of pride in exalting himselfe, in admitting that to him, which the bishops of Rome and their predecessours had refused, beeing offered to them before &c. All which declare that he sought not to thrust out all other bishops out of their churches, and to be bishop himselfe alone. For that was neuer offered to the bishops of Rome by the councell of Chalcedon, that they should be bishops alone, and none other. Neither did Lucifer seeke to haue no mo angels in all heauen but himselfe, but he to be aboue all other alone.

An obiection of a certaine late English writer refuted.

A place of Gregorie examined.

Likewise the word Præcurrere, that is, To runne before other, in the epistle of Pelagius, declareth that John sought not to be bishop alone, but bishop vniuersall. Wee saie not that a man runneth before another, when he runneth alone, and no man followeth him, that is not properly Præcurrere, but Solus currere. Moreouer, in seeking to be superior to other bishops, hee seeketh not to take awaie other bishops, but to make other bishops inferior to him. For where no inferior is, there can be no superior, forsomuch as these togither are correlatiues, and inferre necessary respect mutually. And if it were true as this gloser saith, that he had sought to be bishop alone, how would that councell either haue granted that vnto him, or haue offered it to the bishop of Rome before? or if they had, how could it be possible for him alone to serue all churches, without any fellow bishop to helpe him? And where this foresaide clearke standeth so much vpon the words of S. Gregory: Solus episcopus; Gregorie therfore shall expound Gregory, and one Solus shall declare another. Wherefore if this diuine (whatsoeuer he be, doctor or bachelor) either knoweth not, or would learn, what (onely bishop) meaneth in this place: an other place of the said Gregorie may instruct him, where Gregorie writing to Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria, giueth this reason why he refused the same title offered to him (which then was offered to the said John patriarch of Constantinople) saying: Quia videlicet si vnus patriarcha vniuersalis dicitur, patriarcharũ nomen cæteris derogatur, sed absit hoc, &c. That is to say: For if one alone would bee called a patriarch vniuersall, then should the name of patriarchs be derogated from all other, &c. Whereby two things are to be noted: First, what thing it was which the patriarch of Constantinople did seeke, for Gregorie here findeth no other fault, but with the same which was giuen to John which was to be called patriarch vniuersall. The second thing to be noted, is the cause why Gregory did rebuke this title, both giuen to John, and offred to him, because (saith he) if one take vpon him the name of vniuersall patriarch, then is the name patriarch taken from the rest. As who would say: if I would take vpon me to be named vniuersall patriarch, then should there be no other patriarch, but I should be bishop patriarch alone. And here commeth in your Solus episcopus, &c.

Pelag. 2. epist. 2.

Ex epist. Greg. 36. lib. 4.

Ex epist. Greg. 38. lib. 4.

Furthermore the same Gregorie speaking of the said Solus, in an other place by, seemeth to declare there what he meaneth by this Solus here, in these words as follow: Vt & nulli subesse, & solus omnibus præesse videretur: that is to saie: So that that he would be subiect to none, and would be chiefetaine to all other alone, &c. And so by this place may the other place be expounded, Vt solus episcopus sit is, qui solus inter episcopos præesse appetat, that is, He that seeketh to be as bishop alone, who alone seeketh to be extolled aboue other bishops. But to be short in a matter that needeth not many words: he that thus caulleth vpon this place Solus Episcopus in Gregorie, must be desired here not to take Solus alone, but ioyne withall the word going before, which is, Despectis fratribus. By the which might seeme sufficiently declared, what Gregory meant by Solus Episcopus, meaning, that to despise other bishops, and to diminish their honor, to set vp his owne, and to be subiect to none, but to preferre himselfe inequally before all others, is as much as to be counted bishop alone. And thus much touching this obiection.

Another obiection of our aduersaries is this: Although (say they) no bishop of Rome was euer called, or would bee called by the name of vniuersall bishop: yet it followeth not therefore, that they be not, or ought not to be heads of the vniuersall church. Their reason is this:

Another obiection resolued.

As S. Peter had the charge of the whole church (by the testimonie of Gregorie) committed vnto him, although he were not called vniuersall apostle:

So no more absurd it is for the pope to be called the head of the whole church, and to haue the charge thereof, although he be not called vniuersall bishop, &c.

A double vntruth in one popish argument. Peter how he had charge and not charge of the church.

Wherein is a double vntruth to be noted, first in that they pretend Peter to be the head, and to haue the charge of the whole church: if we take here (charge or head) for dominion or maistership vpon or aboue the church, in all cases iudiciarie, both spirituall and temporall: for the words of the scripture be plain, Non dominantes in clerum, 1. Pet. Vos autem non sic. Luk. 22. that is, Not as maisters ouer the clergie, &c: But you not so, &c. Againe, that the church is greater, or rather the head of Peter, it is cleare: 1. Corin. 3. All things are yours, whether it be Paul, or Apollo, or Cephas: either the world, death, or life, you be Christs, Christ is Gods, &c. In which words the dignitie of the church no doubt is preferred aboue the apostles, and aboue Cephas also. Moreouer, as the dignity of the wife is aboue the seruant, so must needs the honour and worthinesse of the church (being the spouse of Christ) surmount the state of Peter or other apostles, which bee but seruants to Christ and to the church: yea and though they were princes of the church, yet after the mind of Baldus, Magis attenditur persona intellectualis, quam organica. Other wise if by this word (charge) he meant only the office and diligence of teaching; to that I answere: The same Lord that said to Peter, Feed my sheepe, said also to the other, Goe and preach this gospell to all nations. And he that said to Peter, Whatsoeuer thou losest, said also to the other, Whatsoeuer ye remit in the earth. Moreouer if the matter go by preaching, Paul the apostle laboured more therein, than euer did Peter by his owne confession, Plus laborauj: also suffered more for the same, Plus sustinui, neither was his doctrine lesse sound. Yea and in one point hee went before Peter, and was teacher and schoolemaster vnto Peter, whereas Peter was by him fullie corrected: Gal. 2. Furthermore, teaching is not alwaies nor in all things a point of maistership, but sometime a point of service. As if a Frenchman should be put to an Englishman to teach him French, although he excelleth him in that kind of faculitie: yet it followeth not therefore, that he hath fulnesse of power vpon him, to appoint his diet, to rule his houshold, to prescribe his lawes, to stint his lands, and such other. Wherefore seeing in trauell of teaching, in paines of preaching, in gifts of tongues, in largenesse of commission, in operation of miracles, in grace of vocation, in receiuing the Holie ghost, in vehemencie of torments and death for Christs name, the other apostles were nothing inferiour to Peter: why Peter then should claime any speciall prerogatiue aboue the rest, I vnderstand no cause. As indeed he neuer claimed any, but the patrons of the apostolicall see doe claime it for him, which he neuer claimed himselfe; neither if he were here, would no lesse abhorre it with soule and conscience, than we doe now: and yet our abhorring now is not for any malice of person, or ony vantage to our selues, but onely the vehemencie of truth, and zeale to Christ and to his congregation. Moreouer, if these men would needs haue Peter to be the curat and ouerseer of the whole vniuersall church (which was too much for one man to take charge of) and to be prince of all other apostles, then would I faine learne of them, what meaneth (Dextræ societatis) the right hand of societie betweene Peter, Paul, and Barnabe, mentioned, Gal. 2. What taking of hands is there betweene subiects and their prince, in way of fellowship? Or where fellowship is, what maistership is there? Or againe, what state of maistership is it like that Christ would giue to Peter, who being indeed maister of all, tooke such little maistership vpon himselfe, and that not onelie in inward affection, but also in outward fact? Although I am not ignorant that Peter in diuers places of the gospell hath his commendation, neither doe I denie Peter to be worthie of the same. But yet these words of commendation giue to him no state of superiorittie, or iurisdiction vpon all others, to haue all vnder his subiection. As if a schoolemaster should haue more speciall charge to some one of his scholers for his riper towardnesse: yet this giueth him no fulnesse of authoritie, or power coactiue vpon the rest, vnlesse by speciall admission he be deputed thereunto. Whereof, nothing can be gathered of Peter, for if it be true that S. Augustine saith, that such things as were spoken to Peter, haue no lightsome vnderstanding, except they be referred to the church, whereof Peter did beare a figure: then hath the person of Peter nothing to claime by these words, but all redoundeth to the church, which being meant by Peter, hath power by this reason, both ouer the person of Peter, and all other persons in the Lord.

Augustin in psal. 103.

But heere stumbleth in an argument of our aduersarie againe, which he in the margent of his booke calleth an inuincible argument drawne out of the bowels of S. John Chrysostome lib. 2. De sacerd. Whereby he supposeth to haue giuen a shrewd blow to protestants, and to haue gotten Hectors victorie vpon a certaine English prisoner taken in plaine field, and of all such as take his part. The text onely of Chrysostome he reciteth, but maketh no argument, albeit he maketh mention of an inuincible argument in the margent. But because he either will not, or list not to shew his cunning therein, I will forme that in argument for him which he would haue done, but did not: and so will forme it (the Lord willing) as he himselfe must of necessitie be driuen to doe, if the matter euer come to the triall of art, and not to the trifling of words. First, he taketh his text out of Chrysostome, as followeth: For what cause I pray you did Christ shed his blood? Trulie, to redeeme those sheep, whose charge he committeth to Peter, and to Peters successours. Upon this place of Chrysostome, this clerke taketh his medium, Christs suffering. His conclusion is, That all which Christ died for, were committed to Peter, wherefore the forme of the argument must needs stand thus in ỹ third figure:

Answer to an inuincible argument prouing by Chrysostome the whole church to be committed to Saint Peter.

Chrysost. lib. 2. de sacerd.

Christ suffered for all men:

Christ suffered for them whom he committed to Peter:

Ergo, All that Christ died for, were committed to Peter.

A popish perilous paralogisme.

If this be the forme of his insoluble argument, as it seemeth to be, by the order of his reasoning, and also must needs be, taking that medium, and making that conclusion as hee doth, (for else in the first figure, and first mood, the text of Chrysostome will not serue him) then must the forme and violence of this inexpugnable argument be denied, for that it breaketh the rules of Logik, making his conclusion vniuersal, which in that figure must needs be particular, either affirmatiue or negatiue. And so this argument inuincible, falleth into one of these two straits, either concluding thus, the forme will not serue him, or concluding in another figure, the words of Chrysostome will not answere to his purpose, to proone that all the world was committed to Peter. Which proposition as it is strange in scripture: so neither is it the proposition of Chrysostom. And though it were, yet both without inconuenience might be granted of vs, and being granted, serueth his purpose nothing, so long as the proposition is not exceptiue, excluding other apostles. For the words of Chrysostome do not so sound, that the whole world was committed to Peter only, and to none other. Likewise then as it may be wel affirmed of vs, that the world was committed to Peter, so can it not be denied of them that the world was also committed to John, James, Bartholomew, Paul, Barnabe, and other al and singuler apostles. For he that said to Peter feede my sheepe; said also to al and singuler his apostles, Go into all the world and preach, &c. Matth. vlt. Moreouer, for as much as this man collecteth out of Chrysostome, that the whole world was committed to Peter, how shall we then ioyne this meaning of Chrysostome with S. Paul, which saith that the gospell was committed to Peter ouer the circumcision, as was Paul ouer the vncircumcision? And heere an answere to this doughtie argument, both to the forme, and to the matter thereof, albeit concerning the matter, here lacketh much to be said more of Peters successours in the text of Chrysostome. By the which successors is not meant the bishop of Rome only (as the papists would beare vs in hand) but all such true and faithfull pastors, whom the Lords calling sendeth, and setteth ouer his flocke, whersoeuer, or whatsoeuer they be. For as Peter beareth a representation of the church, by the testimony of August. in Ioan. tract. 124. Præfat. in Psal. 108. so the successours of Peter be all faithfull pastors and ouerseers of Christs church, to whom Christ our Lord hath committed the charge of his flock. Wherefore they are not a little deceiued, which loking vpon the rocke onely of the person, and not the rocke of confession (contrarie to the rule of Hilarie De trinit. lib. 6.) doe tie the apostleship or rocke of Peter to one onelie bishop, and the succession of Peter to one onlie see of Rome: whereas this being a spirituall office, and not carnall, hath no such carnall race or descent after any worldlie or locall vnderstanding: but hath a more mysticall meaning, after a spirituall sense of succession, such as Hierome speaketh of, Epist. ad Euagrium. Omnes, inquit, apostolorum successores sunt, &c: that is, All, (saith hee, speaking of bishops) be successours of the apostles, &c.

The world was committed as well to other apostles as to Peter.

Ergo, the biſhop of Rome was called head of the church in the old ancient time.

Anſwer to the argument. This argument ſyllogiſtorie, being clouted vp in the third figure, and concluding ſingulerly, hath rather a ſhew of an argument, than maketh any neceſſarie concluſion, ſtanding vpon no mood in the ſaid figure, if the author thereof were put to his triall. Albeit to leaue the forme, and to come to the matter of the argument. Firſt, how well will he diſpatch himſelfe of the maior, and prooue vs that S. Peter although he were at Rome, and taught at Rome, and ſuffered at Rome: yet that he was biſhop and proper ordinarie of that citie and ſpeciall ſée of Rome? As touching the allegation of Abdias, Oroſius, Ado, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierome, Optatus, and Auguſtine brought forth for his moſt aduantage, to proue his maior: thus I anſwer concerning Oroſius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Hierom and Auguſtine, that where they ſpeake of S. Peters chaire, or planting the faith at Rome, ſtraightway this man argueth thereupon, that Peter was biſhop of Rome. But that doth not clerkelie follow. For the office of the apoſtles was to plant the faith in all places, and in euery region, yet were they not biſhops in euery region. And as for the chaire, as it is no difference eſſentiall that maketh a biſhop (for ſo much as a doctour may haue a chaire, and yet be no biſhop) ſo cannot he conclude by the chaire of Peter, that S. Peter was biſhop of Rome. For al this proueth no further, but that Peter was at Rome, and there taught the faith of Chriſt, as Paul did alſo, and peraduenture in a chaire likewiſe: yet we ſay not that Paul was therefore biſhop of Rome: but that he was there as an apoſtle of Chriſt, whether he taught there ſtanding on his feet, or ſitting in a chaire. In the ſcripture commonlie the chaire ſignifieth doctrine or iudgement, as ſitting alſo declareth ſuch as teach or iudge, whether they ſit in the chaire of Moſes, or in the chaire of peſtilence. Planting likewiſe is a word apoſtolicall, and ſignifieth not onely the office of a biſhop. Wherefore it is no good conſequent, He ſat, he taught, he planted at Rome, his chaire and ſeat was at Rome; Ergò, he was biſhop of Rome. And thus much touching Oroſius, Tertullian, Cyprian, Auguſtine.

Oroſius. Tertul. lib. de præſcript. aduer. hæreſ. Cypri lib. 1. ep 8. Hier. in catal. & epiſt. 92.

As for Abdias, Ado, Optatus, and ſuch others, although we ſhould haue much wrong offered, and neuer ſhould make an end, if we ſhould be preſt with the authoritie of euerie one that could or did moue pen, in all the whole firſt age of the church, to be our iudges in euery eccleſiaſticall matter: and much more wrong ſhould haue, if the authors either corrupted, or counterfeited, ſhould be laid vnto vs, ſpeaking not in the ſame ſenſe, or in the ſame tongue, or in the ſame time wherin they wrote: yet to helpe and to ſalue the authorities of theſe authors ſo much as we may, I anſwer to their allegations, with this diſtinction of a biſhop, which is to be taken either generallie or ſpeciallie. After the firſt, a biſhop is he to whomſoeuer the publike cure and charge of ſoules is committed, without any limitation of place. And ſo the name of biſhop is coincident with the office of apoſtle, or any publike paſtor, doctor, or curat of the vniuerſall flocke of Chriſt. And thus may Paul, Peter, or any other of the apoſtles be called biſhops. So alſo is Chriſt himſelfe by expreſſe word called ἐπισκόπος and ποίμην, that is, biſhop and paſtor, 1. Pet. 2. And thus may Peter well be named a biſhop of theſe foreſaid authors after this manner of taking. But this publike and generall charge vniuerſallie ouer the whole, without limitation, ceaſed after Chriſt and the apoſtles. For then were biſhops by places and prouinces appointed, to haue ſpeciall ouerſight of ſome particular flocke or prouince, and ſo to be reſident and attendant only vpon the ſame.

A double taking of the word biſhop.

Chriſt himſelfe a biſhop.

The other diuerſitie of this name biſhop, is to be taken after a more ſpeciall ſort, which is, when any perſon orderly called, is aſſigned, namely and ſpeciallie to ſome one certaine place, citie, or prouince, whereunto he is onely bound to employ his office and charge, and no where elſe, according to the old canons of the apoſtles, and of the councell of Nice. And this biſhop differing from the other, is called Epiſcopus intitulatus, hauing his name of his citie or dioceſſe. And thus we denie that Peter the apoſtle was euer biſhop elected, inſtalled, or intituled to the citie of Rome: neither doth Optatus, Abdias, Ado, or Hierome affirme the ſame. And if Ado ſay that Peter was biſhop of Rome fiue and twentie yéeres, vntill the laſt yéere of Nero, that is eaſilie refuted both by the ſcriptures and hiſtories: for ſo we vnderſtand by the declaration of S. Paul, Gal. 1. 2. that foureteene yéeres after his converſion, ſaint Paul had Peter by the hand at Hieruſalem.

Canon. Apoſt. 23 34. 34. Con. Nice. cap. 15. Concil. Antioch. cap. 2. 12.

Peters being at Rome.

Moreouer, the ſaid Paul in the foreſaid epiſtle witneſſeth, that the charge apoſtolicall was committed vnto Peter ouer the circumciſed, and ſo was he intituled. Alſo S. Paul writing to the Romans, in his manifold ſalutations to them in Rome, maketh no mention there of S. Peter, which doubtleſſe ſhould not haue been vnremembred, if he had been then in Rome. Againe S. Peter, dating his epiſtle from Babylon, was not then belike at Rome.

Furthermore, hiſtories do record, that Peter was at Pontus fiue yéeres, and at Antioch ſeuen yeeres. How could hee then be fiue and twentie yéeres at Rome? Finallie, where our aduerſarie alleaging out of Ado, ſaith, that S. Peter was there fiue and twentie yéeres, vntill the laſt yéere of Nero: how can that ſtand, when S. Paul ſuffering vnder Nero, was put to death the ſame day twelue moneth, that is, a whole yere after Peter? &c. But eſpeciallie how agreeth this with ſcripture, that Chriſt ſhould make Peter an apoſtle vniuerſall to walke in all the world? Ite per vniuerſum orbem. Item, Eritis mihi teſtes vſque ad fines terræ, &c. And our papiſts would néeds make him a ſitting biſhop, and intitle him to Rome. How accord theſe: Apoſtolus and Epiſcopus, Ire and ſedere, Omnes gentes and Roma together?

And thus haue I reſolued the firſt vntruth of that popiſh demonſtration before rehearſed, wherein they thinke to proue that as Peter, although he was not called vniuerſall apoſtle, yet was the head of the whole church: ſo the pope might and hath had after him the charge of the whole church, although he was not called vniuerſall biſhop in the old time, &c.

The ſecond vntruth of the argument aboue mentioned.

Now followeth the ſecond vntruth to bee touched in the ſame argument, which is, that becauſe Peter was the head of the church: ſo therefore the pope muſt alſo bee the head of the church, and was, albeit he was not called vniuerſall biſhop a long time. But this we do denie, yea the matter denieth it ſelfe by their owne poſition, for being granted by them, that the title of vniuerſall biſhop was not receiued at Rome, but refuſed to the time of Gregorie: then muſt it neceſſarilie be granted, that the biſhops of Rome before S. Gregorie, had not the charge of the whole church, neither could be admitted by that reaſon to be heads of the church. For ſo much as there can be no head, but which is vniuerſall to the whole bodie, neither can any haue charge of the whole, but he muſt needs be vniuerſall to all and ſinguler parts of that, whereof he hath the charge. As in ſciences, whoſoeuer hath knowledge and cunning in all the ſeauen liberall ſciences, and all the parts thereof pertaining to liberal knowledge, is ſaid to be an vniuerſall learned man: ſo in office, to whomſoeuer the publike charge of all churches doth appertaine, how is he not to be called biſhop vniuerſall? Now if before S. Gregories time, the name of vniuerſall biſhop was repealed in Rome: how then can the name be refuſed, and the definition of the name be admitted? Or els let our aduerſaries tell vs how they define an vniuerſall biſhop, ſeeing this word biſhop is properlie the name of office whereto is annexed charge. Wherefore, if a biſhop be he which hath the charge of al ſoules in his dioceſſe committed to him, and muſt render account for them all; then whoſe charge extendeth to al & ſinguler churches, & muſt render account for euery chriſtian ſoule within the whole world, to him cānot be denied the name of an vniuerſal biſhop, hauing the office of an vniuerſal biſhop. Or if he be not an vniuerſall biſhop, he cannot then haue the charge of the whole, that is, of all & ſinguler churches of Chriſt. For ſuch is the rule of true definition: Cui conuenit definitio, conuenit & definitum, & contra: Cui adimitur definitio, eidem & definitum adimitur. Although this word vniuerſall, in the Greek writers, ſignifieth that, which we in our vulgar Engliſh tongue call catholike; yet I ſuppoſe our aduerſaries here will not take vniuerſall in that ſenſe. For after that meaning, as we do not denie that the biſhops of Rome may be vniuerſall biſhops, ſo neither can they denie but other biſhops alſo may be as vniuerſal, that is, as catholike as they. But ſuch as more diſtinctly and ſcholelike diſcuſſe this matter, define vniuerſall or catholike by three things: to wit, by time, place, and perſon. So that whatſoeuer extendeth it ſelfe to all times, all places, and all perſons, that is properlie vniuerſall or catholike. And contrariwiſe, what thing is to be called vniuerſal or catholike, reacheth to al thoſe three aforeſaid, comprehending all places, times, and perſons, and extendeth it ſelf of his owne nature to the ſame, or els it is not to be called properlie vniuerſall or catholike. And thus three things there be, which moſt commonlie we call catholike or vniuerſall: that is, the church, which is called the catholike church: faith, which is called the catholike faith: a man, whom alſo we cal a man catholike, becauſe theſe three of their own nature and diſpoſition (no contrarie obſtacle letting) extend themſelues ſo to all, ỹ no time, place, nor perſon is excluded. Which three conditions, if they altogether concurre in the charge of the biſhop of Rome, then is it an vniuerſall charge, and he an vniuerſall biſhop: if not, then is his charge neither vniuerſall, nor he the head of the church, nor yet vniuerſall biſhop. For how theſe three can be ſeparated, I cannot ſée, except the aduerſarie part doe proue it more euidently than yet they haue done.

What is an vniuerſall biſhop.

Regula definitionis.

Cui conuenit definitio, & definitum.

Vniuerſall defined by three things, time, place, and perſon.

Three things commonlie called catholike or vniuerſall.

To haue vniuerſall charge to be head of the vniuerſall church, and to be vniuerſall biſhop are all coincident together.

And thus much to the obiection of our aduerſaries, arguing thus; that as S. Peter being not called vniuerſall apoſtle, yet was the head of the vniuerſall church: ſo the pope although he was not firſt called vniuerſall biſhop, had, and might haue the charge of the whole church, and was the vniuerſall head of the ſame. The which obiection containing (as is ſaid) a double vntruth, our aduerſaries yet notwithſtanding doe buſie themſelues greatlie to fortifie by ſundrie teſtimonies and allegations, patched out of old and ancient doctors, but ſpecially out of Theodoretus, Ireneus, Ambroſe and Auguſtine, proouing by them that the ſée of Rome hauing the preeminence & principalitie, hath been honored aboue all other churches. Whereupon the ſaid aduerſarie before minded, groundeth this conſequent:

Ireneus. lib. 3. Cap. 3. Amb. de doct. gent. lib. 2. cap. 6. Auguſt. epiſt. 162.

Ireneus, Ambroſe, Auguſtine and Theodoretus affirme, that the church of Rome is the chiefe of all other churches:

The argument of the papists.

Ergo, the bishop and head of that church is chiefe and head ouer all bishops, and head of all other churches.

Answer.

But this consequent is to be denied, for that the excellencie of the church or place doth not alwaies argue the excellencie of the minister or bishop, nor yet necessarily doth cause the same. For in matters of the church which are spirituall, all preeminence standeth vpon spirituall & inward gifts (Spiritualia enim spiritualibus comparantur) as faith, pietie, learning and godlie knowledge, zeale and feruencie in the holie ghost, vnitie of doctrine, &c: which gifts many times may excell in a church, where the minister or bishop is inferior to bishops or ministers of other churches. As the most famous schole in a realme hath not alway the most famous schoolemaster, neither doth make him thereby most excellent in learning aboue all others. So if our aduersaries doe meane by this preeminence of the church of Rome, such inward gifts of doctrine, faith, vnitie and peace of religion; then say I, the excellencie hereof doth not inferre or argue the excellencie of the bishop. And thus concerning the principalitie of the church of Rome, commended at that time of the doctors, it may be true, and so well expounded one way.

Preeminence of a church esteemed after a double consideration.

And thus do I grant the antecedent of this argument, and denie the consequent. But here will our aduersaries peraduenture replie againe and say, that the principalitie of the church of Rome which is commended by the doctors, is not meant here so much by inward gifts and indowments belonging to a christian church, as by outward authoritie and domination ouer other churches. Whereto is to be answered: first, what necessitie is there, or where did our papists learne, to bring into the spirituall church of Christ, this outward forme of ciuill regiment and policie: that as the Romane emperors in times past gouerned ouer all the world, so the Romane bishop must haue his monarchie vpon the vniuersall cleargie, to make all other churches to stoope vnder his subiection. And where then be the words of our Sauior: Vos autem non sic. If they hold their affirmatiue Quòd sic, where then is Christs negatiue Non sic? If they say, there must néeds be distinction of degrées in the church, and in this distinction of degrees, superioritie must necessarilie be granted for the outward discipline of the church, for directing matters, for quieting of schismes, for setting orders, for commensing of conuocations and councels, as need shall require, &c. Against this superioritie we stand not, and therefore we yéeld to our superior powers, kings, and princes, our due obedience, and to our lawfull gouernours vnder God of both regiments, ecclesiasticall and temporall. Also in the ecclesiasticall state, we take not away the distinction of ordinarie degrees, such as by the scripture be appointed, or by the primitiue church allowed; as patriarchs, or archbishops, bishops, ministers and deacons, for of these foure we specially reade as chiefe. In which foure degrees as we grant diuersitie of office, so we admit in the same also, diuersitie of dignitie: neither denying that which is due to each degrée, neither yet maintaining the ambition of any singuler person. For as we giue to the minister place aboue the deacon, to the bishop aboue the minister, to the archbishop aboue the bishop: so we sée no cause of inequalitie, why one minister should be aboue another minister: one bishop in his degrée aboue another bishop to deale in his diocesse: or one archbishop aboue another archbishop. And this is to keepe an order duely and truly in the church, according to the true nature and definition of order by the authoritie of August. lib. De ciuit. Dei. Where he thus defineth that which we call order: Ordo est parium disparíumque rerum sua cuique loca tribuens dispositio. Order (saith he) is a discretion or disposition giuen to all things, according as they are matches, or not matches, proportionallie to euery one his owne right and proper place.

Obiection. Outward preeminence belongeth vnto outward kingdomes, not to the church of Christ.

The first answere to the obiection.

Non sic, saith Christ: Quod sic saith the pope. Obiection. Answer.

Superioritie in the church. Distinction of degrees in the church. Diuersitie of dignities in degrees. Order kept in the church, and what true order is.

Aug lib. de Ciuit. Dei cap. 19. Order defined.

This definition of S. Augustine, standing with the things before premised: now here toyneth the question betweene vs and the papists, whether the metropolitane church of Rome, with the archbishop of the same, ought to be preferred before other metropolitane churches and archbishops, through vniuersall christendome or not? To the answere whereof, if the voice of order might héere be heard, it would say: Giue to things that be matches and like, like honour; to things vnlike, vnlike honour, &c. Wherefore, seeing the sée of Rome is a patriarchall sée appointed by the primitiue church, and the bishop thereof an archbishop limited within his owne bordering churches, which the councell of Nice calleth Suburbicas ecclesias, as other archbishops be: he ought therefore orderly to haue the honour of an archbishop (ordering himselfe thereafter) and such outward preéminence as to other archbishops is due. More if he do require, he breaketh the rule of right order, he falleth into presumption, and doth wrong vnto his fellowes; and they also doe wrong vnto themselues, whosoeuer they be, which séeding his humor of ambition, giue more vnto him then the foresaid rule of order doth require. For so much as they yéeld to him more then is his right, so much they take from themselues, which is due to them. And the same is the cause, why both Gregorie and Pelagius his predecessor reprehendeth them, which gaue to the archbishop of Constantinople, that, which now the bishop of Rome claimeth to himselfe, charging them with the breach of order in these words: Ne dùm priuatim aliquod daretur vni, honore debito sacerdotes priuarentur vniuersi, that is, Lest that while any singular thing is giuen to one person, all other priests be depriued of their due honour. And for the like case Pelagius exhorteth that no priest do giue to any one archbishop, the name of vniuersall bishop, Ne sibi debitum subtrahat, cum alteri honorem offert indebitum, that is, Lest (saith he) in so doing, he take from himselfe his due honour, while he yéeldeth that, which is not due to another. And also in the same epistle: Quia si summus patriarcha vniuersalis dicitur, patriarcharum nomen cæteris derogatur. For (saith he) if he be called the chiefe vniuersall patriarch, then is the name of patriarchs derogated from others, &c. Wherefore as is said, séeing the bishop of Rome is an archbishop, as others be, order giueth that he should haue the dignity which to archbishops is due; what soeuer is added more, is derogation to the rest. And thus much concerning distinction of degrées, and order in giuing to euerie degrée his place and honour.

Ex epist. 2. Pelagij 2. dist. 99. cap. Nullus.

The second reason or answere to the obiection before moued, is this: That being granted to the papists, that the doctours aforesaid, speaking of the principalitie of the church of Rome, doe meane not onely of the inward vertues of that church, but also of the outward authoritie and iurisdiction of the same, aboue other churches: yet the cause wherefore they did attribute so much to ẏ church, is to be expended, which was this, as before was alleaged out of the councell of Chalcedon, ca. 28. διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην, that is, For the rule and empere which that citie of Rome had then aboue other cities; which cause being outward and carnall, was neither then cause sufficient, and now ceasing, importeth not to vs the like effect, according as they say: Sublata causa tollitur effectus. So that by the reason thereof, the foresaid principalitie of the church of Rome, did not hold then Iure diuino sed humano. And as it holdeth by mans law, so by mans law may be repealed againe.

The second answer to the obiection before moued.

Ex concil. Chalcad. cap. 28.

Wherefore, be it admitted that both the pope sitteth and succéedeth in the chaire of Peter, and also that he is the bishop of the greatest citie in the world: yet it followeth not thereby that hee should haue rule and lordship ouer all other bishops and churches of the world. For first touching the succession of Peter, many things are to be considered.

Certaine demands for the papists to answer vnto.

First, whether Peter sate, and had his chaire in Rome, or not?

Secondlie, whether he sate there as an apostle, or as a bishop?

Thirdly, whether the sitting in the outward seat of Peter, maketh successor of Peter?

Fourthly, whether he sitteth in the chaire and seat of Peter, which sitteth not in the doctrine of Peter?

Fiftly, whether the succession of Peter maketh rather an apostle than a bishop, and so should we call the pope, the apostle of Rome, and not the bishop of Rome?

Sirtly, whether ecclesiasticall functions ought to be esteemed by ordinarie succession of place, or by Gods secret calling or sending?

Seuenthly and lastly, whether it stand by scripture, any succession at all to be pointed in Christs church, or why more from Peter than from other apostles?

All which interrogatories being wel discussed (which would aske a long processe) it should well appeare what little hold the pope hath to take this state vpon him, aboue all other churches as he doth. In the meane time, this one argument by the way may suffice in stead of many, for our aduersaries to answere to at their conuenient leisure. Which argument thus I forme and frame in Camestres.

An argument prooving the popes of this latter church of Rome not to be successors of Peter.

Ca- All the true successors of Peter sit in the chaire of the doctrine of Peter, and other apostles vniformlie:
me- No popes of this latter church of Rome sit in the chaire of S. Peters and other apostles doctrine vniformlie: stres. Ergo, No popes of this latter church of Rome bee the true successors of Peter.

And when they haue wel perused the minor of this argument, & haue well conferred together the doctrine taught them of S. Peter, with the doctrine taught now by the popes, of iustification of a christian man, of the office of the law, of the strength and largenes of sinne, of mens merits, of frée will, of works of supererogation, of setting vp images, of seuen sacraments, of auricular confession, of satisfaction, of sacrifice of the masse, of communicating vnder one kind, of eleuating and adoring the sacramentall elements, of Latine seruice, of inuocation, of prohibition of meats and marriage, of vowing chastitie, of sects and rules of diuers religions, of indulgences and pardons: also with their doctrine taught now of magistrates, of the fulnesse of power, and regalitie of the sée of Rome, with many other like to these, &c: then will I be glad to heare what they will say to the premisses.

Secondly, if they would proue by the allegation of the doctors, Ireneus, Ambrose, Augustine, Theodoretus aforesaid, the bishop of Rome to be the chiefe of all bishops therefore, because the citie whereof he is bishop is the chiefe and principall aboue all other churches, that consequent is to be denied. For it followeth not (taking, as I said, the principalitie of that church to stand διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν. that is, vpon the principall dominion of that citie) no more than this consequent followeth.

London is the chiefe citie in all England:

Ergo,

Ex registro Greg. lib. 4. epist. 32.

Digitized by Google

Ergo, The bishop of London is the chiefest of all bishops in the realme.

Which argument were derogatorie to the bishop both of Canturburie and of Yorke.

Yea to grant yet more to our aduersaries (which is all they can require) the mind of the foresaid doctors, as Ireneus, Ambrose, Augustine, and Theodoretus, in giuing principality vnto Rome, to haue respect vnto the vertue of succession from Peter, & not vnto the greatnesse of the citie: yet notwithstanding, for all this their argument holdeth not, if it be rightly considered, to say:

A false consequent of the papists.

The apostolicall sée of Rome, hauing succession from Peter, with the bishops thereof, was chiefe then of all other churches in the primitiue time of these doctors:

Ergo, The apostolicall sée of Rome, with the bishops thereof, hauing succession from Peter, ought now to be chiefe of all other churches in these our daies.

Answere to the consequent.

This consequent might well follow, if the times were like, or if succession which gaue them the cause of principalitie, were the same now, which was then. But now the time and succession is not correspondent, for then succession in the time of these doctors was as well in doctrine apostolicall, as in place apostolicall. Now the succession of doctrine apostolicall hath long ceased in the sée apostolicall: and nothing remaineth but onely place, which is the least matter of true spirituall and apostolicall succession. And thus much to the authoritie and testimonie of these forenamed doctors.

Succession apostolicall double wise to be considered.

Besides these obiections heretofore recited out of Ireneus, Ambrose, Augustine, and Theodoretus, our aduersaries yet obiect and heape vp against vs moreouer examples of the primitiue time of the church, testimonies of generall councels, and opinions of ancient writers taken out of the booke of councels, and epistles decretall, whereby their intent is to prooue the foresaid termes (of the head of the church, ruler of the church, chiefe of all other priests) to be applied not onely to Peter, but also to the bishop of Rome within the compasse of the primitiue time. And here commeth in the testimonie cited of Vincentius Lirinensis. Of the epistle of Paschasius and his fellowes, writing to Leo from the councell of Chalcedon. The testimonie also of Iustinian the emperour in his Codex: where Ioannes then pope was called Caput omnium ecclesiarum, epist. inter claras, cap. De summa trinit. & fide cath. The testimonie also of Athanasius, with his fellow bishops of Egypt, of Thebaida, and Lybia, in their epistles to pope Marcus, Liberius, and Felix. Likewise the testimonie of Ierome, In præf. in 4. Euang. Item epist. 42. tom. 1. Item epist. 41. tom. 2. Of S. Ambrose, 1. tom. 2. Of S. Augustine to Boniface. Ad Bonifac. contra duas epist. Pelagian. lib. 1. cap. 1. Item lib. 2. de baptism. ca. 1. Of Theodoretus in his epistle to pope Leo. epist. commentar. in Pauli epist. præfixa. Of Chrysostome, epist. ad Innocentium, tom. 5. &c. By which testimonies our aduersaries would proue S. Peter, and after him the bishop of Rome to be called and taken for head of the church, chiefe bishop, prince & ruler of the whole clergie. To all which obiections fullie and exactly to answer in order, would require a whole volume by it selfe. In the meane time, leauing the rest vnto them, vnto whom it doth more properlie appertaine, briefly with this one short distinction I answer these and all such other like places, where S. Peter with his successours are called, head of the church, chiefe of bishops, prince of the apostles, &c. In which places, this word head, chiefe, and prince of the apostles, may be taken two maner of waies: to note either dominion, or els commendation. For so we read sometime Caput & Princeps, to be words not of authoritie, but of excellencie, whereby is declared the chiefest and worthiest part among many parts, and not possessour and gouernour of the whole. Like as in the person of man, the head is the principall part of the whole bodie, being indued with reason, and furnished with most excellent senses, by the which the whole body of man is directed, so thereof is deriued by a metaphor, to what man or thing soeuer nature or condition hath giuen the greatest excellencie of gifts and properties aboue other parts or members, the same societie to be called of the said parties, Caput or Princeps, head or prince. And yet the same head or prince so called, hath not alwaies dominion or iurisdiction of the rest. So we call in our vulgar speech the head or chiefe men of the parish, who for their riches, wisdome, or place, are most spectally noted: after like phrase of speech we call the head man of the inquest, him that hath the first place: and yet neither they nor these haue any dominion or iurisdiction vpon the residue. In a schole the chiefest scholar in learning, is not therefore the master or gouernor of his fellowes. Neither hath M. Cicero any title thereby to claime subiection and seruice of all other orators, because hee is named Princeps eloquentiæ, & goeth before them in that kind of phrase. The same Cicero, lib. 1. offic. calleth Cratippum principem huius ætatis philosophorum, as Homerus also may bee called Poetarum princeps: and yet neither philosophers to Cratippus, nor poets to Homer owe any thing else, but only fame and praise.

Testimonies alleaged for the principalitie of the pope.

How Peter is princeps apostolorum, princeps eloquentiæ Ciceronis, princeps philosophorum Cratippus.

Answere by a distinction.

Caput & princeps haue a double vnderstanding.

And what if S. Peter the blessed apostle be called and counted of the old ancient doctours, as head and prince of the apostles, which is as much as Coryphæus apostolorum, for his excellent faith, for his diuine confession and singular affection to the Lord Iesus: yet what interest or charge either hath he to challenge ouer the apostles, or the pope after him ouer all other bishops and the whole church of Christ, although the pope haue the like excellencie of Christs faith which Peter had, as would God he had! As concerning these allegations therefore out of the doctors, two things are to be obserued: first, that neither these names and titles though they be giuen to Peter, do giue him any state or dominion aboue other apostles: nor yet the succession of him doth further any whit this celsitude and regalitie of the pope to aduance him aboue his fellow archbishops, as he now doth.

Petrus princeps & coryphæus apostolorum.

And if our aduersaries would needes prouoke vs to the numbring of testimonies, and diuiding the house (speaking of the writers and councels of the primitiue age) for these aforesaid testimonies alleaged on their side, I could on the contrarie part recite out of the witnesse of doctors, out of the examples of councels, and practises of emperors, no lesse than sixtie voices, much more repugnant against their assertion, than there is for the pope. The tractation whereof for this present I do refer, either to them that haue more leasure at this time to discourse them, or else omit it to another time, if the good pleasure of the Lord shall be to grant me further leasure in another booke to intreat thereof at large, in such order, as (if the Lord so grant) shall appeare sufficient matter, to proue by the doctors, generall councels, examples and histories of time, that the bishops of Rome, during the first fiue hundred yeeres after Christ, although for the greatnesse of the empire, were somewhat more magnified than the other, and therefore were sought of many, and were flattered of some, and they themselues diuers did set forth themselues more than they should: yet by the common consent of churches were stopped of their purpose, so that by the consension of the most part, within the compasse of that age the bishops of Rome had not this regall state of title, iurisdiction, and fulnesse of power, which now they vsurpe, but were taken as archbishops, of equall honour, of equall merit with other archbishops and rulers of the church. And if any preferment was giuen vnto them something aboue the rest, yet neither was it so giuen of all, nor of the most part: secondly, neither was it so giuen of them for any such necessitie of Gods word, Aut iure aliquo diuino, as which did so bind them thereunto, nor yet so much for the respect of Peter, and his succession: as for certaine other causes and respects, as may be gathered to the number of thirteene.

Thirteene causes of aduancing the see of Rome.

1 Of which, the first is the greatnesse of the citie and monarchie of Rome.

2 The second, is the authoritie of the emperour Constantine the great, first of the emperours conuerted to the faith, and ruling in the same citie, by whom the vniuersall libertie of the church was first promoted: and the causes of the bishops being then at variance, were committed partly to the bishop of Rome, partly to other bishops neere by, to be decided, as appeareth, Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

3 The third was the councell of Nice, which confirmed the preeminence of that church to haue the ouersight of the churches bordering about it.

4 The fourth cause of aduancing the church of Rome, was the vnquiet state of the Greeke church, much troubled in th se daies with sects, factions, and dissensions, whereof we may read, Socrat. lib. 2. cap. 15. Sozom. lib. 3. cap. 8.

5 The fift, when as synods were called by other metropolitans, then if it chanced the bishops of Rome to be absent, and their sentence being absent to be required, by the occasion thereof they began at length to take their sentence for a canon or rule ecclesiasticall, and thereby to refuse other synods, where their decree or sentence was not required.

6 Another cause was, that when any common matter was in hand in other places, whatsoeuer was done, commonly the manner was to write to the Roman bishop for his approbation in the same, for publike vnity & consent to bee had in Christs church, as appeareth, Lib. 10. epist. 78. Ambros. ad Theophil.

7 Item, for that the testimonie sometimes of the Roman bishop was wont in those daies also to be desired, for admitting teachers and bishops in other churches, whereof we haue example in Socrat. lib. 4. cap. 37.

8 Moreouer, this was a great setting vp of that church, when as their sentence not onely was required, but also receiued diuers times of other bishops. And when bishops of other prouinces were at any dissension among themselues, they of their owne accord appealed to the bishop of Rome, desiring him to cite vp both parties, and to haue the hearing and deciding of the cause, as did Macarius and Helychius send to Julius then bishop of Rome, &c.

9 Item, in that certaine of the Arrians returning from their Arrianisme, offered vp and exhibited vnto the bishops of Rome their libels of repentance, and were of them receiued againe, as Vrsatius and Valens did to Julius. Socra. lib. 2. cap. 24.

10 The tenth cause was also, for that Gratianus the emperor made a law, that all men should retaine that religion which Damasus bishop of Rome, and Peter bishop of Alexandria did hold. Sozom. lib. 7. cap. 4.

11 And also, if it happened the bishop of Rome to disallow the ordering of any minister or ministers, the popes perceiuing how how diligent and readie they were to seeke their fauour, and to send vp their messengers to Rome for their purgation, take thereby no little maner of exaltation. Theodoret. lib. 5. cap. 23.

12 Besides these aforesaid, the bishops of Rome had also an other artificiall practise, that in sending out their letters abroad, as they did to many, in all their epistles (if the epistles be theirs and not forged) euer they were harping of the greatnes of their name, and of their apostolike see, and of the primacie of S. Peter, their predecessor and prince of all the apostles, &c. And this they vsed in euery letter, whensoeuer they wrote to any, as appeareth in all their letters decretall, namely, in the letters of Miltiades, Marcellus, and Marcus, &c.

13 Againe, if any of the east church directed any writing to them, wherein any signification was contained of neuer so little reuerence giuen vnto them (as learned men commonly vse for modesties sake) that was taken by and by and construed for plaine subiection and due obedience, as declareth the letter of Damasus written to the bishops of the east church, beginning thus: Quòd debita reuerentia, &c. In English thus: But that your charitie yéeldeth due reuerence to the apostolicall see, you in so doing (deare children) doe much for your selues, &c. Theodoret. lib. 5. cap. 9. where as the bishops of the east church notwithstanding had shewed little or no reuerence in their epistle to pope Damasus before.

Thus haue ye the first and original grounds, by the means whereof, ỳ archbishops of the Romish see haue atchieued to this their great kingdome and celsitude ouer Christs church, first beginning the mysterie of their iniquitie by that which was modestly and voluntarily giuen them; afterward by vse and custome claiming it ambitiouslie vnto them of dutie and seruice, and lastly holding fast (as we see) that which once they had gotten into their possession, so that now in no case they can abide the birds to call home their feathers againe, which they so long haue vsurped.

This latter church of Rome differing from the first church of Rome, in forme of gouernment.

And thus much concerning the life, iurisdiction, and title of the Romane bishops: in all which (as is declared) they, and not we, haue fallen from the church of Rome. To these I might also ioyne the maner of gouernment, wherin the said Romish bishops haue no lesse altered both from the rule of scripture, and from the steps of the true church of Rome, which gouernment as it hath been, and ought to be onely spirituall, so hath the bishop of Rome vsed it of late yeres no otherwise, than hath an earthly king or prince gouerned his realme and dominions, with riches, glorie, power, terror, outward strength, force, prison, death, execution, lawes, policies, promoting his friends to dignities, reuenging his affections, punishing and correcting faults against his person more than other offenses against God committed, vsing and abusing in all these things the word of God for his pretext and cloke to worke his worldly purpose withall: whereas indeed the word of God ministreth no such power to spirituall persons, but such as is spirituall: according to the saying of the apostle; Arma militiæ nostræ non sunt carnalia, sed spiritualia, &c: The armour and artillerie, saith S. Paul, of our warfarre, is not carnall, but spirituall: such as serue not against flesh and bloud, nor against the weake person of man: but against satan, against the gates of hell, and the profundities of the wicked power, &c.

How the church of Christ ought to be gouerned.

Which armour as it is all spirituall, so ought they, which haue the dealing thereof, to be likewise spirituall, well furnished with all such gifts and graces of the holie ghost, meet for the gouernance of his spirituall church: as with wisdome and knowledge in the scripture to instruct the ignorant: with inward intelligence and foresight of the crafftie cogitations and operations of satan, with power of the spirit to resist the same: with practise and experience of temptations, to comfort such as be afflicted and oppressed of satan: with heauenly discretion to discerne spirits, and truth from vntruth: with iudgement and knowledge of tongues and learning to conuict error: with zeale of Gods glorie, with feruencie of prayer, with patience in persecution: with a mind contented with all cases and states incident, with teares and compassion on other mens griefes: with stoutnes and courage against proud and stout oppressors: with humilitie toward the poore and miserable: with the counsell of the Lord Iesus, by his word and spirit to direct him in all things to be done; with strength against sinne: with hatred of this world: with gift of faith: power of the keies in spirituall causes, as to minister the word, the sacraments and excommunication when the word biddeth, that the spirit may be saued, and to reconcile again, as cause requireth, &c. These & such like are the matters wherein consisteth the sinews and strength of the church, and for true gouernance of the same. But contrarie to these aforesaid both the bishop & clergie of this latter church of Rome, proceeding in their administration and gouernance, as who vnder the name and pretense of Christ and his word, haue exercised of long time nothing else but a worldly dominion, seeking indeed their owne glorie, not the glorie of Christ: riches of the world, not the lucre of soules: not feeding the flock, but filling the purse: reuenging their owne wrongs, but neglecting Gods glorie: striuing against man onlie, and killing him; but not killing the vice, nor confuting the errour of man: strong against flesh and bloud, but weake against the diuell, stout against the simple, but meeke against the mightie: briefly,

Prepostereous gouernement of the church by the pope.

doing almost all things preposterously, more like to secular princes, than spirituall pastors of Christs flocke, without outward forcement, and feare of punishment, with prisoning, famishing, hanging, racking, drowning, heading, slaying, murdering, and burning, and warring also: on the other side, with his riches and treasures, with his gard and gardiance, with strength of men, with court and cardinals: with pompe and pride about them, with their triple crowne, with the naked sword, with their ordinarie succession: with their lawes, and executions: their promotions and preferments: their biddings and commandings: threatnings and reuengings, &c.

A comparison betweene the king domie of this world and the kingdome of the pope.

In fine, to compare therfore the images of a worldly kingdome, with this kingdome of the pope, there is no difference, saue onely that this kingdome of the pope, vnder hypocrisie maketh a face of the spirituall sword, which is the word of God: but in very deed doth all things with the temporall sword, that is, with outward forcement and coaction: differing nothing from ciuill and secular regiment in all properties and conditions, if it be well considered. For as in an earthly kingdome, first there is a prince or some chiefe magistrate appointed, hauing dominion ouer his nobles and commons, containing all his subiects vnder his statutes and lawes, with the which lawes notwithstanding he dispenseth at his pleasure; vnder whom all other inferiour magistrats haue their order and place to them appointed to rule ouer the subiects, and yet to be subiect vnder him: so if the state and forme of the pope be well considered, we shall see it altereth nothing from the same, but only in the names of the persons. In ciuill gouernment, all subiection is referred to one head ruler, whose authoritie surmounteth all the rest, and keepeth them vnder obedience: in like maner, the gouernment of the popish church is committed to one man, who as chiefe steward, ouerseer and ruler of Christs houshold in his absence, hath supreme power ouer all churches, to moderat and direct all the affaires thereof. But heere standeth the difference, in ciuill policy he is called a king or prince: here he is called a pope.

Secular nobilitie compared with ecclesiastical nobilitie.

The king hath next vnto him his dukes and earles: the popes nobilitie standeth in his cardinals & legats, who though they be no dukes in name, yet in pompe and pride will not only giue checke to them, but also mate to kings themselues, if they might be suffered, as did Theodorus, Lanfrancus, Anselmus, Thomas Becket, and so would Thomas Wolsey haue done, had not the king giuen him a necke to his mate betime. In ciuill policie next to dukes and earles followeth the order of lords, barons, knights, esquires, gentlemen, with maiors, shiriffes, constables, bailiffes, wardens, &c. The like race is to be seene also, although vnder other names, in the popes policie: of primats, bishops, suffragans, prouosts, deans, canons, vicars, archdeacons, priests, deacons, subdeacons, acolyts, exorcists, lectors, doorekeepers, singlers, with other clerks. And as in the other vnder wardens commeth the order of scauingers: so neither doth the popes monarchy lacke his chanelrakers, to whom may well be compared the rablement of abbats, prouincials, priors, monks, friers, with their couents, and nunries.

Ciuill magistrats compared with ecclesiasticall.

Officers of the temporall court compared with the officers of the spirituall court.

Moreouer, from iustices, iudges, lawyers, sergeants, attorneies, which be necessarie officers in the common wealth, what differeth the popes inquisitors, canonists, doctors, and bachelors of the popes law, commissaries, officials, proctors, promotors, with such others, which serue no lesse in spiritual court, and in the consistory, then the other aforesaid do in temporal court, or in Guildhall? Now who so list to compare the glorie & magnificence of the one, with the glorie of the other: also the power and strength of the one regiment, with the power of the other: and so the riches of the one, with ỳ riches of the other; I suppose he shall see no great ods betweene them both, taking the popes kingdome, as it hath stood in his full ruffe, and yet doth stand where churches are not reformed. As for subtiltie and politike practise, there is no man that doubteth that is indifferent, nor that seeth not that hath his eies, but that the popes hierachie in holding vp their state, far excelleth al the kingdomes of worldly princes, of whom all other may take example to learne.

Glorie compared.

Power compared.

Riches compared.

Subtiltie compared.

Thus in comparing the popes regiment with ciuil gouernance, as they doe little or nothing disagree asunder: so in comparing again the same with the order of scriptures, or with the regiment that was in the old ancient church of Rome, we shall see no resemblance betweene them. As we read in the apostles time, all the armour of Christs ministers was spirituall and full of godly power against the spiritual enemies of our saluation, gouerning the church then with peace, patience, humilitie, true knowledge of God, the sword of the spirit, the shield of faith, the brestplate of righteousnesse, hartie charitie, sincere faith, and a good conscience: so after the apostles in the time of Ambrose, by his owne testimonie is to be vnderstood, that the armour of churchmen was then, Preces & lachrymæ, prayers and teares: where now the armour of the popes priesthood is nothing els but Ignis & ferrum, fire and sword, wherewith they keepe all things vnder their subiection. And heere commeth the enorme and horrible abuse of excommunication, suspension, and interdiction in cases friuolous, or worldly, and for such as for which the ciuill magistrat will not commit any citizens to the stocks, the popes censure will not sticke to commit a christian to the diuell: not to speake of their other vsurped dealings

The difference betweene the popes regiment and the order of the primitiue church.

The popes gouerning in matters to them not pertaining.

and doings in matters, that belong to the ciuill sword, and be to them impertinent. As in punishing whordome and adulterie, in administration and probats of testaments, in bearing ciuill office, as popes to be senators of Rome, and emperour also Sed vacante, : cardinals to be captains in war, and rulers of regions: bishops to be presidents or chancellors, priests to bee stewards in great mens houses, or masters of mints, or clerks of the market, or gardiners to gentlemen, &c. All which here I ouerpasse, referring them to the deeper consideration of such as haue more leisure to marke the order of their doings, and so to iudge of the same with indifferencie, according to the rule of truth, touched with Gods word, and publike examples of the ancient church of Christ in the primitiue time.

The corrupt doctrine of the popes church examined and detected.

Thus hauing discoursed sufficiently so much as concerneth the manner of life, tittle, iurisdiction, & gouernment of the popes see (in al which points is to be seene how this latter church of Rome hath receded from the trus ancient church of Rome) now remaineth, according to my promise, and order prefixed, consequently to proceed to the fourth and last point, which is of doctrine: wherein consisteth the chiefest matter that maketh with vs and against them, in such sort as (their doctrin standing as it doth) neither they are to be reputed for true catholiks, being altered so far from them: nor we otherwise then heretiks if we should now ioine with these. For the more triall whereof, let vs examine the doctrine and rites of the said church of Rome now vsed, and compare the same with the teaching of the ancient catholiks, to the intent that such simple soules as haue been hitherto, & yet are seduced by the false colour and image of this pretensed and bastardlie church, perceiuing what lieth within it, may be warned betime, either to eschew the perill, if they list to be instructed: or if not, to blame none but themselues for their owne wilfull destruction. And albeit I could here charge the newfangled church of the pope with seuen or eight hainous crimes, as blasphemie, idolatrie, heresie, superstition, absurditie, vanitie, crueltie, and contrarietie (as which neither agreeth with the old learning of their fore-elders, nor yet with themselues in sundrie points) yet after a more temperate sort to passe this matter with them, these two things I will and dare boldly affirme, that in this doctrine of the pope now taught in the church of Rome, is neither any consolation of conscience, nor saluation of mans soule. For seeing there is no life nor soules health but only in Christ, nor any promise of saluation or comfort made, but onelie by faith in the sonne of God: what assurance then can there be of perfect peace, life, or saluation, where that which onelie maketh all, is least made of, and other things which make least are most esteemed? For to say the simple truth, what els is the whole course and body of the popes law now set forth, but a doctrine of lawes, a heape of ceremonies, a teaching of traditions, a meditation of merits, a foundation of new religions? all which confer not one iot to the iustification of our soules before the terrible iudgement of God.

The false image of the popes church.

No comfort nor saluation in the popes doctrine now taught.

The scope and summe of the popes doctrine whither it tendeth.

And therefore (as it may be trulie said) this doctrine of the pope to be void of all true comfort and saluation: so likewise it seemeth that these which addict themselues so deuoutly to the popes learning, were neuer earnestly afflicted in conscience, neuer humbled in spirit nor broken in heart, neuer entred into any serious feeling of Gods iudgement, nor euer felt the strength of the law and of death. For if they had, they should soone haue seene their owne weakenesse and be driuen to Christ: then should they haue seene what a horrible thing it is to appeare before God the father, or once to thinke on him (as Luther saith) without Christ. And on the contrarie side, then should they know what a glorie, what a kingdome, what libertie and life it were to be in Christ Iesus by faith, holding their inheritance, not with the bondsonne of Agar, but with the free sonne of Sara: by promise, and not by the law: by grace, and not by works: by gift, and not by deseruing: that God onely might be praised, and not man.

Papists neuer lightly afflicted in conscience deepely.

An horrible thing to thinke of God without Christ. Luther.

The right faith of the old Romans. Cornelius, a Roman first baptised of all the gentils.

And thus were the old Romans first taught by S. Paul writing to the Romans. The same did Cornelius the Roman, and first that was baptised of all the gentils, learne of S. Peter when he receiued the holy ghost, not by the deeds of the law, but onely by hearing the faith of Iesus preached. And in the same doctrine, the said church of the Romans many yeeres continued, so long as they were in affliction. And in the same doctrine, the bishop of Rome with his Romans now also should still remaine, if they were such ancient catholiks as they pretend, & would follow the old mother church of Rome, and hold the first liquor wherwith they were first seasoned. But the sweet verdor and sent of that liquor and pleasant must is now cleane put out through other vnsauorie infusions of the popes thrusting in; so that almost no taste nor peece remaineth of all that primitiue doctrine, which S. Paul and other apostles first planted among the gentils. And what maruell if the Romans now in so long tract of time haue lost their first sap, seeing the church of the Galathians then in the very time of S. Paul their scholemaster, he being amongst them, had not so soone turned his backe a little, but they were all turned almost from the doctrine of faith, and had much adoe to be recouered againe?

The church of Rome hath lost the liquor wherewith it was first seasoned.

The Galathians almost gone from faith in S. Pauls time.

Of this defection and falling from faith, S. Paul expressly foretelleth vs in his letters both to the Thessalonians, and also to Timothie, where he sheweth, that a defection shall come, and that certaine shall depart from the faith, attending to spirits of error, &c. 1. Tim. 4. And to know what errors these shall be, the circumstance plainely leadeth vs to vnderstand in the same place, where the said apostle speaketh of marked consciences, forbidding men to marrie, and to eate meates ordained of God to be taken with thanksgiuing, for mans sustenance, most euidently as with his finger, pointeth out vnto vs the church of Rome, which not in these points onely but also in all other conditions almost is vtterly reuolted from the pure originall sinceritie of that doctrine, which S. Paul planted in the church of the Romans, and of all other gentils.

1. Tim. 4.

The summe of S. Pauls doctrine deliuered to the gentiles.

A briefe summe of S. Pauls doctrine deliuered to the gentiles.

1 FIrst, the doctrine of S. Paul ascribeth all our iustification freely and merely to faith onely in Christ as to the only meanes and cause immediat, whereby the merits of Christs passion be applied vnto vs, without any other respect of worke or works of the law, what soeuer: and in this doctrine the church of the Romans was first planted.

Saluation by mercie onely, and not by merits.

2 Secondly, the same doctrine of S. Paul cutting off & excluding all glorie of mans deseruing, stayeth onely vpon Gods promise and vpon grace, not mans merits: vpon mercie, not mans labouring or running: vpon election and calling, not mans willing, &c.

All flesh concluded vnder sinne.

3 Thirdly, the same doctrine casting downe the strength of man and his Integra naturalia (as the schooles doe terme them) concludeth all flesh vnder sinne, and maketh the same destitute of the glorie of God.

Difference betweene the law and the gospell.

4 Item, it maketh manifest difference betweene the law and the gospell, declaring the vse and end of them to be diuers: the one to kill, the other to quicken; the one to condemne, the other to iustifie; the one to haue an end and a time, the other to be perpetuall, &c.

Iustitia Dei. Iustitia propria.

5 Item, the same doctrine of S. Paul, as it sheweth a difference betweene the law and the gospell; so it maketh no lesse difference betweene Iustitia Dei, & Iustitia propria: that is, the righteousnes of God and the righteousnes of man, abhorring the one, that is, mans owne righteousnes, comming by the law and works; and embracing the other which God imputeth freelie and gratiouslie to vs for Christ his sonnes sake, in whom we beleeue.

The righteousnesse of God, and the righteousnes of man how they differ in scripture.

6 Item, it wipeth away all traditions, and constitutions of men what soeuer, especially from binding of conscience, calling them beggerlie elements of this world.

A true christian knoweth nothing but Christ crucified.

7 Likewise it reiecteth and wipeth away all curious subtilties, and superfluous speculations, and knoweth nothing else but Christ onely crucified, which is onely the obiect whereunto our faith looketh.

All men condemned by one. All men saued by one. Originall sinne, originall iustice.

8 Furthermore, as the same doctrin of S. Paul defineth all men to bee transgressours by disobedience of one Adam, though they neuer touched the apple, comming of his stock by nature; so doth it proue all men to be iustified by the obedience of one, though they did not his obedience, being likewise borne of him by spirituall regeneration and faith.

9 And therefore as all men comming of Adam be condemned originallie, before they grow vp to commit any sinne against the law: so all men be saued originallie being regenerated by faith in Christ, before they begin to doe any good worke of charitie, or any other good deed.

Rom. 5. Rom. 8.

10 Item, the doctrine of S. Paul perpending the high glorie of a christian mans state in Christ Iesus by faith, first setteth him in a perfect peace with almightie God. Rom. 5. Secondlie, exempteth him from all condemnation. Rom. 8. Thirdlie, it matcheth him with angels, it equalleth him with saints and fellow citizens of heauen, it numbereth him with the houshold of God, and inheriteth him with Iesus Christ himselfe. Ephes. 2. Fourthlie, it adopteth him from the state of a seruant, to the state of the sonne of God, crying Abba father. Gal. 4. Fiftly, it openeth to him a bold accesse and entrance to the high maiestie and throne of grace. Ephes. 2. Heb. 4. Sixtly, it subiecteth all things vnder him, as ministers, yea, the apostles themselues in their highest office, death, life, things present, things to come, with the whole world besides, and assigneth him no spirituall head, but onely Christ, saying, And you are Christs, and Christ is Gods. 1. Cor. 3. Seuenthly, it aduanceth & setteth him in a spirituall libertie or freedome, aboue all terrors of spirit, rising either of Gods law or mans law, aboue all dreadfull feares of sinne, damnation, malediction, reiection, death, hell, or purgatorie: aboue all seruile bondage of ceremonies, mens precepts, traditions, superstitious vices, yokes, customes, or what else soeuer oppresseth & intangleth the spirituall freedome of a conscience which Christ hath set at libertie; & requireth moreouer that we walke and stand stout in that libertie with the free sonne of Sara, whereto we are brought, and not suffer our selues any more to be clogged with any such seruill bondage: that is to meane, although we must be content to subiect our bodies to al seruice and to all men, yet that we yeeld not our spirituall consciences and soules as slaues and seruants to be subiect to the feare or bondage of any terrene thing in this world, for so much as 11 Item, the right veine of S. Pauls doctrine putteth no difference nor obseruation in daies and times. Gal.4. Col.2.

Daies and times indifferent.

12 Item, it leaueth all meats to be indifferent, with thankesgiuing, to serue the necessitie of the bodie, and not the bodie to serue them. Col.2. 1.Tim.4.

Meates indifferent with thankesgiuing.

13 Item, it permitteth marriage without restraint or exception, lawfull and also expedient for all men, hauing need thereof. 1.Cor.7.

Marriage lawfull for all men.

14 Item, it admitteth no sacrifice for sinne but the sacrifice of Christ alone, and that done once for all with bloud. For without bloud there is no remission of sinne, which only is applied to vs by faith, and by nothing else. Heb.9.

One sacrifice for sinne and no more. Heb.9.

15 Item, as touching the holy communion, by the letters of S. Paul to the Corinth. 11. we vnderstand, that the vse then amongst them was, to haue the participation of the bread called the Lords bodie, & of the cup called the Lords blood administred not at an altar, but at a plaine board or table, the congregation there meeting together after the time of their supper, where not the minister alone did receiue and the other looked one; but the whole congregation together did communicate with reuerence and thanksgiuing, not lifting ouer the priests head, nor worshipping, nor kneeling, nor knocking their breasts, but either sitting at the supper, or standing after the supper. According to which forme the Vulcounts yet to this day following the old rite of the countrie (although being drowned otherwise in much superstition) vse to receiue it after they bee risen from their dinner standing. Experience whereof was seene here at London the first day of October 1569.

The vse of the holie communion in ancient time of the primitiue church.

16 Item, the said apostle, besides the sacramentall supper maketh mention of baptisme, or washing of regeneration, although he himselfe baptised but few: 1.Cor.1. of the other sacraments he maketh no mention.

No mo sacraments mentioned in S. Paul but the Lords supper and baptisme.

17 Item, by the same doctrine of S. Paul, no tongue is to be vsed in the congregation, which is not knowne and doth not edifie. 1.Cor.14.

18 Item. the rule of S. Pauls doctrine subiecteth euerie creature vnder the obedience of kings and princes and ordinarie magistrats, ordained of God to haue the sword and authoritie of publike regiment, to order and dispose in all things not contrarie to God, whatsoeuer pertaineth to the maintenance of the good, or to the correction of the euill: from whose iurisdiction there is no exemption of vocations of persons, whether they be ecclesiasticall or politicall. And therefore to this office appertaineth to preserue peace, to set things in lawfull order, to conserue christian discipline in the church of Christ, to remoue offenses, to bridle the disobedient, to prouide and procure wholesome and faithfull teachers ouer the people, to maintaine learning and set vp schooles, to haue ouersight not onelie of the people, but also of all ecclesiasticall ministers, to see to euery one to doe his dutie, and to remoue or punish such as be negligent: also to call councels and synods, and to prouide the church goods to be faithfully dispensed by the hands of true dealers, to the sustentation of the church, of true teachers, and to the publike necessitie of the poore, &c.

The authoritie and office of the ciuil magistrates.

19 Furthermore, by S. Pauls doctrine, the ministers and superintendents of Christs church haue their authoritie and armour likewise to them limited, which armour is onely spirituall and not carnall, whereby they fight not against flesh and bloud, but against the power of darkenes, errour, and sin; against the spirituall seduction and craftinesse in heauenlie things, against the works and proceedings of Satan the prince of this world, in comforting weake consciences against the terrors of the diuell, and desperation, and finally against euerie cogitation lifted vp against Christ, to subdue euery celsitude to the subiection and power of Christ Iesu the sonne of God.

The office and authoritie of bishops how farre it doth extend.

Another breefe recapitulation of the same.

Another briefe recapitulation of S. Pauls doctrine reduced to fiue points.

BRiefly and in a compendious sum to reduce the whole doctrine of S. Paul, in these fiue points chiefly it consisteth.

1 First, in setting foorth the grace, great loue and good will, and free promises of God the Father in Christ Iesus his sonne to mankind, which so loued the world, that he hath giuen his owne sonne for the redemption thereof. 1. Ioh.3. Which gaue his sonne to die for vs being his enemies. Rom.5. Which hath quickned vs being dead in sinne, Ephes.2. Which so mercifullie hath reconciled the world to himselfe by his sonne, and also by his ambassadors desireth vs to be reconciled vnto him. 2.Cor.5. Who hath giuen his owne sonne to be sinne for vs. 2.Cor.5. To be accursed for vs. Gal.2. Which by firme promise hath assured vs of our inheritance. Rom.4. Which not by the works of righteousnesse that we haue done, but of his owne mercie hath saued vs by the washing of regeneration. Tit.3.

Iohn 3. Rom.5. Ephes.2. The great mercie of God in Christ. Gal 3. 2 Cor.5. Rom.5. Tit.3.

2 The second point consisteth in preaching and expressing the glorious and triumphant maiestie of Christ Iesus the sonne of God, and the excellencie of his glorie, who being once dead in the infirmitie of flesh, rose againe with power, ascending vp with maiestie, hath led away captiuitie captiue. Eph.4. sitteth and raigneth in glorie on the right hand of God in heauenlie things aboue all principats and potestates, powers and dominations, and aboue euery name that is named, not onely in this world, but also in the world to come, Ephes. 1. In whose name euery knee hath to bend both in heauen and in earth, and vnder the earth, and euery tongue to confesse our Lord Christ Iesus to be of the glorie of God the Father. Phil.2. In whom and by whom all things are made both in heauen and in earth, things visible and inuisible, whether they be thrones or dominations, or principats, or potestats, all are by him and for him created, and he is before all, and all things consist in him, who is the head of his bodie the church, the beginning and first borne from the dead, in whom dwelleth all fulnesse. Col.1. To whom the Father hath giuen al iudgement, and iudgeth no man himselfe any more. Iohn 5. To whom the Father hath giuen all things to his hands. Iohn 13. To whom the Father hath giuen power of all flesh. Iohn 17. To whom all power is giuen in heauen and in earth. Mat.vlt. In whom be all the promises of God Eft & Amen. 2.Cor.1.

Who by death hath destroied him which had the power of death, that is, the diuell, and hath deliuered them which liued vnder feare of death all their life in bondage. Heb.2. By whose obedience we are made iust: by whose righteousnesse we are iustified to life. Rom.5. By whose curse we are blessed, and deliuered from the malediction of the law. Gal.3. By whose bloud we that once were far off, are made neere vnto God. Ephes.5. Who in one bodie hath reconciled both Iewes and Gentils vnto God. Eph.2. Who by his flesh hath taken away the diuision and separation betweene God and vs, abolishing the law which was set against vs in precepts and decrees. Ephes. 2. Who is our peace, our aduocat, and propitiation for the sinnes of the whole world. 1.Iohn 2. Who was made accursed, and sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. 2.Cor.5. Who is made of God for vs, our wisdome and righteousnesse and sanctification, and redemption. 1.Cor.1. By whom wee haue boldnesse and entrance with all confidence through faith in him. Ephes.3. Who forgiueth all our sinnes, and hath torne in peeces the obligation or handwriting, which was against vs in the law of commandements, and hath crucified it vpon the crosse, and vtterly hath dispatched and abolished the same, and hath spoiled principats and potestats, as in an open shew of conquest, triumphing ouer them openly in himselfe. Col. 2. Who iustifieth the wicked by faith. Rom.4. In whom we are made full and complet. Col.2. &c.

The third branch. The vertue and effect of Christs death, and what exceeding benefits proceed thereof. Ephes.1. Esay 53. Colos.1. Rom.5. 1.Tim.1. Heb.2. Rom.5. Gal.3. Ephes.2. 1.Iohn 2. 2.Cor.5. 1.Cor.1. Ephes.3. Colos.2. Rom.4. Colos.2.

4 The fourth branch is, to teach and informe vs (to whom these benefits of Christs passion and victorie doe appertaine) by what meanes the same is applied and redoundeth vnto vs: which meanes is onely one, that is, onely faith in Christ Iesu, and no other thing. Which faith it pleaseth almightie God, to accept for righteousnesse. And this righteousnesse it is, which onely standeth before God, and none other, as we are plainelie taught by the scriptures, and especiallie by the doctrine of S. Paul. Which righteousnesse thus rising of faith in Christ, S. Paul calleth the righteousnesse of God, where he speaketh of himselfe, vtterly refusing the other righteousnesse which is of the law, that they might be found in him, not hauing his owne righteousnesse which is of the law, but the righteousnesse of Christ, which is of faith. Phil.3. Againe, the said apostle writing of the Iewes, which sought for righteousnesse and found it not; and also of the Gentiles, which sought not for it, and yet found it, sheweth the reason why: Because (saith he) the one sought it as by works and the law, and came not to it, who not knowing the righteousnesse of God, and seeking to set vp their owne righteousnesse, did not submit themselues to the righteousnesse which is of God. The other, which were the Gentils, and sought not for it, obtained righteousnesse, that righteousnesse, which is of faith, &c. Rom.9. Also in another place, S. Paul in the same epistle writing of this righteousnesse which commeth of faith, calleth it the righteousnesse of God, in these words: Whom God (saith he) hath set vp for a propitiation by faith in his bloud, whereby to make manifest the righteousnes which is of himselfe in tolerating our sins, &c. Rom.3. By the which righteousnesse it is euident that saint Paul meaneth the righteousnes of faith, which almightie God now reuealeth and maketh manifest by preaching of the gospell. Wilt thou see yet more plainely this righteousnesse of God how it is taken in saint Paul, for the righteousnesse of faith, and therefore is called the righteousnesse of God, because it is imputed only of God to faith, and not deserued of man? In the same epistle to the Romans and in the third chapter aforesaid, his words be manifest: The righteousnesse of God (saith he) is by faith of Iesus Christ, in all, and vpon all that doe beleeue, &c.

Wherefore whosoeuer studieth to be accepted with God and to be found righteous in his sight, let him learne diligently by the doctrine of saint Paul to make a difference and a separation, as farre as from heauen and earth, betweene these two; that that is betweene the righteousnesse of workes, and righteousnesse of faith: & in any wise beware he bring no other meanes for his iustification, or remission of his sinnes, but only faith apprehending the bodie or person of Christ Iesus crucified. For as there is no way into the house but by the dore, so is there no comming to God but by Christ alone, which is by faith. And as the mortall bodie, without bodily sustenance of bread & drinke cannot but perish: so the spirituall soule of man hath no other refreshing but onely by faith in the bodie and bloud of Christ, wherby to be saued. With this faith the idolatrous gentiles apprehended Iesus Christ, & receiued thereby righteousnes. Cornelius (the first baptised Romane) so soone as he heard Peter preach Christ, receiued straightway the holy ghost. Peter himselfe confessed, and for his confession had the keies of heauen. Matth. 16. Zacheus receiued the person of Christ into his house, and withall receiued saluation both to him and his whole household. Luk. 19. What a sinner was Marie, which had no lesse in her than seuen diuels, and yet because she set her heart and affection vpon that person, many sinnes were forgiuen her. Luk. 7. The right hand theefe, how farre was he from all workes of the law, and yet by faith entred he iustified into paradise the same day with Christ, Luke. 23. In like manner, although the pore publicane came to the church with lesse holinesse after the law, yet went he home to his house more iustified than the pharisee with all his works, and al by reason of faith. Luk. 18. The parable of the prodigall sonne which was lost, yet reuined againe; also of the lost groate, and of the lost sheepe which went astray and was found againe, what doe these declare but that which is lost by the law, to be recouered by faith and grace? And how oft doe we reade in the gospels: Thy faith hath saued thee, &c. Iesus seeing their beleefe, &c. He that beleeueth in me, I will raise him vp in the last day, &c. Beleeue also in me, &c. He that beleeueth in me hath euerlasting life, &c. Without me yee can doe nothing, &c. He that is in me, &c. He that loueth me, &c. He that heareth me, &c. He that abideth in me, &c. He that receiueth me, &c. Vnlesse ye eat my flesh and drinke my bloud, &c. That they may receiue remission of sinnes by their faith in me, &c. Act. 26. To him all the prophets giue witnes, to haue remission of sinnes, whosoeuer beleeueth in his name, &c. Act. 10. He that beleeueth and is baptised. Matth. vlt. And likewise in the writings of saint Paul, how often doe wee heare the name of Christ, almost in euery third or fourth line, where he still repeateth: In Christo Iesu, per Christum Iesum, per Iesum Christum Dominum nostrum, &c. Qui credunt in ipso, &c. Omnes qui credunt in eo, &c. Credentes illo, in eum, credentes illi, in nomen eius, in nomine Domini nostri Iesu Christi, &c. Beleeue (saith saint Paul to the gailer) in the Lord Iesus, and thou shalt be saued & thy whole house, &c. Act. 16.

The writings of S. Paul full of the name of Christ Iesus.
Beleefe only in Christ saueth.
Acts 16.

Thus then thou seest, as the passion of Christ is only the efficient or personall cause immediat of our saluation: so is faith ony the instrumentall or meane cause that maketh the merits of Christ to vs auailable. For as the passion of Christ serueth to none but such as do beleeue: so neither doth faith (as it is onely a bare qualitie or action in mans mind) it selfe iustifie, vnlesse it be directed to the bodie of Christ crucified, as to his obiect, of whom it receiueth all his vertue. And therefore these two must alwaies ioyntlie concurre together, faith, and Christ Iesus crucified. As for example, when the children of Israel were bid of Moses to looke vp to the brasen serpent, neither could the serpent haue helped them, except they had looked vp; nor yet their looking vpward haue profited them, vnlesse they had directed their eies vpon the said serpent, as the onely obiect set vp to the same purpose for them to behold. So our faith in like case directed to the bodie of Iesus our sauiour, is onelie the meanes whereby Christs merits are applied vnto vs, and we now iustified before God, according to the doctrine of saint Paul, who in expresse words, defining to vs what this faith is, and how it iustifieth, saith: If thou shalt confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, and beleeue with thy hart that God raised him from death, thou shalt be saued, &c. Rom. 10. Besides this, what action or qualitie soeuer is in man, either hope, charitie, or any other kind of faith and beleeuing, be it neuer so true, except it apprehend this obiect (which is) the body of Christ, the sonne of God, it serueth not to iustification. And that is the cause why we adde this particle (onely) to faith, and say that faith onely in Christ iustifieth vs, to exclude all other actions, qualities, gifts, or works of man, from the cause of iustifying; forsomuch as there is no other knowledge nor gift giuen of God to man, be it neuer so excellent, that can stand before the iudgement of God vnto iustification, or whereunto any promise of saluation is annexed; but onely this faith looking vp to the brasen serpent, that is, to the bodie of Christ Iesus for vs crucified.

Thrist the onlie obiect of faith which iustifieth.

What faith is by S. Paul.
Rom. 10.
Faith only.

As for example, when the Turke saith, that he beleeueth in one liuing God that made heauen and earth, his beleefe therein is true, yet it iustifieth him not, because it lacketh the right obiect, which is Christ. So when the Iew saith, that he beleeueth in one God maker of heauen and earth, and beleeueth also the same God to be omnipotent, merciful, iust, and true of promise, and that he hath elected the seed of Abraham: true it is that he beleeueth, and yet all this serueth him not, because Christ the sonne of God is not ioyned withall. And though the said Iew should bee neuer so deuout in his prayers, or charitable in almes, or precise in keeping the law, and beleeued neuer so stedfastly that he is elect to be saued: yet he is neuer the nearer to saluation for all this, so long as his faith is not grounded vpon the head corner stone, which is the person and bodie of Christ Iesus the true sauiour. After like sort it may bee said of the papist, when he saith that he is baptised, & beleeueth in the father, the sonne, and the holy ghost, three persons and one God, and also confesseth Iesus Christ to be the sonne of God, which died for our sinnes, and rose againe for our righteousnesse, &c: his beleefe therein is true, and indeede would saue him, if he did stay his saluation in this faith, and vpon Christ his sauiour onely, according to the promise and grace of God, and goe no further. But that he doth not: for neither doth he admit Christ only to be his perfect sauiour without the helpe of the patrons, heads, aduocats, and mediatours, nor yet permitteth his faith in Christ onely to be the meanes of his iustification, but setteth vp other by-meanes, as hope, charity, sacrifice of the masse, confession, penance, satisfaction, merits, and pardons, supposing thereby to worke his iustification before God, contrarie to the word of promise, to the gospell of grace, and to the doctrine of saint Paul, whereof we shall see more (the Lord willing) hereafter.

Diuers sorts of beleeuing.

Euery truth may be beleeued, but the beleeuing of euery truth saueth not.

Onely.
Hope and charitie be no parts of our iustification, nor causes to make the merits of Christ ours.

And thus much of the true causes of our iustification after the doctrine of S. Paul. Concerning which causes this distinction furthermore by the way is to be added, that as touching the originall causes of our saluation, which be diuers & sundrie, some are externall, & without vs: some are internall, & within vs. Of the externall causes which are without vs, the first and principall is the mercie and grace of God. Of this followeth predestination and election. Then commeth vocation. The last and next cause to vs is the death and bloudshed of Christ whereby we are redeemed, and all these be externall causes, because they are without vs. Of internall causes that be in man thorough the gift of God, there is but one, & no more in scripture appointed, that is, our faith in Christ, which is the gift of God in vs. Besides this, there is no gift of God giuen to man, vertue, worke, merit, nor any thing else, that is any part or cause of saluation, but onelie this gift of faith, to beleeue in Christ Iesu. And this is the cause why we hold that faith only iustifieth, meaning, that amongst all the works, deeds, actions, labours, and operations, what soeuer man doth, or can do, there is nothing in man that worketh saluation, but onelie his faith giuen to him of God to beleeue in Christ his sonne, following therein the trade of saint Pauls teaching: who in precise words so ascribeth iustification to faith, that he excludeth all other actions of man, and works of the law. And therefore in the same epistle to the Romans, Saint Paul reasoning of the glorie of iustifying, asketh this question, how this glorie is excluded: whether by the law of works? And concludeth, not ascribing only the glorie thereof to the law of faith, and consequently vpon the same he inferreth: Colligimus enim iustificari hominem per fidem sine operibus legis: We hold that a man is iustified by faith without the deeds of the law.

The meaning and cause why faith only iustifieth.
All works of man excluded from the glorie of iustifying.

And how then can that be accounted for any part of our iustification, which S. Paul vtterlie debarreth and excludeth in that behalfe? Of which like exclusiues & negatiues the whole course of S. Pauls doctrine is full, where he still concludeth: Sine operibus, absque operibus legis, non ex operibus, Dei donum est; secundum misericordiam; non ex operibus, ne quis glorietur, Eph. 2. Non ex operibus iustitiæ quæ fecimus nos, sed secundùm propositum suum & gratiam, &c. Tit. 3. Non secundum opera nostra, &c. Tim. 1. That is to say, It is the gift of God, not of works, that no man should glorie, &c. Not of the works of righteousnes, which we haue done, but of his owne mercie, &c. Not after our works, but after his own purpose, and grace which is giuen to vs, &c. Againe, Gal. 2. Non iustificatur homo ex operibus, &c. That is, A man is not iustified by works &c. Item, Ei qui non operatur, credenti autem in eum qui iustificat impium, fides imputatur ad iustitiam, &c. Rom. 4. To him that worketh not, but believeth in him which iustifieth the wicked, his faith is imputed to righteousnesse, &c. By these exclusiues and negatiues in S. Pauls doctrine, what doth he else meane, but vtterlie to seclude all kind of mans merits, and works of the law from the office and dignitie of iustifying? And although he expresseth not the word, Onely: yet vpon his exclusiues & negatiues, this exceptiue must needs be inferred. For in all logike the consequent is necessarie and formall; as, One man is suffered to come into the house, and no person else is suffered but one: Ergo one man only is suffered to enter into the house. And thus much concerning faith in Christ, proued to be the onely meane, or instrumentall, or conditionall cause of our saluation, and no other besides the same alone, by the doctrine of S. Paul taught to the ancient Romans.

5 The fifth branch, which I note in S. Pauls doctrine, is this: that after he hath thus established vs in certaintie of our saluatiõ through faith in Christ, then after that, he exhorteth vs behementlie and with all instance of good works, shewing the true vse and end of good works: which is, first to shew our obedience and dutifull seruice (as we may) vnto God, who hath done so great things for vs. Secondly, to releeue our neighbors with our charitie and kindnes, as God hath bin kind to vs his enemies. Thirdly, or stir vp others by our example, to praise God, to embrace the same religion, & to doe the like. For requisit it is, that as God hath bin so mercifull to vs and gratious in eternall gifts, we should be mercifull likewise to other in temporall commodities. And seeing it hath pleased him of his fatherly goodnesse (of our parts so little deserued) to call vs to so high a vocation, to giue the bloud of his sonne for vs, to forgiue vs all our sinnes, to deliuer vs from this present wicked world, to make vs citizens of heauen, yea his children more than seruants: little then can we doe, and well may we thinke those benefits ill bestowed, if we forgiue not our neighbors, and shew some thing againe worthie that holy calling wherewith he hath called vs, in mortifying our worldly lusts here, and studying after heauenly things: and finally if we being prouoked with such loue and kindnesse, render not againe some loue for loue, some kindnesse for kindnes, seeking how to walke in the steps which he hath prepared for vs to walke in, seruing him (so much as we may) in holines and righteousnes all the daies of our life. And though our obedience shall alwaies be imperfect, doe the best we can: yet reason would that some obedience we should shew, as louing children to such a louing father.

Good works iustifie not, but follow the iustified.

And this is the cause why S. Paul is so vehement and vrgent to cal vpon good works, not that works should iustifie, but that we being iustified so mercifullie and tenderly through his grace, should not abuse his grace in vaine, but endeuour our selues to our vttermost to render our seruice againe to him, in such conuersation of life as may most make to his glorie, and profit of our neighbour. And though the words of our sauiour seeme in some places to attribute to our obedience and charitie here in earth, great rewards in heauen, that is of his owne free grace and goodnesse so to impute small matters for great deserts, and not for vs to claime any méed thereby or thanke at his hand, as by any worthines of our doings: no more than the seruant, when hee commeth from the plough and seruing the cattell in the field, serueth first his maister at home and watteth vpon his table: the maister is not bound (saith Christ) to thanke his seruant therefore, and bid him sit downe: So you (saith he) when you haue done that is commanded you, say yee are vnprofitable seruants: yee haue done but what your bound dutie was to doe. Luke 17.

Luke 17.

Againe, here also is to be vnderstood, that where such rewards be ascribed vnto mens deeds, it is not for the worthines of the déed it selfe, but for the faith of the doer, which faith maketh the worke to be good in Gods sight: for else if an infidell should doe the same worke that the christian doth, it were nothing but meere sinne before God. In that therefore the christian mans worke is accepted be it neuer so small (as to giue a cup of cold water) the same is onely for his faith sake that doth it, and not for the worke which is done. Whereby againe we may learne how faith onely doth iustifie a man, and that three manner of waies.

Faith iustifieth three manner of waies.

First, it iustifieth the person in making him accepted, and the child of God by regeneration, before he begin to doe any good worke.

Secondly, it iustifieth a man from sin, in procuring remission and forgiuenesse of the same.

Thirdly, it iustifieth the good déeds and works of man, not onelie in bringing foorth good fruites, but also in making the same works to be good and acceptable in the sight of God, which otherwise were impure and execrable in his sight.

The office of faith, and the office of the law compared together.

The office therefore of faith and works is diuers, and must not be confounded. Faith first goeth before, and regenerateth a man to God, and iustifieth him in the sight of God, both in couering his ill déeds, and in making his good déeds acceptable to God, climing vp to heauen, and there wrestling with God and his iudgement for righteousnesse, for saluation, and for euerlasting life. Works and charitie follow faith, and are exercised here vpon the earth, and glorieth onely before man, but not before God, in shewing foorth obedience both to God and to man.

The works of man be imperfect and therefore haue nothing to doe with iustificatiō.

Further then this our good works doe not reach, nor haue any thing to doe in the iudgement of God touching saluation. I speake of our good works (as S. Paul speaketh, Rom. 7.) as they be ours and imperfect. For else if our works could be perfect according to the perfection of the law, as Christ wrought them in the perfection of his flesh; that is, if we could perfect them, as it is said: Qui fecerit ea viuet in eis. But now seeing the imbecillitie of our flesh cannot attaine thereto, it followeth thereof that all glorie of iustifying is taken from works, and transferred onelie to faith.

And thus much concerning the principall contents of S. Pauls doctrine. Wherein the church of the ancient Romans first was grounded and planted, and so continued in the same, or at least did not much alter, during the primitiue state of the church. Likewise the same forme of doctrine the latter Romans also that followed should haue maintained, and not haue fallen away for any mans preaching, but hold him accursed, yea if he were an apostle or angell from heauen, teaching any other doctrine besides that institutiō which they haue receiued. Gal. 1.

Gal. 1.

for so were they warned before by the apostle S. Paul, to doe. And yet notwithstanding all this forewarning and diligent instruction of this blessed apostle of the gentiles, what a defection of faith is fallen among the gentiles, especially among the Romans, whereof the said apostle also foretold them so long before, foreprophesying: That the day of the Lord shall not come, except there come a defection before, and that the man of sinne should be reuealed, the proud aduersarie of God, &c. The. 2. meaning (no doubt) by this defection, a departing and a falling from that faith which the holy ghost had then planted by his ministerie among the gentils. As we see it now come to passe in the church of Rome. Which church is so gone from the faith that S. Paul taught, that if he were now aliue, and saw these decrees and decretals of the bishop of Rome, these heapes of ceremonies and traditions, these masse bookes, these portesses, these festiuals and legends, these processionals, hymnes and sequences, these beads and graduals, and the maner of their inuocation, their canons, censures and latter councels, such swarms of superstitious monks and friers, such sects of so many diuers religions, the testament of S. Francis, the rule of S. Benedict, of S. Brigit, of S. Anthonie, &c: the intricat subtilties and labyrinths of the schoolemen, the infinit cases and distinctions of the canonists, the sermons in churches, the assertions in schooles, the glorie of the pope, the pride of the clergie, the crueltie of persecuting prelats with their officials and promotors: he would say this were not a defection, but rather a plaine destruction and a ruine of faith; neither that this were any true church of Christ, but a new found religion, or paganisme rather, brought in vnder the shadow of christiantie, wherein remaineth almost nothing else but the name onely of Christ, & the outward forme of his religion, the true vaine and effect whereof is vterlie decaied: as to them which list to examine all the parts of this new Romish religion may soone appeare.

Defection of faith in the church of Rome.

A view of the popes catholike church. The. 2.

The church of Rome degenerated againe almost to new paganisme.

For saue onely that they pretend the solemne forme and words of the créed, and are baptised, confessing the name of the father, the sonne and holy ghost: as touching all other points and true sinceritie of the christian faith, which they outwardlie professe, they are vtterly degenerated from that which saint Paul and the word of God first had taught them.

First, they confesse the father in word, but his will in his word expressed they renounce; his grace they acknowledge not, his benefits and promises giuen vnto vs in his sonne they receiue not, the vigor of his law they feele not, the terrour of his iudgements earnestlie they feare not, his commandements they obserue by the traditions and commandements of their owne.

The popes church in words catholike, in deed heathenish.

Likewise the name of Christ his sonne in word they confesse, but his office in déed they deface and diminish: his glory they seeke not, but vnder his name they doe seeke their owne: the power of his blood and passion they know not, or els dissemble it, whom neither they admit to be the head of his church alone, nor sauior alone, nor onely to be our patrone and aduocat, but match with him our ladie, and other patrons, so that euerie parish almost in christendome hath his peculiar patron besides Christ to hold by.

In like manner they confesse the name of the holy ghost, but God himselfe knoweth how far they are from the comfort, knowledge, and talke of the holy ghost; as well may appeare by their councels, by their expounding of scripture, by their superstitious ceremonies, by their outward worshipping and idolatrous inuocation to stockes and stones, and to dead creatures, by their scrupulous obseruation of daies, tunes, places, numbers and gestures: and no lesse also by their doctrine, which defraudeth the poore hearts of simple christians of their due consolation, ioy and liberty in the holy Ghost, and keepeth them still in a seruile bondage, and a doubtfull incertaintie of their saluation, contrarie to the working of the holy spirit of God.

The religiō of the popes church proceedeth contrarie to the working of the holy ghost.

And thus the church of Rome, pretending onely the name of Christ and of his religion, is so farre altered from the truth of that which it pretendeth, that vnder the name of Christ it persecuteth both Christ and his religion: working more harme to the church of Christ, than euer did the open tyrants and persecuting emperours among the heathen: not much vnlike hereto the old synagogue of the scribes and pharisies, who vnder the name of God crucified the sonne of God, and vnder pretense of the law fought against the gospell, and vnder the title of Abrahams children persecuted the children of Abraham. And as they bragging so highlie of the Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord, did in déede destroy the true Temple of the Lord: right so these pretensed catholikes in these daies, after they haue raised vp a catholike church of their owne, and haue armed the same with lawes, & haue gathered vnto them a power of priests, prelats, abbats, friers, of religious men, of cardinals, and also of secular princes to take their part; now vnder the name of the catholike church they persecute the true catholike church, and colouring their proceeding still with In nomine Domini, most cruelly put them to death which die Pro nomine Domini, condemning them for heretikes, schismatiks, and rebels, not which deny any part of the créed, which they themselues professe, nor such whom they can conuince by any scripture; but only such which will not ioyne with their errors & heresies, contrarie to the honor of God and truth of his word.

The church of Rome pretendeth a faire face of religion but is void of the effect thereof.

The old pharisies and the later church of Romanists compared together.

The popes church vnder the name of the catholike church persecuteth the true catholike church of Christ.

These principles and infallible rules of the ſcripture, as no man can denie: ſo if they be granted, the doctrine then of the popes church muſt néeds be found not to be catholike, but rather full of errours and hereſies, as in the ſequele following remaineth more expreſſelie and particularly by the grace of Chriſt to be conuinced.

Here followeth a ſummarie collection of the errours, hereſies, and abſurdities contained in the popes doctrine, contrarie to the rules of Gods word, and the firſt inſtitution of the church of Rome.

Of faith and iuſtification.

The errours, hereſies and abſurdities in the popes doctrine.

FIrſt, as touching the onely meanes and inſtrumentall cauſe of our iuſtification, whereby the merits of Chriſts paſſion be applied to vs and made ours, ye heard before how ſaint Paul onely aſcribeth the ſame to faith: as appeareth by all his letters, eſpecially to the Romans. Where he excluding all kind of workes, aſcribeth all our ſaluation, iuſtification, righteouſneſſe, reconciliation, and peace with God onely vnto faith in Chriſt. Contrary to which doctrine the pope and his church hath ſet vp diuers and ſundrie other meanes of their own deuiſing whereby the merits of Chriſts paſſion (they ſay) are applied to vs and made ours, to the putting away of ſinnes, and for our iuſtification, as hope, charitie, ſacrifice of the maſſe, auricular confeſſion, ſatisfaction, merits of ſaints, and holie orders, the popes pardons, &c. So that Chriſts ſacrifice, ſtripes, and ſuffering, by this teaching doth not heale vs, nor is not beneficiall to vs, though we beléeue neuer ſo well, vnleſſe we adde alſo theſe workes and merits aboue recited. Which if it be true, then is it falſe that Eſay the prophet doth promiſe: chap.53. In his ſtripes all we are made whole, &c.

The meanes of applying Chriſts merits vnto vs by the popes doctrine.

The taking away of this article of faith onely to iuſtifie, is the roote of great inconuenience in Chriſts church.

This errour and hereſie of the church of Rome, though it ſéeme at firſt ſight to the naturall reaſon of man to be but of ſmall importance; yet if it be earneſtlie conſidered, it is in very déed the moſt pernicious hereſie that euer almoſt crept into the church, vpon the which as the onely foundation, all, or the moſt part of all the errours, abſurdities, and inconueniences of the popes church are grounded. For this being once admitted, that a man is not iuſtified by his faith in Chriſt alone, but that other meanes muſt bee ſought by our owne working and merits to apply the merits of Chriſts paſſion vnto vs, then is there neither any certaintie left of our ſaluation, nor end in ſetting vp new meanes and merits of our owne deuiſing for remiſſion of ſinnes. Neither hath there béen any hereſie that either hath rebelled more preſumptuouſlie againſt the high maieſtie of God the father, nor more perniciouſlie hath inuired the ſoules of the ſimple, than this doctrine.

No hereſie to be compared to the hereſie of papiſts.

The firſt inconuenience.

Firſt of all it ſubuerteth the will and teſtament of God. For where almightie God of mercie hath giuen vs his ſonne to die for vs, and with him hath giuen out his full promiſe, that whoſoeuer beléeueth vpon him ſhould bee ſaued by their faith, and aſſigneth none other condition either of the law or any of workes, but onely of faith, to be the meanes betweene his ſonne and vs: theſe men take vpon them to alter this teſtament that God hath ſet, and adioyne other conditions, which the Lord in his word neuer appointed nor knew. To whom the words of Hierome may be well applied vpon the epiſtle to the Galathians, ſpeaking of ſuch: Qui de euangelio Chriſti faciunt hominis euangelium, vel quod peius eſt, diaboli, &c. That is, Which make of the goſpell of Chriſt the goſpell of men, or rather the goſpell of the diuell, &c.

No condition limited of God to man for ſaluation but one. Hieron. in epiſt. ad Gal. cap.1.

The ſecond inconuenience.

Secondlie, whereas the chriſtian reader in the goſpell, reading of the great grace and ſweet promiſes of God giuen to mankind in Chriſt his ſon, might thereby take much comfort of ſoule, & be at reſt and peace with the Lord his God: commeth in the peſtiferous doctrine of theſe heretikes, wherewith they obſcure this free grace of God, to choke the ſweete comforts of man in the holie ghoſt, and oppreſſe chriſtian libertie, and bring vs into ſpirituall bondage.

What hurt commeth into the church, by taking away the article of iuſtification.

The third inconuenience.

Thirdly, as in this their impious doctrine they ſhew themſelues manifeſt enemies to Gods grace: ſo are they no leſſe iniurious to chriſtian men, whom they leaue in a doubtfull diſtruſt of Gods fauour and of their ſaluation, contrarie to the word and will of God, & right inſtitution of the apoſtolike doctrine.

Obiection of the papiſts anſwered.

And whereas our new ſchoolemen of late, to maintaine the ſaid wicked point of doctrine, doe obiect vnto vs that wee rather leaue mens conſciences vncertaine, forſomuch as, If life (ſay they) were not a due reward, it were vncertaine. And now forſomuch as due debt is certaine, and mercie or fauour is vncertaine, therefore (ſay they) we leauing mens conſciences to the mercie of God, doe leaue them in a doubtfull vncertaintie of their ſaluation. To this I anſwere, that due debt, if it be preſerued by the law duly deſerued, it muſt be certaine. But if the law ſhall proone it vnperfect or inſufficiently due, then is it not certaine, neither can there be any thing duelie claimed. Now as touching mercie, ſo long as it remaineth ſecret in the princes will, and not knowne to his ſubiects, ſo long it is vncertaine. But when this mercie ſhall be openly publiſhed by proclamation, ratified by promiſe, conferred by will & teſtament, eſtabliſhed in blood, and ſealed with ſacraments, then this mercie remaineth no more doubtfull, but ought firmelie to bee beléeued of euery true faithfull ſubiect. And therefore S. Paul, to

The papiſts doe teach the mercie of God to be vncertaine.

Mercie of God made certaine by his owne promiſes.

to establish our hearts in this assurance, and so answere to this doubt, in his epistle to the Romans doth teach vs, saying: And therefore of faith, that after grace the promise might bee firme and sure to the whole seed of Abraham, &c. Rom. 4. Meaning hereby, that workes haue nothing to doe in this case of iustifying, and noteth the reason why. For then our saluation should stand in a doubtfull wauering, because in working wee are neuer certaine whether our deserts be perfect & sufficient in Gods iudgement or no. And therefore (saith saint Paul) to the intent our saluation should be out of al doubt, and certaine, it standeth not of workes in deseruing, but of faith in apprehending, and of Gods free grace in promising.

Saluation standeth sure and certaine by Gods promise. The place of S. Paul, Rom. 4. expounded. The fourth inconuenience.

Fourthly, as in this their sinister doctrine they breake this principle of christian religion, which saith that a man is iustified by faith without workes, so againe it breaketh another principle aboue rehearsed. For this rule being granted, that nothing is to be added to Gods word nor taken from it: then haue these men done wickedly in adding (as they doe) to Gods word. For where the word of God limiteth to our iustification no condition but faith: Beleeue (saith he) in the Lord Iesu, and thou shalt be saued, and thy whole house, &c. Act. 16. these iusticiaries doe adde thereto diuers and sundrie other conditions besides, and such as the word also precisely excludeth, as hope, charitie, the sacrifice of the masse, the worke of the priest Ex opere operato, auricular confession, satisfaction, meritorious deeds, &c. And thus much concerning the doctrine of faith and iustification. Whereby it may appeare to what horrible blindnesse and blasphemie the church of Rome is now fallen, where this kind of doctrine is not onely suffered, but also publikelie professed, which speaking against faith, thus blasphemouslie dare say: Fides illa qua quis firmiter credit, & certò statuit propter Christum sibi remissa esse peccata, seséque possessurum vitam æternam, non fides est, sed temeritas: non spiritus sancti persuasio, sed humanæ audaciæ præsumptio. That is, That faith wherewith a man firmely beleeueth, and certainely assureth himselfe, that for Christs sake his sinnes bee forgiuen him, and that he shall possesse eternall life, is not faith but rashnesse: not the persuasion of the holy ghost, but presumption of a mans boldnesse.

The fourth principle aboue recited, broken.

Ex Lindano in epitome doctrinæ euangelicæ.

Of workes and the law.

The first error of the papists, touching good workes.

AS touching the doctrine of good workes & the law, what the teaching of saint Paul was to the Romans, ye heard before. Who although he excludeth good workes from the office of iustifying, yet excludeth he them not from the practise and conuersation of christian life. but most earnestly calleth vpon all faithfull beleeuers in Christ, to walke worthie their vocation, to lay downe their old conuersation, to giue their members seruants of righteousnesse, to offer their bodies vp to God a liuelie sacrifice, &c. The like example of whole teaching, if the churches now reformed do not follow, let their sermons, their preachings, writings, exhortings, and liues also beare record. Who although they cannot say with Christ, Which of you can blame me of sinne? yet they may say to the aduersaries, Whosoeuer of you is without fault, cast the first stone of reproch against vs. Wherefore Hosius, Pighius, with their fellowes, doe them open wrong, and slanderoulie belie them in comparing them in this behalfe to Aetius, Eunomius, and other hereticks called Anomei, who taking the good sentences of saint Paul, did abuse the same to filthie licence of the flesh, and corruption of wicked life, &c.

Hosius in 2. tom. confessionis, cap. 1.

But to let these slanders passe, now what the errours be of the church of Rome, touching this part of doctrine, remaineth to be declared. Whose errour first standeth in this, that they misunderstanding the definition of good workes, doe call good workes, not such as properly are commanded by the law of God, but such as are agreeable to the popes law. As building of abbeis and churches, giuing to the high altar, founding of trentals, finding of chanteries, gilding of images, hearing of masses, going on pilgrimage, fighting for the holy crosse, keeping of bowes, entering to orders, fasting of vigils, creeping to the crosse, praying to saints, &c. All which are not onely reputed for good workes, but so preferred also before al other workes, that to these is giuen pardon from the pope, double and treeplefold more then to any other good worke of charity commanded in the law of almightie God.

The second error of the papists in the doctrine of good workes. Faith the roote and cause of good workes.

An other errour also may be noted in the papists, touching the efficient or formall cause of good workes. For albeit they all confesse in their bookes, that Gratia Dei gratis data is the chiefe and principall cause thereof, and worketh in vs Iustitiã primam (as they call it) yet the good workes after regeneration, they referre to other subordinate causes vnder God, as to free will, or to Habitum virtutis, or Ad integra naturalia, and nothing at all to faith, when as faith only next vnder God is the roote & fountaine of all well doing: as in the fruites of a good tree, albeit the planter or the husbandman be the principall agent thereof, and some cause also may be in the good ground; yet the next and immediate cause is the roote that maketh the tree fruitfull. In like maner the grace of God, in a soft and repentant mollified hart planteth the gift of faith. Faith as a good roote cannot lie dead or vnoccupied, but springeth forth and maketh both the tree fruitful, and also the fruite thereof to be good, which otherwise had no acceptation nor goodnesse in them, were it not for the goodnesse of the roote from whence they spring. So Paul, although he had certaine workes in him, such as they were, before his conuersion: yet had he no good workes before the grace of Christ had rooted faith in him. So Marie Magdalene the sinner and Zacheus the publican. So all the nations of the gentiles began to bring forth fruit, and especially good fruit, when they began to be ingrafted in Christ, and to receiue the roote of his faith, whose fruits before that were all damnable and vnsauorie. As touching the cause therefore of good workes, there is no other in man but faith, whose office as it is to iustifie vs in heauen, so the nature of it is here in earth to worke by loue, as the root worketh by the sap. For as a man seeth and feeleth by faith, the loue and grace of God toward him in Christ his sonne: so beginneth he to loue againe both God and man, and to doe for his neighbour as God hath done to him. And hereof properly springeth the running fountaine of all good workes and deeds of charitie.

Workes are not to be called good, but by reason of faith.

The office of faith to iustifie. The effect of faith to bring forth good workes.

Fides per dilectionem operans. Gal. 5.

Thirdly, as they erre in the cause of good workes, so do they erre much more in the end of the law, and of good workes: for where saint Paul teacheth the law to be giuen to this vse and end, to conuict our transgressions, to prowe vs sinners, to shew and condemne our infirmitie, and to driue vs to Christ: they take and applie no other end to the law, but to make vs perfect, to keepe vs from wrath, and to make vs iust before God. And likewise where saint Paul prowueth all our good workes to be vnperfect, and vtterlie secludeth them from the end of iustifying: they contrariwise do teach, as though the end of good workes were to merit remission of sinnes, to satisfie vnto God, to deserue grace, to redeeme soules from purgatorie, and that by them the person of the regenerat man doth please God, and is made iust before God. For so they teach most wickedlie and horriblie, saying: that Christ suffered for originall sinne, or sinnes going before baptisme; but the actuall sinnes, which follow after baptisme, must be done awaie by mens merits. And so they assigne to Christ the beginning of saluation, or obteining of the first grace (as they call it) but the perfection or consummation of grace they giue to workes & our owne strength. Neither can they in anie case abide, that we be iustified freelie by the mercie of God through faith onlie apprehending the merits of Christ. Howbeit neither do all papists in this their errour agree in one. For some make distinction and saie, that we are iustified by Christ Principaliter, id est, principallie: Et minus principaliter, id est, lesse principallie, by the dignitie of our owne deeds, contrarie to the eight principle before mentioned. Others hold that we are made righteous before God, not by our workes that go before faith: but by our vertues that follow after. Some againe do thus expound the saying of saint Paul: Wee are iustified by faith: that is (say they) by faith, preparing vs or setting vs in a good waie to be iustified. Others expound it by the figure Synecdoche, that is, by faith conioined together with other vertues. Others thus: By faith, that is, being formed with charitie, &c. Thus all these do derogat from the benefit of Christ, and attribute vnto workes a great or the greatest part of our iustification, directlie against the true veine of saint Paules doctrine, and first institution of the ancient church of Rome, and against all the principles of holie scripture.

Thom. Aquinas. Hosius in 2. tom confess. cap. 1.

The diuers opinions of the catholike papists, how faith iustifieth.

The popes doctrine against the principles of Scripture.

Furthermore, as touching the said doctrine of the law and good workes, they erre in misunderstanding the nature of the law and workes. For where saint Paul disputeth that the law is spirituall, and requireth of vs perfect obedience of the whole power of man, which we being carnall are neuer able to accomplish: they affirme otherwise, that the law doth require but onely outward obedience of man, and therewith is contented. And this obedience (they say) man is not onely able to performe, but also to do more and greater things then the law requireth. Whereof riseth the workes of supererogation, contrarie to the sixth and eight principles aboue specified. Also there be (say they) among other certaine workes of the law, which pertaine not to all men, but are Consilia, counsels, left for perfect men, as matter for them to merit by, and these they call Opera perfectionis, or Opera indebita, adding also vnto these new deuices to serue God after their own traditions besides the word of God, as monasticall vowes, wilful pouerty, difference of meates and garments, pilgrimage to reliks and saints, worshipping of the dead, superstitious ceremonies, rosaries, &c. with such like, and these they call workes of perfection, which they preferre before the other commanded in the law of God. Insomuch that in comparison of these, the other necessarie duties commanded and commended by the word of God (as to beare office in the common-wealth, to liue in the godly state of matrimonie, to sustaine the office of a seruant in a house) is contemned, and accounted as prophane in comparison of these, contrarie to the tenth principle aboue mentioned.

while they consider not the deepenesse and largenesse of sinne, supposing it still to be nothing else but the inward actions with consent of will, or the outward, such as are against will: whereas the strength of sinne extendeth not onely to these, but also comprehendeth the blindnesse and ignorance of the mind, lacke of knowledge and true feare of God, the vntowardnesse of mans mind to Godward, the prime rebellion of the heart against the law of God, the vndeliting will of man to God and his word. The sense of fleshly saint Paul also calleth an enemie against God, and fœlech in himselfe, that is, in his flesh, nothing dwelling but sinne.

Originall sinne what it is.

As touching also originall sinne, wherein we are borne, which is the destruction of originall iustice, and of Gods image in vs (remaining in vs and bringing forth in vs wicked cogitations, affections, and motions of naughtinesse, against the law of God, and neuer ceaseth so long as man liueth) this originall sinne the popes doctrine doth not denie, but yet doth much extenuat the same, and holdeth that this inward concupiscence and vitious affections not bursting out in vs with consent of will, are no mortall nor damnable sinne, but onely Fomes peccati: and say moreouer, that this Concupiscentia in vs, is no deprauation of the higher, but onely of the lower parts of man, being a thing ἀδιάφορον, indifferent, and no lesse naturall in vs than is the appetite to eate and drinke, and that the same is left to remaine in the saints after baptisme, to be to them occasion of more meriting, &c.

Fomes peccati.

Of penance, or repentance.

False doctrine of the latter church of Rome touching penance.

OF penance, this latter Laterane church of Rome, of late hath made a sacrament (contrarie to the fourth principle before) which penance, say they, standeth of three parts, contrition, confession, and satisfaction canonicall. Contrition (as they teach) may be had by strength of free will, without the law and the holy Ghost, Per actus elicitos, through mans owne action and endeuour. Which contrition first must be sufficient, and so it meriteth remission of sinne. In confession they require a full rehearsall of all sinnes, whereby the priest knowing the crimes, may minister satisfaction accordingly. And this rehearsing of sinnes, Ex opere operato deserueth remission, contrarie to the fourteenth principle before. Satisfactions they call Opera indebita, inioyned by the ghostly father. And this satisfaction (say they) taketh away, and changeth eternall punishment into temporall paines, which paines also it doth mitigat. And againe, these satisfactions may bee taken away by the popes indulgence, &c.

Contrition.

Confession.

Satisfaction.

True doctrine of repentance by the scripture.

Parts of repentance.

1. Contrition.

2. Faith.

3. New obedience.

This vnsauorie and heathenish doctrine of penance farre differeth from the true teaching of holy scripture; by the which teaching, repentance properlie containeth these three parts, contrition, faith, and new life. Contrition is called in scripture the sorrow of heart, rising vpon the consideration of sinne committed, and of the anger of God prouoked, which sorrow driueth a man to Christ for succour: whereupon riseth faith. Faith bringeth afterward amendment or newnesse of life, which wee call new obedience, working fruits worthie of repentance.

Difference betweene the law and the Gospell.

The blind ignorance of the popes church in not distincting the law from the gospell.

AS there is nothing more necessarie and comfortable for troubled consciences, than to be well instructed in the difference betweene the law and the Gospell: so is the church of Rome much to blame in this behalfe, because it confoundeth together those two, being in nature so diuers and contrarie one from another: as threatnings and promises, things temporall with things eternall, sorrowful things with glad tidings, death with life, bondage with freedome, &c: teaching the people, that whatsoeuer the law saith, the gospel confirmeth, and whatsoeuer the gospell saith the same is agreeable to the law, and so make they no difference betweene Moses and Christ, saue onelie that Moses (they say) was the giuer of the old law, Christ is the giuer of the new and a more perfect law. And thus imagine they the gospell to be nothing else but a new law giuen by Christ, binding to the promises thereof the condition of our doings and deseruings, no otherwise than to the old law. And so diuide they the whole law after this distinction, into three parts, to wit, the law of nature, the law of Moses, and the law of Christ. And as for the gospell (they say) it is reuealed for no other cause, but to shew to the world more perfect precepts and counsels, than were in the old law: to the fulfilling whereof they attribute iustification, and so leaue the poore consciences of men in perpetuall doubt, and induce other manifold errours: bringing the people into a false opinion of Christ, as though he were not a remedie against the law, but came as another Moses, to giue a new law to the world.

A Babylonicall confusion in the popes doctrine.

What difference the papists put betweene Moses and Christ.

Papists make the gospell a new law.

Papists diuide the law into the law of nature, the law of Moses, and the law of Christ.

The popes church blind in the office of Christ.

The time of the law, and time of the gospell distincted.

Furthermore, as they make no difference betweene the nature of the law and the nature of the gospell, confounding Moses and Christ together: so neither do they distinct or discerne the time of the law, and the time of the gospell asunder. For where S. Paul bringeth in the law to be a schoolemaster, and limitteth him his time vnto Christ: and saith that Christ is the end of the law, that is, whereas the law ceaseth, there Christ beginneth, and where Christ beginneth there the law endeth: they contrarie make the law to haue no end nor ceasing, but giue to it immortall life & kingdom equall with Christ, so that Christ and the law together do raigne ouer the soule and conscience of man. Which is vntrue. For either Christ must giue place, and the law stand; or the law (the condemnation and malediction of the law I mean) must end, and Christ reigne. For both these, Christ and the law, grace and malediction, cannot reigne and gouerne together. But Christ the sonne of God which once died, can die no more, but must reigne for euer. Wherefore the law with his strength, sting, and curse, must needs cease and haue an end. And this is it that S. Paul speaking of the triumph of Christ, saith, that he Ascending vp led away captiuitie captiue, & hath set man at libertie, not at libertie to liue as flesh lusteth, neither hath freed him from the vse and exercise of the law, but from the dominion and power of the law, so that There is now no condemnation to them that be in Christ Iesu, which walke not after the flesh, &c. Rom. 8. And in another place, S. Paul speaking of the same power and dominion of the law, saith, that Christ hath taken the obligation written against vs in decrees, and hath nailed it vpon the crosse, triumphing ouer all, &c. So that as the kingdome of Christ first began vpon the crosse, euen so vpon the same crosse, and at the same time the kingdome of the law expired, and the malediction of the law was so crucified vpon the crosse, that it shall neuer rise againe, to haue any power against them that be in Christ Iesu. For like as if a woman be discharged from her first husband being dead, and hath married another man, the first husband hath no more power ouer hir: euen so we now being espoused vnto Christ our second husband, are discharged vtterlie from our first husband the law, and (as S. Paul in another place saith) Are no more vnder the law, that is, vnder the dominion and malediction of the law, But vnder grace, that is, vnder perpetuall remission of sinnes, committed not onely before our baptisme, but as well also after baptisme, and during all our life long. For therein properlie consisteth the grace of God, in not imputing sinne vnto vs, so often as the repenting sinner rising vp by faith fleeth vnto Christ, and apprehendeth Gods mercie and remission promised in him, according to the testimonie both of the psalme, Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth no sinne, &c: and also of all the prophets, Which (as S. Peter saith) giue record to him, that through his name all that beleeue in him shall receiue remission of their sins, &c. Act. 10. Which being so, as it cannot bee denied, then what neede these priuat and extraordinarie remissions to be brought into the church by eare confession, by meritorious deeds, and by the popes pardons? For if there be no condemnation but by the law: and if this law it selfe be captiued, crucified, abolished, and departed, which was the first husband, what condemnation then can there be to them that be in Christ Iesu, or by whom should it come? If there be no condemnation, but a free and generall deliuerance for all men, once gotten by the victorie of Christ, from the penaltie of the law: what needeth then any particular remission of sinnes, at sundrie times to be sought at the priests hands or the popes pardons? He that hath a generall pardon needeth no particular. If remedie for sinne be generall and perpetuall once gotten for euer, to all them that be in Christ Iesu, what needeth any other remedie by auricular confession? If it be not generall and perpetuall, how then is it true that S. Paul saith: The law is crucified, and condemnation abolished? or how standeth redemption perpetuall and generall, if remission be not generall? For what is redemption else, but remission of sinnes, or sinnes bought out? Or what else to kill the law, but to discharge vs from condemnation for euer? He that deliuereth his friend for a time out of his enemies hand, doth him a pleasure: but he that killeth the enemie once out of the way, giueth perpetuall safetie. So if remission of sinnes by Christ were for some sinnes and not for all, the law then must needs liue still. But now the killing and crucifying of the law importeth full remission to bee absolute, and our safetie to be perpetuall. But here percase will be obiected of some: How standeth remission of sinnes certaine and perpetuall, seeing new offenses being daily committed, doe daily require new remission? Hereto I answere: Albeit sins doe daily grow, whereby we haue need daily to desire God to Forgiue our trespasses, &c: yet notwithstanding the cause of our remission standeth euer one and perpetuall, neither is the same to be repeated any more, nor any other cause to bee sought besides that alone. This cause is the sacrificed bodie of Christ once vpon the crosse for all sins that either haue or shall be committed. Beside this cause there is no other, neither confession, nor mens pardons that remitteth sinnes.

Obiection.

Answer.

The cause of remission euer one and perpetuall.

Furthermore, as the cause is one and euer perpetuall, which worketh remission of sinnes vnto vs: so is the promise of God euer one, once made and standeth perpetuall, that offereth the same to the faith of the repenting sinner. And because the said promise of God is alwaies sure and cannot faile, which offereth remission to all them that beleeue in Christ, being limited neither to time nor number, therefore we may boldlie conclude, that what time soeuer a repenting sinner beleeueth, and by faith applieth to him the sacrifice of Christ, he hath by Gods owne promise remission of his sinnes, whether they were done before or after baptisme.

The promise of remission euer perpetuall.

Remission of sinnes freelie promised without limitation of time or number.

And

The meanes whereby remission is promised is only faith.

And moreouer, for so much as the said promise of God offereth remission to the repentant sinner, by no other meanes nor condition, but onely one, that is, by faith in Christ: therefore excluding all other meanes and conditions of mans working, we saie, that what repenting sinner soeuer beleeueth in Christ, hath alreadie in himselfe (and needeth not to seeke to anie priest) perpetuall assurance of remission, not for this time or that time onelie, but for euer and a daie. For the promise saith not, He that beleeueth in Christ shall be pardoned this time, so he sinne no more: neither doth it say, that the law is staid, or the sentence reprieued, but saith plainlie, that The law with his condemnation and sentence his selfe is condemned and hanged vp, and shall neuer rise againe to them that be in Christ Iesu: and promiseth indeterminatlie, without limitation, remission of sinnes, To all that beleeue in his name, &c.

The words of promise free and absolute.

Act. 10. Act. 10. And likewise in another place the scripture speaking absolutelie, saith, Sinne shall not preuaile ouer you, and addeth the reason why: saying: Because ye are not vnder the law but vnder grace. Rom. 6. Adding this lesson withall (as followeth in the same place) Not that sinners should sin more therefore, because they are vnder grace, but onelie that weake infirmities might be releeued, broken consciences comforted, and repenting sinners holpen from desperation, to the praise of Gods glorie. For as God forgiueth not sinners because they should sinne, so neither doth infirmitie of falling diminish the grace of Christ, but rather doth illustrat the same, as it is written: My strength is made perfect in infirmitie, 2. Corin. 12. And againe: Where sinne aboundeth, there superaboundeth also grace.

Rom. 6.

Wans infirmitie impaireth not the grace of Christ, but augmenteth it. 2. Cor. 12. Rom. 5.

In remission of sinnes therefore, these foure things must concurre together; first the cause that worketh (which is the sacrifice of Christs bodie) secondlie the promise that offereth, thirdlie faith that apprehendeth, fourthly the repenting sinner that receiueth. And although sinnes dailie do grow, which dailie prouoke vs to craue remission: yet as touching the cause that worketh remission of our dailie sinnes, and the meanes which apprehend and applie the said cause vnto vs, they remaine alwayes one and perpetuall: besides which no other cause nor meanes is to be sought of man. So that to them that be repenting sinners, and be in Christ Iesu, there is no law to condemne them, though they haue deserued condemnation: but they are vnder a perpetuall kingdome & a heauen full of grace and remission to couer their sinnes, and not to impute their iniquities, through the promise of God in Christ Iesu our Lord.

Foure things concur in remission of sinnes.

The popes errours touching remission of sins detected.

And therefore wicked and impious is the doctrine of them, first which seeke anie other cause of remission then onely the bloud of our Sauiour: secondly, which assigne any other meanes to applie the bloudshedding of Christ vnto vs, besides onelie faith: thirdlie and especiallie, which so limit and restraine the eternall priuilege of Christs passion, as though it serued but onely for sinnes done without and before faith, and that the rest after baptisme committed must be done awaie by confession, pardons, and satisfactorie deeds. And all this riseth, because the true nature of the law and the gospell is not knowne, nor the difference rightlie considered betweene the times of the one and of the other. Neither againe do they make anie distinction betweene the malediction of the law and vse of the law. And therefore whensoeuer they heare vs speake of the law (meaning the malediction of the law) to be abolished, thereupon they maliciously slander vs, as though we spake against the good exercises of the law, and giue liberty of flesh to carnall men to liue as they list. Whereof more shall be said (by the Lords grace) as place & time shall hereafter require.

What inconuenience riseth for lacke of distinction betweene the law and the Gospell.

Of free will.

COncerning free will, as it may peraduenture in some case be admitted, that men without grace maie do some outward functions of the law, and keepe some outward obseruances or traditions: so as touching things spirituall and apperteining to saluation, the strength of man being not regenerate by grace, is so infirme & impotent, that he can performe nothing, neither in doing well nor willing well. Who after he be regenerated by grace may worke and do well, but yet in such sort, that still remaineth notwithstanding a great imperfection of flesh, and a perpetuall repugnance betweene the flesh and spirit. And thus was the originall church of the ancient Romans first instructed. From whom see now how farre this latter church of Rome hath degenerated, which holdeth and affirmeth, that men without grace may performe the obedience of the law, and prepare themselues to grace by working, so that those works maie be meritorious, and of congruitie obteine grace. Which grace once obteined, then men may (say they) perfectlie performe the full obedience of the law, and accomplish those spirituall actions and works which God requireth, and so those works, of condignitie, deserue euerlasting life. As for the infirmitie which still remaineth in nature, that they nothing regard nor once speake of.

Erroneous doctrine of the papists concerning free will.

Meritum de congruo.

Meritum d: condigno.

Of inuocation and adoration.

False doctrine concerning inuocation.

OVer and besides these vncatholike and almost vnchristian absurdities and defections from the apostolical faith aboue specified, let vs consider the maner of their inuocation, not to God alone, as they should; but to dead men, saying: that saints are to be called vpon, Tanquam mediatores intercessionis, As mediators of intercession: Christum verò tanquam mediatorem salutis, And Christ as the mediator of saluation. And affirme moreouer, that Christ was a mediator onelie in time of his passion. Which is repugnant to the words of saint Paul writing to the old Romans, chapter eight, where he speaking of the intercession of Christ: Which is (saith he) on the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for vs, &c. And if Christ be a mediator of saluation, what needeth then anie other intercession of the saints for our suites? For saluation being once had what can we require more? Or what lacketh he more to be obteined of the saints, which is sure to be saued onlie by Christ? And yet in their catholike deuotions, why do they teach vs thus to praie to the blessed virgine: Salua omnes qui te glorificant, that is, Saue all them that glorifie thee, &c.: if saluation onelie belong to Christ? vnles they studie of purpose to seeme contrarie to themselues.

Mediator of intercession. Mediator of saluation. Christ a continuall mediator, by the doctrine of S. Paul. Rom. 8. Christ only being our mediator of saluation, what needeth any other mediation of saints? Saluation falsly attributed to the blessed virgin.

Hitherto also perteineth the worshipping of relikes, and the false adoration of sacraments, that is, the outward signes of the things signified, contrarie to the seuenth principle before. Adde to this also the prophanation of the Lords supper, contrarie to the vse for which it was ordeined, in reseruing it after the communion ministred, in selling it to sale for monie, and falslie perswading both themselues and others, that the priest doth merit both to himselfe that saith, and to him that heareth, Ex opere operato, sine bono motu vtentis, &c: that is, Onelie by the meere doing of the worke, though the partie that vseth the same hath no motion in him.

Idolatrous adoration of relikes and sacraments. Prophanation of the Lords supper. False meriting by masses.

Of sacraments, baptisme and the Lords Supper.

AS touching sacraments, their doctrine likewise is corrupt and erroneous.

False doctrine touching sacraments.

1 First they erre falslie in the number. For where the institution of Christ ordeineth but two, they (contrarie to the fourth principle aboue prefixed) haue added to the prescription of the Lords word, fiue other sacraments.

The number.

2 Secondlie, in the cause finall they erre. For where the word hath ordeined those sacraments to excite our faith, and to giue vs admonitions of spirituall things: they contrariwise do teach that the sacraments do not onelie stirre vp faith, but also that they auaile and are effectuall without faith, Ex opere operato, sine bono motu vtentis, &c. As is to be found in Thomas Aquinas, Scotus, Catharinus, and others more.

Cause finall.

3 Thirdlie, in the operation & effect of the sacraments they faile, where they contrarie to the mind of the scriptures, do saie, that they giue grace, and not onlie do signifie, but also conteine and exhibit that which they signifie, to wit, grace and saluation.

The operation.

4 Fourthlie, they erre also in application, applying their sacraments both to the quicke and the dead, to them also that be absent, to remission of sinnes, and releasing of paine, &c.

The application of sacraments.

In the sacrament of baptisme they are to be reproued, not onelie for adding to the simple words of Christs institution diuers other new found rites and phantasies of men: but also where the vse of the old church of Rome was onelie to baptise men, they baptise also bels, and applie the words of baptisme to water, fire, candels, stocks, and stones, &c.

Errors and abuses in baptisme. Baptising of belles.

But especiallie in the supper of the Lord their doctrine most filthilie swarueth from the right mind of the scripture, all order, reason, and fashion, most worthie to be exploded out of all christian churches. Touching the which sacrament, the first errour is their idolatrous abuse by worshipping, adoring, censing, knocking and kneeling vnto it, in reseruing also and carying the same about in pompe & procession in townes and fields. Secondlie also in the substance thereof their teaching is monstrous, leauing there no substance of bread and wine to remaine, but onelie the reall bodie and bloud of Christ, putting no difference betweene calling and making. Because Christ called bread his bodie, therefore, saie they, he made it his bodie, and so of a wholesome sacrament, make a perilous idoll: and that which the old church of Rome did euer take to be a mysterie, they turne into a blind mist of meere accidences to bleare the peoples eies, making them beleeue they see that they see not: and not to see that which they see, and to worship a thing made, for their maker, a creature for their creator: and that was thrcshed out of a wheaten sheafe they set vp in the church, and worship for a sauiour: and when they haue worshipped him, then they offer him to his father: and when they haue offered him, then they eat him vp, or else close him fast in a pix, where if he corrupt and putrifie before he be eaten, then they burne him to powder and ashes. And notwithstanding they know wel by scriptures, that the bodie of Christ can neuer corrupt and putrifie: yet for all this corruption will they needs make it the bodie of Christ, and burne all them which beleeue not that which is against true christian beleefe.

False doctrine of the popes church concerning the Lords supper. Idolatrie committed to the sacrament. The sacrament turned to an idoll. Changing, worshipping, offering, eating, burning the bodie of Christ in the sacrament of the altar.

Of matrimonie

WHat order and rule saint Paul hath set for marriage in his epistle to the Corinthians it is manifest: whereas Absurdities and errors of the popes church touching matrimony. 1.Cor.7.

he preferreth single life in such as haue the gift of continence, before the married state: so againe in such as haue not the gift, he preferreth the coupled life before the other: willing euerie such one to haue his wife: Because of fornication. Furthermore, how the said apostle alloweth a bishop to bee the husband of one wife (so he exceed not to the manner of the Iewes, which were permitted to haue many) and how vehemently hee reprooueth them that restraine marriage, his letters to Timothie do record. Moreouer, what degrees be permitted by the law of God to marrie, in the booke of Leuiticus is to bee seene, chapter eightéene. Also how children ought not to marrie without consent of their parents, by manifest examples of the scriptures it is notorious.

1.Tim.3. 1.Tim.4. Leuit.18.

Single life be it neuer so impure preferred before matrimonie. The third part of christendome stopt by the popes law to marrie. The popes doctrine against priests marriage, and their children. The third part of the yeare exempted from marriage. Marriage within the fifth or sixth degree, by the popes law. Gossips inhibited to marrie by the popes law. What inconueniences come by restraining of mariage.

Contrarie to these ordinances of the scripture, the new catholikes of the popes church, first doe repute and call mariage a state of imperfection, and preferre single life, be it neuer so impure, before the same, pretending that where the one replenisheth the earth, the other filleth heauen. Furthermore, as good as the third part of christendome, if it be no more, both men and women, they keepe through coacted vowes from mariage, hauing no respect whether they haue the gift or no. Ministers and priests, such as are found to haue wiues, not onely they remoue out of place, but also pronounce sentence of death vpon them, and account their children for bastards and illegitimate: Againe, as good as the third part of the yeare they exempt and suspend from libertie of marriage. Degrées of copulation forbidden they extend further then euer did the law of God, euen to the fifth or sixth degrée. Which degrée notwithstanding they release againe when they list for money. Ouer and besides all this, they haue added a new found prohibition of spirituall kindred, that is, that such as haue been gossips, or godfathers and godmothers together in christening an other mans childe, must not by their law marrie together. Briefly and finally in this doctrine and cases of matrimonie, they gaine and rake to themselues much money from the people, they augment horrible sodomitrie, they nourish wicked adulterie and much fornication, they fill the world with offensions and bastards, and giue great occasion of murthering infants.

Of magistrates and ciuil gouernement.

The corrupt doctrine of the popes church concerning ciuill rulers and magistrates. Rom.13.

YE heard before what rules and lessons saint Paul gaue to the old Romans concerning magistrats, to whose authoritie he would all humane creatures to be subiected, and how they are the ministers of God, hauing the sword giuen vnto them, wherewith they ought to represse false doctrine and idolatrie, and maintaine that which is true and right, Rom.13. Now let vs survey a little the popes proceedings, and marke how farre he transgresseth in this, as he doth in all other points almost from true christianitie.

1 First, the pope with all his clergie exempt themselues from all obedience ciuill.

2 They arrogate to themselues authority to ordaine and constitute, without all leaue or knowledge of the ordinarie magistrate.

3 Yea they take vpon them to depose and set vp rulers and magistrates, whom they list.

Of purgatorie.

The fantasies and antickes of the popes church concerning purgatorie.

THe paradores, or rather the fantasies of the latter church of Rome concerning purgatorie, be monstrous, neither old nor apostolicall.

1 First (say they) there is a purgatorie, where soules do burne in fire after this life.

2 The paine of purgatorie differeth nothing from the paines of hell, but onely that it hath an end; the paines of hell haue none.

Ex Thom. Mono & aliis.

3 The painefull suffering of this fire fretteth and scowreth away the sinnes before committed in the bodie.

4 The time in these paines indureth in some longer, in some lesse, according as their sinnes deserue.

5 After which time of their paines being expired, then the mercie of God doth translate them to heauenly blisse, which the bodie of Christ hath bought for them.

6 The paines of purgatorie bee so great, that if all the beggers of the world were séene on the one side, and but one soule of purgatorie on the other side, the whole world would pitie more that one, then all the others.

7 The whole time of punishment in this purgatorie must continue so long, till the fire haue cleane fretted and scowred away the ruttie spots of euery sinfull soule there burning, vnlesse there come some release.

8 Helpes and releases that may shorten the time of their purgation, be the popes pardons and indulgences, sacrifice of the altar, dirges, and trentals, prayer, fasting, meritorious déeds out of the treasure house of the church, almes and charitable déeds of the liuing, in satisfying Gods iustice for them, &c.

9 Lacke of beliefe of purgatorie bringeth to hell.

Many other false errors and great deformities, heresies, absurdities, vanities, and follies, besides their blasphemous railings & contumelies, may be noted in the said latter church of Rome, wherein they haue made manifest defection from the old faith of Rome, as in depriuing the church of one kind of the sacrament, in taking from the people the knowledge and reading of Gods word, in praying and speaking to the people, and administring sacraments in a tongue vnknowne, in mistaking the authoritie of the keyes, in their vnwritten verities, in making the authoritie of the scripture insufficient, in vntrue iudgement of the church and the wrong notes of the same, in the supremacie of the sée of Rome, in their wrong opinions of antichrist.

Manifest defection of the popes church from the old faith of Rome.

But because these, with all other parts of doctrine, are more copiously and at large comprehended in other bookes both in Latine and English, set forth in these our daies; I shall not néede further herein to trauell, especially séeing the contrarie betweene the popes church and the church of Christ, betweene the doctrine of the one and the doctrine of the other, is so euident that he is blind that séeth it not, and hath no hands almost that féeleth it not.

For (briefly in one note to comprehend, which may suffice for all) whereas the doctrine of Christ is altogether spirituall, consisting wholy in spirit and veritie, and requireth no outward thing to make a true christian man but onely baptisme (which is the outward profession of faith) and receiuing the Lords supper: let vs now examine the whole religion of this latter church of Rome, and we shall find it from top to toe, to consist in nothing else but altogether in outward and ceremoniall exercises; as outward confession, absolution at the priests hand, outward sacrifice of the masse, buying of pardons, purchasing of obits, externe worshipping of images and relikes, pilgrimage to this place or that, building of churches, founding of monasteries, outward workes of the law, outward gestures, garments, colours, choice of meates, difference of times and places, peculiar rites, and obseruances, set prayers, and number of prayers prescribed, fasting of vigils, keeping of holy daies, comming to church, hearing of seruice, externe succession of bishops, and of Peters sée, externe forme and notes of the church, &c. So that by this religion to make a true christian and a good catholike, there is no working of the Holy-ghost almost required. As by example, to make this matter more demonstrable, let vs here define a christian man after the popes making: whereby we may sée the better what is to be iudged of the scope of his doctrine.

Contrarietie betweene the religion of Christ and of the pope briefly noted. Christs doctrine is wholie spirituall.

No outward thing is required in Christs doctrine to make a christian man but onely baptisme and the Lords supper. All doctrine of the popes standeth onely in outward things.

A christian man after the popes making defined.

AFter the popes catholike religion, a true christian man is thus defined: first, to be baptised in the Latin tongue (where the godfathers profesle they cannot tell what) then confirmed by the bishop: the mother of the child to be purified; after he bee growen in yeares, then to come to the church, to keepe his fasting daies, to fast the Lent, to come vnder benedicite, that is to be confessed of the priest, to do his penance, at Easter to take his rites, to heare masse and diuine seruice, to set vp candles before images, to creepe to the crosse, to take holy bread and holy water, to go on procession, to carie his palmes and candle, and to take ashes, to fast the ember daies, rogation daies, and vigils, to keepe the holy daies, to pay his tithes and offering daies, to go on pilgrimage, to buy pardons, to worship his maker ouer the priests head, to receiue the pope for his supreme head, and to obey his lawes, to receiue S. Nicholas clerks, to haue his beads, and to giue to the high altar, to take orders if he wil be a priest, to say his mattens, to sing his masse, to lift vp faire, to keepe his vow, and not to marrie, when he is sicke to bee anneled, and take the rites of the holy church, to be buried in the churchyard, to be rung for, to bee sung for, to be buried in a friers coole, to find a soule priest, &c.

A christian man defined after the popes doctrine.

All which points being obserued, who can denie but this is a deuout man and a perfect christian catholike, and sure to be saued, as a true faithfull child of the holy mother church?

Corporall exercise serueth to small profit.

Now looke vpon this definition, and tell me (good reader) what faith or spirit, or what working of ỹ Holy-ghost in al this doctrine is to be required. The grace of our Lord Iesu giue the true light of his gospell to shine in our hearts: Amen.

These persecutions of the primitiue Church lasted two hundred ninety foure yeares, counting from the beheading of Saint Iohn Baptist (which was the xxxii. yeare of the raigne of Tiberius) till the ende of Licinius the last persecuting Emperour of Rome. Concerning the which CCLXiiii. yeares Saint Iohn in his Reuelation doth Prophesie before in sundrie places: first Cap. xi. where hee saith: The Gentiles shall treade downe the holy Citie xlii. monethes. And againe in the xii. Chapter: And power was giuen to the Beast to make xlii. monethes, &c. Which xlii. monethes being counted by Sabbaths of yeares after the common vse of Scripture, and of Daniel, that is, euery moneth for vii. yeares, do rise to the number afore said, of cccxiii. yeares. Wherein is to be noted the errour of them, which taking these xlii. monethes simply (as the letter standeth) for iii. yeares & a halfe, do account thereby, that Antichrist, when he shall come (being born of the tribe of Dan) shall reigne but only iii. yeares and a halfe: for vnderstanding how these xlii. moneths are mystically to bee reckened by Sabbathes of yeares, that is, vii. yeares to euery moneth, after the vse of Scripture, & so they make cccxiii. yeares. During th time of which yeares, Antichrist then reigned in the Primitiue Church, till the comming of Constantine the Christian Emperour.

The like vnderstanding also hath the iii. dales & a halfe mentioned in the Reuelation. Cap. xi. where is saide: That after three dales and a halfe the two Prophets shall reuiue againe, &c. for to count euery houre of the day (which bee xii.) by Sabbaths of yeares, that is, fourtie yeares, and it commeth to cccxiii. yeares.

And so whether we count by monethes or by dales, both waies it giueth a time, times, and halfe a time, mentioned in the Reuelation. cap. 12. xlii. monethes: to it is wise in one day, two dales and halfe a day, may be vnderstand a time, times, and halfe a time. Persecutions expired, S. Iohn in the said booke of his Reuelation, Cap. xx. prophesieth that Sathan should be tied vppe for a thousand yeares, and after that let loose againe in the world for a little space all to xlii. monethes, which (as is aforesaid) being reduced to Sabbaths of yeares, make cccxiii. that is, that the rage and violence of persecution should then bee stirred vp against Gods

The first Booke of the Acts and Monuments, containing the three hundred yeeres next after Christ, with the ten persecutions of the primitiue Church.

THese things before premised, hauing thus hitherto prepared the way vnto our storie, let vs now (by the grace and speed of Christ our Lord) enter into the matter: that as we haue heretofore set forth in a generall description the whole state as well of the primitiue as of the latter times of this church of Rome: so now consequently to discourse in particular sort the acts and doings of euery age, by it selfe, in such order as is afore prefixed.

1 First, to declare of the suffering time of the church, which containeth about the time of three hundred yeeres after Christ.

2 Secondly, the flourishing and growing time of the same, containing other three hundred yeeres.

3 Thirdly, the declining time of the church, and of true religion, other three hundred yeeres.

4 Fourthly, of the time of antichrist, raigning and raging in the church, since the losing of Satan.

5 Lastlie, of the reforming time of Christs church in these latter three hundred yeeres.

In the tractation of all which things our chiefe purpose and endeuor shall be (so neere as the Lord will giue vs grace) not so much to intermeddle with outward affaires of princes, or matters ciuill (except sometime for example of life) as specialliе minding (by the helpe of the Lord) to prosecute such things, which to the ecclesiasticall state of the church are appertaining: as first to intreat of the stablishing of christian faith, then of the persecutions of tyrants, the constancie and patience of Gods saints, the first conuersion of christian realmes to the faith of Christ, namely of this realme of England and Scotland: first beginning with king Lucius, and so forward following the order of our English kings here in this land, to declare the maintenance of true doctrine, the false practise of prelats, the creeping in of superstition and hypocrisie, the manifold assaults, warres and tumults of the princes of this world, against the people of God. Wherein may appeare the wonderfull operation of Christs mighty hand, euer working in his church, and neuer ceasing to defend the same against his enemies, according to the veritie of his own word, promising to be with his church while the world shall stand, so as by the processe of this storie may well be proued, and be testified in the sequell thereof.

Two things in this historie chiefly to be noted.

In the tractation of all which things two speciall points I chiefly commend to the reader, as most requisit and necessarie of euery christian man to obserue and to note for his owne experience and profit, as first the disposition and nature of this world: secondly the nature and condition of the kingdome of Christ: the battle of the one, and stablishment of the other: the vnprosperous and vnquiet state of the one, ruled by mans violence and wisdome, and the happie successe of the other euer ruled by Gods blessing and prouidence: the wrath and reuenging hand of God in the one, and his mercie vpon the other.

The world.

The world I call all such as be without or against Christ, either by ignorance not knowing him, or by heathenish life not following him, or by violence resisting him.

The kingdome of Christ in this world.

On the other side, the kingdome of Christ in this world I take to be all them which belong to the faith of Christ, & here take his part in this world against the world: the number of whom although it be much smaller than the other, and alwaies lightly is hated and molested of the world, yet it is the number, which the Lord peculiarlie doth bless and prosper, and euer will.

The visible church. The church of Christ diuided in two sorts of people.

And this number of Christs subiects is it, which we call the visible church here in earth. Which visible church, hauing in it selfe a difference of two sorts of people, so is it to be diuided in two parts, of which the one standeth of such as be of outward profession onlie, the other which by election inwardly are ioyned to Christ: the first in words and lips seeme to honour Christ, and are in the visible church onely, but not in the church inuisible, and partake the outward sacraments of Christ, but not the inward blessing of Christ. The other are both in the visible and also in the inuisible church of Christ, which not in words onely and outward profession, but also in heart doe truly serue and honor Christ, partaking not onely the sacraments, but also the heauenly blessings and grace of Christ.

And many times it happeneth, that as betweene the world and the kingdome of Christ there is a continuall repugnance: so betweene these two parts of this visible church aforesaid, oft times groweth great variance and mortall persecution, insomuch that sometime the true church of Christ hath no greater enemies then of their owne profession and companie, as happened not onely in the time of Christ and his apostles, but also from time to time almost continually: Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 1: but especiallie in these latter daies of the church vnder the persecution of antichrist and his retinue, as by the reading of this volume more manifestly hereafter may appeare. Euseb. lib. 1. cap. 1.

At the first preaching of Christ, and comming of the gospell, who should rather haue knowne and receiued him, then the Pharisies and Scribes of that people, which had his law? And yet who persecuted and reiected him more then they themselues? What followed? They in refusing Christ to be their king, and choosing rather to be subiect vnto Cesar, were by the said their owne Cesar at length destroyed: when as Christs subiects the same time escaped the danger. Whereby it is to be learned, what a dangerous thing it is to refuse the gospell of God, when it is so gently offered.

Gods punishment for refusing the gospell.

The like example of Gods wrathfull punishment is to be noted no lesse in the Romans also themselues. For when Tiberius Cesar, hauing receiued by letters from Pontius Pilat of the doings of Christ, of his miracles, resurrection, and ascension into heauen, and how he was receiued as God of many, was himselfe also moued with beliefe of the same, and did confer therof with the whole senat of Rome, to haue Christ adored as God: but they not agreeing thereunto refused him, because that contrarie to the law of the Romans, he was consecrated (said they) for God, before the senat of Rome had so decreed and approued him, &c. Tertul. Apol. cap. 5. Thus the vaine senat following rather the law of man then of God, and which were contented with the emperour to reigne ouer them, were not contented with the meeke king of glorie the sonne of God to be their king; and therefore after much like sort to the Iewes were scourged and intrapped for their vniust refusing, by the same way which they themselues did prefer. For as they preferred the emperor, and reiected Christ: so the iust permission of God did stir vp their owne emperors against them in such sort, that both the senators themselues were almost all deuoured, and the whole citie most horriblie afflicted the space almost of three hundred yeeres together. For first the same Tiberius, which for a great part of his raigne was a moderate and a tollerable prince, afterward was to them a sharpe and heauie tyrant, who neither fauoured his owne mother, nor spared his owne nephues, nor the princes of the citie, such as were his owne counsellors, of whom to the number of twentie he left not past two or three aliue; & so cruell was he to the citie, that as the storie recordeth, Nullus à pœna hominum cessabat dies, ne religiosus quidē ac sacer. Suetonius reporteth him to be so sterne of nature & tyrannicall, that in time of his reigne, very many were accused and condemned with their wiues and children, maids also first defloured, then put to death. In one day he recordeth twentie persons to be drawne to the place of execution. By whom also, through the iust punishment of God, Pilat, vnder whom Christ was crucified, was apprehended and accused at Rome, deposed, then banished to the towne of Lions, and at length did slay himselfe. Neither did Herod and Caiphas long escape, of who more followeth hereafter. Agrippa also by him was cast into prison, albeit afterward he was restored. In the reigne of Tiberius, the Lord Iesus the son of God, in the foure and thirtith yeere of his age, which was the seuentéenth of this emperor, by the malice of the Iewes suffered his blessed passion for the conquering of sinne, death, and Satan the prince of this world, and rose againe the third day. After whose blessed passion and resurrection, this foresaid Tiberius Nero (otherwise called Biberius Nero) liued fiue yeeres, during which time no persecution was yet stirring in Rome against the christians, through the commandement of the emperour. Ex Suet. in Vita Tiberij.

Cæsar Caligula.

In the raigne also of this emperor, and yere which was the next after the passion of our Sauior, or somewhat more, saint Paul was conuerted to the faith. After the death of Tiberius, when he had raigned three & twentie yéeres, succeeded C. Cæsar Caligula, Claudius Nero, & Domitius Nero: which three were likewise such scourges to the senat and people of Rome, that the first not only toke other mens wiues violently from them, but also defloured three of his own sisters, and afterward banished them. So wicked he was, that he commanded himselfe to be worshipped as god, and temples to be erected in his name, and vsed to sit in the temple among the gods, requiring his images to be set vp in all temples, and also in the temple of Hierusalem, which caused great disturbance among the Iews, and then began the abominatian of desolation to be set vp in the holy place, spoken of in the gospell. His cruell condition, or else displeasure was such toward the Romans, that he wished that all the people of Rome had but one necke, that he at his pleasure might destroy such a multitude. By this said Caligula, Herod the murtherer of John Baptist, and condemner of Christ, was condemned to perpetuall banishment, where hee died miserablie. Caiphas also, which wickedly sat vpon Christ, was the same time removed from the high priests rome, and Jonathan set in his place. The raging fierrenes of this Caligula incensed against the Romans, had not thus ceased, had not he been cut off by the hands of a tribune and other gentlemen, which slue him in the fourth yéere of his raigne. After whose death was found in his closet two little libels, one called a sword, the other the dagger: in the which libels were contained the names of those senators and noblemen of Rome, whom he had purposed to put to death. Besides this sword and dagger, there was found also a cofter, wherein diuers kinds of poison were kept in glasses and vessels for the purpose, to destroy a wonderful number of people; which poisons afterward being throwne into the sea, destroyed a great number of fish. But that which this Caligula had only conceiued, the same did the other two which came after bring to passe, Claudius Nero, who raigned thirteene yéeres with no little crueltie, but especially the third of these Neroes called Domitius Nero, which succéeding after Claudius, reigned fourtéene yéeres, with such furie and tyrannie, that he slue the most part of the senators, he destroyed the whole order of knighthood in Rome. So prodigious a monster of nature was he, more like a beast, yea rather a diuel then a man, that he séemed to be borne to the destruction of men. Such was his monstrous vncleannesse, that he abstained not from his own mother, his naturall sister, nor from any degrée of kindred. Such was his wretched cruelties, that he caused to be put to death his mother, his brother in law, his sister, his wife great with child, also his instructor Seneca and Lucane, with diuers more of his owne kindred and consanguinitie. Moreouer, he commanded Rome to be set on fire in tweelue places, and so continued it fire daies and seuen nights in burning, while that he to sée the example how Troy burned, sang the verses of Homer. And to auoid the infamie therof, he laid the fault vpon the christian men, and caused them to be persecuted. And so continued this miserable emperour in his reigne fouretéene yeeres, till at last the senat proclaming him a publike enemie vnto mankind, condemned him to be drawne through the citie, and to be whipped to death. For the feare whereof, he flying the hands of his enemies, in the night fled to a manor of his seruants in the countrie, where he was forced to slay himselfe, complaining that he had then neither friend nor enemie left that would doe so much for him. In the latter end of this Domitius Nero, Peter and Paul were put to death for the testimony & faith of Christ. Anno sixtie nine.

Thus ye sée, which is worthie to be marked, how the iust scourge and heauie indignation of God from time to time euer followeth there, and how all things there go to ruine, neither doth any thing well prosper, where Christ Jesus the sonne of God is contemned & not receiued, as by these examples may appeare, both of Romans which not only were thus consumed and plagued by their owne emperors, but also by ciuill wars, whereof three were fought in two yeres at Rome after the death of Nero, and other casualties (as in Sueton is testified) so that in the daies of Tiberius afore said, fiue thousand Romans were hurt and slaine at one time by fall of a theatre. And also most especially by the destruction of the Iewes, which about this same time, in the yéere three score and thirtéene, and forty yéeres after the passion of Christ, and the third yéere after the suffering of S. Peter and Paul, were destroyed by Titus and Uespasian his father (who succéeded after Nero in the empire) to the number of eleuen hundred thousand, besides them which Uespasian slue in subduing the countrie of Galile, ouer and beside them also which were sold and sent into Egypt and other prouinces to vile slauery, to the number of seuentéene thousand. Two thousand were brought with Titus in his triumph, of which, part he gaue to be deuoured of the wild beasts, part otherwise most cruelly were slaine. By whose case all nations & realmes may take example, what it is to reiect the visitation of Gods veritie being sent, and much more to persecute them which bee sent of God for their saluation.

A note for all realmes to marke.

The Romans for contemning

And as this wrathfull vengeance of God thus hath been shewed vpon this rebellious people, both of the Iewes and of the Romans, for their contempt of Christ, whom God so punished by their owne emperors: so neither the emperors themselues, for persecuting Christ in his members, escaped without their iust reward. For amongst so many emperors, which put so many christian martyrs to death, during the space of these first three hundred yéeres, few or none of them escaped either not slaine themselues, or by some miserable end or other worthilie reuenged. First, of the poisoning of Tiberius, and of the slaughter of the other three Neroes after him, sufficiently is declared before. After Nero, Domitius Galba within seuen moneths was slaine by Otho. And so did Otho afterward slay himselfe, being ouercome by Uitellus. And was not Uitellus shortly after drawne through the citie of Rome, and after he was tormented was throwne into Tiber? Titus a good emperor is thought to be poisoned of Domitian his brother. The said Domitian after he had been a persecutor of the christians, was slaine in his chamber, not without the consent of his wife. Likewise Commodus was murdered of Marcillus. The like end was of Pertinax and Julianus. Moreouer, after that Seuerus was slaine here in England, and lieth at Yorke, did not his sonne Basilianus slay his brother Geta, and he after slaine of Martialis? Macrinus with his sonne Diadumenus were both slaine of their owne souldiers. After whom Heliogabalus that monsterous bellipanch, was of his owne people slaine, and drawne through the citie and cast into Tiber. Alexander Seuerus that worthie & learned emperor, which said hee would not feed his seruants doing nothing, with the bowels of the common wealth, although in life and vertues was much vnlike other emperors, yet procured the like end, being slaine at Mentz with his godly mother Mammea, by Maximinus, whom the emperor before of a muletor had aduanced to great dignities. The which Maximinus also after three yéeres was slaine himselfe of his souldiers. What should I speake of Maximus and Balbinus in like sort both slaine in Rome? Of Gordian slaine by Philip: of Philip the first christened emperor, slaine or rather martyred for the same cause: of wicked Decius drowned, and his sonne slaine the same time in battell: of Gallus and Volusianus his sonne, emperors after Decius, both slaine by conspiracie of Aemilianus, who rose against them both in warre, and within three moneths after was slaine himselfe. Next to Aemilianus succéeded Valerianus and Galienus his son, of whom Valerianus (who was a persecutor of the christians) was taken prisoner of the Persians, and there made a riding stole of Sapores their king, who vsed him for a stole to leape vpon his horse, while his sonne Galienus sléeping at Rome, either would not, or could not once prefer to reuenge his fathers ignominie. For after the taking of Valerian, so many emperors rose vp as were prouinces in the Roman monarchie. At length Galienus also was killed by Aureolus which warred against him. It were too long here to speak of Aurelianus another persecutor, slaine of his secretarie; of Tacitus and Florinus his brother, of whom the first raigned fiue moneths and was slaine at Pontus, the other raigned two moneths & was murthered at Tarsis: of Probus, who although a good ciuill emperor, yet was he destroyed by his souldiers. After whom Carus the next emperor was slaine by lightning. Next to Carus followed the impious and wicked persecutor Diocletian, with his fellowes Maximian, Valerius, Maximinus, Marentius, and Licinius, vnder whom all at one time (during the time of Diocletian) the greatest and most grieuous persecution was moued against the christian ten yéeres together. Of which Diocletian and Maximian deposed themselues from the empire. Galerius the chiefest minister of the persecution, after his terrible persecutions, fell into a wonderfull sicknesse, hauing such a sore risen in the nether part of his bellie, which consumed his priuie members, and so did swarme with wormes, that being not curable neither by surgerie nor physicke, hee confessed that it happened for his crueltie toward the Christians, and so called in his proclamations against them. Notwithstanding, he not able to sustaine (as some say) the stinke of his sore slue himselfe. Maximinus in his warre, being tormented with paine in his guts, there died. Marentius was banquished by Constantine, and drowned in Tiber. Licinius likewise being ouercome by the said Constantine the great, was deposed from his empire, and afterward slaine of his souldiers. But on the other side, after the time of Constantine, when as the faith of Christ was receiued into the imperiall seat, we read of no emperor after the like sort destroyed or molested, except it were Julianus or Basilius which expelled one Zeno, and was afterward expelled himselfe, or Valens. Beside these we reade of no emperor to come to ruine and decay, as the others before mentioned. Ex lib. hist. tripart.

And thus haue we in briefe summe collected out of the chronicles, the vnquiet & miserable state of the emperors of Rome, vntill the time of christian Constantine, with the examples no lesse terrible then manifest, of Gods seuere iustice vpon them, for their contemptuous refusing and persecuting the faith and name of Christ their Lord.

I could also infer of this our countrie of England, concerning the terrible plagues of God against the churlish and vnthankfull refusing or abusing the benefit of his truth. First, we reade how that God stirred vp Gildas to preach to the old Britains, and to exhort them vnto repentance & amendment of life, and afore to warne them of plagues to come if they repented not. What auailed it? Gildas was laughed to scorne, and taken for a false prophet, and a malicious preacher. The Britans with lustie courages, whorish faces, and vnrepentant harts went forth to sin, and to offend the Lord their God. What followed? God sent in their enemies on euery side and destroyed them, & gaue the land to other nations. Not many yeres past, God seeing idolatrie, superstition, hypocrisie, & wicked liuing vsed in this realme, raised vp that godly learned man John Wickliffe, to preach vnto our fathers repentance, and to exhort them to amend their liues, to forsake their papistrie and idolatrie, their hypocrisie, superstition, and to walke in the feare of God. His exhortations were not regarded, he with his sermons was despised, his bookes and he himselfe after his death were burnt. What followed? They slue their right king, and set vp three wrong kings on a row, vnder whom all the noble bloud was slaine vp, and halfe the commons thereto, what in France, and with their owne sword in fighting among themselues for the crowne, and the cities and townes decaied, and the land brought halfe to a wildernesse, in respect of that it was before. O extreame plagues of Gods vengeance! Since that time, euen of late yeres, God once againe hauing pitie of this realme of England, raised vp his prophets, namely William Tindall, Thomas Bilney, John Frith, doctor Barnes, Jerome Barret, Anthonie Person, with diuers others, which both with their writings and sermons earnestly laboured to call vs vnto repentance, that by this meanes the fierce wrath of God might be turned away from vs. But how were they intreated? How were their painefull labours regarded? They themselues were condemned and burnt as heretikes, and their bookes condemned and burnt as heretical. The time shall come, saith Christ, that whosoeuer killeth you, will thinke that he doth God high good seruice. Whether any thing since that time hath chanced to this realme worthie the name of a plague, let the godly wise iudge. If God hath deferred his punishment, or forgiuen vs these our wicked deeds, as I trust he hath, let vs not therefore be proud and high minded, but most humblie thanke him for his tender mercies, and beware of the like vngodly enterprises hereafter. Neither is it here any need to speake of these our lower and latter times, which haue been in king Henries and king Edwards daies, seeing the memorie thereof is yet fresh and cannot be forgotten. But let this passe, of this I am sure, that God yet once againe is come on visitation to this church of England, yea and that more louingly and beneficially then euer he did before. For in this visitation he hath redressed many abuses, and clensed his church of much vngodlinesse and superstition, and made it a glorious church, if it be compared to the old forme and state. And now how gratefull receiuers we be, with what heart, studie and reuerence wee embrace that which he hath giuen, that I referre either to them that see our fruits, or to the sequele, which peraduenture will declare. But this by the way of digression. Now to regresse againe to the state of the first former times. It remaineth, that as I haue set forth the iustice of God vpon these Roman persecutors: so now wee declare their persecutions raised vp against the people and seruants of Christ, within the space of three hundred yeres after Christ. Which persecutions in number commonly are counted to bee ten, besides the persecutions first moued by the Iewes in Hierusalem and other places against the apostles. In the which, first Saint Stephan the deacon was put to death, with diuers others mo, in the same rage of time either slaine, or cast into prison. At the doing whereof, Saul the same time plaied the doughtie Pharisie, being not yet conuerted to the faith of Christ, whereof the historie is plaine in the Acts of the apostles set forth at large by S. Luke.

After the martyrdome of this blessed Stephan, suffered next James the holy apostle of Christ, and brother of John. Of which James, mention is made in the Acts of the apostles the twelfth chapter. Where is declared, how that not long after the stoning of Stephan, king Herod stretched forth his hand, to take and afflict certaine of the congregation: among whom James was one, whom he slue with the sword, &c. Of this James, Eusebius also inferreth mention, alleaging Clement, thus writing a memorable storie of him. This James (saith Clement) when he was brought to the tribunall seat, he that brought him (and was the cause of his trouble) seeing him to be condemned, and that he should suffer death: as he went to the execution, he being moued therewith in heart and conscience, confessed himselfe also of his owne accord to be a christian. And so were they led forth together, where in the way he desired of James to forgiue him that he had done. After that James had a little paused with him vpon the matter, turning to him; Peace (saith he) be to thee brother, and kissed him, and both were beheaded together, in the yeere of our Lord thirtie and fiue.

Dorotheus in his booke named Synopsis testifieth, that Nicanor one of the seuen deacons, with two thousand others which beleeued in Christ, suffered also the same day, when as Stephan did suffer.

The said Dorotheus witnesseth also of Simon, another of the deacons, bishop afterward of Bostrum in Arabia, there to bee burned. Parmenias also another of the deacons suffered.

Thomas preached to the Parthians, Medes, and Persians, also to the Germans, Hyraconies, Bactries, and Magies. Hee suffered in Calamina a citie of Juda, being slaine with a dart.

Simon Zelotes preached at Mauritania, and in the countrie of Afrike, and in Britania, he was likewise crucified.

Judas brother of James, called also Thaddeus, and Lebeus, preached to the Edessens, and to all Mesopotamia, he was slaine vnder Augarus, king of the Edessens in Berito.

Simo called Cananeus, which was brother to Jude aboue mentioned, & to James the younger, which all were the sonnes of Mary Cleopha, and of Alpheus, was bishop of Hierusalem after James, and was crucified in a citie of Egypt in the time of Traianus emperour, as Dorotheus recordeth. But Abdias writeth, that hee with his brother Jude, were both slaine by a tumult of the people in Suanir a citie of Parthis.

Marke the euangelist, and first bishop of Alexandria, preached the gospell in Egypt, and there drawne with ropes vnto the fire, was burned, and afterward buried in a place called there Bucolus, vnder the raigne of Traianus emperour.

Bartholomeus is said also to preach to the Indians, and to haue conuerted the gospell of saint Matthew into their tongue, where he continued a great space doing many miracles. At last in Albania a citie of greater Armenia, after diuers persecutions, he was beaten downe with staues, then crucified, and after being excoriat, he was at length beheaded. Iohn De monte regali.

Of Andrew the apostle and brother to Peter thus writeth Hierome in his booke De catalogo scriptorum eccles. Andrew the brother of Peter (in the time & reigne of Vespasianus, as our ancestors haue reported) did preach in the fourescore yeere of our Lord Jesu Christ to the Scythians, Sogdians, to the Sarons: and in a citie which is called Angustia, where the Ethiopians doe now inhabit. He was buried in Patris a citie of Achais, being crucified of Egeas the gouernour of the Edessians. Hitherto writeth Hierome, although in the number of yeres he seemeth a little to misse: for Vespasianus reached not to the fourescore yeere after Christ. But Bernard in his second sermon, and saint Cyprian in his booke De duplici martyrio, doe make mention of the confession and martyrdome of this blessed apostle, whereof partly out of these, partly out of other credible writers we haue collected after this manner: that, When as Andrew being conuersant in a citie of Achaia called Patris through his diligent preaching had brought many to the faith of Christ: Egeas the gouernour knowing this, resorted thither, to the intent he might constraine as many as did beleeue Christ to be God, by the whole consent of the senat, to doe sacrifice vnto the idols, and so giue diuine honor vnto them. Andrew thinking good at the beginning to resist the wicked counsell, and the doings of Egeas, went vnto him, saying in this effect vnto him: that, It behoued him which was iudge of men, first to know his iudge which dwelleth in heauen, and then to worship him being knowne, and so in worshipping the true God, to reuoke his mind from false gods and blind idols. These words spake Andrew to the consull.

But he greatly therewith discontented, demanded of him whether he was the same Andrew that did ouerthrow the temple of the gods, and perswaded men of that superstitious sect, which the Romans of late had commanded to be abolished and reiected. Andrew did plainly affirme that the princes of the Romans did not vnderstand the truth, and that the sonne of God comming from heauen into the world for mans sake, hath taught and declared how those idols, whom they so honoured as gods, were not onely not gods, but also most cruell diuels, enemies to mankind, teaching the people nothing else but wherewith God is offended, and being offended turneth away and regardeth them not, and so by the wicked seruice of the diuell doe fall headlong into all wickednesse, and after their departing, nothing remaineth vnto them, but their euill deeds.

But the proconsull esteeming these things to be as vaine, especially seeing the Iewes (as hee said) had crucified Christ before, therefore charged and commanded Andrew not to teach and preach such things any more; or if he did, that hee should be fastened to the crosse with all speed.

Andrew abiding in his former mind very constant, answered thus concerning the punishment which he threatned: He would not haue preached the honour and glorie of the crosse, if hee had feared the death of the crosse. Whereupon sentence of condemnation was pronounced, that Andrew teaching and enterprising a new sect, and taking away the religion of their gods, ought to be crucified. Andrew comming to the place, and seeing a farre off the crosse prepared, did change neither countenance nor colour, as the vnbecillitie of mortall men is wont to doe, neither did his bloud shrinke, neither did he faile in his speech, his bodie fainted not, neither was his mind molested, his vnderstanding did not faile him, as it is the maner of men to do, but out of the abundance of his heart his mouth did speake; and feruent charitie did appeare in his words as kindled sparkes: he said, O crosse most welcome and long looked for; with a willing mind, ioyfully and desirously I come to thee, being the scholer of him which did hang on thee: because I haue been alwaies thy louer, and haue coueted to embrace thee. James bishop of Ierusalem.

Of Iames the brother of the Lord thus we reade in the storie of Clement and Egesippus.

After that Festus had sent the apostle Paul to Rome after his appellation made at Cesaria, and that the Iewes by the means thereof had lost their hope of performing their malicious vow against him conceiued, they fell vpon Iames the brother of our Lord, who was bishop at Ierusalem, against whom they being bent with like malice, brought him forth before them, and required him to denie before all the people the faith of Christ. But he otherwise then they all looked for, freelie and with a greater constancie before all the multitude confessed Iesus to be the sonne of God, our Sauiour, and our Lord. Whereupon, they not being able to abide the testimony of this man any longer, because he was thought to be the iustest among them all, for the highnesse of diuine wisdome and godlinesse, which in liuing he declared, they killed him, finding the more opportunitie to accomplish their mischiefe, because the kingdome the same time was vacant. For Festus being dead in Iewry, the administration of that prouince was destitute of a ruler, and a deputie. But after what manner Iames was killed, the words of Clement doe declare, which writeth that he was cast downe from the pinacle of the temple, and being smitten with the instrument of a fuller, was slaine: but Egesippus which liued in the time next after the apostles, describeth the cause diligently in his fifth commentarie, after this maner as followeth.

Ex Clemente.

Ex Egesippo in commentario.

Iames the brother of our Lord tooke in hand to gouerne the church after the apostles, being counted of all men from the time of our Lord to be a iust and perfect man. Many & diuers other Iameses there were beside him, but this was borne holy from his mothers wombe, he drunke no wine nor any strong drinke, neither did he eat any liuing creature, the rasor neuer came vpon his head, he was not anointed with oile, neither did he vse bath, to him onely was it lawfull to enter into the holie place, neither was he clothed with woollen cloth, but with silke, and hee onlie entred into the temple, falling vpon his knees, asking remission for the people, so that his knees by oft kneeling lost the sense of feeling, being benummed and hardened like the knees of a camell. He was (for worshipping God and craning forgiuenesse for the people) called iust, and for the excellencie of his iust life named Oblias, which (if you doe interpret it) is the safegard and iustice of the people, as the prophets declare of him: therefore when as many of the heretiks which were among the people asked him what maner of dore Iesus should be, he answered that he was the Sauior. Whereof some do beleeue him to be Iesus Christ, but the aforesaid heretiks neither beleeue the resurrection, neither that any shall come, which shall render vnto euery man according to his works, but as many as beleeue, they beleeued for Iames his cause. When as many therefore of the princes did beleeue, there was a tumult made of the Scribes, Iews and Pharisies, saying: It is dangerous least that all the people doe looke for this Iesus, as for Christ. Therefore they gathered themselues together, and said to Iames: We beseech thee restraine the people, for they beleeue in Iesus, as though he were Christ, we pray thee perswade them all which come vnto the feast of the passeouer of Iesus, for we are all obedient vnto thee, and all the people do testifie of thee that thou art iust, neither that thou doest accept the person of any man, therefore perswade the people that they be not deceiued in Iesus, and all the people and we will obay thee: therefore stand vpon the pillar of the temple, that thou maiest be seene from aboue, and that thy words may be perceiued of all the people, for to this passeouer all the tribes do come with all the countrie. And thus the forenamed Scribes and Pharisies did set Iames vpon the battlements of the church, and they cried vnto him & said: Thou iust man whom all we ought to obey, because this people is led after Iesus, which is crucified, tell what is the doore of Iesus crucified. And he answered with a great voice, What do you aske me of Iesus the sonne of man, seeing that he sitteth on the right hand of God in heauen, and shall come in the clouds of the skie? But when many were perswaded of this, they glorified God vpon the witnesse of Iames, and said: Osanna in the highest to the sonne of Dauid. Then the Scribes & the Pharisies said among themselues, We haue done euill that we haue caused such a testimonie of Iesus, but let vs goe vp and let vs take him, that they being compelled with feare, may deny that faith. And they cried out, saying: O, O, this iust man also is seduced, and they fulfilled that scripture which is spoken of in Esay: Let vs take away the iust man, because he is not profitable for vs, wherefore let them eat the fruits of their works. Therefore they went vp to throw downe the iust man, and said among themselues: Let vs stone this iust man Iames, and they tooke him to smite him with stones, for he was not yet dead when he was cast downe. But he turning, fell downe vpon his knees, saying: O Lord God, father, I beseech thee to forgiue them, for they know not what they doe. Esay 3.

But when they had smitten him with stones, one of the priests of the children of Rechas, the sonne of Charobim, spake to them the testimonie which is in Ieremie the prophet: Leaue off, what doe ye? The iust man prayeth for you. And one of those which were present tooke a fullers instrument, wherewith they did vse to beat and purge cloth, and smote the iust man on his head, and so he finished his martyrdome, and they buried him in the same place, and his pillar abideth yet by the temple. He was a true testimonie to the Iewes and the Gentiles. And shortly after, Uespasianus the emperour destroying the land of Iewrie, brought them into captiuitie. These things being thus written at large of Egesippus, doe well agree to those which Clement did write of him. This James was so notable a man, that for his iustice he was had in honour of all men, in so much that the wise men of the Iewes, shortly after his martyrdom, did impute the cause of the besieging of Ierusalem & other calamities which happned vnto them, to no other cause, but vnto the violence and iniury done to this man. Also Iosephus hath not left this out of his history, where he speaketh of him after this manner: These things so chanced vnto the Iewes for a vengeance, because of that iust man Iames which was the brother of Iesus, whom they called Christ, for the Iewes killed him, although he was a righteous man. Luke 23.

Iosephus lib. 20.

The same Iosephus declareth his death in the same booke and chapter, saying: Cesar hearing of the death of Festus, sent Albinus the lieutenant into Iury: but Ananus the younger being bishop, and of the sect of the Saduces, trusting that he had obtained a conuenient time, seeing that Festus was dead, and Albinus entred on his iournie, he called a councell, and calling many vnto him, among whom was Iames by name the brother of Iesu which is called Christ, he stoned them, accusing them as breakers of the law.

Whereby it appeareth, that many other besides Iames also at the same time were martyred and put to death among the Iewes, for the faith of Christ.

A description of the ten first persecutions in the primitiue church, with a liuely portraiture of the variety of their torments.

The first tenne persecutions in the primitiue church.

These things being thus declared for the martyrdome of the apostles, and the persecution of the Iewes: now let vs (by the grace of Christ our Lord) comprehend with like brentie, the persecutions raised by the Romans against the christians in the primitiue age of the church during the space of three hundred yeeres, till the comming of godly Constantine, which persecutions are reckoned of Eusebius, and by the most part of writers, to the number of tenne most speciall.

The sundrie torments of the holy martyrs in the primitiue church.

Wherein maruellous it is to see and read the numbers incredible of christian innocents that were slaine and tormented, some one way, some another, as Rabanus saith, and saith truelie, Alij ferro perépti. Alij flammis exusti. Alij flagris verberati. Alij

Whole kinds of punishments although they were diuers, yet the maner of constancie in all these martyrs was one. And yet notwithstanding the sharpnesse of these so many and sundrie torments, and like cruelnes of the tormentors, yet such was the number of these constant saints that suffered, or rather such was the power of the Lord in his saints, that as Hierom in his epistle to Cromatius & Heliodorus saith: Nullus esset dies qui nõ vltra quinque millium numerũ martyrum reperiri posset adscriptus, excepto die calẽdarũ Ianuarij: that is, There is no day in the whole yere, vnto which the number of fiue thousand martyrs cannot be ascribed, except only the first day of Januarie.

Histor. eccle. lib. 2. cap. 24. 25. 26.

THe first of these ten persecutions was stirred vp by Nero Domitius, the sixth emperor before mentioned, about the yeare of our Lord three score & seuen. The tyrannous rage of which emperor was so fierce against the christians (as Eusebius recordeth) Vsque adeò vt videres repletas humanis corporibus ciuitates, iacentes mortuos simul cum paruulis senes, fœminarumque absque vlla sexus reuerentia nudata in publico reiectaque starent cadauera: that is, Insomuch that a man might then see cities lie full of mens bodies, the old there lying together with the yong, and the dead bodies of women cast out naked, without all reuerence of that sex in the open streets, &c.

Oroſius. lib. 7.

Likewise Orosius writing of the said Nero saith: that He was the first which in Rome did raise vp persecution against the christians, and not onely in Rome, but also through all the prouinces thereof, thinking to abolish and to destroy the whole name of christians in all places, &c. Whereunto accordeth moreouer the testimonie of Hierome vpon Daniel, saying: that Many there were of the christians in those daies, which seeing the filthie abominations, and intollerable crueltie of Nero, thought that he should be antichrist, &c.

Nero thought to be antichrist.

Saint Peter the apostle crucified at Rome.

In this persecution, among many other saints, the blessed apostle Peter was condemned to death, and crucified as some do write at Rome; albeit othersome, and not without cause, do doubt thereof: concerning whose life and historie, because it is sufficiently described in the text of the gospell, and in the acts of saint Luke, chapter 4. 5. 12. I need not here to make any great repetition therof. As touching the cause & maner of his death, diuers there be which make relation, as Hierome, Egesippus, Eusebius, Abdias, & others, although they doe not all precisely agree in the time. The words of Hierome be these: Simon Peter the sonne of Iona, of the prouince of Galile, & of the towne of Bethsaida, the brother of Andrew, &c. after hee had been bishop of the church of Antioch, and had preached to the dispersion of them that beleeued, of the circumcision in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithinia, in the second yere of Claudius the emperor (which was about the yeare of our Lord fortie and foure) came to Rome to withstand Simon Magus, and there kept the priestly chaire the space of fiue and twentie yeares, vntill the last yeare of the foresaid Nero, which was the fourteenth yeare of his reigne, of whom he was crucified, his head being downe, and his feete vpward, himselfe so requiring, because he was (he said) vnworthie to be crucified after the same forme and manner as the Lord was, &c. Egesippus prosecuting this matter something more at large, and Abdias also (if any authoritie is to be giuen to his booke, who following not onely the sense, but also the very forme of words of Egesippus in this historie, seemeth to be extracted out of him, & of other authors) saith, that Simon Magus being then a great man with Nero, and his president and keeper of his life, was required vpon a time to be present at the raising vp of a certaine noble yong man in Rome of Neroes kindred lately departed: whereas Peter also was desired to come to the reuiuing of the said personage. But when Magus in the presence of Peter could not do it, then Peter calling vpon the name of the Lord Jesus did raise him vp, and restored him to his mother, whereby the estimation of Simon Magus began greatly to decay, and to bee detested in Rome. Not long after the said Magus threatned the Romans that he would leaue the citie, and in their sight flie away from them into heauen. So the day being appointed Magus taking his wings in the mount Capitolinus, began to flie in the aire: but Peter by the power of the Lord Jesus brought him downe with his wings headlong to the ground, by the which fall his legs and ioints were broken, and hee thereupon died. Then Nero sorrowing for the death of him, sought matter against Peter to put him to death. Which when ỳ people perceiued, they intreated Peter with much adoe that hee would flie the citie. Peter through their importunitie at length perswaded, prepared himselfe to auoid. But comming to the gate he saw the Lord Christ come to mẽte him, to whom he worshipping said: Lord whither dost thou go? To whom he answered and said, I am come againe to be crucified. By this Peter perceiuing his suffering to be vnderstanded, returned backe into the city againe, and so was he crucified in maner as is before declared. And this out of Egesippus.

Eusebius moreouer writing of the death not only of Peter but also of his wife, affirmeth that Peter seeing his wife going to hir martyrdome (belike as he was yet hanging vpon the crosse) was greatly ioyous and glad thereof, who crying vnto hir with a loud voice, and calling hir by hir name, bad hir remember the Lord Jesus. Such was then (saith Eusebius) the blessed bond of mariage among the saints of God. And thus much of Peter.

Paul the apostle, which before was called Saul, after his great trauell and vnspeakeable labours in promoting the gospell of Christ, suffred also in this first persecution vnder Nero, and was beheaded. Of whom thus writeth Hierome in his booke De viris illustribus. Paul, otherwise called Saul, one of the apostles, yet out of the number of twelue, was of the tribe of Beniamin, and of a towne of Jewrie called Giscalis, which towne being taken of the Romans, he with his parents fled to Tharsus a towne of Cilicia; afterward was sent vp by his parents to Jerusalem, and there brought vp in the knowledge of the law, at the feet of Gamaliel, and was at the death of Stephan a doer. And when he had receiued letters from the high priest to persecute the christians, by the way going to Damascus he was stricken downe of the Lords glorie, and of a persecutor was made a professor, an apostle, a martyr, a witnesse of the gospell, and a vessell of election.

Among his other manifold labors and trauels in spreading the doctrine of Christ, he wan Sergius Paulus the proconsull of Cyprus to the faith of Christ, whereupon he tooke his name, as some suppose, turned from Saulus to Paulus. After he had passed through diuers places and countries in his laborious peregrinations, he tooke to him Barnabas, and went vp to Jerusalem to Peter, James, and John, where he was ordained and sent out with Barnabas to preach vnto the Gentiles.

Saulus turned to Paulus.

Paul sent to the Gentiles.

And because it is in the acts of the apostles sufficiently comprehended, concerning the admirable conuersion, and conuersation of this most worthie apostle, that which remaineth of the rest of his historie, I will here adde, how the said apostle Paul the 25. yeare after the passion of the Lord in the second yeare of Nero, at what time Festus ruled in Jewrie, was sent vp in bonds to Rome, where he remaining in his free hostelrie two yeares together, disputed daily against the Jewes, proouing Christ to be come. And here is to be noted, that after his first answere or purgation there made at Rome, the emperor Nero not yet fullie confirmed in his empire, and yet not bursting out into those mischiefes which historiers report of him, hee was at that time by Nero discharged, and dismissed to preach the gospell in the west parts and about the coast of Italie, as he himselfe writing vnto Timothie, afterward in his second apprehension, in his second epistle witnesseth, saying: In my first purgation no man stood with me, but did all forsake me, the Lord lay it not to their charge but the Lord stood with me and did comfort me, that the preaching of his word might proceed by me, and that all the Gentiles might heare and be taught, and I was deliuered out of the lions mouth, &c. In which place by the lion he plainly meaneth Nero. And afterward likewise saith: I was deliuered from the mouth of the lion, &c. And againe, The Lord hath deliuered me out from all euill workes, and hath saued me vnto his heauenly kingdome, &c: speaking this, because he perceiued then the time of his martyrdome to bee neare at hand. For in the same epistle before, he saith: I am now offered vp, and the time of my dissolution draweth on.

2. Tim. 4.

Thus then, this worthy preacher and messenger of the Lord, in the fourteenth yeare of Nero, and the same day in which Peter was crucified (although not in the same yeare as some write, but in the next yeare following) was beheaded at Rome for the testimonie of Christ, and was buried in the way of Ostia, the seuen and thirtith yeare after the passion of the Lord. He wrote nine epistles to seuen churches, to the Romans one, to the Corinthians two, to the Galathians one, to the Ephesians one, to the Philippians one, to the Colossians one, to the Thessalonians two. Moreouer he wrote to his disciples, to Timothie two, to Titus one, to Philemon one.

The epistles of saint Paul to seuen churches.

The epistle which beareth the title to the Hebrues, is not thought to be his, for the difference of the stile and phrase, but either iudged to be written of Timothie as Tertullian supposeth, or of saint Luke as others do thinke: or else of Clement afterward bishop of Rome, who as they say, was adioined with Paul, and compiling together his sayings and sentences, did phrase them in his stile and maner. Or else, as some do iudge, because S. Paul wrote vnto the Hebrues, for the odiousnes of his name among that people, therefore he dissembled, and confessed felled his name in the first entrie of his salutation, contrarie to his accustomed condition. And as he wrote to the Hebrues he being an Hebrue, so hee wrote in Hebrue, that is, his owne tongue more eloquently. And that is thought to bee the cause why it differeth from his other epistles, and is after a more eloquent manner translated into the Græcke then his other epistles be. Some also read the epistle written to Laodicea, but that is exploded of all men. Thus much Hierome.

The epistle to Laodicea.

As touching the time and order of the death and martyrdome of S. Paul, as Eusebius, Hierome, Maximus and other authors do but briefly passe ouer: so Abdias (if his booke be of any substantiall authoritie) speaking more largely of the same, doth say: that after the crucifying of Peter, and the ruine of Simon Magus, Paul yet remaining in free custodie, was dimissed and deliuered at that time from martyrdome by Gods permission, that all the Gentiles might be replenished with preaching of the gospell by him.

Abdias de viris. lib. 2.

And the same Abdias proceeding in his storie, declareth moreouer, that as Paul was thus occupied at Rome, he was accused to the emperor, not onely for teaching new doctrine, but also for stirring vp sedition against the empire. For this he being called before Nero, and demanded to shew the order and maner of his doctrine, there declared what his doctrine was. To teach all men peace & charitie, how to loue one another, how to preuent one another in honor; Rich men not to be puft in pride, nor to put their trust in their treasures, but in the liuing God; Meane men to be contented with food and raiment, and with their present state, Poore men to reioice in their pouertie with hope; Fathers to bring vp their children in the feare of God, Children to obey their parents, Husbands to loue their wiues, Wiues to be subiect to their husbands, Citizens and subiects to giue their tribute vnto Cesar and to bee subiect to their magistrates, Maisters to be courteous not curtith to their seruants, Seruants to deale faithfully with their maisters: and this to be the sum of his teaching. Which his doctrine he receiued not of men nor by men, but by Iesus Christ, and the father of glorie, which spake to him from heauen, the Lord Iesus saying to him, that he should go and preach in his name, and that he would be with him, and would be the spirit of life to all that beleeued in him, and that whatsoeuer he did or said, he would iustifie it, &c. After that Paul had thus declared vnto the emperor, shortly after sentence of death was pronounced against him, that he should be beheaded. Vnto whose execution then Nero sent two of his esquiers, Ferega and Parthenius, to bring him word of his death. They comming to Paul, instructing them the people, desired him to pray for them that they might beleeue. Who told them ỹ shortly after they should beleeue, and bee baptised at his sepulchre (as Abdias writeth.) This done, the souldiers came and led him out of the citie to the place of execution, where hee after his prayers made, gaue his necke to the sword. Abdias reporteth, that as his head was stroken off, in stead of blood issued out white milke, and that at laying downe his head hee signed himselfe with the signe of a crosse in his forehead: but this being found in no other historie, Abdias seemeth either to adde of his own, or else to borrow out of the legend, as he doth many other things beside, whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) hereafter. Although the same miracle of milke flowing out of his necke, is referred also vnto Ambrose, who in his sermon threescore and eight (if it be not counterfeited) seemeth to affirme the same. Of the time and yeare when the blessed apostles did suffer, histories do not all agree. They that follow the common opinion, and the popes decrees say, that both Peter and Paul suffred both in one day and in one yeare: which opinion seemeth to be taken out of Dionysius bishop of Corinth. Hierom in his booke De viris illustr. affirmeth that they both suffred in one day, but he expresseth not the yeare. So doth Isidorus & Eusebius. Simon Metaphrastes bringeth in the opinion of some, which thinke that Paul suffred not with Peter, but after Peter. Prudentius in his Peristephano, noteth that they both were put to death vpon the same day, but not in the same yeare, and saith that Paul followed Peter a yeare after.

The storie of Abdias suspected.

Histories do varie about the time of their martyrdome.

If this be true Prudentius recordeth of Paul to suffer vnder Nero, and the yeare after Peter, then is it false which Hierome before testifieth, Peter to suffer the last yeare of Nero.

Abdias aboue mentioned, recordeth that Paul suffred two yeares after Peter. Moreouer, if it bee true which Abdias saith, that after the crucifying of Peter, Paul remained in his faire custodie at Rome, mentioned in the acts of the apostles, which was as Hierome witnesseth the third or fourth yeare of Nero, then must it be ten yeares betwixt the martyrdome of Peter and of Paul, for as much as it is by all writers confessed, that Paul suffred the fourteenth yeare, which was the last yeare of Nero. And so Abdias seemeth neither to agree with other authors, nor with himselfe. And thus much of the first persecution.

The second persecution.

The second persecution. Anno 69.

THe first Romane persecution beginning vnder Nero, as is aforesaid, ceased vnder Vespasianus, who gaue some rest to the poore christians. After whose raigne was moued not long after the second persecution, by the emperor Domitian brother of Titus. Of whom Eusebius and Orosius so write, that he first beginning mildly, afterward did so farre outrage in pride intollerable, that he commanded himselfe to be worshipped as God, and that images of gold and siluer in his honour should be set vp in Capitolio. The chiefest nobles of the senators, either vpon enuie, or for their goods, he caused to be put to death, some openly, and some hee sent into banishment, there causing them to be slaine priuily.

Ex Oroſio. lib. 7.

And as his tyranny was vnmeasurable, so the intemperancie of his life was no lesse. He put to death all the nephues of Iuda, called the Lords brother, and caused to be sought out, and to be slaine all that could be found of the stocke of Dauid (as Vespasian also did before him) for feare lest he were yet to come of the house of Dauid, which should enioy the kingdome. In the time of this persecutor, Simeon bishop of Ierusalem after other torments was crucified to death, whom Iustus afterward succeeded in that bishoprike.

The tyrannie and intemperance of Domitian.

Simeon bishop of Ierusalem crucified.

In this persecution John the apostle an euangelist was exiled by the said Domitianus into Pathmos. Of whom diuers and sundrie memorable acts be reported in sundrie chronicles. As first how he was put in a vessell of boiling oile, by the proconsull of Ephesus. The legend and Perionius say, it was done at Rome. Isidorus also writing of him and comprehending many things in few words, declareth that hee turned certaine pieces of wood into gold, and stones by the sea side into margarits, to satisfie the desire of two, whom he had before perswaded to renounce their riches: and afterward they repenting that for worldly treasure they had lost heauen, for their sakes againe he changed the same into their former substance. Also how he raised vp a widow & a certaine yong man from death to life. How he dranke poison and it hurt him not, raising also to life two which had dranke the same before. These and such other miracles, although they may be true, and are found in Isidorus and other writers more, yet because they are no articles of our christian beleefe, I let them passe, and onely content my selfe with that which I read in Eusebius, declaring of him in this wise: that in the fourteenth yeare after Nero, in the second persecution, in the daies of Domitian, John was banished into Pathmos for the testimonie of the word, in the yeare fourscore and seuentéene. And after the death of the forsaid Domitian being slaine, and his acts repealed by the senate, John was againe released vnder Pertinax the emperor, and came to Ephesus in the yeare one hundred. Where he continued vntill the time of Traianus, and there gouerned the churches in Asia, where also he wrote his gospell, and so liued till the yeare after the passion of our Lord threescore and eight, which was the yeare of his age one hundred and twentie.

John banished. John released out of banishment.

Moreouer, in the foresaid ecclesiasticall storie of Eusebius, we reade that John the apostle and euangelist, whom the Lord did loue, was in Asia, where he being returned out of Pathmos after the death of Domitian, gouerned the churches and congregations. Irenæus in his second booke thus writeth: And of him all the elders do witnesse, which were with John the disciple of the Lord in Asia, that he spake and wrote these things, &c: for there he continued with them vnto the time of Traianus, &c. Also the said Irenæus, lib. 3. Hypothes. in like words declareth, saying: The church of the Ephesians being first founded by Paul, afterward beeing confirmed of John (who continued in the same citie vnto the time of Traianus the emperor) is a true witnesse of this apostolicall tradition, &c. Clemens Alexandrinus moreouer noteth, both the time of this holy apostle, and also addeth to the same a certaine historie of him, not vnworthie to be remembred of such which delight in things honest and profitable. Of the which historie Sozomenus also in his commentaries maketh mention, the words of the author setting forth this historie be these: Heare a fable, and not a fable, but a true report which is told vs of John the apostle, deliuered and commended to our remembrance. After the death of the tyrant, when John was returned to Ephesus, from the Ile of Pathmos, he was desired to resort to the places bordering neere vnto him, partly to constitute bishops, partly to dispose the causes and matters of the church, partly to ordaine and set such of the clergie in office, whom the Holy-ghost should elect. Whereupon, when he was come to a certaine citie not far off, the name of which also many doe yet remember, and had among other things comforted the brethren, he looking more earnestly vpon him which was the chiefe bishop among them, beheld a yong man mightie in bodie, and of beautifull countenance, and of a feruent mind: I commend this man (saith hee) to thee with great diligence, in the witnesse heere of Christ and of the church.

Clemens Alexandrinus.

A notable historie of John the euangelist.

When the bishop had receiued of him this charge, and had promised his faithfull diligence therein againe the second time, John spake vnto him, and desired him in like maner and contestation as before. This done, John returned againe to Ephesus. The bishop receiuing the yong man, commended and committed to his charge, brought him home, kept him & nourished him, and at length also did illuminate (that is) he baptised him, and in short time through his diligence, brought him vnto such order and towardnesse, that he committed vnto him the ouersight of a certaine cure in the Lords behalfe. The yong man thus hauing more his libertie, it chanced that certaine of his companions and old familiars being idle, dissolute and accustomed of old time to wickednesse, did ioyne in companie with him, him, who first brought him to sumptuous and riotous bankets, then inticed him forth with them in the night to rob and steale, after that, he was allured by them vnto greater mischiefe and wickednesse. Wherin by custome of time by little and little, he being more practised, and being of a good wit, and a stout courage, like vnto a wild or an vnbroken horse, leauing the right way and running at large without bridle, was caried headlong to the profunditie of all misorder and outrage. And thus being past all hope of grace, vtterly forgetting and reiecting the wholesome doctrine of saluation, which hee had learned before, began to set his mind vpon no small matters. And forasmuch as he was entred so farre in the way of perdition, hee cared not how further he proceeded in the same. And so associating vnto him the companie of his companions, and fellow theeues, tooke vpon him to bee as head and captaine among them, in committing all kind of murther and felonie.

In the meane time it chanced that of necessitie John was sent for to those quarters againe, and came. The causes being decided, and his businesse ended for the which hee came, by the way meeting with the bishop afore specified, requireth of him the pledge, which in the witnesse of Christ and of the congregation then present he left in his hands to keepe. The bishop something amazed at the words of John, supposing hee had meant of some money committed to his custodie, which he had not receiued, and yet durst not mistrust John nor contrarie his words, could not tell what to answere. Then John perceiuing his doubting, and vttering his mind more plainly: The yong man (saith hee) and the soule of our brother committed to your custodie, I doe require. Then the bishop with a loud voice sorrowing and weeping said, Hee is dead. To whom John said, How and by what death? The other said, He is dead to God, for hee is become an euill man and pernicious, to bee briefe, a theefe: and now he doth frequent this mountaine with a companie of villaines and theeues like vnto himselfe against the church. But the apostle rent his garments, and with great lamentation said, I haue left a good keeper of my brothers soule, get me a horse, and let me haue a guide with mee, which being done, his horse and man procured, hasted from the church as much as he could, and comming to the same place was taken of theeues that watched. But hee neither flying nor refusing, said: I came for this same cause hither, lead me, said he, to your captaine. So he being brought, the captaine all armed, fiercely began to looke vpon him: and eftsoones comming to the knowledge of him, was stroken with confusion and shame, and began to fly. But the old man followed him as much as he might, forgetting his age and crying: My son why doest thou flie from thy father? an armed man from one naked, a young man from an old man? haue pitie on me my son and feare not, for there is yet hope of saluation, I will make an answere for thee vnto Christ, I will die for thee if need bee, as Christ hath died for vs, I will giue my life for thee, beleeue me, Christ hath sent me. Hee hearing these things, first as in a maze stood still, and therewith his courage was abated. After that he had cast downe his weapons, by and by he trembled yea and wept bitterly: and comming to the old man embraced him, and spake vnto him with weeping (as well as he could) being euen then baptized afresh with teares, onely his right hand being hid and couered. Then the apostle, after that he had promised and firmely ascertained him that he should obtaine remission of our Sauiour, and also prayed, falling downe vpon his knees, and kissed his murthering right hand, which for shame hee durst not shew before, as now purged through repentance, brought him to the congregation. And when he had prayed for him with continuall praier and daily fastings, and had comforted and confirmed his mind with many sentences, went not from him (as the author reporteth) before hee had restored him to the congregation againe, and made him a great example and triall of regeneration, and a token of the visible resurrection.

A notable lesson for all ministers to seeke againe their lost sheepe.

Vnspeakeable loue shewed out to a wicked sinner.

An example of the godly to flie the companie of the wicked.

Moreouer, the foresaid Irenæus in lib. 3. cap. 3. and Eusebius lib. 3. cap. 28. and lib. 4. cap. 14. prosecuting the history of John, declare in these words, saying: that there were certaine which heard Polycarpus say, that John the disciple of our Lord going into Ephesus to be washed, seeing Cerinthus within, hee leaped out of the bath vnbathed, because hee feared the bath should haue fallen, seeing that Cerinthus an enemie to the truth was within. Such feare had the apostles (saith Irenæus) that they would not communicate a word with them that adulterate the truth.

And forasmuch as we are here in hand with the storie of John the blessed euangelist, commeth in matter & occasion not 80 giuen by him, but taken of others, of a great doubt and difficultie, such as hath occupied all the catholike, subtill, illuminate, and seraphicall doctors of the popes catholike church, these fiue hundred yeares. The difficultie is this: That for so much as auricular confession hath been, and is yet receiued in the popes catholike church for an holy and necessarie sacrament, extending vniuersally to all and singular creatures christian: here then riseth a question, Who was our ladies confessor, or ghostly father? But that is decreed and confessed with full consent of all the catholikes to bee S. John. Whosoeuer denieth or doubteth of this, is straightwaies Ipso facto an heretike. This then so determined, ariseth another question or doubt, that seeing our Ladie was without al originall sinne, and also actuall or mortall: what need then had shee of any confessor? Or what should she confesse vnto him? For if shee had confessed any sinne, when she had none: then had she made hir selfe a lier, and so had sinned indeed. Here therefore (gentle reader) in this perplexitie these our illuminate doctors stand in need of thine aid to helpe at a pinch. Magnus Albertus the great Diuine, denieth not, but that she indeed, although most pure, yet was confessed to hir ghostly father, to keepe the obseruance of the law, appointed for such as had that need, which she had not. And therefore (saith hee) necessarie it was that shee should confesse with mouth. But then here is to bee asked, What did she say in her confession, when shee had nothing to confesse? To this Albertus answereth againe, and telleth vs plainly what she said in her confession, which was this: That she had receiued that great grace, not Ex condigno, that is, Not of any dignitie of hir owne, but yet notwithstanding of congruitie. And this was it (saith Albert) that shee said in her confession. Albert. cap. 74. super euang. Missus est, &c.

Moreouer, to helpe this case out of all doubt, commeth in 20 famous Thomas of Watring, and thus loseth the knot, much after like effect, saying: that As Christ, although he did owe nothing to the law, yet notwithstanding receiued circumcision, to giue to others example of humilitie and obedience: in like maner would our Ladie shew her selfe obedient to the obseruance of the law, albeit there was no cause why shee had any need thereof. And thus hast thou (gentle reader) this doubtfull question moued and soluted, to the intent I would reueale to thee some part of the deepe diuinitie of our catholike maisters, 30 that haue ruled and gouerned the church in these their late popish daies.

But breaking off this matter, to returne againe where we left, that is, to this foresaid second persecution vnder Domitianus. In which persecution, besides these afore mentioned, and many other innumerable godly martyrs, suffering for the like testimony of the Lord Jesus, was Flauia the daughter of Flauius Clemens, one of the Romane consuls, which Flauia with many others was banished out of Rome into the Ile Pontia, for the testimonie of the Lord Jesus, by the emperor Domitianus. Euseb. lib. 3. 40

Flauia the daughter of a consul, banished for the testimonie of Christ.

Ex Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 19.

This Domitianus feared the comming of Christ as Herod did, and therefore commanded them to be killed which were of the stocke of David in Jewrie. There were remaining aliue at that time certaine of the Lords kindred, which were the nephues of Jude, that was called the Lords brother after the flesh. These when the lieutenant of Jewrie had brought vp to Domitian to be slaine, the emperor demanded of them, whether they were of the stocke of David? Which when they had granted, he asked againe, what possessions, and what substance they had. They answered, that they both had no more betweene them in all, but nine and thirtie acres of ground, and how they gat their liuing, & sustained their families with the hard labors of their hands, shewing forth their hands vnto the emperor, being hard and rough, worne with labors, to witnesse that to bee true which they had spoken. Then the emperor inquiring of them concerning the kingdome of Christ, what maner of kingdome it was, how and when it should appeare? They answered that his kingdome was no worldly nor terren thing, but an heauenly and angelicall kingdome, and that it should appeare in the consummation and end of the world, what time he comming in glorie, should iudge the quicke and the dead, and render to euery one according to his deseruings. Domitian the emperor, hearing this (as the saying is) did not condemne them; but despising them as vile persons let them goe, and also staied the persecution then moued against the christians. They being thus discharged and dismissed, afterward had the gouernment of churches, being taken for martyrs, and as of the Lords stocke, and so continued in good peace till the time of Traianus. Hæc Egesip. & Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 20.

The emperor maketh inquirie for all that were of Dauids stocke.

Dauids stocke feared of the emperors.

The kingdome of Christ not of this world.

By this storie here recited may appeare, what were the 70 causes why the emperors of the Romane monarchie did so persecute the christians: which causes were chiefly these: feare and hatred. First, feare for that the emperors and senate of blind ignorance, not knowing the maner of Christs kingdome, feared & mistrusted lest the same would subuert their empetie, (like as the pope thinketh now that this gospel will ouerthrow his kingdome of maiestie) and therfore sought they all meanes possible, how by death and all kinds of torments vtterly to extinguish the name and memorie of the christians. And thereupon seemeth to spring the old law of the Romane senate: Non debere dimitti christianos, qui semel ad tribunal venissent, nisi propositum mutent: that is, that the christians should not bee let goe, which were once brought to the iudgement seate, except they changed their purpose, &c. Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 21. Secondly, hatred, partly for that this world, of his owne naturall condition hath euer hated and maliced the people of God, from the first beginning of the world. Partly againe, for that the christians being of a contrarie nature and religion, seruing onely the true liuing God, despised their false gods, spake against their idolatrous worshippings, and many times stopped the power of Satan, working in their idols. And therefore Satan the prince of this world, stirred vp the Romane princes and blind idolaters to beare the more hatred and spite against them.

False accusations and slanders against the christians. Ex apologia Iustini Martyr.

Upon these causes, and such like, rose vp these malicious slanders, false surmises, infamous lies, and slanderous accusations of the heathen idolaters against the christian seruants of God, which incited the princes of this world the more to persecute them: for what crimes soeuer malice could inuent, or rash suspition could minister, that was imputed to the christians, as that they were a people incestuous, that in the night in their concourses, putting out their candels, they ran together in all filthie maner, that they killed their owne children, that they vsed to eate mans flesh, that they were seditious and rebellious, that they would not sweare by the fortune and prosperitie of Cesar, that they would not adore the image of Cesar in the market place, that they were pernicious to the emperie of Rome. Briefly, whatsoeuer misshappened to the citie or prouinces of Rome, either famine, pestilence, earthquake, warres, wonders, vnseasonablenesse of weather, or what other euils soeuer happened, it was imputed to the christians, as Iustinus recordeth. Ouer and beside all these, a great occasion that stirred vp the emperors against the christians, came by one Publius Tarquinius the chiefe prelate of the idolatrous sacrifices, and Mamertinus the chiefe gouernour of the citie, in the time of Traianus, who partly with monie, partlie with sinister and pestilent counsell, partlie with infamous acculations (as witnesseth Nauclerus) incensed the minde of the emperor so much against Gods people.

Publius Tarquinius, & Mamertinus persecutors.

Also among these other causes aboue said, crept in some peece of couetousnesse withall (as in all other things it doth) in that the wicked promoters and accusers for lucre sake, to haue the possessions of the christians, were the more readie to accuse them to haue the spoile of their goods.

Ex Iust. Mart. in 2. Apolog.

Thus hast thou (christian reader) first the causes declared of these persecutions; secondly, the cruell law of their condemnation; thirdly, now heare more what was the forme of inquisition, which was (as is witnessed in the second apologie of Iustinus) to this effect, that they should sweare to declare the truth, whether they were in verie deed christians or not: and if they confessed, then by the law the sentence of death proceeded. Iust. apol. 2.

The forme of inquisition against the christians in the old time.

The crueltie of tyrants in killing of christian men.

Neither yet were these tyrants and organs of Satan thus contented with death onely, to bereaue the life from the bodie. The kinds of death were diuers, and no lesse horrible than diuers. What soeuer the cruelnesse of mans inuention could deuise for the punishment of mans body, was practised against the christians, as partly I haue mentioned before, and more appeareth by the epistle sent from the brethren of France, hereafter following. Craftie traines, outcries of enemies, imprisonments, stripes & scourgings, drawings, tearings, stonings, plates of iron laid vnto them burning hot, deepe dungeons, racks, strangling in prisons, the teeth of wild beasts, gridirons, gibbets and gallowes, tolling vpon the hornes of buls: moreouer, when they were thus killed, their bodies laid in heapes and dogs there left to keepe them, that no man might come to burie them, neither would any prayer obtaine them to be interred and buried. Ex epist. fratrum Viennensium & Lugdunensium; ad fratres per Asiam & Phrygiam scripta.

Ex Nicephoro. lib. 3. cap. 22.

And yet notwithstanding, for all these continuall persecutions, and horrible punishments, the church of the christians dailie increased, deepely rooted in the doctrine of the apostles, and of men apostolicall, and watered plenteouslie with the blood of saints, as saith Niceph. lib. 3. Whereof let vs heare the worthy testimony of Iustinus Martyr in his dialogue with Tripheus. And that none (saith he) can terrifie or remoue vs which beleeue in Iesus, by this it daily appeareth: for when wee are slaine, crucified, cast to wilde beasts, into the fire, or giuen to other torments, yet we go not from our confession: but contrarie, the more crueltie and slaughter is wrought against vs, the more they be that come to pietie and faith by the name of Iesus: no otherwise then if a man cut the vine tree, the better the branches grow. For the vine tree planted by God & Christ our sauiour, is his people. Hæc Iust.

Ex Iust. Mart. in dialogo cum Triphæo.

The church increaseth by persecution.

¶ To comprehend the names and number of all the martyrs that suffered in all these ten persecutions (which are innumerable) as it is impossible, so it is hard in such varietie and diuersitie of matter to keepe such a perfect order and course of yeares and times, that either some be not left out, or that euery one be reduced into his right place, especially seeing the authors themselues, whom in this present worke we follow, do diuersly disagree both in the times, in the names and also in the kind of martyrdome of them that suffered. As for example, where the common reading and opinion of the church, and the epistles decretall doe take Anacletus to succeed after Clement, next before Euaristus: contrarie Eusebius lib. 3. & lib. 5. cap. 6. making no mention of Cletus but of Anacletus, saith that Euaristus succeeded next to Clement. Likewise Ruffinus and Epiphanius, speaking nothing of Anacletus, make mention of Linus and of Cletus, next before Clement, but say nothing of Anacletus: whereby it may appeare that Cletus and Anacletus were both one. Sabellicus Aenead. 7. lib. 2. speaketh of Linus and of Cletus, and saith that they were ordeined helpers vnder Peter, while he laboured in his apostleship abrode, and so saith also Marianus Scotus: contrarie Irenæus, lib. 3. contra hæres. speaketh of Anacletus, making no mention of Cletus. Whereby it may appeare by the way, what credit is to be giuen to the decretall epistles, whom all the latter histories of the pope his church do follow in this behalfe, &c. Moreouer, where Antoninus, Vincentius, Iacobus In supplemẽto, Simoneta, Aloisius, with others, declare of Linus, Cletus, Clement, Anacletus, Euaristus, Alexander, bishops of Rome, that they died martyrs: Eusebius in his ecclesiasticall historie writing of them, maketh thereof no mention.

Disagreement in authors, touching the liues and times of martyrs.

Linus bishop of Rome.

Cletus and Anacletus both one.

And first as touching Clement (whom Marianus Scotus calleth the first bishop of Rome after Peter) they say that hee was sent out in banishment of Traianus, beyond Pontieus, with two thousand christians, where he opened to them a well spring, which in the wildernesse were condemned to the mines. Afterward being accused to the emperor, he was throwne into the sea with a millstone fastened about his necke, and that not long after, his body was cast vp and buried (as Platina saith) at the place where the well was made. Some say it was found first in the daies of pope Nicholas the first. Fascicul. tempor. But forsomuch as I find of his martyrdome no firme relation in the ancient authors, but onely in such new writers of latter times, which are wont to paint out the liues and histories of good men, with fained additions of forged miracles, therefore I count the same of lesse credit, as I do also certaine decretall epistles, vntruely (as may seeme) ascribed and intituled to his name. Eusebius in his third booke, writing of Clement, giueth no more of him, but thus: After he had gouerned the church of Rome nine yeares, the said Clement left the succession thereof to Euaristus.

Clement a bishop counted a martyr.

The liues of martyrs painted out with fained miracles.

Of which Euaristus next bishop of Rome, thus we find in Ireneus, lib. 3. cap. 3. Peter and Paul (saith hee) committed the charge of that church to Linus: after whom came Anacletus, then succeeded Clemens, next to Clemens followed Euaristus, after whom came Alexander, and then Sixtus the sixth bishop of Rome after ỹ apostles: after Sixtus sat Telesphorus, then Higinus, then Pius, then Anicetus. And when Soter tooke the place after him, then the twelfth bishop of Rome was Eleutherius. Thus after Clement followed (as is said) Euaristus in the second or third yeare of Traianus, as saith Eusebius; or as Nicephorus saith, the fourth yeare of the said emperor. But howsoeuer the count of yeares standeth, little or nothing remaineth of the acts and monuments either of this, or of other bishops of Rome in those daies. Whereby it may appeare that no great account was then made of Romane bishops in those daies, whose acts & deeds were then either so lightly reputed, or so slenderly committed to historie. Notwithstanding, certaine decretall epistles are remaining, or rather thrust vpon vs in their names, containing in them little substance of any doctrine, but altogether stuffed with lawes, iniunctions, and stately decrees, little to the purpose, and lesse sauoring of the nature of that time then present. Amongst whom also are numbred the two epistles of this Euaristus.

Euaristus bishop of Rome and martyr.

The decretall epistles.

And when hee had giuen these orders, and had made six priests, two deacons, and fiue bishops, for sundrie places (saith the storie) he suffered martyrdome. But what kind of death, for what cause he suffered, what constancie hee shewed, what was the order or conuersation of his life, is nothing touched, and seemeth therefore the more to be doubted that which our new histories doe say: because the old ancient writers haue no remembrance thereof, which otherwise would not haue passed such things ouer in silence, if they had been true. Againe, neither do the authors fully agree in the time of his martyrdome, which Nauclerus witnesseth to be in the last yeare of Traianus: but Platina thinketh rather that hee suffered vnder Hadrianus. Fascicul. temporum referreth it to the third yeare of Hadrian, Volateranus to the beginning of the reigne of Hadrian. Contrarie, Eusebius comming neare to the simple truth (as seemeth) doth affirme that Euaristus succeeded Clement in the third yeare of Traianus, & so giuing to him nine yeares, it should follow thereby that Euaristus deceased the twelfth yeare of Traianus.

Naucle. ge. 1. Platina. Volateran. Anthropo. lib. 22. Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 24.

Alexander bishop of Rome and martyr.

Authors disagree.

After whom succeeded next Alexander in the gouernance of that church, of whose time and death the like discrepance is among the writers. Marianus Scotus saith he was the fourth bishop from Peter: but that could not be. Some say hee was the first & some the seuenth: but they likewise were deceiued: for the most part all doe grant Sixtus to be the first: Damasus affirmeth that he was in the reigne of Traian. And how can that be, when the said Damasus affirmed before that Euaristus his predecessor suffred in the last yeare of Traian, and then the bishoprike stood at least a moneth void, except hee meane that the said Alexander succeeded Euaristus in the last yeare of Traianus. But then how can that stand with Bede and Marianus Scotus: which say that he suffered vnder Traianus, or with Otho Frisingensis, which saith he suffred the fourth yeare of Hadrian, when hee had been bishop ten yeares, by the generall consent of most writers.

They which write of the deeds and doings of this blessed bishop, as Bergomensis Antoninus, Equelinus, and such as follow them, declare that he had conuerted a great part of the senators to the faith of Christ, amongst whom was Hermes a great great man in Rome, whose sonne being dead, Alexander raised againe to life, and likewise restored sight to his maid being blind. Hadrian the emperor then absent hearing this, sent worde to Aurelianus gouernour of Rome, to apprehend Alexander, with Euentius and Theodulus, otherwise called Theodorus, as Platina saith, his two deacons, & Hermes, and to commit them toward with Quirinus the tribune: which being done, as their storie recordeth, Alexander, inclosed in a diuers prison from Hermes; notwithstanding, by the guiding of an angell through three dores with three locks a peece, was brought with candle light to the lodging of Hermes; and so returning to the prison againe, cured the daughter of Quirinus his keeper, named Balbina, by reason whereof the said Quirinus, with his whole houshold were all baptised, and suffered also for the faith of Christ.

Alexander. Euentius. Theodulus. Hermes with his houshold. Quirinus with his houshold, martyrs.

Thus then (saith the storie) about the second yeare of Hadrian, Aurelianus the ruler tooke Alexander the bishop, with Hermes, his wife, children, and his whole houshold, to the number of one thousand two hundred and fiftie, & threw them in prison. And not long after the said Alexander, with Euentius his deacon, and Hermes and the rest were burned in a furnace. Theodulus an other deacon of Alexander, seeing and rebuking the crueltie of the tyrant, suffered also the same martyrdome.

Quirinus also the same time (as saith Antoninus) hauing first his tongue cut out, then his hands and feet, afterward was beheaded and cast to the dogs: Equilinus saith that he was beheaded and cast into Tiber in the raigne of the emperor Claudius: but that cannot bee, albeit Platina maketh relation but onely of Alexander with his two deacons aforesaid, declaring moreouer, that in the time of this bishop, Saphira of Antioch, and Sabina a Romane suffered martyrdome.

Ex Platina in vita Alexandri.

Saphira and Sabina martyrs.

Florilegus, the author of Flores historiarum, affirmeth that Alexander bishop of Rome was beheaded seuen miles out of Rome, where he lieth buried, in the yeare one hundred and fiue: but that agreeth not with the chronicles aboue recited. Eusebius recordeth of him no more, but that in the third yeare of Hadrian, he ended his life and office, after he had been bishop ten yeares.

Ex Florilego.

Diuers miracles are reported of this Alexander, in the canon legends, and liues of saints; which as I denie not but may be true, so because I cannot auouch them by any graue testimonie of ancient writers, therefore I dare not affirme them, but doe refer them to the authors and patrons thereof, where they are found. Notwithstanding, what soeuer is to be thought of his miracles, this is to bee affirmed and not doubted, but that he was a godly and vertuous bishop.

The ordinances of Euaristus. Dist.93.cap. Diaconi.

And as I say of his miracles, the like iudgement also I haue of the ordinances both of him and of Euaristus his predecessor, testified in the popes decrees by Gratianus, as Dist.93. cap. Diaconi, where is said that Euaristus diuided diuers titles in the citie of Rome to the priests, also ordained in euerie citie seuen deacons to associate and assist the bishop in his preaching, both for his defence, and for the witnesse of truth. Notwithstanding, if probable coniectures might stand against the authoritie of Gratianus and his decrees, here might be doubted whether this absolute ordination of priests was first forbidden by Euaristus, and whether the intitulation of priests was first by him brought in or not: wherein an instance may be giuen to the contrarie, that this intitulation seemeth to take his first beginning at the councell of Chalcedon, and of pope Vrbane in the councell of Placentia. In the which councell of Chalcedon the words of the canon (making no mention of Euaristus at all) doe expressie forbid, that any ecclesiasticall person either priest or deacon should be ordained absolutely, otherwise the imposition of hands without some proper title of the partie ordained, to stand voide and frustrate, &c. And likewise Vrbanus in the councell of Placentia doth decree the same, alleaging no name of Euaristus, but the statutes of former councels.

Ex dist.70.cap. Neminem.

Ibidem, cap. Sanctorum.

Moreouer in the time of Euaristus, the church then being vnder terrible persecutions, was diuided into no peculiar parishes or cures, whereby any title might rise, but was scattered rather in corners and deserts, where they could best hide themselues. And as the church of Rome in those daies was not diuided into seuerall parishes or cures (as I suppose) so neither was then any such open or solemne preaching in churches, that the assistance or testimonie of seuen deacons either could auaile among the multitude of the heathen, or else needed amongst the christian secret congregations. Againe, the constitution of seuen deacons seemeth rather to spring out of the councel of Neocesaria long after Euaristus, where it was appointed that in euery citie were it neuer so small, there should bee seuen deacons after the rule. And this rule the said councel taketh out of the booke of the acts of the apostles, making no word or mention of Euaristus at all, Dist.93. But these (as is said) bee but onely coniectures, not denying that which is commonly receiued, but onely shewing what may be doubted in their epistles decretall.

The institutions of Alexander. Holy water first inuented. De consecras. Dist.3.

More vnlike it seemeth to be true that is recorded and reported of Alexander, whereof we read De consecr. dist.3: that he should be the first founder and finder of holy water mixt with salt, to purge and sanctifie them vpon whom it is sprinkled. The words of the dist. be these: Aquam sale conspersam in populis benedicimus, vt ea cuncti aspersi sanctificentur & purificentur, quod omnibus sacerdotibus faciendum esse mandamus, &c: that is, We blesse water mixt with salt among the people, that all men being sprinkled therewith may be sanctified and purified: and this we command all priests to doe, &c.

The opinion is also, but how true I haue not to affirme, that by him first was ordained water to be mixt with wine in the chalice.

The third persecution.

The third persecution of the church. Anno 100

BEtweene the second Romane persecution and the third, was but one yeare, vnder the emperor Nerua, after whom succeeded Traianus: and after him followed the third persecution. So the second and the third are noted of some to bee both one, hauing no more difference but one yeare betweene them. This Traianus, if we loke well vpon his politike and ciuill gouernance, might seeme (in comparison of others) a right worthie and commendable prince, much familiar with inferiors, and so behauing himselfe toward his subiects, as hee himselfe would haue the prince to be to him, if he himselfe were a subiect. Also he was noted to be a great obseruer of iustice, in so much that when hee ordained any pretor, giuing to him the sword hee would bid him vse the sword against his enemies in iust causes: and if he himselfe did otherwise then iustice, to vse then his power against him also. But for all these vertues, toward christian religion he was impious and cruell, who caused the third persecution of the church. In the which persecution Plinie the second, a man learned and famous, seeing the lamentable slaughter of christians, and moued therewith to pitie, wrote to Traianus of the pitifull persecution: certifying him that there were many thousands of them daily put to death, of which none did any thing contrarie to the Roman lawes worthie persecution: sauing that they vsed to gather together in the morning before day, and sing hymnes to a certaine God whom they worshipped, Called Christ. In all other their ordinances they were godly and honest. Whereby the persecution by commandement of the emperor was greatly staied and diminished. The forme and copie of which epistle of Plinie I thought here not inconuenient to set downe, as followeth.

Plinius secundus wrote to Traian to stop the persecution.

The epistle of Plinie to Traianus.

IT is my propertie and maner (my soueraigne) to make relation of al those things vnto you wherein I doubt. For who can better, either correct my slacknesse, or instruct mine ignorance then you? I was neuer yet present my selfe at the examination and execution of these christians; and therefore what punishment is to be administred, and how farre, or how to proceed in such inquisitions, I am plaine ignorant, not able to resolue in the matter whether any difference is to be had in age and person, whether the yong and tender ought to be with like cruelty intreated as the elder and stronger, whether repentance may haue any pardon, or whether it may profit him or not, to denie which hath been a christian, whether the name onely of christians without other offenses, or whether the offenses ioyned with the name of a christiã ought to be punished. In the meane season, as touching such christians as haue been presented vnto me, I haue kept this order. I haue inquired the second and third time of thẽ, whether they were christians, menacing thẽ with feare of punishment; and such as did perseuere, I commanded to execution. For thus I thought, that what soeuer their profession was, yet their stubbornnesse and obstinacie ought to be punished. Whether they were also of the same madnesse, whom because they were citizens of Rome, I thought to send them backe againe to the citie. Afterward, in further processe & handling of this matter, as the sect did further spread, so the more cases did thereof ensue.

There was a libel offred to me bearing no name, wherein was contained the names of many which denied themselues to bee christians, contented to do sacrifice with incense & wine to the gods, and to your image (which image I for that purpose caused to be brought) & to blaspheme Christ: whereunto none such as were true christians indeed could be compelled, and those I did discharge and let goe. Othersome confessed that they had been christians, but afterward denied the same, &c: affirming vnto me the whole summe of that sect or error to consist in this, that they were wont at certaine times appointed, to conuent before day, and to sing certaine hymnes to one Christ their God, and to confederate among themselues to abstaine from al theft, murther, and adulterie, to keepe their faith and to defraud no man: which done, then to depart for that time, and afterward to resort againe to take meate in companies together both men and women one with another, and yet without any act of euill.

In the truth whereof to be further certified whether it were so or or not, I caused two maidens to be laid on the racke, and with torments to bee examined of the same. But finding no other thing in them, but onelie leaud and immoderat superstition, I thought to surcease of further inquire, till time that I might be further aduertised in the matter from you, for so the matter seemed vnto me worthie and needfull of aduisement, especiallie for the great number of those that were in danger of your statute. For verie manie there were of all ages and states, both men and women, which then were and more are like hereafter to incur the same perill of condemnation. For that infection hath crept not onelie in cities, but villages also and burroughs about, which seemeth that it may be staied and reformed. For as much as we see in manie places that the temples of our gods which were wont to be desolate, begin now to be frequented, and that they bring sacrifices from euerie part to be sold, which before verie few were found willing to buie them. Whereby it maie easilie be coniectured, what multitudes of men may be amended, if space and time be giuen them, wherein they may be reclamed.

The epistle of Traianus to Plinie.

The answere of Traian to Plinies letter.

THe act and statute, my Secundus, concerning the causes of the christians which yee ought to follow, ye haue rightly executed. For no such generall law can be enacted, wherein all speciall cases particularlie can be comprehended. Let them not be sought for, but if they be brought and conuicted, then let them suffer execution: so notwithstading, that whosoeuer shall denie himselfe to be a christian, and that he do it vnfainedlie in open audience, & do sacrifice to our gods, howsoeuer he hath beene suspected before, let him be released vpon promise of amendment. Such libels as haue no names, suffice not to anie iust crime or accusation, for that should giue both an euill president, neither doth it agree with the example of our time.

Tertullian writing vpon this letter of Traianus aboue prefired, thus saith: O sentence of a confused necessitie. He would not haue them to be sought for as men innocent, and yet causeth them to be punished as persons guilty. And thus the rage of that persecution ceased for a time, although notwithstanding many naughtie disposed men and cruell officers there were, which vpon false pretense to accomplish their wicked minds, ceased not to afflict the christians in diuers prouinces; and especially if any occasion were giuen neuer so little for the enemies to take hold, or if any commotion were raised in the prouinces abroade, by and by the fault was laid vpon the christians. As in Hierusalem after that the Emperor Traianus had sent downe his commandement, that whosoeuer could bee found of the stocke of Dauid, hee should bee inquired out and put to death. Vpon this Egesippus writing, saith, that Certaine sectaries there were of the Jewish nation, that accused Simeon the bishop then of Hierusalem and sonne of Cleophas to come of the stocke of Dauid, and that he was a christian. Of the which his accusers it hapned also (saith the said Egesippus) that certaine of them likewise were apprehended and taken to be of the stocke of Dauid, and so right iustly were put to execution themselues, which sought the destruction of others. As concerning Simeon the blessed bishop, the foresaid Egesippus thus writeth; that Simeon the lords nephue, when he was accused to Attalus the proconsull, by the malicious sect of the Jewes, to be of the line of Dauid, and to be a christian, was scourged, during the space of many daies together, being of the age of an hundred and twenty yeares. In which his martyrdome he indured so constant, that both the consull and all the multitude did maruell to see him of that age so constantly to suffer, and so at last being crucified, finished his course in the Lord, for whom he suffered, as partly before also is recorded.

In this persecution of Traianus aboue specified (which Traianus next followed after Nerua) besides the other afore mentioned, also suffered Phocas bishop of Pontus, whom Traianus, because he would not doe sacrifice to Neptunus, caused to be cast into a hot limekilne, and afterward to be put into a scalding bath, where the constant godly martyr, in the testimony of Christ, ended his life, or rather entered into life. In the same persecution suffered also Sulpitius and Serulianus, two Romans; whose wiues are said to be Euphrosina and Theodora, whom Sabina did conuert to the faith of Christ, and after were also martyred. Of which Sabina Jacobus Philippus author of the booke called Supplementum, reporteth that in the mount of Auentine in Rome, she was beheaded of Clepidus the gouernour, in the daies of Hadrian. Vnder whom also suffered Seraphia a virgin of Antioch, as Hermannus witnesseth.

The forenamed authors Antoninus and Equilius make mention moreouer of Nereus and Achilleus, who in this persecution of Traiane, had the crowne of martyrdome, being put to death at Rome. Eusebius in his fourth booke, cap. 26. maketh mention of one Sagaris, who about the same time suffered martyrdome in Asia, Serulius Paulus being then proconsull in that prouince.

Nereus, Achilleus martyrs.

Sagaris martyr.

In this persecution, beside many others, suffred the blessed martyr of Christ Ignatius, who vnto this daie is had in famous reuerence anong verie manie. This Ignatius was appointed to the bishoprike of Antioch next after Peter in succession. Some do saie, that he being sent from Syria to Rome, because he professed Christ, was giuen to the wild beasts to be deuoured. It is also said of him, that when he passed through Asia, being vnder the most strict custodie of his garders, he strengthned and confirmed the parishes through all the cities as he went, both with his exhortations and preaching of the word of God: and admonished them especiallie and before all other things, to beware and shun those heresies risen vp, and sprung newlie among them, and that they should cleaue and sticke fast to the tradition of the apostles, which he for their better safegard, being about to denounce or put in writing, thought it a thing verie necessarie to trauell in. And thus when he came to Smyrna, where Polycarpus was, he wrote one epistle to the congregation of Ephesus, wherein he made mention of Onesimus their pastor, and an other he wrote to the congregation of Magnetia, being at Meandre; wherein also he forgetteth not Dama their bishop. Also another he wrote to the congregation of Trallis, the gouernor of which citie at that time he noteth to be one Polybius. Vnto which congregation he made an exhortation, lest they refusing martyrdome, should lose the hope that they desired.

Ignatius martyr. { Anno 111 } Ex Euseb. lib. 3. cap. 35. 36.

Ex Hier. in catalogo script. eccles.

Onesimus pastor at Ephesus.

But it shall be verie requisit that I allege somewhat thereof to the declaration of this matter. He wrote therefore as the words lie, in this sort. From Syria (saith he) euen till I came to Rome, had I a battell with beasts, as well by sea as land, both daie and night, being bound in the middest of ten cruell libards (that is, the companie or band of the souldiers) which the more benefits that they receiued at my hands became so much the worse vnto me. But I being exercised and now well acquainted with their iniuries, am taught euerie daie more and more: but hereby am I not yet iustified. And would to God I were once come to the beasts, which are prepared for me, which also I wish with gaping mouths were readie to come vpō me, whom also I will prouoke that they without delaie maie deuoure me, and forbeare me nothing at all, as those whom before they haue not touched or hurt for feare! And if they will not vnlesse they be prouoked, I will then inforce them against my selfe. Pardon me I praie you. How much beneficiall it is to me, I know. Now begin I to be a scholer, I force or esteeme no visible things, nor yet inuisible things, so that I maie get or obtain Christ Jesu. Let the fire, the gallowes, the deuouring of wild beasts, the breaking of bones, the pulling asunder of my members, the bruising or pressing of my whole bodie, and the torments of the diuell or hell it selfe come vpon me, so that I maie win Christ Jesus.

The words of Ignatius. The strict handling of Ignatius.

The notable constancie and burning zeale to Christ in this blessed martyr to be marked.

And these things wrote he from the foresaid citie vnto the congregations which we haue recited. And when he was euen now iudged to be throwne to the beasts, hee spake for the burning desire that he had to suffer, what time he heard the lions roring: I am the wheat or graine (saith he) of Christ, I shall be ground with the teeth of wilde beasts, that I may be found pure bread. He suffered in the eleuenth yeare of Traian the Emperor. Hæc Eusebius & Hieronym.

Ignatius deuoured of wilde beasts.

Besides this godlie Ignatius, manie thousands also were put to death in the same persecution, as appeareth by the letter of Plinius Secundus aboue recited, written vnto the emperour. Hierome in his booke intituled De viris illustribus maketh mention of one Publius bishop of Athens, who for the faith of Christ, the same time during this persecution was put to death and martyred.

Ex Hier. lib. de viris illust.

Publius bishop of Athens martyr.

Hadrian emperour.

NExt after this Traianus succeeded Hadrian the emperor, vnder whom suffered Alexander the bishop of Rome, with his two deacons Euentius and Theodorus: also Hermes and Quirinus with their families, as late before was declared.

It is signified moreouer in the histories, that in the time of this Hadrian, Zenon a noble man of Rome with ten thousand two hundred and three were slaine for Christ. Henricus de Erfordia, and Bergomensis, lib. 8. make mention of ten thousand in the daies of this Hadrian to be crucified in the mount Ararath, crowned with crownes of thorne and thrust into the sides with sharpe darts, after the example of the Lords passion whose captains (as Antoninus and Vincentius in spec. histor. declare) were Achaicus, Heliades, Theodorus, and Carcerius. Whether this storie be the same with the other aboue of Zenon or not, it is doubted. As touching the miracles done, and the speaking of the angell, I refer the certaintie thereof to Vincentius, and such other like authors, where more things seeme to be told then to be true.

Achaicus, Heliades, Theodorus, Carcerius, with ten thousand martyrs.

There was one Eustachius a captaine, whom Traianus in time past had sent out to warre against the Barbarians. After he had by Gods grace valiantlie subdued his enemies, and now was returning home with victorie; Hadrian for ioy meeting him in his iourney to bring him home with triumph, by the way first would do sacrifice to Apollo for the victorie gotten, willing also Eustachius to do the same with him. But when Eustachius could by no meanes thereto be enforced, being ing brought to Rome, there with his wife and children, suffred martyrdome vnder the foresaid Adrian. It were a long processe here to recite all the miracles contained or rather suspected in this storie of this Eustachius concerning his conuersion and death. How the crucifix appeared to him betweene the hornes of an Hart. Of the sauing of his wife from the shipmen. Of one of his sonnes saued from the lion, the other saued from the woolfe. Of their miraculous preseruation from the wild beasts, from the torments of fire mentioned in Bergomensis, Vincentius, and others. All which as I find them in no ancient records, so I leaue them to their authors, and compilers of the legends.

Faustinus and Iobita, Calocerius, martyrs.

We read also of Faustinus and Iobita, citizens of the citie of Brixia, which suffred martyrdome with like grieuous torments. At the sight whereof one Calocerius seeing their so great patience in so great torments, cried out with these words: Verè magnus Deus christianorum: that is, Verily great is the God of christians. Which words being heard, forthwith he was apprehended, and being brought to the place of their execution, was made partaker of their martyrdome. Ex Ant. Equilin.

Eleutherius with his mother Anthia martyrs. Ex Nicephoro & ex Onom.

The storie of Nicephorus maketh mention of Anthia a godly woman, who committed hir sonne Eleutherius to Anicetus bishop of Rome, to be brought vp in the doctrine of christian faith, who afterwards being bishop in Apulia, was there beheaded with his foresaid mother Anthia, Onomast.

Iustus and Pastor brethren and martyrs.

Iustus also and Pastor two brethren, with like martyrdom ended their liues in a city of Spaine called Complutum, vnder the said Adrian the emperor.

Symphorilla with hir seuen children martyred.

Likewise Symphorilla the wife of Getulus the martyr, with hir seuen children, is said about the same time to suffer: who first was much and often beaten and scourged, afterwards was hanged vp by the haire of hir head; at last hauing an huge stone fastened vnto hir, was throwne headlong into the riuer, and after that hir seuen children in like maner, with sundrie and diuers kinds of punishment diuerslie martyred by the tyrant.

Sophia with hir three children martyred.

The storie of S. Hermannus, and Antoninus, and others, report of Sophia, with hir three children also; also of Seraphia and Sabina, to suffer vnder the said emperor, about the yeare of our Lord one hundred and thirtie.

As concerning Alexander bishop of Rome, with his two deacons, also with Hermes, Quirinus, Saphira, and Sabina, some writers, as Bede, and Marianus Scotus record that they suffered vnder Traianus. Others againe, as Otto, Frisingensis with like more, report that they suffered in the fourth yeare of this emperor Adrian, but of these martyrs sufficiently hath been said before.

While Adrian the emperor was at Athens, hee purposed to visit the countrie of Eluisina, and so did: where he sacrificing to the Gentiles gods, after the maner of the Grecians, had giuen free leaue and libertie, whosoeuer would, to persecute the christians. Whereupon Quadratus a man of no lesse zeale excellent, as of famous learning, being then bishop of Athens, and disciple of the apostles, or at least succeeding incontinent the age of the apostles, and following after Publius (who a litle before was martyred for the testimonie of Christ) did offer vp and exhibit vnto Adrian the emperor a learned and excellent apologie in the defence of the christian religion. Wherein hee declared the christians, without all iust cause or desert, to bee so cruelly intreated and persecuted, &c. The like also did Aristides another no lesse excellent philosopher in Athens, who for his singular learning and eloquence being notified to the emperor, and comming to his presence, there made before him an eloquent oration. Moreouer, he did exhibit vnto the said emperor a memorable apologie for the christians, so full of learning and eloquence, that as Hierome saith, it was a spectacle and admiration to men in his time, that loued to see wit and learning. Euer and besides these, there was also another named Serenus Granius a man of great nobilitie, who likewise did write verie pithie and graue letters to Adrian the emperor, shewing and declaring therein to be consonant with no right nor reason, for the blood of innocents to bee giuen to the rage and furie of the people, and so to bee condemned for no fault, onely for the name and sect that they followed.

Quadratus bishop of Athens offereth an apologie of christian doctrine.

Aristides a philosopher of Athens, defendeth before the emperor the religion of Christ.

Serenus Granius a defender of christian religion. Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 8.

Thus the goodnesse of God being moued with the prayers and constant labour of these so excellent men, so turned the heart of the emperor, that he being better informed concerning the order and profession of the christians, became more fauorable vnto them. And immediatly vpon the same directed his letters to Minutius Fundanus (as is partly before mentioned) proconsul of Asia, willing him from henceforth to exercise no more such extremitie against the christians, as to condemne any of them, hauing no other crime obiected against them but onely their name. The copie of which his letter, because that Iustin in his apologie doth alleage it: I thought therefore to expresse the same in his owne words as followeth.

The emperor writeth for the christians.

The letter of Adrian the emperor to Minutius Fundanus.

The letter of Adrian the emperor to Fundanus the proconsull.

I Haue receiued an epistle written vnto mee from Serenus Granius, our right worthie and welbeloued, whose office you doe now execute. Therefore I thinke it not good to leaue this matter without further aduisement and circumspection to passe, lest our subiects be molested, and malicious sycophants boldned and supported in their euill. Wherefore if the subiects of our prouinces doe bring forth any accusation before the iudge against the christians, and can proue the thing they obiect against them, let them doe the same, and no more, and otherwise for the name onely, not to impeach them, nor to crie out against them. For so, more conuenient it is, that if any man will be an accuser, you to take the accusation quietly, and iudge vpon the same. Therefore, if any shall accuse the christians, and complaine of them as malefactors, doing contrarie to the law, then giue you iudgement according to the quality of the crime. But notwithstanding whosoeuer vpon spite and maliciousnes shall commense or cauill against them, see you correct and punish that man for his vnordinat and malicious dealing.

Respit from persecution.

Thus by the mercifull prouidence of God, some more quiet and rest was giuen to the church, although Hermannus thinketh these Alcion daies did not verie long continue, but that the emperor changing his edict, began to renue againe persecution against Gods people, albeit this soundeth not to bee so by the words of Melito in his apologie to Antoninus hereafter ensuing. In the meane time this is certaine, that in the daies of this Adrian, the Iewes rebelled againe and spoiled the countrie of Palestina. Against whom the emperor sent Iulius Seuerus, who ouerthrew in Iurie fiftie castles, and burnt and destroyed nine hundred and fourescore villages and townes, and slue of the Iewes fiftie thousand: with famine, sicknesse, sword, and fire, Iuda was almost desolate. But at length Adrian the emperor, which otherwise was named Aelius, repared and enlarged the citie againe of Ierusalem, which was called after his name Aeliopolis, or Aelia Capitolina, the inabitance whereof he granted onely to the Gentiles, and to the christians, forbidding the Iewes vtterly to enter into the citie.

The second destruction of the Iewes. Ierusalem reedified and inlarged. Some write that the place where Christ was crucified was taken into the wals. Ierusalem called by a new name Aeliopolis.

Antoninus Pius emperor. Anno 140.

After the death of Adrian, who died by bleeding at the nose, succeeded Antoninus Pius, about the yeere of our Lord, one hundred and fourtie, and raigned twentie and three yeeres, who for his clemencie and modest behauiour, had the name of Pius, and is for the same in histories commended. His saying was, that he had rather saue one citizen, then destroy a thousand of his aduersaries. At the begining of his raigne, such was the state of the church, as Adrian his predecessor had left it, as in which, although there was no edict set forth to persecute the christians: yet the tumultuous rage of the heathen multitude for the causes aboue specified, did not cease to disquiet and afflict the quiet people of God, imputing and ascribing to the christians whatsoeuer misfortune happened contrarie vnto their desires: moreouer inuenting against them all false crimes and contumelies whereof to accuse them. By reason whereof, diuers there were in sundrie places much molested, and some put to death: albeit, as it is to be supposed, not by the consent of the emperor, who of nature was so mild and gentle, that either hee raised vp no persecution against the christians, or else he some staied the same being moued. As well may appeare by his letter sent downe to the countries of Asia, the tenor whereof here insueth.

The epistle of Antoninus Pius to the commons of Asia.

The letter of Antoninus Pius to the commons of Asia.

EMperor and Cæsar, Aurelius Antoninus Augustus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, Tribune eleuen times, consul thrise, vnto the commons of Asia greeting. I am very certaine that the gods haue a care of this, that they which be such, shal be knowne, and not lie hid. For they doe punish them that will not worship them more then you, which so sore vex and trouble them, confirming therby the opinion which they haue conceiued, and doe conceiue of you, that is, to be wicked men. For this is their ioy and desire, that when they are accused, rather they couet to die for their God, then to liue. Whereby they are victorers, and doe ouercome you, giuing rather their liues, then to be obedient to you, in doing that which you require of them. And here it shall not be inconuenient to aduertise you of the earthquakes, which haue and do happen among vs, that when at the sight of them you tremble and are afraid, then conferre your case with them. For they vpon a sure confidence of their God, are bold and feareless, much more then you: who in all the time of this your ignorance, both doe worship other gods, and neglect the religion of immortalitie, & such christians as worship him, the you do driue out, and persecute them vnto death. Of these and such like matters many presidents of our prouinces did write to our father of famous memorie heretofore. To whom hee directed his answere againe, willing them in no case to molest the christians, except they were found in some trespasse preiudiciall against the empire of Rome. And to me also many there be, which write, signifying their mind in like manner. To whom I haue answered againe, to the same effect and manner as my father did. Wherefore, if any hereafter shall offer any vexation or trouble, to such, hauing no other cause, but onely for that they are such,

A notable argument of the emperor to proue the good conscience of christians, and the false conscience of the heathen.

He meaneth Adrian which adopted this Antoninus of son in law, his to be his sonne and heire.

O noble edict.

let him that is appeached, be releaſed and diſcharged free, yea although he be found to be ſuch (that is a chriſtian) and let the accuſer ſuſtaine the puniſhment, &c.

This godly edict of the emperor was proclamed at Epheſus, in the publike aſſemblie of al Aſia, whereof Melito alſo biſhop of Sardis, who floriſhed in the ſame time, maketh mention in his apologie written in defence of our doctrine to M. Antoninus Verus, as hereafter (Chriſt willing) ſhall appeare. By this meanes then the tempeſt of perſecution in thoſe daies began to bee appeaſed, through the merciſull prouidence of God, which would not haue his church vtterly to bee ouerthrowne, though hardly yet to grow.

The fourth perſecution.

M. Antonius Verus emperor. Anno 162

After the deceaſe of the foreſaid quiet and mild prince Aurelius Antonius Pius (who among all other emperors of that time made the moſt quiet end) followed his ſonne M. Antoninus Verus, with Lucius his brother, about the yeare of our Lord one hundred threeſcore and two, a man of nature more ſterne and ſeuere. And although in ſtudie of philoſophie, and in ciuill gouernment no leſſe commendable: yet toward the chriſtians ſharpe and fierce, by whom was moued the fourth perſecution after Nero. In whoſe time a great number of them which truely profeſſed Chriſt, ſuffred moſt cruell torments and puniſhments, both in Aſia and France. In the number of whom was Polycarpus, the worthie biſhop of Smyrna, who in the great rage of this perſecution in Aſia, among many other moſt conſtant ſaints was alſo martyred. Of whoſe end and martyrdome I thought it here not vnexpedient to commit to hiſtorie, ſo much as Euſebius declareth to be taken out of a certaine letter or epiſtle, written by them of his owne church to the brethren of Pontus: the tenor of which epiſtle here followeth.

Polycarpus, the bleſſed martyr biſhop of Smyrna.

Ex Euſeb. hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 15. Hieron. in catalogo.

The congregation which is at Smyrna, to the congregation which is at Philomilium, and to all the congregations throughout Pontus, mercie to you, peace and the loue of God our father, and of our Lord Jeſu Chriſt, be multiplied, Amen. We haue written vnto you brethren of thoſe men which haue ſuffred martyrdome, and of bleſſed Polycarpus, which hath ended and appeaſed this perſecution, as it were by the ſhedding of his owne blood. And in the ſame epiſtle, before they enter into further matter of Polycarpus, they diſcourſe of other martyrs, deſcribing what patience they abode and ſhewed in ſuffering their torments: which was ſo great and admirable (ſaith the epiſtle) that the lokers on were amazed, ſeeing and beholding how they were ſo ſcourged & whipped, that the inward veines and arteries appeared, yea euen ſo much that the verie intrailes of their bodies, their bowels and members were ſeene, and after that, were ſet vpon ſharpe ſhels taken out of the ſea, edged, and ſharpe, and certaine nailes and thornes for the martyrs to go vpon, which were ſharpened and pointed, called Obeliſci. Thus ſuffered they all kind of puniſhment and torment that might be deuiſed: and laſtly, were throwne vnto the wilde beaſts to be deuoured. But eſpecialy in the foreſaid epiſtle mention is made of one Germanicus, how hee moſt worthilie perſeuered and ouercame by the grace of God, that feare of death which is ingraffed in the common nature of all men, whoſe notable patience and ſufferance was ſo notable that the whole multitude wondering at this beloued martyr of God, for this his ſo bold conſtancie, and alſo for the ſingular ſtrength and vertue proceeding of the whole multitude of the chriſtians, began ſuddenly to crie with a loud voice, ſaying: Deſtroy the wicked men, let Polycarpus be ſought for. And whileſt a great vprore and tumult began thus to be raiſed vpon thoſe cries, a certaine Phrygian named Quintus, lately come out of Phrygia, who ſeeing and abhorring the wild beaſts, and the fierce rage of them, of an ouer light mind betraied his own ſafetie. For ſo the ſame letter of him doth report, that hee, not reuerently, but more malipertly then was requiſite, togither with others ruſhed into the iudgement place, and ſo being taken, was made a manifeſt example to all the beholders, that no man ought raſhly and vnreuerently with ſuch boldneſſe to thruſt in himſelfe, to intermeddle in matters wherewith hee hath not to doe.

But now we will ſurceaſe to ſpeake more of them, and returne to Polycarpus, of whom the foreſaid letter conſequently declareth as followeth: How that in the beginning, when hee heard of theſe things, was nothing at all afraid nor diſquieted in mind, but purpoſed to haue taried ſtill in the citie, till being perſuaded by the intreatie of them that were about him (which deſired him inſtantly that he would conuey himſelfe away) hid himſelfe in a grange or village not farre off from the city, & there abiding with a few more in his companie, did nothing elſe (night nor day) but abode in ſupplication, wherein he made his humble petition for the obtaining of peace vnto all the congregations throughout the world, for that was his accuſtomed maner ſo to doe. And as he was thus making his praiers three daies before he was apprehended, in a viſion by night he ſaw the bed ſet on fire vnder his head, and ſuddenly to be conſumed. And when he awaked, he told by and by and expounded vnto them that were preſent his viſion, and told them before what thing ſhould come to paſſe, that is, how that in the fire hee ſhould loſe his life for Chriſts cauſe. It is further mentioned, that when they were hard at hand, which ſo narrowly ſought for him, that he was inforced for the affection and loue of his brethren to flie into another village, to which place notwithſtanding within a little while after the purſuers came, and when they had taken a couple of children that dwelt thereabouts, they ſo beat one of them with whips, that by the bewraying or confeſſion of him they were brought vnto the Inne where Polycarpus was. And they ſay that the purſuers making no great haſt to enter, found him in the vppermoſt place of the houſe, from whence hee might haue eſcaped into other houſes, if hee would; but this hee would not doe, ſaying: The will of God bee done. Furthermore, when hee knew that they were come, as the ſaid hiſtorie ſheweth, hee came downe, and ſpake vnto them with a chereſull and pleaſant countenance, ſo that it was a wonder to ſee thoſe which a while agone knew not the man, now beholding and viewing his comelie age, and his graue and conſtant countenance, lamented that they had ſo much employed their labour, that ſo aged a man ſhould be apprehended. To conclude, hee commanded that ſtraight way without any delay the table ſhould be laid for them, and perſuaded them that they would eate and dine well, and required of them boldly, that he might haue an hours reſpit to make his prayers. Which thing after it was granted, he aroſe and went to pray, ſo being repleniſhed with the grace of God, that they which were preſent, and hearing the prayers that he made, were aſtonied at it, and now many of them were ſorie that ſo honeſt and godly an aged man ſhould be put to death.

Polycarpus purſued and taken.

Polycarpus might eſcape and would not.

Polycarpus falleth to prayer.

After this, the foreſaid epiſtle or letter, proſecuting the hiſtorie, addeth more as followeth: After hee had made an end of his prayers, & had called to his remembrance all thoſe things which euer happened vnto him, and to the vniuerſall catholike church throughout all the world (whether they were ſmall or great, glorious or elſe inglorious) and that the houre was now come in which they ought to ſet forward, they ſet him vpon an aſſe, and brought him to the citie vpon a ſolemne feaſt day. And there met him Irenarchus Herodes, and his father Nicetes, which cauſing him to come vp into the chariot where they ſat, perſuaded him and ſaid: What hurt I pray thee ſhall come thereof to thee, if thou ſay (by the way of ſalutation) My lord Ceſar, and do ſacrifice, and thus to ſaue thy ſelfe? But he at the beginning made them none anſwere, till that when they inforced him to ſpeake, he ſaid: I will not doe as ye counſell me I ſhould. When as they ſaw he could not be perſuaded, they gaue him very rough language, and of purpoſe moleſted him, that in going downe the chariot from them, he might hurt or breake his legs. But he forcing verie light of the matter, as though he had felt no hurt, went merilie and diligently forward, making haſt vnto the place appointed. And when there was ſuch vprore in the place of execution, that he could not be heard but of verie few, there came a voice from heauen to Polycarpus, as he was going into the ſtage or appointed place of iudgement, ſaying: Be of good chere Polycarpus and play the man. No man there was, which ſaw him that ſpake, but very many of vs heard his voice. And when he was brought in, there was a great noiſe made by them which vnderſtood that Polycarpus was apprehended. The proconſul aſked him when that he was come, whether his name was Polycarpus or not: And when he ſaid, yea it was, he gaue him counſel to deny his name, & ſaid vnto him: Be good vnto thy ſelfe, and fauour thine old age: and many other ſuch like words which they accuſtome to ſpeake; Sweare, ſaith he, by the emperors good fortune, loke vpon this matter, ſay thou with vs: Deſtroy theſe naughtie men. Then Polycarpus beholding with conſtant countenance the whole multitude which was in the place appointed, and giuing a great ſigh, loked vp to heauen, ſaying: Thou, thou it is that wilt deſtroy theſe wicked naughtie men. And the proconſul thus being earneſtly in hand with him, ſaid: Take thine oth, and I will diſcharge thee, defie Chriſt. Polycarpus anſwered: Foureſcore and ſix yeares haue I been his ſeruant, yet in all this time hath hee not ſo much as once hurt me: how then may I ſpeake euill of my king and ſoueraigne Lord, which hath thus preſerued me? Then the proconſul againe inforced him and ſaid: Sweare thou I aduiſe thee by Ceſars proſperitie. Polycarpus replieth: If thou require of me this fond word of vaine boaſting, feining not to know (as thou ſaieſt) who I am, I doe thee to wit that I am a chriſtian: and if thou deſire to know the doctrine of chriſtianitie, appoint a day, and thou ſhalt heare. Perſuade the people vnto this, ſaid the proconſull. Truely, ſaith Polycarpus, I haue thought it my part thus to ſay vnto you, for ſo much as we are commanded to giue vnto the gouernors and powers ordained of God, the honour meete and due to them, and not hurtfull vnto vs: but as for thoſe, I doe iudge them vnworthie to purge my ſelfe vnto them. Hereupon the proconſul ſtood vp: I haue, ſaith hee, wild beaſts to whom I will throw thee, vnleſſe thou take a better waie. Whereunto Polycarpus anſwered: Let them come, we haue determined with our ſelues that wee will not by repentance turne vs from the better way to the worſe, but rather rather conuenient it is, that a man turne from things that be euill, vnto that which is good and iust. Againe saith the proconsull, I will tame thee with fire, if that thou set not by the wilde beasts, nor yet repent. Then said Polycarpus; You threaten me with fire which shall burne for the space of an houre, and shall be within a little while after put out and extinguished; but thou knowest not the fire of the iudgement that is to come and of euerlasting punishment, which is reserued for the wicked and vngodly. But why make you all these delaies? giue me what death soeuer ye list. These and many other such like things being by him spoken, he was replenished with ioy and boldnesse, and his countenance appeared so full of grace and fauour, that not only he was not troubled with those things which the proconsull spake vnto him, but contrarily the proconsull himselfe began to be amazed and sent for the crier, which in the middle of the stage was commanded to crie three times; Polycarpus hath confessed himselfe to bee a christian: which words of the crier were no sooner spoken, but that all the whole multitude both of the Gentiles and Iewes inhabiting at Smyrna, with a vehement rage and loud voice cried; This is that doctor or teacher of Asia, the father of the christians, and the destroyer of our gods, which hath instructed a great number, that our gods are not to be worshipped: and after this they cried vnto Philip the gouernour of Asia, and required him that he would let loose the lion to Polycarpus. To whom he made answere that he might not so do, because he had already his prey. Then they cried againe all together with one voice that hee would burne Polycarpus aliue. For it was requisit that the vision which he saw as concerning his pillow or bolster should be fulfilled: which when he had seene burnt, as he was in his prayer, hee turned himselfe vnto the faithfull sort which were with him, saying by the way of prophesie, It will so come, that I shall bee burned aliue. And the proconsull had no sooner spoken, but it was out of hand performed. For why? the multitude by and by brought out of their shops, workehouses, and barns, wood and other drie matter for that purpose, and specially the Iewes were most seruiceable for that matter, after their wonted manner.

Polycarpus threatned with wilde beasts.

And thus the pile being laid, and that he had now put off his garments and vndone his girdle, and was about to pull off his shoes, which hee had not done before, for that all the faithfull sort among themselues striued (as it were) who should first touch his bodie at their farewell, because for the good conuersation of his life, yea, from his yonger age, hee was had in great estimation of all men. Therefore straightway those instruments which are requisite to such a bonefire, were brought vnto him, and when they would haue nailed him to the stake with iron hoopes, hee said, let me alone as I am, for he that hath giuen me strength to suffer and abide the fire, shall also giue power, that without this your prouision of nailes, I shall abide, and stirre not in the middest of this fire or pile of wood. Which thing when they heard, they did not naile him, but bound him. Therefore when his hands were bound behind him, euen as the chiefest ram taken out of the flocke, hee was sacrificed as an acceptable burnt offering to God, saying: O Father of thy welbeloued and blessed Sonne Iesus Christ, by whom wee haue attained the knowledge of thee, the God of Angels and powers, and of euerie creature, and of all iust men which liue before thee, I giue thee thankes, that thou hast vouchsafed to grant me this day that I may haue my part amongst the number of the martyrs in the cup of Christ, vnto the resurrection of eternall life both of bodie and soule, through the operation of the holy Spirit; among whom I shall be this day receiued into thy sight for an acceptable sacrifice: and as thou hast prepared, and reuealed the same before this time, so thou hast accomplished the same, which canst not lie, O thou most true God. Wherefore I in like case for all things praise thee, blesse thee, and glorifie thee by our euerlasting bishop Iesus Christ, to whom bee glorie euermore. Amen.

His prayer before his death.

And as soone as he had ended this word Amen, and finished his prayer, the tormentors began to kindle the fire, and as the flame flashed out vehemently, we to whom it was giuen to discerne the same, saw a maruellous matter, which were also to this purpose preserued, that we might shew the same to others. For the fire being made like to a rose or vaut of a house, and after the manner of a shipmans saile, filled with winde, compassed about the bodie of the martyr as with a certaine wall, and hee in the middle of the same, not as fleth that burned, but as gold and siluer when it is tried in the fire. And surely we smelt a sauour so sweet as if myrrhe or some other pretious balme had giuen a sent. At the last, when those wicked persons saw that his bodie could not be consumed by fire, they commanded one of the tormentors to come to him, and thrust him thorow with his sword. Which being done, so great a quantitie of blood ranne out of his bodie, that the fire was quenched therewith, and the whole multitude maruelled that there was so much diuersitie betweene the infidels and the elect, of whom this Polycarpus was one, being a disciple of the apostles, and a prophetical instructor of our times, and bishop of the catholike church of Smyrna: for what word soeuer he spake, both it was and shall be accomplished. subtill and enuious aduersarie, when he saw the worthinesse of his martyrdome, and that his conuersation euen from his yonger yeares could not be reproued, and that he was adorned with the crowne of martyrdome, and had now obtained that incomparable benefit, gaue in charge, that we should not take and diuide his bodie, for feare lest the remnants of the dead corps should be taken away, and so worshipped of the people. Whereupon diuers whispered Nicetas the father of Herod, and his brother Alces in the eare, to admonish the proconsull, that in no case he should deliuer his bodie, lest (saith he) they leaue Christ and begin to worship him. And this spake they because the Iewes had giuen them secret warning, and prouoked them thereunto, who also watched vs that we should not take him out of the fire: not being ignorant how that we ment at no time to forsake Christ, which gaue his life for the saluation of the whole world (as many I meane as are elected to saluation by him) neither yet that we could worship any other. For why? him we worship as the Sonne of God, but the martyrs do we loue as disciples of the Lord (and that worthilie) for their abundant loue towards their king and master, of whom we also desire and wish to be companions, and to be made his disciples. When therefore the centurion saw and perceiued the labour of the Iewes, the corps being laid abroad, they burnt the same, as was their manner to do.

Thus good Polycarpus with twelue others that came from Philadelphia suffered martyrdom at Smyrna; which Polycarpus specially aboue the rest is had in memorie, so that he in all places among the Gentiles is most famous. And this was the end of this worthie disciple of the apostles, whose historie the brethren of the congregation at Smyrna haue written in this their epistle as is aboue recited.

Twelue martyrs put to death in Smyrna.

Ex Ireneo. lib. 3. cap. 21 Euseb. lib. cap. 14

Irenæus in his third booke against heresies, the third chapter, and Eusebius in his fourth booke and fourteenth chapter of his ecclesiasticall historie reporteth this worthie saying of Polycarpus: This Polycarpus (saith he) meeting at a certaine time Marcion the heretike, who said to him; Doest thou not know me? made answere; I know that thou art the first begotten of Satan. So great feare what euill might ensue thereof had the disciples of the apostles, that they would not speake to them whom they knew to be the deprauers of the verity, euen as Paul saith: The heretike after the first and second admonition, shun and auoid, knowing that he which is such one, is peruerse or froward, and damneth himselfe. This most holy confessour and martyr of Christ Polycarpus suffered death in the fourth persecution after Nero, when Marcus Antoninus, and Lucius Aurelius Commodus reigned, in the yeare of our Lord, one hundred threescore and seuen, as Vrsperg. affirmeth, in the yeare one hundred threescore and ten, as Eusebius witnesseth in his chronicles, the seuenth before the kalends of Februarie.

{Anno 167}

Of Germanicus mention is made aboue in the storie of Polycarpus, of whom writeth Eusebius lib. 4. cap. 15. noting him to be a yong man, and most constantly to perseuere in the profession of Christs doctrine, whom when the proconsull went to perswade to remember his age, and to fauour himselfe, being in the flower of his age, he would not be allured; but constantly and boldly, and of his owne accord incited and prouoked the wilde beast to come vpon him, and to deuour him, to be deliuered more speedily out of this wretched life. Hæc Euseb. an. 170.

Germanicus. Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 15. Hist. for. eccle.

Thus haue you heard out of the epistle of the brethren of Smyrna, the whole order and life of Polycarpus: whereby it may appeare that he was a verie aged man, who had serued Christ fourescore and six yeares since the first knowledge of him, and serued also in the ministerie about the space of threescore and ten yeares. This Polycarpus was the scholler and hearer of John the euangelist, and was placed by the said John in Smyrna. Of him also Ignatius maketh mention in his epistle which he wrote in his iourney to Rome, going toward his martyrdome, and commended to him the gouernment of his church at Antioch, whereby it appeareth that Polycarpus then was in the ministerie. Likewise Irenæus writeth of the said Polycarpus after this manner: He alwaies taught (said he) those things which he learned of the apostles, leauing them to the church, and are onely true. Whereunto also all the churches that be in Asia, and all they which succéeded after Polycarpus to this day beare witnesse. And the same Irenæus witnesseth also that the said Polycarpus wrote an epistle to the Philippians, which whether it be the same that is now extant and read in the name of Polycarpus, it is doubted of some: notwithstanding in the said epistle diuers things are found very holesome and apostolike: as where he teacheth of Christ, of iudgement, and of the resurrection. Also he writeth of faith very worthily, thus declaring that by grace we are saued, and not by workes, but in the will of God by Iesus Christ.

In Eusebius we reade in like manner a part of an epistle written by Irenæus to Florinus, wherein is declared how that the said Irenæus being yet yong, was with Polycarpus in Asia; at what time he saw & well remembred, what Polycarpus did, and the place where he sate teaching, his whole order of life and proportion of his bodie, with the sermons and words which he said to the people. And furthermore hee perfectly remembred how that the said Polycarpus often times reported vnto him, those things which he learned and heard them speake of the Lord, his doings, power, and doctrine, who heard the word of life with their owne eares, all which were more consonant and agreeable to the holy scripture. This with much more hath Ireneus concerning Polycarpus.

The authority of Polycarpus in the churches of Asia.

Hierome also writing of the same Polycarpus, hath how he was in great estimation throughout all Asia, for that he was scholler to the apostles, and to them which did see and were conuersant with Christ himselfe: whereby it is to be coniectured his authoritie to be much not only with them of his owne church, but with all other churches about him.

Polycarpus came to Rome.

Polycarpus conferre h with Anicetus.

The east church and Romane church differ about Easter day.

Ex Niceph. lib. 4. cap. 29.

Ouer and besides, it is witnessed by the said Ireneus, that Polycarpus came to Rome in the time of Anicetus bishop of Rome, about the yeare of our Lord one hundred fiftie and seuen in the reigne of Antoninus Pius, whose cause of his coming thither appeareth to be about the controuersie of Easter day: wherein the Asians and the Romans something disagreed among themselues. And therefore the said Polycarpus in the behalfe of the brethren and church of Asia, toke his long iourney thither, to come and confer with Anicetus. Whereof writeth also Nicephorus, lib. 4. declaring that Polycarpus and Anicetus something varied in opinions and iudgement about that matter, and that notwithstanding, yet both friendly communicated either with the other, in so much that Anicetus in his church gaue place to Polycarpus to minister the communion and sacrament of the Lords supper for honor sake. Which may be a notable testimonie now to vs, that the doctrine concerning the free vse and libertie of ceremonies, was at that time retained in the church without any offence of stomacke, or breach of christian peace in the church.

Difference of ceremonies caused no breach of charitie in the primitiue church.

This Polycarpus (as is aboue mentioned) suffered his martyrdome euen in his owne church at Smyrna, where hee had laboured so many yeares in planting of the Gospell of Christ, which was about the yeare of our Lord one hundred threescore and ten, as Eusebius reckoneth in his chronicle, and in the seuenth yeare of Antoninus Verus his reigne: whereby it appeareth that Socrates in Historia tripartita was much deceiued, saying that Polycarpus suffered in the time of Gordianus.

Socrates deceiued in his Tripartit. hist.

In this fourth persecution beside Polycarpus and others mentioned before, we reade also in Eusebius of diuers others, who at the same time likewise did suffer at Smyrna.

Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 17.

Metrodorus, Pionius.

Ouer and besides in the same persecution suffered moreouer Metrodorus a minister, who was giuen to the fire, and so consumed. Another was worthie Pionius, which after much boldnesse of speech, with his apologies exhibited, and his sermons made to the people in the defence of christian faith, and after much releeuing and comforting of such as were in prisons, and otherwise discomforted, at last was put to cruell torments and afflictions, then giuen likewise to the fire, and so finished his blessed martyrdome.

Carpus, Papilus, Agathonica, martyrs.

After these also suffered Carpus, Papilus, and Agathonica, a woman, who after their most constant and worthie confessions were put to death at Pergamopolis in Asia, witnessing Eusebius, lib. 4. cap. 7.

Felicitas with her seuen children, Januarius, Felix, Philippus, Siluanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis, martyrs.

And as these suffered in Asia, so in Rome suffered Felicitas with her seuen children, who vnder this M. Antoninus Verus sustained also the cruelties of this persecution. The names of whose children Bergomensis and other histories doe thus recite: Januarius, Felix, Philip, Siluanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis. Of whom her first and eldest sonne Januarius, after he was whipped and scourged with rods, was prest to death with leaden weights. Felix and Philip had their braines beaten out with mawles. Siluanus was cast downe headlong, and had his necke broken. Furthermore, Alexander, Vitalis, and Martialis were beheaded. Last of all Felicitas the mother (otherwise then the accustomed manner was for such as had borne children) was slaine with the sword. Ex Supplem.

In the rage of this fourth persecution, vnder the raigne of Antoninus Pius, suffered also good Iustinus, a man in learning and philosophie excellent, and a great defender of christian religion, who first exhibited vnto the emperour and to the senat, a booke or apologie in the defence of the christians, and afterward himselfe also died a martyr. Of whom in the historie of Eusebius, lib. 4. cap. 16. it is thus recorded: that about what time, or a little before that Polycarpus with diuers other saints suffered martyrdome in Pergamopolis a citie of Asia, this Iustinus (as is aforesaid) presented a booke in defence of our doctrine to the emperour, to wit, vnto Antoninus, and to the senat. After which he was also crowned with like martyrdome vnto those, whom he in his booke had defended, through the malicious meanes and craftie circumuention of Crescens.

Iustinus Martyr.

Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 16.

Crescens a philosopher procurer of the death of Iustinus.

This Crescens was a philosopher conforming his life and manners to the Cynicall sect, whom for because this Iustinus had reproued in open audience, and had borne away the victory of the truth which he defended, he therefore as much as in him lay, did worke and procure vnto him this crowne of martyrdome. And this did also Iustine himselfe a philosopher no lesse famous by his profession foresee and declare in his foresaid apologie, telling almost all those things before hand which should happen vnto him, by these words, saying: And I looke after this good turne, that I be slaine going by the way, either of some of those whom I haue named, and to haue my braines beaten out with a bat, or else of Crescens, whom I cannot call a philosopher, but rather a vaine boaster. For it is not conuenient to call him a philosopher, which openly professeth things to him vnknowne, and whereof he hath no skill, saying and reporting of vs, that the christians be vngodly and irreligious: and all to please and flatter them which are seduced by error.

Crescens a railing philosopher and a malicious railer.

For whether he obiecteth against vs the doctrine of the christians which he hath not read, yet is he very malicious, and worse then the vnlearned idiots, who for the most part vse not to dispute or iudge of things they know not, and to beare witnesse of the same. Or put case that he had read it, yet vnderstandeth he not the maiestie of the matters therein contained: or if peraduenture he vnderstandeth them, and doth it for this purpose, that he would not be counted as one of them; then is he so much the more wicked and malicious, and the bondslaue of vile and beastly both fame and feare. For this I testifie of him, giuing you truly to vnderstand that for a truth, which I declare vnto you, how that I haue opposed him, and haue put vnto him many questions, whereby I know and perceiue, that he vnderstandeth nothing. But if so be that this our disputation with him hath not come vnto your eares, I am readie to communicate vnto you againe those questions which I demanded of him, which things shall not be vnfit for your princely honor to heare. But if ye know and vnderstand both what things I haue examined him of, as also what answere he hath made, it shall be apparant vnto you, that he is altogether ignorant of our doctrine and learning; or else if he knoweth the same, he dare not vtter it for feare of his auditors, which thing, as I said before, is a proofe that he is no philosopher, but a slaue to vaine glorie, which maketh none account of that, which his owne master Socrates had in so great estimation. And thus much of Iustine, out of Iustine himselfe.

A slaue of fame and feare.

Crescens proued an vnlearned philosopher.

Now to verifie that, which Iustine heere of himselfe doth prophesie, that Crescens would and did procure his death: Tacianus (a man brought vp of a child in the institutions of the Gentiles, and obtained in the same not a little fame, and which also left behind him many good monuments and commentaries) writeth in his booke against the Gentiles in this sort: And Iustine (saith hee) that most excellent learned man, full well spake and vttered his minde, that the afore recited men were like vnto theeues or liers by the high-way side. And in the said booke speaking afterward of certaine philosophers, the said Tacianus inferreth thus; Crescens therefore (saith he) when he came first into that great citie, passed all others in the vicious loue of children, and was verie much giuen to couetousnesse; and where he taught that men ought not to regard death, hee himselfe doth feare death, that he did all his endeuour to oppresse Iustine with death, as with the most greatest euill that was, and all because that Iustine speaking truth, reproued the philosophers to be men only for the belly, and deceiuers: and this was the cause of Iustines martyrdome. Hierome in his ecclesiasticall catalogue thus writeth: Iustine, when in the citie of Rome he had his disputations, and had reproued Crescens the Cynike for a great blasphemer of the christians, for a belligod, and a man fearing death, and also a follower of lust and lecherie: at last by his endeuour and conspiracie was accused to be a christian, and for Christ shed his blood in the yeare of our Lord one hundred fiftie and foure vnder Marcus Antoninus, as the chronicles do witnesse, Abbas Vrspergensis, and Eusebius in his chronicle in the thirteenth yeare of the emperor Antoninus.

Among these aboue recited is also to be numbred Praxedis a blessed virgin, the daughter of a citizen of Rome, who in the time of Anicetus there bishop, was so brought vp in the doctrine of Christ, and so affected to his religion, that shee with her sister Potentiana, bestowed all her patrimonie vpon the releeuing of poore christians, giuing all her time to fasting and prayer, and to the burying of the bodies of the martyrs. And after shee had made free all her familie with her seruants after the death of her sister, shee also departed, and was buried in peace.

Vnder the same Antoninus also suffered Ptolomeus and Lucius for the confession of Christ, in a citie of Egypt called Alexandria, whose historie because it is described in the apologie of Iustinus Martyr, I thought therefore so to set forth the same, as it is alledged in Eusebius, declaring the manner and occasion thereof, Lib. 4. cap. 17. in words and effect as followeth, &c.

Ptolomeus, Lucius, martyrs.

Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 17.

There was (saith hee) a certaine woman married vnto a husband, who was giuen much to lasciuiousnesse, whereunto shee her selfe in times past was also addict. But she afterward being instructed in the christian religion, became chast her selfe, and also perswaded her husband to liue chastly; oftentimes telling him that it was written in the precepts of the christians, that they should be punished eternally, which liued not chastly and iustly in this life. But he still continuing in his filthinesse, thereby caused his wife to estrange her selfe from his companie. For why? the woman thought it not conuenient to continue in her husbands companie, which contemning the law of of nature, sought otherwise to satisfie his filthie appetite. Therfore she was purposed to be diuorced from him. But her neighbours and kinsfolke prouoked her, by promising his amendment, to keepe companie againe with him, and so she did. But not after this tooke his iourney into Alexandria, and when it was shewed her, that there he liued more licentiously then at anie time before, for that she would not be counted partaker of his incestuous life by coupling her selfe anie longer with him, shee gaue him a letter of diuorce, and so departed from him. Then her husband, who ought rather to haue reioyced to haue so honest and chaste a wife, which not only would not commit any dishonest thing her selfe, but also could not abide any leaud or misordered behauiour in her husband, and that by this her separation shee went about to reclaime him from his incest and wickednesse to better amendment of life: hee in recompence to his wife againe, accused her to bee a christian, which at that time was no lesse then death. Whereupon shee being in great perill and danger, deliuered vp vnto the emperor (as Iustinus in his apologie writing to the emperour himselfe declareth) a supplication, desiring and crauing of his maiestie, first to grant her so much licence as to set her familie in order, and that done, afterward to come againe and make answere to all that might or should be laid against her: whereunto the emperour condescended. Then her husband seeing that he could haue no vantage against her, deuised with himselfe, how he might bring Ptolomeus (which was her instructor in the faith of Christ) in trouble and accusation: vsing the meanes of a certaine Centurion who was his verie friend, whom he perswaded to examine Ptolomeus whether he were a christian or not. Ptolomeus (as one that loued the truth, and not thinking god to hide his profession) confessed no lesse then to the examiner, openly declaring that he had (as truth was) taught and professed the veritie of christian doctrine. For who so denieth himselfe to be that he is, either condemneth in denying that thing that he is, or maketh himselfe vnworthie of that, the confession whereof hee flieth, which thing is neuer found in a true and sincere christian. Thus then he being brought before Urbicius the iudge, and by him condemned to suffer: one Lucius being also a christian, standing by, and seeing the wrong iudgement, and hastie sentence of the iudge, said to Urbicius: What reason I pray you or equitie is this, that this man who neither is adulterer, nor fornicatour, nor homicide, nor fellon, neither hath committed anie such crime, wherein hee may bee charged, is thus condemned only for his name and confession of a christian? This condemnation and these maner of iudgements (O Urbicius) are neither seemely for the vertuous emperour, nor to the philosopher his sonne, nor yet for the estate of his senat of Rome.

The doltnesse and christian constancie of Lucius.

Which words being heard, Urbicius making no further examination of the matter, said vnto Lucius: Me thinketh thou art also a christian. And when Lucius had giuen him to vnderstand that he was also a christian, the iudge without further delay commanded him to be had away to the place of execution. To whom hee answered: I thanke you with all my heart, that you release me from most wicked gouernours, and send me vnto my good and most louing father, being also the king of all gods. And in like manner the third man also, comming vnto him, and vsing the like libertie of speech, had also the like sentence of death and condemnation, and crowned also with the same crowne of martyrdome. And thus much out of the apologie of Iustinus, by the which storie it may appeare not to be true that Gratianus attributeth vnto Higinus bishop of Rome, the deciding of causes matrimoniall, seeing that in Iustinus time (who was in the same age of Higinus) the diuorcement of this woman in this historie aboue touched, was not decided by any ecclesiasticall law, or brought before any bishop, but was brought before a heathen prince, and determined by the law ciuill.

Concordus martyr.

Henricus de Erfordia recordeth out of the martyrologe of Iſuardus, of one Concordus a minister of the citie of Spolet, who in the raigne of this Antoninus Uerus, because he would not sacrifice vnto Iupiter, but did spit in the face of the idoll, after diuers and sundrie punishments sustained, at last with the sword was beheaded. Uincentius in his tenth booke, chap. 108. reciteth a long storie of his acts and life, whereof some part perhaps may seeme tollerable. But this verily appeareth to be false and fabulous, concerning the water flowing besides his sepulchre in the forenamed citie of Spolet, vnto the which water was giuen (saith Uincentius) by the vertue of him, for whose name he suffered, to restore sight to the blind, to heale the sicke, and to cast out diuels, &c. Which kind of vertue to open the eyes of the blind, and to expell diuels neither doth God giue to any creature of water, neither is it like that Concordus the blessed martyr did or would require any such thing at the hands of God.

Iſuardus, and Bede, Vincentius, and Henricus de Erfordia, with other authors more, make relation of diuers other martyrs that by sundrie kinds of torments were put to death, vnder the foresaid Antoninus Uerus: the names of whom bee Symmetrius, Florellus, Pontianus, Alexander, Caius, Epipodius, Victor, Corona, Marcellus, Valerianus. The cause of whose martyrdome was the reprehending of idolatrie and because at the emperours commandement they would not sacrifice to idols. Many sorts of punishments and miracles are told of them: but at length the end of them all is this, that they were beheaded. Whereby it may be the more suspected, the histories of these writers not to be certaine or true, as well touching these as also other martyrs, as may appeare in Vincentius, in Petrus de Natalibus, and other authors of like sort. In which authors they which list to reade more of their miracles there may find them.

A little before, mention was made of Symphorilla, otherwise named Symphorosa, wife of Getulus, with her seuen sons. This Getulus or Getulius, was a minister or a teacher (as witnesseth Martyrol. Adonis) in the citie of Tiber; which Getulus with Cerealis, Amantius, and Primitiuus, by the commandement of Adrian were condemned to the fire, wherein they were martyred and put to death. The names moreouer of the seuen sonnes of this Symphorosa, I find to be Crescens, Julianus, Nemesius, Primitiuus, Iustinus, Statteus, and Eugenius, whom the chronicle of Ado declareth to be put to death at the commandement of Adrian, being fastened to seuen stakes, and so racked vp with a pullie, and at last were thrust thorow, Crescens in the necke, Julianus in the brest, Nemesius in the heart, Primitiuus about the nauill, Iustinus cut in euery ioynt of his bodie, Statteus run thorow with speares, Eugenius cut asunder from the brest to the lower parts, and then cast into a deepe pit, hauing the name by the idolatrous priests, entituled Ad septem Biothanatos. After the martyrdome of whom also Symphorosa the mother did likewise suffer, as is before declared.

Under the said Antonius Uerus, and in the same persecution, which raged not in Rome and Asia only, but in other countries also, suffered the glorious and most constant martyrs of Lions and Uienna, two cities in France, giuing to Christ a glorious testimonie, and to all christian men a spectacle or example of singular constancie and fortitude in Christ our Sauiour. The historie of whom, because it is written and set forth by their owne churches, where they did suffer, mentioned in Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 2. I thought here to expresse the same in the forme and effect of their owne words, as there is to be seene. The title of which their epistle written to the brethren of Asia and Phrygia thus beginneth.

The persecution in Lions and Uienna, two cities in France. Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 2.

The seruants of Christ inhabiting the cities of Uienna and Lions, to the brethren in Asia and Phrygia, hauing the same faith and hope of redemption with vs: peace, grace, and glorie from God the Father, and from Iesus Christ our Lord.

A letter of the brethren of France to the brethren of Asia.

THe greatnesse of this our tribulation, the furious rage of the Gentiles against vs, and the torments which the blessed martyrs suffered, neither can we in words, nor yet in writing exactly, as they deserue, set forth. For the aduersarie with all his force gaue his endeuour to the working of such preparatiues, as he himselfe lusted, against his tyrannous comming, and in euerie place practised he and instructed his ministers, how in most spitefull maner to set them against the seruants of God: so that not only in our houses, shops and markets we were restrained, but also were vniuersally commanded, that none (so hardie) should be seene in any place. But God hath alwaies mercie in store, and tooke out of their hands such as were weake amongst them, and other some did he set vp as firme and immoueable pillars, which by sufferance were able to abide all violent force, and valiantly to withstand the enemie, enduring all their opprobrious punishment they could deuise: to conclude, they fought this battell for that intent to come vnto Christ, esteeming their great troubles but as light: thereby shewing that all that may be suffered in this present life, is not able to counteruaile the great glorie which shall be shewed vpon vs after this life. And first they patiently suffered whatsoeuer the multitude of frantike people running vpon head did vnto them, as railings, scourgings, drawings, and hallings, flinging of stones, imprisonings, and what other thing soeuer the rage of the multitude is wont to vse and practise against their professed enemies. Then afterward they being led into the market place, and there iudged of the captaine and rest of the potentates of the citie, after their confession made openly before the multitude, were commanded againe to prison, vntill the returne of their chiefe gouernour. After this they being brought before him, and he vsing all extremitie that possible he might against them: one Uetius Epagathus, one of the brethren, replenished with feruent zeale, both towards God and his brethren (whose conuersation although he were a yong man was counted as perfect as was the life of Zacharie the priest, for he walked diligently in all the commandements and iustifications of the Lord, and in all obedience towards his brethren blamelesse) he hauing within him the feruent zeale of loue, and spirit of God, could not suffer that wicked iudgement which was giuen vpon the christians; but being vehemently displeased, desired that the iudge would heare the excuse which hee was minded to make in the behalfe of the christians, in whom (saith he) is no impietie found. But the people cried againe to those that were assistants with the chiefe iustice, that it might not be so (for in deed he was a noble man borne) neither did the iustice grant him his lawfull request, but only asked him whether hee himselfe were a christian or not? And he immediately with a loud and bold voice answered and said, I am a christian. And thus was he receiued into the fellowship of the martyrs, and called the aduocat of the christians.

The stoutnesse of a godly yong man.

And he hauing the spirit of God more plentifully in time, then had Zacharie, the abundance thereof he declared, in that he gaue his life in the defence of his brethren, being a true disciple of Christ, following the lambe whersoeuer he goeth.

By this mans example the rest of the martyrs were the more animated to martyrdome, and made more ioyous with all courage of mind to accomplish the same. Some other there were vnreadie and not so well prepared, and as yet weake, not well able to beare the vehemencie of so great conflict: of whom ten there were in number that fainted, ministring to vs much heauinesse and lamentation. Who by their example caused the rest which were not yet apprehended, to be lesse willing thereunto. Then were we all for the variablenes of confession not a little astonied: not that we feared the punishment intended against vs, but rather as hauing respect to the end, and fearing lest any should fall. Euerie day there were apprehended such as were worthie to fulfill the number of them which were fallen: in so much that of two churches, such as were chiefest, and which were the principall gouernors of our churches, were apprehended. With these also certaine of the Ethniks, being our men seruants, were apprehended (for so the gouernor commanded, that all of vs in generall without any respect, should be taken) which seruants being ouercome by Satan, and fearing the torments which they saw the saints to suffer, being also compelled thereunto by the meanes of the souldiers, fained against vs that we kept the feastings of Thiestes, and incest of Oedipus, and many such other crimes, which are neither to be remembred, nor named of vs, nor yet to be thought that euer any man would commit the like.

The tender mercie of God.

The infirmitie of certaine weake christians.

False slanders of the christians.

These things being now bruted abroad, euery man began to shew crueltie against vs, in so much that those which before for familiaritie sake were more gentle towards vs, now vehemently disdained vs, and waxed mad against vs. And thus was now fulfilled that which was spoken by Christ, saying, The time will come that whosoeuer killeth you, shall thinke that he doth God great good seruice. Then suffred the martyrs of God such bitter persecution as is passing to be told: Satan still shooting at this marke, to make them to vtter some blasphemie by all meanes possible. Maruellous therefore was the rage both of the people and prince, specially against one Sanctus, which was deacon of the congregation of Vienna, and against Maturus, being but a little before baptised, but yet a worthie souldier of Christ, and also against Attalus, being borne in Pergama, which was the foundation and piller of that congregation, and also against Blandina: by whom Christ sheweth, that those things which the world esteemed vile and abiect, to be glorious in Gods sight, for the verie loue which in heart and deed they beare vnto him, not in outward face only. For when all we were afraid, and specially her mistresse in flesh, who also was her selfe one of the number of the foresaid martyrs, left happily for the weakenesse of bodie she would not stand strongly to her confession, the foresaid Blandina was so replenished with strength and boldnesse, that they which had the tormenting of her by course from morning to night, for very wearinesse gaue ouer and fell downe, and were themselues ouercome, confessing that they could do no more against her, and maruelled that yet she liued hauing her bodie so torne and rent: and testified that any one of those torments alone, without any more, had been enough to haue pluckt the life from her bodie. But that blessed woman, fighting this worthie battell, became stronger and stronger, and as often as shee spake these words (I am a christian, neither haue we committed any euill) it was to her a maruellous comfort and bolding to abide the torments.

The rage of the heathen against the christians.

The cruell handling and great patience of Blandina.

Sanctus a martyr.

Sanctus also another of the martyrs, who in the midst of his torments, enduring more paines then the nature of a man might away with, also at what time the wicked supposed to haue heard him vtter some blasphemous words, for the greatnesse and intollerablenesse of his torments and paines that he was in, abode notwithstanding in such constancie of minde, that neither he told them his name, nor what countrieman he was, nor in what citie brought vp, neither whether he was a free-man or a seruant: but vnto euery question that was asked him, he answered in the Latine tongue, I am a christian, & this was all that he confessed both of his name, citie, kindred, and all other things in the place of execution; neither yet could the Gentiles get any more of him: whereupon both the gouernour and tormentors were the more vehemently bent against him. And when they had nothing to ver him withall, they clapped plates of brasse red hot to the most tenderest parts of his bodie, wherwith his body indeed being scorched, yet he neuer shrunke for the matter, but was bold and constant in his confession, being strengthened and moystened with the fountaine of liuelie water, flowing out of Christs side. Trulie his bodie was a sufficient witnesse what torments he suffered: for it was all drawne together and most pitifully wounded and scorched, so that it had therewith lost the proper shape of a man, in whose suffering Christ obtained vnspeakeable glorie, for that he ouercame his aduersarie, and to the instruction of others declared, that nothing else is terrible, or ought to be feared where the loue of God is, nor nothing grieuous wherein the glorie of Christ is manifested.

The notable constancie of Sanctus.

The cruell torments of Sanctus.

And when those wicked men began after a certaine time againe to torment the martyr, and hoped wel to bring it to passe, that either they should ouercome him in causing him to recant, by reiterating his torments, now when his bodie was so sore and swollen, that he might not suffer a man to touch him with his hand, or else that if he died vnder their hands, yet that thereby they should strike such feare into the hearts of the rest, to cause them to denie Christ. But they were not only disappointed herein, but also contrarie to the expectation of men, his bodie was in the latter punishment and torments supplied and restored, and tooke the first shape and vse of the members of the same, so that the same his second torment was by the grace of Christ (in stead of punishment) a sure medicine.

A miraculous working of God.

Also Satan now thinking to haue setled himselfe in the hart of one Biblides, being one of them which had denied Christ, and thinking to haue caused her, being a weake and feeble woman in faith, to haue damned her soule, in blaspheming the name of God, brought her to the place of execution: enforcing to wrest some wicked thing out of the mouth of the christians. But she in the middle of her torments, returning to her selfe, and waked as it were out of her dead sleepe, by that temporall paine, called to her remembrance the paines of hell fire, and against all mens expectations reuiled the tormentors, saying: How should we christians eat yong infants (as ye reported of vs) for whom it is not lawfull to eate the blood of any beast? Upon that, so soone as she had confessed her selfe to be a christian, she was martyred with the rest. Thus when Christ had ended those tyrannicall torments, by the patience and sufferance of our saints, the diuell yet inuented other engins and instruments. For when the christians were cast into prison, they were shut vp in darke and vgly dungeons, and were drawne by the feet in a racke or engine made for that purpose, euen vnto the first hole. And many other such punishments suffered they, which the furious ministers, stirred vp with diuellish furie, are wont to put men vnto: so that very many of them were strangled and killed in the prisons, whom the Lord in this manner would haue to enioy euerlasting life, and set forth his glorie. And surely these good men were so pitifully tormented, that and if they had had all the helpes and medicines in the world, it was thought impossible for them to liue, and to be restored. And thus they remaining in prison destitute of all humane helpe, were so strengthened of the Lord, and both in bodie and mind confirmed, that they comforted and stirred vp the minds of the rest: the yonger sort of them, which were latter apprehended, and put in prison, whose bodies had not yet felt the lash of the whip, were not able to endure the sharpnesse of their imprisonment, but died of the same.

The blessed Photinus, who was deacon to the bishop of Lions about fourescore and nine yeares old, and a very feeble or weake man, and could scarcely draw breath for the imbecillitie of his bodie: yet was he of a liuely courage and spirit for the great desire he had of martyrdome, when he was brought vnto the iudgement seat: although his bodie was feeble and weake, both because of his old age, and also through sicknesse, yet was his soule or life preserued to this purpose, that by the same Christ might triumph and be glorified. He, being by the souldiers brought to the place of iudgement, many citizens and men of great abilitie following him, and the whole multitude cried vpon him diuerslie, as though he had been Christ himselfe, gaue a good testimonie. For being demanded of the chiefe ruler, what was the christian mans God? he answered: If thou be worthy to know thou shalt know. He being with these words somewhat neere touched, caused him to bee very sore beaten. For those that stood next him, did him all the spite and displeasure that they could both with hand and foot, hauing no regard at all to his old age or white haires. And they which were further off, whatsoeuer came next to hand, they threw at him, and euery man thought that he did verie wickedly refraine, that withheld his hand from not doing the like. For by this meanes they thought that they did reuenge the quarrell of their gods. Photinus now, euen as it were gasping after life, was throwne into prison, and within two daies after died.

Photinus a blessed martyr.

The rage of the people against Photinus.

And heere is the mightie prouidence of God, and the vnspeakeable mercie of Jesus Christ declared, which prouidence being assured amongst a fraternitie, is neuer destitute of the aid of Jesus Christ. For those which in their first persecution denied Christ, they also were put in prison, and made partakers of the others affliction. Neither yet did it any whit at all at that time helpe them that had denied Christ, but they which confessed him were imprisoned as christians, neither was there any other crime obiected against them, but the other sort taken like homicids & wicked doers were laid hand on, & had double more punishment then the others had. These men were refreshed with the ioy of martyrdome, the hope of Gods promises, the loue towards Christ, and the spirit of God: the others their consciences sciences accused them, and that very sore, in so much that by their gate, their countenances bewraied vnto the rest their guiltie consciences. For the christians went forth hauing cheerful countenances, very much adorned with glorie and grace, in so much that the very bonds wherewith they were tied, set them out as men in seemely apparell, and like as brides when they be decked in gorgeous and gay garments, and therewithall sauored as of the redolent smell of Christ, so that it might be supposed them to be anointed with some sweet balme: whereas the others were doubtfull and sad, abiect, ill fauored, filled with all shame, and furthermore reuiled of the Gentiles themselues, as wretches degenerat, hauing the crime of homicide, and destitute of the most pretious, glorious, and liuely calling of the christian name. And truly by these sights the rest were confirmed, and being apprehended, confessing Christ without any staggering, not hauing so much as the thought of any such dreadfull mind of denial. And in the same epistle of the foresaid brethren of France, writing to the brethren of Asia, it followeth in this manner: After these things done, the martyrdome of these holy saints were diuided diuerslie into diuers kinds and formes, as the offering to God the father a garland decked with diuers and sundrie kinds of colours and flowers. For it so behooued the worthie champions of God, after they had suffered diuers kinds of torments, and so winning a triumphant victorie, to obtaine great reward of immortalitie.

Then Maturus, Blandina, and Attalus together, were brought to the common scaffold, there in the face of the people to be eaft and deuoured of the beasts. And Maturus with Sanctus being brought the second time to the scaffold, suffered againe all kind of torments, as though hitherto they had suffered nothing at all, yea rather as though the aduersaris being oftentimes put to the worst, they as striuing for the crowne, suffered againe more scourgings, the tearing of wild beasts, and what thing else soeuer the frantike people on euery side cried for & willed. And aboue all the rest they brought an iron chaire, in the which their bodies being set, were so fried & scorched as on a gridiron fried on the coles, & filled with the sauor of the frying all the people that stood by. And yet for all that, the tormentors ceased not, but waxed more fierce and mad against them, labouring to ouercome the patience of the saints. Notwithstanding al this, they could not get out of Sanctus mouth any other thing but the confession which at the beginning hee declared. And thus these holy men, after they had long continued aliue in this their most horrible conflict, at the length were slaine, being made all that whole day a spectacle vnto the world, in place and in stead of the games and sights which were wont to be exhibited to the people. And thus much concerning Maturus and Sanctus.

The spitefull handling of Gods people.

Maturus and Sanctus martyred.

Blandina brought forth againe.

Now concerning Blandina, who being fastened vpon a stake, was cast to the rauening beasts to bee deuoured, which thing was not done without the determinat will of God: to this end, that while she seemed to hang vpon a crosse, as it were by the feruentnesse of her prayer, she much comforted the rest of the saints, as beholding her Christ with her bodilie eies, which in that agonie suffered for them all, and that all which beleeue in him, and suffer for the glorie of Christ, might bee assured to liue with him for euer. And when they saw that no beast would come neere her thus hanging, they took her downe from the tree, & cast her again into prison till another time, that she hauing the victorie of many battels, might triumph ouer that vgly serpent the diuell, & that she being a weake & sillie woman, and not regarded, armed with Christ the inuincible conqueror, might incourage her brethren, and by the enduring of this battell might win a crowne of incorruptible glorie.

Now to Attalus: who being also required and called for of the people to punishment alreadie prepared (for his conscience sake) commeth forth to the fight. For he being worthilie exercised in the Christian profession, was alwaies a witnesse and a maintainer of our doctrine. Therefore when the pretse of people was about the scaffold, and the table carried before him, wherein was written in the Romane tongue, This is Attalus the christiã: then the people were in a maruellous rage against him. But the gouernor, vnderstanding that he was a Roman, commanded him againe to prison, with the rest of his prison fellowes: whereof he wrote to the emperour, and waited for answer what his pleasure herein was. The prisoners were not idle in the meane season, nor vnprofitable to their brethren, but by their patience the vnspeakeable mercy of Christ shined out. For those which were dead before, were now reuiued by them that liued, and they which were martyrs profited them which were none, and the church did much reioyce, as receiuing them againe aliue, whom she had lost before as dead. For many of them which before had denied, now by their denial were restored and stirred vp, and learned to bee confessors. And now being reuiued and strengthened, and tasting the sweetnesse of him which desireth not the death of a sinner, but is mercifull to the penitent, came of their owne accord to the iudgement seat againe, that they might be examined of the iudge. And for that the emperor had written backe againe to him, that all the confessors should be punished and the other let goe, and that the sessions or sises were now begun, which for the multitude that had repaire thither out of euery quarter, was maruellous great:

Attalus commanded to prison.

The deniers returning againe to their confession.

he caused all the holy martyrs to be brought thither, that the multitude might behold them, and once againe examined them, and as many of them as hee thought had the Romane freedome he beheaded, the residue he gaue to the beasts to bee deuoured. And truly Christ was much glorified by those which a little before had denied him, which againe contrarie to the expectation of the infidels confessed him euen vnto the death. For they were examined apart from the rest, because of their deliuery, which being found confessors, were ioyned to the companie of the martyrs, and had with them their part. But there were then abroade which had no faith at all, neither yet so much as the feeling of the wedding garment, nor any cogitation at all of the feare of God, but blasphemed his waies by the leand conuersation of their life, euen such as were the children of damnation. All the residue ioyned themselues to the congregation: which when they were examined, one Alexander a Phrygian borne, and a physitian which had dwelt long in France, and knowne almost of all, for the loue hee had to God, and boldnesse of speaking (neither was he void of the apostolicall loue) this Alexander standing somewhat neere to the barre, by signes and becks perswaded such as were examined, to confesse Christ: so that by his countenance sometime reioycing, some other while sorrowing, hee was descried of the standers by. The people not taking in good part to see those which now recanted, by and by again to sticke to their first confession, they cried out against Alexander as one that was the cause of all this matter. And when he was inforced by the iudge, and demanded what religion he was of: he answered: I am a christian. He had no sooner spoken the word, but he was iudged to the beasts of them to be deuoured.

Alexander the Phrygian martyred.

The next day following, Attalus of whom I made mention a little before, and Alexander, were brought forth together (for the gouernour granting Attalus vnto the people, was baited againe of the beasts.) When these men were brought to the scaffold, and had taken a taft of all the instruments that there were prepared for their execution, and had suffered the greatest agonie they could put them to, were also at the length slaine: of whom Alexander neuer gaue so much as a sigh, nor held his peace, but from the bottome of his heart prased and prayed to the Lord. But Attalus, when he was set in the iron chaire, and began to frie, and the frying sauour of his burning bodie began to smell, he spake to the multitude in the Romane language: Behold (saith he) this is to eat mans flesh which you do, for we neither eat men, nor yet commit any other wickednesse. And being demanded what was the name of their God: Our God (saith he) hath no such name as men haue. Then said they, Now let vs see whether your God can helpe you, and take you out of our hands or not.

The worthie patience and constancie of Attalus.

After this, being the last day of the spectacle, Blandina againe, and one Ponticus, a child of fifteene yeeres old was brought forth, and this was euery day, to the intent they seeing the punishment of their fellowes might bee compelled thereby to sweare by their idols. But because they constantly abode in their purpose, and defied their idols, the whole multitude was in a rage with them, neither sparing the age of the child, nor fauouring the sex of the woman, but put them to all the punishment and paine they could deuise, and oftentimes inforced them to sweare, and yet were not able to compell them thereunto. For Ponticus being so animated of his sister, as the Ethnikes standing by did see, after that he had suffered all torments and paines gaue vp the ghost. This blessed Blandina therefore being the last that suffered, after she had like a worthy mother giuen exhortations vnto her children, and had sent them before as conquerors to their heauenly king, and had called to her remembrance all their battels and conflicts, so much reioyced of her childrens death, and so hastened her owne, as though she had been bidden to a bridall, and not in case to bee thrown to the wild beasts. After this her pitifull whipping, her deliuerie to the beasts, and her torments vpon the gridiron, at the length she was put in a net, and thrown to the wild bull, and when she had been sufficiently gored and wounded with the hornes of the same beast, and felt nothing of all that chanced to her, for the great hope and consolation she had in Christ and heauenly things, was thus slaine, insomuch that the very heathen men themselues confessed that there was neuer woman put to death of them that suffered so much as this woman did. Neither yet was their furious crueltie thus allwaged against the christians. For the cruell barbarous people, like wild beasts when they be mooued, knew not when the time was to make an end, but inuented new and sundrie torments euery day against our bodies. Neither yet did it content them when they had put the christians to death, for that they wanted the sense of men: for which cause both the magistrat and people were bered at the very hearts, that the scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, He that is wicked, let him bee wicked still, and he that is iust let him be more iust. For those which in their prisons they strangled, they threw after to the dogs, setting keepers both day and night to watch them, that they should not be buried, and bringing forth the remnant of their bones and bodies, some halfe burned, some left of the wild beasts, and some all to bee mangled, also bringing forth heads of others which were cut off, and in like manner committed by them them to the charge of the keepers to see them remaine vnburied.

The Gentiles grinded and gnashed at the christians with their teeth, seeking which way they might amplifie their punishment: some other flouted and mocked them, extolling their idols, attributing vnto them the cause of this crueltie and vengeance shewed to vs. Such which were of the meeker sort, and seemed to be moued with some pitie, did hit vs in the teeth, saying, Where is your God that you so much boast of? and what helpeth this your religion for which you giue your liues? These were the sundrie passions and affects of the Gentiles, but the christians in the meane while were in great heauines, that they might not burie the bodies and relikes of the holie martyrs. Neither could the darke night serue them to that purpose, nor any intreatie nor waging them with monie, which were appointed for watchmen: but they so narrowlie looked vnto the matter, as though they should haue gotten great benefit and profit thereby.

Thus were the bodies of the martyrs made a wondering flocke, and lay fiue daies in the open streetes, at the length they burned them, and threw their ashes into the riuer of Rodes, so that there might appeare no remnant of them vpon the earth. And this did they as though they had been able to haue pulled God out of his seat, and to haue let the regeneration of the saints, and taken from them the hope of the resurrection, whereof they being perswaded (said they) bring in this new and strange religion, and set thus light by death and punishment. Atque hæc ex epistola Viennensium, &c.

Iustinus. Among others that suffered vnder Antoninus, mention was made also of Iustinus, who (as it is said before) exhibited two apologies, concerning the defense of christian doctrine, the one to the senat of Rome, and the other to Antoninus Pius the emperor, concerning whose suffering, and the causes thereof is partly before declared: this Iustine was borne in Neapoli, in the countrie of Palestine, whose father was Priscus Bachius, as he himselfe doth testifie, by whom in his youth he was set to schole to learne, where in processe of time he became a famous and worthie philosopher, of whose excellencie many learned and notable men doe record. For first he being altogether inflamed and rauished with desire of knowledge, would in no wise bee satisfied in his mind, before he had gotten instructors singularlie seene in all kind of philosophie, whereupon he writeth of himselfe in the beginning of his dialogue Cum Tryphone thus, declaring that in the beginning he being desirous of that sect and societie, applied himselfe to be the scholer to a certaine Stoike, & remaining with him a time, when he nothing profited in diuine knowledge (whereof the Stoike had no skill, and affirmed the knowledge therof not to be necessarie) he forsoke him, and went to another of the sect of the Peripatetiks, a sharpe witted man, as he thought; with whom after he had been a while, he demanded of him a stipend for his teaching, for the better confirmation of their familiaritie. Wherupon Iustine accounting him as no philosopher, left him, and departed. And yet not satisfied in mind but desirous to heare of further learning in philosophie, adioyned himselfe to one that professed the Pythagorian sect, a man of great fame, & one who made no small account of himself. Whom after he had followed a time, his master demanded of him whether he had any sight in Musike, Astronomie and Geometrie, without the sight of which science he said he could not be apt to receiue the knowledge of vertue and felicitie, vnlesse before hee had vsed to applie his mind from sensible matters to the contemplation of things intelligible. And speaking much in the commendation of these sciences, how profitable and necessarie they were: after that Iustine had declared himself not to be seene therin, the philosopher gaue him ouer, which grieued Iustine not a little, and so much the more because he thought his master to haue some knowledge in those sciences. After this, Iustine considering with himselfe what time was requisit to the learning of these sciences, and thinking not to defer any longer, thought best to resort to the sect of the Platonists for the great fame that ran of them: wherefore he chose vnto him a singular learned man of that sect, which lately was come to those parts, and so remaining with him seemed to profit not a little in contemplation of supernall things, & inuisible formes, insomuch that he thought shortlie to aspire to such sharpenes of wit and wisdom, that out of hand he might atchiue to the comprehension and contemplation of God, which is the end of Plato his philosophie. And in this maner he bestowed his youth: but afterward he growing to a riper age, how and by what means the said Iustine came to the knowledge and profession of christianitie, it followeth likewise in his said first apologie: where hee affirmeth of himselfe (as witnesseth Eusebius in his fourth booke) that when he did behold the christians in their torments & suffrings to be so constant in their profession, was therwith maruelouslie mooued: after this maner reasoning with himselfe, that it was impossible for that kind of people to be subiect to any vice or carnalitie, which vices of their owne nature are not able to sustaine any sharp aduersity, much lesse the bitternes of death. The sight whereof helped him not a little (being of his owne nature inclined to the searching of true knowledge and vertue) to begin thereby to loue and imbrace christian religion, for so he doth witnesse of himselfe in the end of the first apologie: signifying there how it was his seeking and indeuor to attaine to christianitie: vnderstanding how the christians by malice of wicked persons were compelled to suffer wrong and torments, and to be euill spoken of. By sight whereof, as he saith himselfe, he became a christian, through this occasion. For being thus afflicted in his mind, as is aforesaid, it came in his head for his more quietnesse to go aside to some desert and solitarie place void of concourse of people, vnto a village or grange neere to the sea side: whither as he approched, thinking there to be all alone, there meeteth with him an old ancient father of a comely visage and gentle behauior, who following him a little off, began to reason with him: where after long disputation, when the old man had declared vnto him that there was no knowledge of truth amongst the philosophers, which neither knew God, neither were aided by the holy Ghost: and further had reasoned with him of the immortalitie of the soule, of the reward of the godly, and punishment of the wicked: then Iustine being confirmed with his reasons & arguments, yeelded to him of his owne accord; and demanded of him by what means he might attaine to that true knowledge of God, whereof he had spoken: who then counselled him to read and search the prophets, adioyning therewith prair. But what master (quoth Iustine) should I vse for the instruction thereof, and who shall be able to helpe vs if these philosophers (as you say) lacke the truth, and are void of the same? To whom the old father answering, There haue been (said he) many yeers before these philophers other more ancient then all these, which being accounted for philosophers were iust and beloued of God: who spake by the spirit of God, foreseeing and prophesying these things which we see now come to passe, and therefore they are called prophets. These only haue knowne the truth and reuealed it to men, neither fearing nor passing for any, who were seduced with no opinions of mans inuention, but only spake and taught those things which they themselues both heard and saw, being inspired with the holie spirit of God: whose writings and works yet to this day remaine, out of which the reader may receiue great profit and knowledge of things, as concerning the first creation of the world and end of the same, with all other things necessarie to be knowne of euery true philosopher which will giue credit vnto them. Neither in their teaching doe they vse any demonstration, as being more certaine of themselues, then that they need any such demonstration to be made, forasmuch as the accomplishing and the end of things both past and now present, constraineth vs of necessitie to beleeue the words and doctrin which they taught: which men not only therfore are to be beleeued, but also for their miracles and wonders done, are worthie of credit; for that they both preached of God the maker and creator of all things, and also did prophesie before of Christ his sonne to be sent of him; the which the false prophets being seduced with false & wicked spirits, neither haue done, nor doe, but onely take vpon them to worke certaine prodigious wonders for men to gaze at, setting out thereby to the world false and vncleane spirits. But then afore all things make thy prayer that the gate of light may be opened vnto thee, for otherwise these things cannot be attained vnto of euery man, but onlie of such to whom God and his Christ giueth vnderstanding.

The vanitie of the old philosophers reproued.

The doctrine of the prophets commended.

The vtilitie of reading the prophets.

Prophets to be credited for two causes.

These things, with much more (which now leisure serueth not to prosecute) after the foresaid old father had declared vnto him, hee departed, exhorting him well to follow the things which he had spoken: and after that Iustine (as he himselfe witnesseth) saw him no more. Immediatlie after this, Iustine being all inflamed as with fire kindled in his brest, began to conceiue a loue and zeale toward the prophets and all such as were fauoured of Christ. And thus he reuoluing in his mind more and more these words, found only this philosophie among all other professions both sure and profitable, and so became hee a philosopher, and in time by these meanes afterwards hee was made a christian and baptised. But where he receiued this holy sacrament of baptisme, it is not read of, nor yet by what occasion he left his country and came to Rome. This only we read in Ierome, that he was in Rome, and there vsed certaine exercises which he called Diatribas, disputing there with Crescens a Cynicall philosopher, as is before touched. But this is certaine, how that Iustine after he had receiued the profession of christian religion, became an earnest defender of the same, trauelling and disputing against all the aduersaries thereof, fearing neither peril of life nor danger of death, whereby he might maintaine the doctrine of Christ against the malicious blasphemers, and also augment the number of christian beleeuers, as may appeare by his vehement disputations against the heathen philosophers: also moreouer as wel appeareth in that long disputation which he had with one Tripho at Ephesus, as also in his confutations of heretikes. Furthermore, his conflicts and apologies which with great courage and securitie he exhibited against the persecutors of the christians, both the emperor and the magistrats, yea and the whole senat of Rome do testifie the same.

Two apologies of Iustinus.

wrote and vttered his mind and conscience to them. For that in persecuting of the christians they did neglect their dutie, and highly offended God, and therefore need they had to be admonished. And further writing to Urbicius lieutenant of the citie, said, that he put men to death and torments for no offence committed, but for the confession onely of the name of Christ, which proceedings and iudgements neither became the emperor nor his sonne, nor the senat: defending moreouer in the said apologie, and purging the christians of such crimes as falslie were laid and obiected against them by the ethniks.

The second apologie of Iustine.

And likewise in his second apologie writing to Antoninus the emperor and his successors, with like grauitie and free libertie declareth vnto them how they had the name, commonly being reputed and taken as vertuous philosophers, maintainers of iustice, louers of learning; but whether they were so, their acts declared. As for him, neither for flatterie nor fauor at their hands, he was constrained thus to write vnto them, but only to sue vnto them, and desire a serious and righteous kind of dealing in their iudgements and sentences (for it becommeth princes to follow vprightnesse and pietie in their iudgements, not tyrannie and violence) and also in plaine words chargeth as well the emperour as the senat with manifest wrong, for that they did not grant the christians that which is not denied to all other malefactors, iudging men to death not conuicted but only for the hatred of the name. Other men which be appeached (said he) in iudgement, are not condemned before they are conuicted: but on vs you take our name only for the crime, when as indeed you ought to see iustice done vpon our accusers. And againe (saith he) If a christian being accused only denie that name, him you release, being not able to charge him with any other offence: but if hee stand to his name, only for his confession you may call him, where indeede it were your dutie rather to examine their manner of life what thing they confesse or denie, and according to their demerits to see iustice done.

The Lord take away this spirit of fury, condemning innocents before they be conuicted.

And in the same further he saith; You examine not the causes, but incensed with rash affections as with the spurre of fury, ye slay and murther them not conuicted, without any respect of iustice. And further he addeth: Some peraduenture will say, certaine of them haue been apprehended and taken in euill doings: as though (saith he) you vsed to inquire vpon them being brought afore you, and not commonly to condemne them before due examination of their offense for the cause aboue mentioned. Where also in the end of the said apologie after this manner he reprehendeth them: You doe degenerat (quoth he) from the goodnesse of your predecessors, whose example you follow not: for your father Adrian of famous memorie caused to be proclamed that christians accused before the iudge, should not be condemned, vnlesse they were found guiltie of some notorious crime. I find that all his vehement and graue apologie standeth vpon most strong and firme probations, denying that the christians ought by conscience at the will and commandement of the emperor & senat to doe sacrifice to the idols: for the which they being condemned, affirme that both they suffer open wrong; affirming moreouer that the true and only religion is the religion of the christians, whose doctrine and conuersation hath no fault. Iustinus although with these and such like perswasions did not so preuaile with the emperour, to cause him to loue his religion and become a christian (for that is not written) yet thus much hee obtained, that Antoninus writing to his officers in Asia in the behalfe of the christians, required and commanded them, that those christians which onlie were found guiltie of any trespasse, should suffer, and such as were not conuicted, should not therefore only for the name be punished, because they were called christians. By these it is apparant with what zeale and faith this Iustinus did striue against the persecutors, which (as he said) could kill only, but could not hurt.

Ex Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 16.

A place of Epiphanius found faultie.

This Iustinus by the meanes and malice of Crescens the philosopher (as is before declared) suffered martyrdome vnder Marcus Antoninus Uerus, a little after that Polycarpus was martyred in Asia, as witnesseth Eusebius, Lib. 4. Heere is to be gathered how Epiphanius was deceiued in the time of his death, saying, that he suffered vnder Rusticus the president, and Adrian the emperor, being of thirtie yéeres of age, which indeed agréeth not either with Eusebius, nor Hierome, nor Swide, nor others more, which manifestly declare & testifie how he exhibited his apologie vnto Antoninus Pius which came after Adrian. Thus haue thou (good reader) the life of this learned and blessed martyr, although partly touched before, yet now more fullie and amplie discoursed for the better commendation of his excellent and notable vertues, of whose finall end thus writeth Pholius, saying; that he suffering for Christ died cheerefully and with honor.

Cū dignitate & latus pro Christo pertulit.

Thus haue ye heard the whole discourse of Iustinus and of the blessed saints of France, Uetius, Zacharias, Sanctus, Maturus, Attalus, Blandina, Alexander, Alcibiades, with others, recorded and set forth by the writing of certaine christian brethren of the same church and place of France. In the which foresaid writing of theirs, moreouer appeareth the great meekenesse and modest constancie of the said martyrs described in these words: Such followers were they of Christ, who when he was in the forme of God, thought it no robberie to be equall with God, being in the same glorie with him, that they not once nor twice but oft times suffered martyrdom, and taken againe from the beasts, & bearing wounds, tearings and skars in their bodies, yet neither would count themselues martyrs, neither would they suffer vs so to call them: but if any of vs either by word or letter would call them martyrs, they did vehemently rebuke them, saying; that The name of martyrdome was to be giuen to Christ the faithfull and true martyr, the first borne of the dead, and the captaine of life; testifying moreouer, that martyrdome belongeth to such, who by their martyrdom were alreadie passed out of this life: and whom as Christ by their worthie confession hath receiued vnto himselfe, and hath sealed vp their martyrdome by their end finished: as for them which were not yet consummated, they (said they) were not worthie the names of martyrs, but only were humble and worthie confessors, desiring also their brethren with teares to pray without ceasing for their confirmation. Thus they performing indeed that which belongeth to true martyrs, in resisting the heathen with much libertie & great patience, without all fears of man, being replenished with the feare of God, refused to bee named of their brethren for martyrs. And after in the said writing it followeth more: They humbled themselues vnder the mightie hand of God by which they were greatly exalted, then they rendred to all men a reason of their faith, they accused no man, they losed all, they bound none, and for them which so euill did intreat them they prayed, following the example of Stephan the perfect martyr, which said: O Lord impute not their sinne to them. And after againe: Neither did they proudly disdaine against them which fell, but of such as they had they imparted to them that lacked, bearing toward them a motherly affection, shedding their plentifull teares for them to God the father, and prayed for their life and saluation, and as God gaue it them they also did communicat to their neighbours, and thus they as conquerors of all things departed to God. They loued peace, and leauing the same to vs, they went to God, neither leauing any molestation to their mother, nor sedition or trouble to their brethren, but ioy, peace, concord, and loue to all.

The holy martyrs refuse to be called martyrs.

Out of the same writing moreouer concerning these martyrs of France afore mentioned, is recorded also another history not vnworthie to be noted, taken out of the same booke of Eusebius cap. 3. which history is this.

Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 2.

Alcibiades.

There was among these constant and blessed martyrs, one Alcibiades, as is aboue specified: which Alcibiades euer vsed a very strict diet, receiuing for his food and sustenance nothing els but only bread and water. When this Alcibiades now being cast into prison went about to accustome the same strictnesse of diet, after his vsuall manner, before it was reuealed by God to Attalus afore mentioned, one of the said companie, being also the same time imprisoned after his first conflict vpon the scaffold, that Alcibiades did not well in that he refused to vse and take the creatures of God, and also thereby ministred to other a pernicious occasion of offensiue example. Whereupon Alcibiades being aduertised, and reformed, began to take all things boldly & with giuing thanks. Whereby may appeare to all scrupulous consciences, not only a wholesome instruction of the holy Ghost, but also here is to be noted how in those daies they were not destitute of the grace of God, but had the holy spirit of God to be their instructor. Hæc Euseb.

The strict fasting of Alcibiades corrected by the holy ghost.

A lesson for scrupulous consciences.

Ireneus newly made minister, and commended to Eleutherus.

The foresaid martyrs of France at the same time commended Ireneus, newly then made minister, with their letters vnto Eleutherus bishop of Rome, as witnesseth Euseb. in the tenth chapter of the said booke, which Ireneus first was the hearer of Polycarpus, then made minister (as is said) vnder these martyrs: and after their death made bishop afterward of Lions in France, and succeeded after Photinus. Besides this Iustinus, there was also the same time in Asia, Claudius Apolinaris, or Apolinarius bishop of Hieropolis, and also Melito bishop of Sardis, an eloquent and learned man, much commended of Tertullian, who succeeding after the time of the apostles, in the raigne of this Antoninus Uerus, exhibited vnto him learned and eloquent apologies in defense of Christs religion, like as Quadratus and Aristides aboue mentioned did vnto the emperour Adrian, whereby they moued him somewhat to stay the rage of his persecution. In like manner did this Apolinaris and Melito (stirred vp by God) aduenture to defend in writing the cause of the christians vnto this Antoninus. Of this Melito, Eusebius in his fourth booke making mention, excerpeth certaine places of his apologie in these words as followeth: Now, saith he, which was neuer séene before, the godly suffer persecution by occasion of certaine proclamations and edicts proclamed throughout Asia; for villanous sycophants robbers and spoilers of other mens goods, grounding themselues vpon those proclamations, and taking occasion of them, rob openly night and day, and spoile those which doe no harme. And it followeth after; Which if it be done by your commandement, be it so well done; for a good prince will neuer command but good things, and so we will be contented to sustaine the honor of his death. This only we most humblie beseech your maiestie, that calling before you and examining the authors of this tumult & contention, then your grace would iustly iudge whether wee are worthie of cruell death or quiet life. And then if it be not your pleasure, and that it proceedeth not by your occasion (which indeede against your barbarous enemies were too bad) the more a great deale we are petitioners to your highnesse, that hereafter you will vouchsafe to heare vs thus so vexed and oppressed with these kind of villanous robberies. And verilie our philosophie and doctrine did first among the barbarous take place, which doctrine first in the daies of Augustus your predecessor, when it did raigne and florish, thereby your empire became most famous and fortunat: and from that time more and more the state of the Romane empire increased in honor, whereof you most happily were made successors, and so shall your sonne too. Honor therefore this philosophie which with your empire sprang vp and came in with Augustus, which your progenitors aboue all other honored and most esteemed. And verily this is no small argument of a good beginning, that since our doctrine florished in the empire, no misfortune or losse happened from Augustus time: but contrarie alwaies victorie, good and honorable yeeres, as euer any man would wish: onelie among all, and of all, Nero and Domitian being kindled by diuers naughtie and spitefull persons cauillinglie obiected against our doctrine, of whom this sycophanticall slandering of vs by naughtie custome first came and sprang vp. But your godly fathers espying the ignorance of these, oftentimes by their writing corrected their temerous attempts in that behalfe: among whom your grandfather Adrian with many others is read of, to haue written of Fundane the proconsull and lieutenant of Asia: and your father, your owne father I say, with whom you ruled in all things, wrote to the cities vnder his signet, as the Laersens, Thessalonicenses, Athenienses and Grecians, rashly to innouat or alter nothing of your highnesse: therefore, who in this case is of that sect as your predecessors were, yea and of a more benigne and philosophicall mind, we are in good hope to obtaine our petition and request.

The christians religion began with the empire of Rome.

Christian religion maketh common weals to flourish.

Thus much out of the apologie of Melito, who writing to Onesimus, giueth to vs this benefit, to know ẏ true catalogue and the names of all the autentike bokes of the old testament, receiued in the ancient time of the primitiue church. Concerning the number and names whereof, the said Melito in his letter to Onesimus declareth; how that he returning into the parts where these things were done and preached, there he diligently inquired out the bokes approoued of the old testament, the names whereof in order he subscribeth, & sendeth vnto him as followeth: The fiue bookes of Moses, Genesis, Exodus, Leuiticus, Numeri, Deuteronomi, Iesus Naue, The Iudges, Ruth, Foure bookes of Kings, Two bookes Paralipomenon, The Psalmes, Prouerbs of Salomon, The booke of Wisdome, The Preacher, The song of songs, Iob, The prophets, Esay, Hieromie, Twelue prophets in one booke, Daniel, Ezechiel, Esdras. And thus much of this matter which I thought here to record, for that it is not vnprofitable for these latter times to vnderstand, what in the first times was receiued and admitted as autentike, and what otherwise.

The bookes of the old testament autentik and receiued.

But from this little digression to returne to our matter omitted, that is, to the apologies of Apolinarius and Melito, in the story so it followeth; that whether it was by the occasion of these two apologies, or whether it was through the writing of Athenagoras a philosopher, and a legat of the christians, it is vncertaine: but this is certaine, that the persecution the same time was staied. Some do thinke, which most probablie seeme to touch the truth, that the cause of staying this persecution, did rise vpon a wonderfull miracle of God shewed in the emperors campe by the christians; the story whereof is this. At what time the two brethren Marcus Antoninus, & Marcus Aurelius Commodus emperors, ioyning together, warred against the Quades, Vandales, Sarmates, and Germans, in the expedition against them, their armie by reason of the imminent assault of their enemies was coped and shut in within the straits and hot drie places, where their souldiers besides other difficulties of battell, being destitute of water fiue daies, were like to haue perished, which dread not a little discomfited them, and abated their courage; where, in this so great distresse and ieopardie, suddenly withdrew from the armie a legion of the christian souldiers for their succor, who falling prostrat vpon the earth, by ardent prayer by and by obtained of God double release: by meanes of whom God gaue certaine pleasant showers from the element, wherby as their souldiers quenched their thirst, so were a great nũber of their enemies discomfited and put to flight by continuall lightnings which shooted out of the aire. This miracle so pleased and won the emperor, that euer after he waxed gentler and gentler to the christians, and directed his letters to diuers of his rulers (as Tertullian in his apologie witnesseth) commanding them therein to giue thanks to the christians, no lesse for his victorie, then for the preseruation of him and all his men. The copie of which letter insueth.

Ex Eusebio, ibidem.

A miraculous raine obtained by the christians.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus emperor, to the senat and people of Rome.

I Giue you hereby to vnderstand what I intend to doe, as also what successe I haue had in my warres in Germany, and with how much difficultie I haue vitelled my campe, being compassed about with seuentie and foure fierce dragons, whom my Scouts descried to be within nine miles of vs, and Pompeianus our lieutenãt hath viewed, as he signified vnto vs by his letters: wherefore I thought no lesse but to be ouerrunne and all my bands of so great multitude, as well my vaward, maineward, as rereward, with all my souldiours of Ephrata; in whose host there were numbred of fighting men, nine hundred seuentie and fiue thousand. But when I saw my selfe not able to encounter with the enemie, I craued aid of our countrie gods: at whose hands I finding no comfort, and being driuen of the enemie vnto an exigent, I caused to be sent for those men which wee call christians, who being mustered, were found a good indifferent number, with whom I was in further rage thẽ I had good cause, as afterwards I had experience by their maruellous power, who foorthwith did their indeuor, but without either weapõ, munition, armor or trumpets, as men abhorring such preparation and furniture, but only satisfied in trust of their God, whom they carie about with them in their consciences. It is therefore to be credited, although we call them wicked men, that they worship God in their hearts. For they falling prostrat vpon the ground prayed not onlie for me, but for the host also which was with me, beseeching their God for helpe in that our extremity of victuals and fresh water: for we had been now fiue daies without water, and were in our enemies land, euen in the midst of Germany; who thus falling vpon their faces, made their prayer to a God vnknowne of me. And there fel amongst vs from heauen a most pleasant and cold shower, but amongst our enemies a great storme of haile mixt with lightning, so that immediatlie we perceiued the inuincible aid of the most mighty God to bee with vs: therefore we giue those men leaue to professe christianitie, lest perhaps by their prayer we be punished with the like, and thereby make my selfe the author of such hurt as shall bee receiued by the christian profession. And if any shal apprehend one that is a christian, only for that cause, I will that he being apprehended without punishment, may haue leaue to confesse the same, so that there bee none other cause obiected against him, more then that he is a christian; but let his accuser bee burned aliue. Neither will I that he confessing and being found a christian, shall be inforced to alter the same his opinion by the gouernor of any of our prouinces, but left to his owne choice. And this decree of mine I will to be ratified in the senat house, and command the same publikely to be proclamed and read in the court of Traianus: and that further from thence it may bee sent into all our prouinces by the diligence of Veratius gouernor of our citie Polione. And further, we giue leaue to all men to vse and write out this our decree, taking the same out of our copie publikely in the common hall set foorth.

Thus the tempestuous rage of persecution against the christians began for a time to asswage partly by the occasion hereof, partly also vpon other causes incident, compelling the enemies to surceasse their persecution, as great plagues and pestilence lying vpon the countrie of Italie: likewise great wars, as well in the east parts, as also in Italie and France, terrible earthquakes, great flouds, noisome swarmes of flies and vermine deuouring their corne fields, &c. And thus much of things done vnder Antoninus Uerus, which Antoninus in the beginning of his raigne ioyned with him in the gouernment of the empire his brother Marcus Aurelius Commodus, who also was with him at the miraculous victorie gotten by the christians, as Eusebius, cap. 5. lib. 5. recordeth. Contrarie, Platina in vita Soteris, and the booke intituled Flores historiarum, referre the same to the time of Antoninus Uerus, and his sonne Lucius Antoninus Commodus, & not of Marcus Aurelius Commodus his brother. But howsoeuer the truth of yeeres do stand, certaine it is, that after the death of Antoninus Uerus, and of Aurelius Commodus, succeeded Lucius Antoninus Commodus the sonne of Uerus, who raigned thirteene yeeres.

The difference between Eusebius and Platina.

Anno 175.

In the time of this Commodus, although hee was an incommodious prince to the senators of Rome, yet notwithstanding there was some quietnesse vniuersally through the whole church of Christ from persecution, by what occasion it is not certaine. Some thinke, of whom is Xiphilinus, that it came through Marcia the emperors concubine, which fauored the christians: but howsoeuer it came (saith Eusebius) the furie of the raging enemies was then somewhat mitigated, and peace was giuen by the grace of Christ vnto the church throughout the whole world: at what time, the wholesome doctrine of the gospell allured and reduced the hearts of all sorts of people vnto the true religion of God, insomuch that many both rich and noble personages of Rome with their whole families and households to their saluation, adioyned them to the church of Christ.

Quietnesse giuen to the church.

Among whom there was one Apollonius, a noble man and a senator of Rome, mentioned in Eusebius, lib. 5. cap. 21. who being maliciouslie accused vnto the senat by one whom Hierome writeth to be the seruant of the said Apollonius, and nameth him Seuerus: but whose seruant soeuer he was, the wretched man came sone enough before the iudge, being condignelie rewarded for that his malicious diligence: for by a law which the emperor made, that no man vpon paine of death should should falsly accuse the christians, he was put to execution, and had his legs broken forthwith by the sentence of Perennius the iudge, which being an heathen man he pronounced against him: but the beloued martyr of God when the iudge with much adoe had obtained of him to render an account before the honorable senat of his faith, vnder whose defense and warrant of life he did the same, deliuered vnto them an eloquent apologie of the christian beleefe: but the former warrant notwithstanding, he by the decree of the senat was beheaded, and so ended his life, for that there was an ancient law among them decreed, that none that professed Christ and therefore arraigned, should be released without recantation, or altering his opinion.

Apollonius exhibiteth an apologie of his faith to the senat.

An old wicked law of the Romans.

This Commodus is said in stories to be so sure and steddie handed in casting the dart, that in the open theater before the people he would encounter with the wild beasts, and be sure to hit them in place where he appointed. Among diuers other his vicious and wild parts he was too farre surprised in pride and arrogancie, that he would be called Hercules, and many times would shew himselfe to the people in the skinne of a lion, to bee counted thereby the king of men, like as the lion is of the beasts.

The ridiculous pride of the emperor.

Vpon a certaine time being his birth day, this Commodus calling the people of Rome together, in a great roialtie hauing his lions skin vpon him, made sacrifice to Hercules and Iupiter, causing it to be cried through the citie that Hercules was the patrone and defender of the city. There were the same time at Rome, Vincentius, Eusebius, Peregrinus, Potentianus, learned men and instructors of the people, who following the steps of the apostles, went about from place to place where the gospel was not yet preached, conuerting the Gentils to the faith of Christ. These hearing the madnesse of the emperor and of the people, began to reprooue their idolatrous blindnesse, teaching in villages and townes all that heard them to beleeue vpon the true and only God, and to come away from such worshipping of diuels, and to giue honor to God alone which only is to be worshipped, willing them to repent and to be baptised, lest they perished with Commodus. With this their preaching they conuerted one Julius a senator, & others, to the religion of Christ. The emperor hearing thereof, caused them to be apprehended of Vitellus his captaine, and to be compelled to sacrifice vnto Hercules: which when they stoutlie refused, after diuers grieuous torments & great miracles by them done, at last they were pressed with leaden weights to death. This Peregrinus aboue mentioned had been sent before by Xistus bishop of Rome into the parties of France, to supplie there the roome of a bishop and teacher, by reason that for the continuall and horrible persecutions there aboue touched, those places were left desolate and destitute of ministers and instructors, where after he had occupied himselfe with much fruite among the flock of Christ, and had stablished the congregation there, returning home againe to Rome, there finished at last (as it is said) his martyrdome.

Peregrinus sent to France and martyred at Rome.

Ex Platina in vita Sixti.

Now remaineth likewise to speake of Julius: which Julius being (as is afore described) a senator of Rome, and now wonne by the preaching of these blessed men to the faith of Christ, did eftsoones inuite them and brought them home to his house, where being by them more fullie instructed in christian religion, he beleeued in the gospell. And sending for one Rufinus a priest, was with all his familie by him baptised, who (not as the common sort was wont to doe) kept close and secret his faith, but incensed with a marueilous and sincere zeale, openlie professed the same, altogether wishing and praying to be giuen to him by God, not onely to beleeue in Christ, but also to hazard his life for him. Which thing the emperour hearing how that Julius had forsaken his old religion, and became a christian, forthwith sent for him to come before him, vnto whom hee spake on this wise: O Julie, what madnes hath possessed thee, that thus thou doest fall from the old and common religion of thy forefathers, who acknowledged & worshipped Iupiter and Hercules their gods, and now doest imbrace a new and fond kind of religion of the christians? At which time Julius hauing good occasion to shew and open his faith, gaue straightway account thereof to him, and affirmed that Hercules and Iupiter were false gods, and how the worshippers of them should perish with eternal damnation and punishments. Which the emperor hearing how that hee condemned and despised his gods, being then inflamed with a great wrath (as he was by nature verie cholerike) committed him forthwith to Vitellus the master of the souldiors, a very cruell and fierce man, to see Julius either to sacrifice to mightie Hercules, or refusing the same to slay him. Vitellus (as he was commanded) exhorted Julius to obay the emperors commandement, and to worship his gods, alleaging how that the whole empire of Rome was not only constituted, but also preserued and maintained by them: which Julius denied vtterly to doe, admonishing sharply in like maner Vitellus to acknowledge the true God, and obey his commandements, lest hee with his maister should die some grieuous death: whereat Vitellus being moued, caused Julius with cudgels to be beaten vnto death.

Julius with his familie baptised and after martyred.

These things being thus briefly recited touching such holie martyrs as hitherto haue suffered, now remaineth that we returne againe to the order of the Romane bishops, such as followed next after Alexander, at whom wee left, whose successor next was Xistus or Sixtus, the sixth bishop counted after Peter, and gouerned that ministerie the space of tenne yeeres, as Damasus and others do write. Urspergensis maketh mention but of nine yeeres. Platina recordeth that he died a martyr, & was buried at Vaticane. But Eusebius speaking of his decease, maketh no word or mention of any martyrdome. In the second tome of the councels certaine epistles be attributed to him, whereof Eusebius, Damasus, Hierome, and other old authors, as they make no relation, so seeme they to haue no intelligence nor knowledge of any such matter. In these counterfeit epistles, and in Platina appeareth that Xistus was the first author of these ordinances. First, that the holy mysteries and holy vessels should be touched but onelie of persons holie and consecrated, especiallie of no woman. Item, that the corporas cloth should be made of no other cloth but of fine linen. Item, that bishops such as were called vp to the apostolike see, returning home againe, should not bee receiued at their returne, vnlesse they brought with them letters from the bishop of Rome, saluting the people. Item, at the celebration he ordained to be sung this verse, Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, Dominus Deus Saboth. Where moreouer is to be noted, that the said Platina, in the life of this Xistus, doth testifie that Peter ministred the celebration of the communion onely with the Lords prayer. These trifling ordinances of Xistus, who is so rude that seeth not or may not easily coniecture to bee falsly fathered of Xistus, or of any father of that time? first by the vniforme rudenesse and stile of all those decretall letters, nothing sauouring of that age, but rather of the latter dunsticall times that followed; also by the matter and argument in those letters contained, nothing agreeing with the state of those troublesome daies. Neither againe is it to be supposed, that any such recourse of bishops was then to the apostolicall see of Rome, that it was not lawfull to returne without their letters: when as the persecution against the christians was then so hot, in the daies of Adrian, that the bishops of Rome themselues were more glad to flee out of the citie, then other bishops were to come to them vnto Rome. And if Xistus added the Sanctus vnto the masse canon, what peece then of the canon went before it, when they which put to the other patches came after Xistus? And if they came after Xistus that added the rest, why did they set their peeces before his, seeing they that began the first peece of the canon, came after him?

The same likewise is to be iudged of the epistles and ordinances of Telesphorus, who succeeded next vnto Xistus, and being bishop of that congregation the terme of eleuen yeeres, the first yeere of the reigne of Antonius Pius, died martyr, about the yeere of our Lord, one hundred thirtie and eight. His epistle like vnto the rest containing in it no great matter of doctrine, hath these ordinances. First he commandeth all that were of the clergie to fast and abstaine from flesh eating seuen weekes before easter. That three masses should be said vpon the nativitie day of the Lord. That no lay man should accuse either bishop or priest. He ordained moreouer Gloria in excelsis, to be added to the masse, &c. But these things falsly to be fained vpon him may easily be coniectured. For as touching the seuen weeks fast, neither doth it agree with the old Romane terme commonly receiued, calling it Quadragesima, that is, the fortie daies fast: neither with the example of our sauiour, who fasted not seuen weeks but onelie fortie daies. Moreouer, as concerning this fortie daies fast, we read of the same in the epistle of Ignatius, which was long before Telesphorus: whereby it may appeare that this Telesphorus was not the first inuentor thereof. And if it be true that is lately come out in the name of Abdias (but vntrulie as by many coniectures may be prooued) there is read, that in the daies of S. Matthew this Lent fast of fortie daies was obserued long before Telesphorus; by these words that follow: In the daies (said he) either of Lent, or in the time of other lawfull fastings, he that abstaineth not as well from the eating meat as also from the mixture of bodies, doth incur in so doing not onelie pollution, but also committeth offense, which must be washed away with the teares of repentance. Againe, Apollonius affirmeth that Montanus the heretike was the first deuiser and bringer in of these lawes of fasting into the church, which before was vsed to be free. Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 18. But especially by Socrates, writer of the ecclesiasticall storie, who liued after the daies of Theodosius, may be argued, that this seuen weekes fast is falsly imputed to Telesphorus. For Socrates in his first booke, speaking of this time hath these words: Romani namque tres ante pascha septimanas præter Sabbatum & Dominicam continuas ieiunant, that is: The Romans (saith he) doe fast three weeks continuallie before easter, beside the sabbath and the sunday. And moreouer, speaking of the diuers and sundrie fastings of Lent in sundrie and diuers churches, he addeth these words: And because that no man can bring foorth any commandement written of this matter, it is therefore apparant, that the apostles left this kind of fast free to euery mans will and iudgement, lest any should bee constrained by feare and necessitie to doe that which is good. &c.

With this of Socrates agrée also the words of Sozomenus, liuing much about the same time, in his seuenth book, where he thus writeth: The whole fast of Lent (saith he) some comprehend in six weeks, as doe the Illirians, and the west churches, with all Libia, Egypt, & Palestina: some in seuen weeks, as at Constantinople, and the parties bordering to Phenica: other some in three weeks, next before the day of Easter, and some againe in two weeks, &c. By the which it may be collected, that Telesphorus neuer ordained any such fast of seuen weeks: which otherwise neither would haue bin neglected in Rome, and in the west churches: neither again would haue been vnremembred of these ancient ecclesiasticall writers, if any such thing had been. The like is to be thought also of the rest, not onely of his constitutions, but also of the other ancient bishops & martyrs, which followed after him, as of Higinus in the yére of our Lord one hundred fortie and two, who succeeding him and dying also a martyr, as Volateranus lib. 22. declareth, is said or rather fained to bring in the creame, one godfather and godmother in baptisme, to ordain the dedication of churches: when as in his time so far it was off, that any solemne churches were standing in Rome, that vnneth the christians could safely conuent in their owne houses. Likewise the distincting the orders of metropolitans, bishops, and other degrées, sauor nothing lesse then of that time.

After Higinus followed Pius, who as Platina reporteth was so precisely deuout about the holy mysteries of the Lords table, that if any one crum therof did fall downe to the ground, he ordained that the priest should doe penance fortie daies: if any fell vpon the superaltar, he should doe penance three daies: if vpon the linnen corporas cloth fource daies: if vpon any other linnen cloth nine daies. And if any drop of the blood (saith he) should chance to be spilled, whersoeuer it fell it should be licked vp, if it were possible: if not, the place should be washed or pared, and so being washed or pared, should be burned and laid in the vestrie. All which toies may séeme to a wise man more vaine and trifling, then to sauor of those pure and strict times of those holy martyrs. This Pius (as is reported) was much conuersant with Hermes, called otherwise Pastor. Damasus saith he was his brother. But how is that like that Hermes being the disciple of Paul, or one of the threescore disciples, could be the brother of this Pius? Of this Hermes and of the reuelations the foresaid Pius in his epistle decretall (if it be not forged) maketh mention, declaring that vnto him appeared the angell of God in the habit of a shepheard, commanding him that Easter day should be celebrated of all men vpon no other day, but vpon a sunday: whereupon, saith the epistle, Pius the bishop by his authoritie apostolicall decréed and commanded the same to bee obserued of all men.

Then succéeded Anicetus, Soter, and Eleutherius, about the yéere of our Lord one hundred and fourescore. This Eleutherius, at the request of Lucius king of Britaine, sent to him Damianus and Fugatius, by whom the king was conuerted to Christs faith, and baptised about the yéere of our Lord one hundred threescore and nineteene. Nauclerus, lib. chro. Gen. 6. saith, it was in the yéere one hundred fiftie and fiue. Henr. de Erfordia saith, it was in the yeere one hundred threescore and nine, in the nineteenth yéere of Verus the emperor. Some say it was in the first yeere of Commodus, which should be about the yéere of our Lord one hundred fourescore and fiue. Timotheus in his storie thinketh that Eleutherius came himselfe: but that is not like. And as there is a variance among the writers for the count of yéeres: so doth there rise a question among some, whether Eleutherius was the first that brought the faith from Rome into this land or not. Nicephorus lib. 4. cap. 4. saith that Simon Zelotes came into Britaine. Some other alleage out of Gildas de victoria, Aurel. Ambrosi. that Joseph of Aramathy after the dispersion of the Jews, was sent to Philip the apostle from France to Britaine, about the yéere of our Lord threescore and three, and here remained in this land all his time, and so with his fellowes laid the first foundation of christian faith among the Britaine people. Whereupon other preachers and teachers comming afterward confirmed the same and increased it more. And therefore doth Petrus Cluniacensis call the Scotishmen and so doth count them as more ancient christians. For the confirmation hereof might be allaged the testimonie of Origen, of Tertullian, and the words also of the letter of Eleutherius, which import no lesse but that the faith of Christ was here in England among the Britaine people, before Eleutherius time, and before the king was conuerted: but hereof more shall be spoken hereafter (Christ willing) when after the tractation of these ten persecutions, we shall enter into the matter of our English stories.

About this time of Commodus afore mentioned, among diuers other learned men & famous teachers, whom God stirred vp at that time (as he doth at all other times raise vp some) in his church, to confound the persecutors by learning and writing, as the martyrs to confirme the truth with their bloud, was Serapion bishop of Antioch, Egesippus a writer of the ecclesiasticall historie from Christs passion to his time, as witnesseth Hierome and Eusebius, lib. 4. cap. 8. & 22. which books of his be not now remaining: and those that be remaining (which be fiue De excidio Hierosol.) be not mentioned neither of Hierome, Eusebius, nor of Miltiades, which also wrote his apologie in defense of christian religion, as did Melito, Quadratus, and Aristides before mentioned. About the same time also wrote Heraclitus, who first began to write annotatiõs and enarrations vpon the new testament, and epistles of the apostles. Also Theophilus bishop of Cesaria, Dionysius bishop of Corinth a man famously learned, which wrote diuers epistles to diuers churches, and among others writeth, exhorting Pentus a certaine bishop, Ne graue seruandæ castitatis onus necessariò fratribus imponat, sed multorum sese imbecillitati attemperet, that is, That he would lay no yoke of chastitie of any necessitie vpon his brethren: but that he would consider the infirmity of others, and beare with it. Euseb. lib. 4. cap. 23. Moreouer the said Dionysius in his epistles writing of Dionysius Areopagita, declareth of him how that he was first conuerted to the christian faith by S. Paul, according as in the acts is recorded, and afterward was made the first bishop of Athens, but maketh there no mention of his book De hierarchia. Whereby it may easily appeare, what is to be iudged of that booke. Furthermore, by the epistles of the said Dionysius of Corinth, this we haue to vnderstand, to be the vse at that time in churches to read the letters and epistles, such as were sent by learned bishops and teachers vnto the congregations, as may appeare by these words of Dionysius, who writing to the church of the Romans, and to Soter, saith: This day we celebrat the holie dominicall day, in which we haue read your epistle, which alwaies we will reade for our exhortation, like as we do reade also the epistle of Clement sent to vs before, &c. Eusebius, ibid. Where also mention is made of keeping sunday holy, whereof we find no mention made in ancient authors, before his time, except onely in Justinus martyr, who in his description declareth two times most especially vsed for christian men to congregat together: first, when any conuert was to bee baptised, the second was vpon the sunday, which was wont for two causes then to be hallowed: first, because (saith he) vpon that day God made the world: secondly, because that Christ vpon that day first shewed himselfe after his resurrection to his disciples, &c.

Duer and beside these aboue named, about the daies of Commodus, wrote also Clemens Alerãdrinus, a man of notable and singular learning, whose books although for a great part be lost, yet certaine of them yet remaine, wherein is declared among other things, the order and number of the books and gospels of the new testament, &c.

Clemens Alexandrinus.

The same time moreouer liued Pantenus, which was the first in Alexandria that professed in open schoole to read, of whom is thought first to proceed the order and manner among the christians to read and professe in vniuersities. This Pantenus for his excellencie of learning was sent by Demetrius bishop of Alexandria to preach to the Indians, where he found the gospel of S. Matthew written in Hebrue, left there by S. Bartholomew, which booke afterward he brought with him from thence to the librarie of Alexandria.

The gospell of S. Matthew in Hebrue.

During all the reigne of Commodus, God granted rest and tranquillitie, although not without some bloudshed of certaine holy martyrs, as is aboue declared, vnto his church. In the which time of tranquillitie, the christians hauing now some leasure from the forreigne enemie, began to haue a little contention among themselues about the ceremonie of Easter: which contention albeit of long time before had been stirring in the church, as is before mentioned of Polycarpus and Anicetus: yet the variance & difference of that ceremonie brought no breach of christian concord and societie among them: neither as yet did the matter excéed so farre, but that the bond of loue, and communion of brotherlie life continued, although they differed in the ceremonie of the day. For they of the west church pretending the tradition of Paul and Peter, but indéed being the tradition of Hermes and of Pius, kept one day, which was vpon the sunday after the foureteenth day of the first moneth. The church of Asia following the ordinance of John the apostle, obserued another, as more shall be declared (the Lord willing) when wee come to the time of Victor bishop of Rome. In the meane time as concerning the fourth persecution let this hitherto suffice.

The fift persecution.

Seuerus emperor. Anno 195.

After the death of Commodus raigned Pertinax but few moneths, after whom succéeded Seuerus, vnder whom was raised the fifth persecution against the christian saints: who raigning the terme of eightéene yeeres, the first ten yéeres of the same was very fauourable and courteous to the christians: afterward through sinister suggestions and malicious accusations of the malignant, was so incensed against them, that by proclamations he commanded no christians any more to bee suffered. Thus the rage of the emperor being inflamed against them, great persecution was stirred vp on euery side, whereby an infinit number of martyrs were slaine, as Eusebius in his first booke recordeth, which was about the yéere of our Lord two hundred and fiue. The crimes and false accusations obiected against the christians are partly touched before; as sedition and rebellion against the emperour, sacriledge, murthering of infants, fants, incestuous pollution, eating raw flesh, libidinous commixture, whereof certaine indeed called then Gnostici, were infamed. Item, it was obiected against them for worshipping the head of an asse: which whereof it should rise, I find no certaine cause, except it were perhaps by the Iewes. Also they were charged for worshipping the sun, for that peraduenture before the sun did rise, they conuented together, singing their morning hymnes vnto the Lord, or else because they prayed toward the east: but specially for that they would not with them worship their idolatrous gods, and were counted as enemies to all men, &c.

The captaines and presidents of this persecution vnder the emperor were Hilerianus, Aigellius, Claudius, Hermianus ruler of Cappadocia, Cecilius, Capella, Aespronius, also Demetrius mentioned of Cyprian, and Aquila iudge of Alexandria, of whom Eusеb. lib. 6. cap. 5. maketh relation.

The captaines and ministers of this persecution. Ex Tertul. ad Scapulam.

The places where the force of this persecution most raged, were Africa, Alexandria, Cappadocia, and Carthage. The number of them that suffered in this persecution, by the report of the ecclesiasticall storie was innumerable. Of whom the first was Leonides, the father of Origen, who was beheaded: with whom also Origen his sonne, being of the age then of seuentéene yeares, should haue suffered (such a feruent desire hee had to be martyred for Christ) had not his mother prinilie in the night season conueied away his cloths and his shirt. Whereupon more for shame to be séene, then for feare to die, hee was constrained to remaine at home: and when hee could doe nothing else, yet he writeth to his father a letter with these words: Caue tibi, ne quid propter nos aliud quàm martyrij constanter faciendi propositum cogites, that is, Take heed to your selfe, that you turne not your thought and purpose for our sake, &c. Such a feruencie had this Origen being yet yong, to the doctrine of Christs faith, by the operation of Gods heauenly prouidence, and partly also by the diligent education of his father, who brought him vp from his youth most studiously in all good literature, but especially in the reading and exercise of holy scripture, wherein he had such inward and mysticall speculation, that many times he would moue questions to his father of the meaning of this place or that place in the scripture. In so much that his father diuers times would vncouer his brest being a sléepe, and kisse it, giuing thanks to God which had made him so happie a father of such a happie child. After the death of his father, and all his goods confiscated to the emperor, he with his poore mother, and sir brethren, being brought to such extreame pouertie, did sustaine both himselfe and them by teaching a schole: till at length being wearie of the profession, hee transferred his studie onely to the knowledge and séeking of diuine scripture, and such other learning conducible to the same. So much he profited both in the Hebrue & other tongues, that hee conferred the Hebrue text with the translation of ỳ three score: and moreouer did confer and finde out the other translations which we call the common translation of Aquila, of Symmachus, and Theodotion. Also he adioyned to these aforesaid other foure translations, whereof more is in the storie of Eusebius expressed.

Ex Euseb. Antonino Simonetta, &c.

They that write of the life of Origen, testifie of him that he was of wit quicke and sharpe, much patient of labour, a great trauceller in the tongues, of a spare diet, of a strict life, a great father, his teaching and his liuing were both one: his going was much barefoot: a strict obseruer of that saying of the Lord, bidding to haue but one cote, &c. He is said to haue written so much as seuen notaries, and so many maids euery day could pen. The number of his bookes by the account of Hierome, came to seuen thousand volumes, the copies whereof he vsed to sell for three pence or a little more, for the sustentation of his liuing. But of him more shall be touched hereafter. So zealous he was in the cause of Christ, and of Christs martyrs, that he nothing fearing his owne perill would assist and exhort them going to their death, and kisse them, in so much that he was oft in ieopardie to be stoned of the multitude: and sometimes by the prouision of christian men had his house guarded about with souldiers, for the safetie of them which daily resorted to heare his readings. And many times he was compelled to shift places and houses, for such as laid wait for him in all places: but great was the prouidence of God to preserue him in the midst of all this tempest of Seuerus. Among others which resorted vnto him, and were his hearers, Plutarchus was one, and died a martyr; and with him Serenus his brother who was burned. The third after these was Heraclides, the fourth Heron, who were both beheaded. The fifth, was an other Serenus, also beheaded, Rhais, and Potamiena, who was tormented with pitch powred vpon hir, and martyred with hir mother Marcella, who died also in the fire. This Potamiena was of a fresh and flourishing beautie, who because she could not be remoued from hir profession, was committed to Basilides one of the captaines there in the armie to sée the execution done. Basilides receiuing hir at the iudges hand, and leading hir to the place, shewed hir some compassion in repressing the rebukes and railings of the wicked aduersaries: for the which Potamiena the virgin to requite againe his kindnesse, bad him bee of good comfort, saying that she would pray the Lord to shew mercie vpon him, and so went she to hir martyrdome, which she both strongly and quietly did sustaine.

Not long after it happened that Basilides was required to giue an oath in a matter concerning his fellow souldiers, which thing he denied to doe, plainly affirming that hee was a christian: for their oath then was wont to bee by the idols and the emperor. At the first hee was thought dissemblingly to yeeld, but after when he was heard constantly and in earnest to confirme the same, he was had before the iudge, and so by him committed toward. The christians maruelling thereat, as they came to him in the prison, inquired of him the cause of that his sudden conuersion. To whom hee answered againe and said, that Potamiena had prayed for him to the Lord, and so he said a crowne put vpon his head: adding moreouer, that it should not be long but he should be receiued. Which things thus done, the next day following hee was had to the place of execution and there beheaded. Eusebius lib. 6. cap. 5. Albeit the said Eusebius giueth this storie of no credit, but onely of heare say, as he there expresseth.

Basilides of a persecutor made a martyr.

Ex Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 5.

As diuers and many there were that suffered in the daies of this Seuerus, so some were againe which through the protection of God his prouidence being put to great torments, yet escaped with life: Of whom was one Alexander, who for his constant confession and torments suffered, was made bishop afterward of Hierusalem togither with Narcissus, who being then an old man of an hundred and three score yeares and three, as saith Eusebius, was inuelde for his age to gouerne that function alone.

Alexander confessor and bishop of Ierusalem.

The notable age of Narcissus bishop of Ierusalem.

Of this Narcissus is reported in the ecclesiasticall history that certaine miracles by him were wrought, very notable if they be true. First of water by him turned into oyle at the solemne vigill of Easter, what time the congregation wanted oyle for their lamps. An other miracle is also told of him, which is this: There were three euill disposed persons, who seeing the soundnesse and graue constancie of his vertuous life, and fearing their owne punishment, as a conscience that is guiltie is alwaies fearefull, thought to preuent his accusations in accusing him first, and laying an hainous crime vnto his charge. And to make their accusation more probable before the people, they bound their accusation with a great oath, one wishing to be destroyed with fire if hee said not true; the other to bee consumed with a grieuous sickenesse; the third to lose both his eyes if they did lie. Narcissus although hauing his conscience cleare, yet not able being but one man to withstand their accusation, bound with such oaths, gaue place, and remoued himselfe from the multitude into a solitarie desert by himselfe, where he continued the space of many yeares. In the meane time to them which so willingly and wickedly forswore themselues, this hapned: The first by casualtie of one little small sparkle of fire, was burnt with his goods and all his familie. The second was taken with a great sickenesse from the top to the toe, and deuoured with the same. The third hearing and seeing the punishment of the other, confessed his fault, but through great repentance powred out such teares, that he lost both his eyes: and thus was their false periurie punished. Narcissus after long absence returning home againe, was by this meanes both cleared of the fact and receiued into his bishoprike againe: to whom as is said, for impotencie of his age, Alexander was ioyned with him in execution of the function. Eusebius, histor. eccles. lib. 6. cap. 10. Of this Alexander is recorded in the said ecclesiasticall history, that after his agonies and constancie of his confession shewed in the persecution of Seuerus, hee was admonished by a vision in the night season to make his iourney vp to Jerusalem and Palestina (for that place remained free from this persecution) to sée there the congregation and to pray. Thus he taking his iourney and drawing neere to the citie, a vision with plaine words was giuen to certaine chiefe heads of Jerusalem to goe out of the gate of the citie, there to receiue the bishop appointed to them of God. And so was Alexander met and receiued, and ioyned partner with aged Narcissus, as is before expressed, in the citie of Jerusalem, where hee continued bishop aboue fortie yeares, vntill the persecution of Decius, and there erected a famous librarie, where Eusebius had his chiefest helpe in writing his ecclesiasticall history. Hee wrote also diuers epistles to diuers churches, and licenced Origen openly to teach in his church. At length being very aged, was brought from Jerusalem to Cesaria before the iudge vnder Decius, where after his constant confession the second time, he was committed to prison and there died.

The constancie and death of Alexand. bishop.

Besides these that suffered in this persecution of Seuerus recited of Eusebius, Vincentius also, Lib. 11. cap. 6. ex martyrologio, speaketh of one Andoclus, whom Polycarpus before had sent into France: which Andoclus because hee spread there the doctrine of Christ, was apprehended of Seuerus, and first beaten with staues and bats, after was beheaded.

Andoclus martyr.

To these aboue named may also bee added Asclepiades, who although was not put to death in this persecution of Seuerus, yet constantly he did abide the triall of his confession, & suffered much for the same, as Alexander did before mentioned. Wherefore afterward he was ordained bishop of Antioch, where he continued the space of seuen yeares, of whom Alexander writeth vnto the church of Antioch out of prison, much Ireneus bishop of Lions, and martyr.

About the same time, during the raigne of Seuerus, died Ireneus. Henr. de Erfordia, Ado, and other martyr writers doe hold, that hee was martyred with a great multitude of others more, for the confession and doctrine of Christ, about the fourth or fifth yeare of Seuerus. This Ireneus as hee was a great writer, so was hee greatly commended of Tertullian for his learning, whom he calleth Omnium doctrinarum curiosissimũ exploratorem: A great searcher of all kind of learning. He was first scholler and hearer of Polycarpus, from thence either was sent or came to France, & there by Photinus, and the rest of the martyrs was instituted into the ministerie, commended by their letter to Eleutherius, as is before premonished. At length after the martyrdome of Photinus, hee was appointed bishop of Lions, where he continued about the space of three and twentie yeares. In the time of this Ireneus, the state of the church was much troubled, not onely for the outward persecution of the forraigne enemie, but also for diuers sects and errors then stirring, against which he diligently laboured, and wrote much, although but few of his bookes be now remaining. The nature of this man well agreeing with his name, was such, that he euer loued peace, and sought to set agreement when any controuersie rose in the church. And therfore, when the question of keeping the Easter day was renued in the church, betweene Victor bishop of Rome, and the churches of Asia, and when Victor would haue excommunicated them as schismatiks, for disagreeing from him therein: Ireneus with other brethren of the French church, sorie to see such a contention among brethren for such a trifle, conuented themselues together in a common councell, and directing their letter with their common consent subscribed, sent vnto Victor, intreating him to stay his purpose, and not to proceed in excommunicating his brethren for that matter. Although they themselues agreed with him in obseruing the sunday Easter as he did: yet with great reasons and arguments exhorted him not to deale so rigorously with his other brethren, following the ancient custome of their countrie maner in that behalfe. And beside this hee wrote diuers other letters abrode concerning the same contention, declaring the excommunication of Victor to be of no force.

Tertullian ecclesiasticall writer.

Not long after Ireneus followed also Tertullian, about the time of this Seuerus and Antoninus Caracalla his sonne, a man both in Greeke and Latine well expert, hauing great gifts in disputing, and in writing eloquent, as his bookes declare, and as the commendation of all learned men doth testifie no lesse. To whõ Vincentius Lirinensis giueth such praise, that he calleth him the floure of all Latine writers: and of the eloquence of his stile he thus writeth, that with the force of his reasons, he saith, whom he could not persuade, them he compelled to consent vnto him. How many words, so many sentences, and how many sentences so many victories he had, &c.

Such men of doing and writing, God raised vp from time to time, as pillers and staies for his poore church, as he did this Tertullian in these dangerous daies of persecution. For when the christians were vexed with wrongs, and falslie accused of the Gentiles: Tertullian taking their cause in hand, defendeth them against the persecutors, and against their slanderous accusations. First, that they neuer minded any stir or rebellion, either against the empire or emperors of Rome: for so much as the vse of christians was to pray for the state of their emperors and gouernors. And whereas they were accused falsly to bee enimies to all mankind, how could that be (saith Tertullian to Scapula) seeing the proper office of the christians is by their profession to pray for all men, to loue their enemies, neuer requiting euill for euill, when as all other doe loue but onely their friends, and scarcely them? As touching the horrible slander of murthering infants, how can that bee true in the christians (saith hee) whole order is to abstaine from all blod and strangled: in so much that it is not lawfull for them to touch the blod of any beast at their tables when they feed? from filthie copulation no sort more free then they, which are and euer haue beene the greatest obseruers of chastitie, of whom, such as may, liue in perpetuall virginitie all their life, such as cannot, contract matrimonie, for auoiding all whoredome and fornication. Neither can it bee proued of the christians to worship the sunne, which false surmise Tertullian declareth to rise hereof, for that the maner of the christians was to pray toward the east. Much lesse was there any of them so mad as to worship an asses head, whereof the occasion being taken onely of the Iewes, the slander therof therefore he proueth to be falslie and wrongfully laid to the charge of the christians.

The apologie of Tertullian defending the christians.

Tertullianus ad Scapulam.

The occasion hereof, belike came of the Iewes worshipping the law of an asse in the storie of Samson.

And likewise against all other lies and slanders, obiected of the heathen against the christians, the said Tertullian purgeth the christians, declaring them falslie to be beleeued, and wrongfully persecuted, not for any desert of theirs, but onely for the hatred of their name. And yet notwithstanding, by the same persecutions, he proueth in the same apologie, the religion of the christians nothing to bee empaired, but rather increased. The more (saith he) we are mowne downe of you, the more rise vp. The blod of christians is seed. For what man (saith he) in beholding the painefull torments, and the perfect patience of them, will not search and inquire what is in the cause? And when hee hath found it out, who will not agree vnto it? And when he agreeth to it, who will not desire to suffer for it? Thus (saith he) this sect will neuer die, which the more it is cut downe, the more it groweth. For euery man seeing and wondering at the sufferance of the saints, is moued the more thereby to search the cause; in searching, he findeth it, and in finding he followeth it. Tertullian in eodem apolog.

Tertul. in apologetico.

Thus Tertullian in this dangerous time of persecution, being stirred vp of God, defended the innocencie of the christians, against the blasphemie of the aduersaries; and moreouer for the instruction of the church hee compiled many fruitfull workes, whereof some are extant, some are not to bee found. Notwithstanding the great learning and famous vertues of this worthie man, certaine errors and blemishes are noted in his doctrine, as were before both of Origen and Ireneus, and likewise of them, were they neuer so excellent, that followed them. Which errors all here in order to note and comprehend, were too long a matter for this storie to prosecute. This by the way shall be sufficient to admonish the reader, neuer to looke for any such perfection of any man in this world, how singular so euer he be (Christ onely excepted) but some blemish or other ioyneth himselfe withall, wherof more perchance shall be said when we come to Cyprian.

The errors and imperfections in learned men noted.

And now to returne againe to the order of bishops of Rome intermitted. After Eleutherius afore mentioned, next in the bishoprike of Rome succeeded Victor, who as Platina saith, died quietly in the daies of Seuerus. But Damasus, Supplement. lib. 8. and such as doe follow the common chronicles, affirme that he died a martyr, after he had sitten ten (or as some say twelue) yeares. This Victor was a great stirrer (as partly before is signified) in the controuersie and contention of Easter day. For the which he would haue proceeded in excommunication against the churches of Asia, had not Ireneus then bishop of Lions, with the counsell of other his brethren there assembled, represt his intended violence. As touching that controuersie of Easter in those daies of the primitiue church, the originall therof was this, as Eusebius, Socrates, Platina, and others record. First, certaine it is, that the apostles onely being intentiue and attendant to the doctrine of saluation, gaue no heed nor regard to the obseruation of daies and times, neither bound the church to any ceremonies & rites, except those things necessary mentioned in the Acts of the apostles, as strangled & blood, which was ordained then of the Holy ghost, not without a most vrgent and necessarie cause, touched partly in the history before. For when the murthering and blod of infants was commonly obiected by the heathen persecutors against the christians, they had no other argument to helpe themselues, nor to refell the aduersary, but onely their owne law, by the which they were commanded to abstaine not onely from all mens blod, but also from the blod of all common beasts. And therfore that law seemeth by the Holy ghost to bs giuen, and also to the same end continued in the church, so long as the cause, that is, the persecutions of the heathen Gentiles continued. Beside these wee read of no other ceremonies or rites, which the apostles greatly regarded, but left such things free to the libertie of christians, euery man to vse therein his owne discretion, for the vsing or not vsing thereof. Wherupon, as concerning all the ceremoniall obseruations of daies, times, places, meats, drinks, vestures, and such others: of all these things neither was the diuersitie among men greatly noted, nor any vniformitie greatly required. In so much that Ireneus writing to Victor of the tradition of daies, and of fastings, and of the diuersitie of these things then vsed among the primitiue fathers, saith: Nihilo tamẽ minus omnes illi pacem inter se retinuerunt, & retinemus etiamnum, & ieiunij dissonantia fidei concordiam commendat, &c: that is, Notwithstanding all this varietie, all they kept peace among themselus, and yet we keepe it still, and this difference of fasting among vs commendeth more the concord of faith. And so long did the doctrine of christian libertie remaine whole and sound in the church till the time of Victor, which was about the yeare of our Lord two hundred, although the diuersitie of these vsages began something before also in the daies of Pius and Anicetus, about the yeare of Christ one hundred sixtie and three to be misliked: yet restraint hereof was not so much vrged before, as in the time of Victor. And yet neither did the violence of Victor take such place, but that the doctrine of christian libertie was defended and maintained by meanes of Ireneus and others, and so continued in the church till after the councell of Nice. And thus much concerning the doctrine of christian libertie of the differences of rites and ceremonies.

Victor bishop of Rome.

Ex Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 26.

The doctrine of christian libertie in outward vsages.

{Anno 200}

The cause discussed why the Holy ghost forbad blood and strangled in the primitiue church.

Now to returne to Victor againe, to shew what diuersitie there was in obseruing the day of Easter, and how it came, thus is the storie. First, in the time of Pius and Anicetus in the yeare of Christ one hundred sixtie and three, the question of Easter day began first to be moued, at what time Pius, by the reuelation of Hermes, decreed the obseruation of that day to bee changed from the wonted maner of the fourteenth day of the moone in the first moneth vnto the next sunday after. After him came Anicetus, Soter, & Eleutherius bishops of Rome, which also determined the same. Against these stood Melito bishop of Sardis, Polycarpus, & as some thinke, Egesippus, with other learned men of Asia. Which Polycarpus being sent by the brethren of Asia, came to Rome as is afore said, to confer with Anicetus tetus in that matter: wherein when they could not agree after long debating, yet notwithstanding, they did both communicate together with reuerence, and departed in peace. And so the celebration of Easterday remained adiaphoron, as a thing indifferent in the church, till the time of Victor; who following after Anicetus and his fellowes, and chiefly stirring in this matter, indeuored by all meanes and might, to draw, or rather subdue the churches of Asia vnto his opinion, thinking moreouer to excommunicate all those bishops and churches of Asia, as heretiks & schismatiks, which disagreed from the Romane order: had not Ireneus otherwise restrained him from that doing, as is aforesaid, which was about the yeare of our Lord one hundred fourescore and eleuen, in the reigne of Commodus. Thus then began the vniformitie of keeping that holy day to be first required as a thing necessarie, and all they accounted as heretiks and schismatiks, which dissented from the bishop and tradition of Rome.

Polycarpus and Anicetus disagreeing in controuersie, yet agreed in charitie.

Anniuersarie ceremonies not to be required as a thing necessarie.

With Victor stood Theophilus bishop of Cesaria, Narcissus of Jerusalem, Ireneus of Lions, Palmas of Pontus, Bancchillus of Corinth, the bishop of Osroena, and others more. All which condescended to haue the celebration of Easter vpon the sunday, because they would differ from the Jewes in all things as neere as they might, and partly because the resurrection of the Lord fell on the same day.

Polycrates bishop of Ephesus.

On the contrary side diuers bishops were in Asia, of whom the principall was Polycrates bishop of Ephesus, who being assembled with a great multitude of bishops and brethren of those parties, by the common assent of the rest, wrote againe to Victor, and to the church of Rome, declaring, that they had euer from the beginning obserued that day, according to the rule of scripture vnchanged, neither adding nor altering any thing from the same. Alleaging moreouer for them the examples of the apostles and holy fathers their predecessors, as Philip the apostle, with his three daughters at Hierapolis: Also John the apostle, and euangelist at Ephesus, Polycarpus at Smyrna, Thraseas at Eumenia bishop and martyr, likewise of Sagaris at Laodicea bishop and martyr, holy Papirius & Melito at Sardis. Beside these bishops also of his owne kindred, and his owne ancestors, to the number of seuen which al were bishops before him, and he the eighth now after them. All which obserued (saith hee) the solemnitie of the same day, after the same wise and sort as we doe now.

Bishops in those dales maried.

Victor excommunicateth the churches of Asia.

Victor, being not a little moued herewith, by letters againe denounceth against them (more bold vpon authoritie, then wise in his commission) violent excommunication, albeit by the wise handling of Ireneus, and other learned men, that matter was staid, and Victor otherwise persuaded. What the persuasions of Ireneus were, partly may appeare in Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 26. the sum whereof tendeth to this effect: That the variance and difference of ceremonies is no strange matter in the church of Christ, when as this varietie is not onely in the day of Easter, but also in the manner of fasting, and in diuers other vsages among the christians. For some fast one day, some two daies, some others fast more. Others there be, which counting fortie houres, both day and night, take that for a full daies fast. And this so diuers fashion of fasting in the church of Christ, began not onely in this our time, but was before among our forefathers. And yet notwithstanding, they with all this diuersitie were in vnitie among themselues, and so bee we; neither doth this difference of ceremonies any thing hinder, but rather commendeth the concord of faith. And bringeth forth the examples of the fathers, of Telesphorus, Pius, Anicetus, Soter, Eleutherius, and such others, who neither obserued the same vsage themselues, nor prescribed it to others, and yet notwithstanding kept christian charitie with such as came to communicate with them, not obseruing the same forme of things which they obserued, as well appeared by Polycarpus and Anicetus, which although they agreed not in one vniforme custome of rites, yet refused not to communicate together, the one giuing reuerence vnto the other. Thus the controuersie, being taken vp betweene Ireneus and Victor, remained free to the time of Nicen councell. Hæc ex Iren. Eusebius. And thus much concerning the controuersie of that matter, and concerning the doings of Victor.

Ireneus to Victor.

Diuersitie commendeth the concord of faith.

Zephirinus bishop of Rome.

After Victor succeeded in the see of Rome Zephirinus, in the daies of the foresaid Seuerus, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and three. To this Zephirinus be ascribed two epistles, in the first tome of the councels. But as I haue said before of the decretall epistles of other Romane bishops: so I say and verily suppose of this; that neither the countenance of the stile, nor the matter therein contained, nor the condition of the time, doth otherwise giue to thinke of these letters, but that they be verily ballard letters, not written by these fathers, nor in these times, but craftily and wickedly packt in by some, which to set vp the primacie of Rome, haue most pestilently abused the authoritie of these holy and ancient fathers, to deceiue the simple church. For who is so rude, but that in considering only the state of those terrible times, may easilie vnderstand (except affection blind him) beside a number of other probable coniectures to lead him, that ỹ more persecuted bishops in that time, would haue been glad to haue any safe couert to put their heads in: so farre was it off, that they had any lust or leisure, then to seeke for any primacie or patriarchship, or to driue all other churches to appeale to the see of Rome, or to exempt all priests from the accusation of any laieman: as in the first epistle of Zephirinus is to be seene, written to the bishops of Sicilia, and likewise the second epistle of his to the bishops of the prouince of Egypt, containing no maner of doctrine, nor consolation necessarie for that time, but onely certaine rituall decrees to no purpose, argueth no lesse but the said epistles neither to sauor of that man, nor talk of the time.

The first epistle of Zephirinus to the bishops of Sicilia.

Patins of glasse borne before the priest.

Of like credit also seemeth the constitution of the patins of glasse, which Damasus saith that the same Zephirinus ordained to be caried before the priest, at the celebration of the masse. Againe Platina writeth that he ordained the ministration of the sacrament to be no more vsed in vessels of wood, or of glasse, or of any other metall, except onely siluer, gold, and tin, &c. But how these two testimonies of Damasus and Platina toyne together, let the reader iudge: especially seeing the same decree is referred to Urbanus, that came after him. Againe, what needed this decree of golden chalices to be stablished afterward in the councell of Tiber and Rhens, if it had been enacted before by Zephirinus? How long this Zephirinus sat, our writers do vary. Eusebius saith, he died in the reigne of Caracalla, & sat seuentene yeares. Platina writeth that he died vnder Seuerus, and sat eight yeares, and so saith also Nauclerus. Damasus affirmeth that he sat sixtene yeares and two noneths.

The ordinances of Zephirinus of small credit.

Mattheus author of the storie intituled Flores historiarum, with other latter chronicles, maketh mention of Perpetua, and Felicitas, and Reuocatus, his brother, also of Saturninus and Satyrus brethren, and Secundulus, which in the persecution of this Seuerus gaue ouer their liues to martyrdome for Christ, being throwne to wild beasts and deuoured of the same, in Carthage and in Afrike; saue that Saturninus brought againe from the beasts, was beheaded, and Secundulus died in prison about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and two, as writeth Florilegus.

Seuerus warreth in Britain.

This Seuerus the persecutor reigned, as the most part of writers accord, the terme of eightene yeares, who about the latter time of his reigne came with his armie hither into Britain, where after many conflicts had with the Britains, in the borders of the north, he cast vp a ditch with a mightie wal made of earth and turffes, and strong stakes, to the length of one hundred thirtie and two miles from the one side of the sea to the other, beginning at Tine, and reached to the Scottish sea: which done, he remoued to Yorke, and there by the breaking in of the northern men & the Scots, was besieged and slaine, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and foureteene, leauing behind him two sonnes, Bassianus and Geta. Which Bassianus surnamed Caracalla, after hee had slaine his brother Geta here in Britain, gouerned the empire alone, the space of sir yeares. After whose death, he being slaine also of his seruants (as he had slaine his brother before) succeeded Macrinus with his son Diadumenus, to be emperor, who after they had reigned one yeare, were both slaine of their owne people.

After them followed Varius Heliogabalus in the empire, rather to be called a monster then a man, so prodigious was his life in all gluttonie, filthinesse, and ribaudrie. Such was his pompe, that in his lamps he vsed balme, & filled his fishponds with rose water. To let passe his sumptuous vestures which he would not weare but onely of gold, and most costly silkes: his shewes glittering with pretious stones finely ingraued, hee was neuer two daies serued with one kind of meate, he neuer wore one garment twice. And likewise for his fleshly wickednesse, some daies his companie was serued at meale with the braines of ostriches, & a strange fowle called phenocoptery, an other day with the tongues of popingais, and other sweet singing birds. Being nigh to the sea, he neuer vsed fish: in places far distant from the sea, all his house was serued with most delicate fishes: at one supper hee was serued with seuen thousand fishes, and fiue thousand fowles. At his remouing in his progresse, often there followed him sir hundred chariots laden onely with bauds, common harlots, and ribauds. He sacrificed with yong children, and preferred to the best aduancements in the common weale most light personages, as bauds, minstrels, carters, and such like: in one word, he was an enemie to all honestie and good order. And when he was foretold by his sorcerers and astronomers, that he should die a violent death, he prouided ropes of silke to hang himselfe, swords of gold to kill himselfe and strong poyson in iacints, and emrauds to poison himselfe, if needs he must thereto be forced; moreouer hee made an high tower, hauing the floore of boords couered with gold plate, bordered with pretious stones from the which tower he would throw himselfe downe, if he should be pursued of his enemies. But notwithstanding all his prouision, he was slaine of the souldiers, drawen through the citie, and cast into Tiber after he had reigned two yeares and eight moneths, as witnesseth Eutropius others say foure yeares.

This Heliogabalus, hauing no issue, adopted to his sonne and heire Aurelius Alexander Seuerus, the sonne of Mammea, who entring his reigne the yeare of our Lord one hundred twentie and foure, continued thirteene yeares, well commended for vertuous, wise, gentle, liberall, and to no man hurtfull. And as hee was not vnlearned himselfe through, the diligent education of Mammea his mother, so he was a great fauourer of men wise and learned. Neither did hee any thing in the common weale, without the assistance of learned and sage counsellors. It is reported of him, to beare such stomacke against corrupt iudges, that when he chanced to meete with any of them, by the commotion of his minde he would cast vp choler, being so moued with them that he could not speake, and was ready with his two fingers to put out their eies. From his court he dismissed all superfluous and vnnedfull seruants, saying, that he was no good pupill, which fed idle seruants with the bowels of his common weale.

Against corrupt iudges.

The saying of Alexander to be noted and followed.

Idle seruants eate vp the bowels of the common weale.

Among his other good vertues, it appeareth also that he was friendly and fauorable vnto the christians, as by this act may be gathered: for when the christians had occupied a certaine publike place in some good vse, belike for the assembling and conuenting together of the congregation, the company of the cooks or tiplers made challenge of that place to belong vnto them. The matter being brought before the emperor, he iudged it more honest, the place to the worship of God, howsoeuer it were, then to the dirtie slubbering of cooks and scullians.

A note worthie to be marked.

By this it may be vnderstood, that in Rome no christian churches were erected vnto this time, when as yet (notwithstanding this fauor of the emperor) no publike house could quietly be obtained for the christians. So that by the reason hereof may appeare the decretall epistle and ordinance of pope Higinus concerning the dedication of churches aboue mentioned to be falsified. And likewise the ordinance of Pius his successor, concerning the altar, or Superaltare to be also false. For what Superaltare was it like they had in the time of Higinus and Pius, when as at this time which was long after, no publike place almost could be granted them for the christians to assemble together?

Platina in vita Pontiani.

Of this Alexander Platina writeth, that as he was a great hater of all boasters and flatterers, so he was of such prudence, that no deceit could escape him, and bringeth in a storie of one Turinus, who had gotten craftily many great bribes and gifts, in making the people beleeue that he was of great authoritie with the emperor, and that he could helpe them to haue what soeuer they sued for. Whereof the emperor being certified, caused him in the open market to be fastened to a stake, and there killed with smoke, where the crier stood thus crying to the people: Smoke he sold, and with smoke he is punished.

Punished with smoke, that sold smoke.

Mammea, the mother of this Alexander aboue mentioned (whom Hierome calleth a deuout and religious woman) hearing of the fame and the excellent learning of Origen, being then at Alexandria, sent for him to Antioch, desirous to heare and see him: vnto whom the foresaid Origen according to her request resorted, and after that he had there remained a space with the emperour and his mother, returned againe to Alexandria.

Mammea the mother of the emperor.

And thus continued this good emperor his raigne the space of thirteene yeeres, at length at a commotion in Germanie, with his mother Mammea he was slaine. After whom succeeded Maximinus, contrarie to the mind of the senat, onely appointed by the souldiers to be emperor. During all this time betweene Seuerus and this Maximinus, the church of Christ, although it had not perfect peace, yet it had some meane tranquillitie from persecution. Albeit some martyrs there were at this time that suffered, whereof Nauclerus giueth this reason: For although (saith he) Alexander being perswaded through the intreating of his mother Mammea, did fauor the christians: yet notwithstanding, there was no publike edict or proclamation prouided for their safegard. By reason whereof, diuers there were which suffred martyrdome vnder Almachius and other iudges. In the number of whom after some stories, was Calixtus bishop of Rome, who succeded next vnto Zephirinus aboue mentioned; and after him Urbanus also, which both being bishops of Rome, did both suffer, by the opinion of some writers, vnder Alexander Seuerus.

Ex Nauclero.

Calixtus bishop of Rome and martyr.

The decretall epistles of Calixtus examined

This Calixtus in his two decretall epistles, written to Benedictus, and to the bishops of France, giueth these ordinances, that no actions or accusations against the prelats or teachers of the church should bee receiued, that no secret conspiracies should be made against bishops: item, no man to communicate with persons excommunicate: also no bishop to excommunicate or to deale in an others diocesse. And here he expounded the diocesse, or the parish of any bishop or minister to bee his wife. The wife (saith the apostle) is bound to the law so long as the husband liueth: when he is dead, she is free from the law: so (saith Calixtus) the wife of a bishop (which is his church) so long as he liueth, is bound duely to him, neither ought to bee iudged or disposed by any other man, without his will and iudgement: after his death she is free from the law, to marrie to whom she will, so it be in the Lord, that is, Regulariter, regularly. In the end of the said his epistle decretall, he confuteth the error of them which hold, that they which are fallen, are not to be receiued againe. Which heresie after the time of Calixtus or Calistus, came in first by Nouatus, in the daies of Cornelius. Moreouer, in his said first epistle decretall, is conteined the fast of the foure times, commonly called the Ember fast, whereof also Marianus Scotus maketh mention. But Damasus speaking of the same fast, saith, he ordained the fast but of three times, which was for the increase of corne, wine, and oyle.

The place of S. Paul vnfitly expounded.

Ember fast first ordained.

By these hitherto premised, it is not hard for a quicke reader to smell out the craftie iugling of that person or persons whosoeuer they were, that falsely haue ascribed these decretall institutions to those holy fathers. For first, what leisure had the christians to lay in their accusations, against their bishops, when we neuer reade nor find in any storie any kinde of variance in those daies among them, but all loue, mutuall compassion, and hartie communion among the saints? And as wee read of no variance among the people in those daies, nor of any fault or backsliding among the bishops, who for the most part then died all constant martyrs: so neither doe wee read of any tribunall seate or consistorie vsed or frequented then about any such matters. Againe, if a man examine well the dangers of those busie daies, he shall see the poore flocke of the christians so occupied and pitiouslie oppressed by the cruell accusations of the heathen infidels, that though the cause did, yet the time would not serue them to commense any law against their bishops. Secondly, as touching their conspiracy against bishops, what conspiracie either would they then practise against them, which alwaies gaue their liues for their defence? Or how could they then conspire in any companies together, when neuer a true christian man durst once put his head out of his doores, neither was there in the church any christian man in those perillous daies, except he were a true man indeed, such as was far from all false conspiracies? And when as all the world almost in all places conspired against them: what time, what cause, or what heart trow yee could they haue to conspire against their instructors? Thirdly, concerning the confutation of that heresie, how standeth the confutation with the time of Calixtus, when Nouatus the author of that heresie was after him in the time of Cornelius? Fourthly, if by the law of Calixtus, euerie diocesse bee the proper wife of euery bishop or minister, then how many bishops loues, and parsons wiues had the adulterous pope of Rome defloured in these latter daies of the church, which so proudly and impudently hath intermedled and taken his pleasure and his owne profit, in euery diocesse and parish almost through all christendome, without all leaue and licence of the good man, who hath been in the meane time, and yet is compelled stil, whersoeuer the popes holinesse commeth, Vigilante stertere naso, and to giue him leaue vnasked, to doe what he lift? Wherfore if this canon decretal be truely his, why is it not obserued, so as it doth stand without exception? If it be not, why is it then falsely forged vpon him, & the church of Christ deceiued? And certes, lamentable it is, that this falsifying of such trifling traditions vnder the false pretense of antiquitie, either was begun in the church to deceiue the people: or that it hath remained so long vndetected. For as I thinke, the church of Christ will neuer bee perfectly reformed, before these decretall constitutions and epistles which haue so long put on the visor of antiquitie, shall be fullie detected, and appeare in their owne colour, wherein they were first painted.

Against the decretall epistles and constitutions.

And yet neither do I say this, or thinke contrarie, but that it may be, that bishops of Rome and of the same name haue béene the true authors of these traditions. But here commeth in the error (as I credible suppose) that when other latter bishops of the like name haue deuised these ceremoniall inuentions, the vulgar opinion of men hath transferred them to the first primitiue fathers, although being of an other time, yet bearing the same name with the true inuentors thereof. But of Calixtus enough: who as Damasus saith, in the daies of this Alexander Seuerus died a martyr. Vincentius affirmeth that he was tied to a great stone, and so out of a window was throwen into a ditch. Eusebius speaking of his death, maketh no mention of his martyrdome, and saith hee sat fiue yeares, Platina saith fiue yeares, Sabellicus giueth him seuen yeares, and so doth Damasus.

Calixtus a martyr. Ex. Vincen. in specul. hist. Ex Antonino tit. 7. cap. 6.

After Calixtus followed Urbanus, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred twentie and seuen, who in his epistle decretall (comming out of the same forge) which he wrote in common to all bishops, making no mention of the heauie persecutions of the church, nor ministring any exhortation of comfort or constancie to the brethren, onely giueth many strict precepts, for not transporting or alienating the goods of the church, and to pay truely their offerings, which they vow: also to haue all common among the clergie. Moreouer, about the end of his epistle he instituteth the confirmation of children after baptisme (which the papists be wont to take into the number of their seuen sacraments) affirming & denouncing more then scripture will beare, that the imposition of the bishops hand bringeth the Holy ghost, and thereby to be made full christians, &c. But of these decretall epistles inough is said before, more may be considered of the discréet reader. Marianus Scotus, Sabellicus, Nauclerus, and other late storie writers doe hold as is afore said, that he died a martyr in the daies of Alexander Seuerus, after he had gouerned that seat foure yeares, as Damasus and Platina do witnesse, as Marianus saith, eight yeares.

Urbanus bishop of Rome. Anno 227

Urbanus martyred.

The same Damasus & Platina do testifie of him, that he by his preaching and holinesse of life conuerted diuers Ethnikes to the faith. Among whom were Tiburtius, and Valerianus the husband of Cecilia, which both being noble men of Rome, Cecilia martyr. Ex martyrologio Adonis.

Rome, remained constant in the faith vnto the end and martyrdome. Of this Cecilia thus it is written in the martyrologe by Ado, that Cecilia the virgin, after she had brought Valerian hir husband espoused, and Tiburtius his brother to the knowledge and faith of Christ, and with hir exhortations had made them constant vnto martyrdome; after the suffering of them she was also apprehended by Almachius the ruler, and brought to the idols to do sacrifice: which thing when she abhorred to doe, she should be presented before the iudge to haue the condemnation of death. In the meane time, the sergeants and officers which were about hir beholding hir comely beautie, and the prudent behauiour in hir conuersation, began with many persuasions of words to solicite hir mind to fauour hir selfe, & that so excellent beauty, and not to cast hir selfe away, &c. But she againe so replied to them with reasons and godly exhortations, that by the grace of almighty God their hearts began to kindle, and at length to yeeld to that religion, which before they did persecute. Which thing she perceiuing desired of the iudge Almachius a little respit: which being granted, she sendeth for Vrbanus the bishop home to hir house, to stablish and ground them in the faith of Christ: and so were they with diuers others at the same time baptised both men and women, to the number (as the storie saith) of foure hundred persons, among whom was one Gordianus a noble man. This done, this blessed martyr was brought before the iudge where she was condemned; then after was brought to the house of the iudge, where she was inclosed in a hot bath, but she remaining there a whole day and night without any hurt, as in a cold place, was brought out againe, and commandement giuen that in the bath she should bee beheaded. The executor is said to haue foure strokes at her neck; and yet hir head being cut off, she (as the storie giueth) liued three daies after, and so died this holy virgin martyr, whose bodie in the night season Vrbanus the bishop take and buried among the other bishops. Ado the compiler of this martyrologe addeth that this was done in the time of Marcus Aurelius, and Commodus. But that cannot be, for so much as Vrbanus by all histories was long after those emperors, and liued in the daies of this Alexander, as is aboue declared. Antoninus, Bergomensis, Equilinus, with such other writers set forth this historie with many strange miracles wrought by the said Cecilia, in conuerting hir husband Valerianus and his brother, in shewing them the angell which was the keeper of hir virginitie, and of the angell putting on crownes vpon their heads. But as touching these miracles, as I do not dispute whether they bee true or fabulous, so because they haue no ground vpon any ancient or graue authors, but taken out of certaine new legends, I doe therefore refer them thither from whence they came.

The martyrdome of Cecilia.

Under the same Alexander diuers others there be, whom Bergomensis mentioned to haue suffred martyrdome, as one Agapetus of the age of fifteene yeres, who being apprehended and condemned at Preneste in Italie, because he would not sacrifice to idols, was assailed with sundrie torments: first with whips scourged, then hanged vp by the feet, after hauing hot water poured vpon them, at the last cast to the wild beasts: with all which torments when he could not bee hurt, finallie, with sword was beheaded. The executor of these punishments (as by Henricus Erford may be gathered) was one Antiochus, who in the executing of the foresaid torments suddenly fell downe from his iudiciall seat, crying out, that all his inward bowels burned within him, and so gaue vp the breath. Henr. de Erfordia, lib. 6. cap. 29.

Agapetus a blessed martyr. Ex Bergomense lib. 8.

A notable example of Gods iust plague vpon a persecutor. Ex Henr. Erfordiense lib. 6.

Also with the same Agapetus is numbred Calepodius a minister of Rome, whose body first was drawen through the citie of Rome, and after cast into Tiber. Bergo. ibidem.

Calepodius martyr.

Then followeth Pammachius a senator of Rome, with his wife and children, and others both men and women, to the number of fortie and two.

Pammachius with his wife and children martyrs. Fortie and two martyrs.

Item, another noble senator of Rome named Simplicius, all which together in one day had their heads smitten off, and their heads after hanged vp in diuers gates of the citie for a terror of others, that none should professe the name of Christ.

Simplicius martyr.

Besides these suffred also Quiritius a noble man of Rome, who with his mother Iulia and a great number more, were put likewise to death.

Quiritius, Iulia his mother, martyrs.

Also Tiberius and Valerianus citizens of Rome, and brethren, suffred (as Bergomensis saith) the same time, who first being buled and broken with bats, after were beheaded.

Tiberius, Valerianus, brethren and martyrs.

Also Vincentius, Bergomensis, and Erfordiensis, make mention of Martina a christian virgin, which after diuers bitter punishments being constant in hir faith, suffered in like maner by the sword.

Martina a virgin and martyr.

Albeit as touching the time of these forenamed martyrs, as I find them not in older writers: so do I suppose them to suffer vnder Maximinus or Decius, rather then vnder Alexander.

The sixth persecution.

Maximinus emperor and persecutor. The sixth persecution.

Anno 237

After the death of Alexander the emperor, who with his mother Mammea (as is said) was murdered in Germanie, followed Maximinus, chosen by the will of the souldiers, rather then by the authority of the senat, about the yeare of our Lord, two hundred thirtie and seuen, who for the hatred he had to the house of Alexander (as Eusebius recordeth) raised vp the sixth persecution against the christians, especially against the teachers and leaders of the church, thinking thereby the sooner to vanquish the rest, if the captaines of them were removed out of the way. Whereby I suppose rather the martyrdome of Vrbanus the bishop, and of the rest aboue specified, to haue hapned vnder the tyrannie of this Maximinus then vnder Alexander. In the time of this persecution, Origen wrote his booke De martyrio: which booke if it were extant would giue vs some knowledge, I doubt not, of such as in this persecution did suffer, which now lie in silence vnknowen: and no doubt but a great number they were and more should haue been, had not the prouident mercie of God shortened his daies and bridled his tyrannie, for he reigned but three yeares. After whom succeeded Gordianus in the yeare of our Lord two hundred and fortie, a man no lesse studious for the vtilitie of the commonwealth, as mild and gentle to the christians. This Gordianus, after he had gouerned with much peace and tranquillitie the monarchie of Rome the space of six yeares, was slaine of Philip emperor after him.

Origenes de martyrio.

Gordianus emperor. Anno 240

In the daies of these emperors aboue recited, was Pontianus bishop of Rome, who succeeded next after Vrbanus aboue rehearsed, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred thirtie and six, in the twelfth yere of Alexander, as Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 28. noteth, declaring him to sit six yeares. Contrarie Damasus and Platina write, that he was bishop nine yeres and a halfe, and that in the time of Alexander, he with Philippus his priest was banished into Sardinia, and there died. But it seemeth more credible that he was banished rather vnder Maximinus, and died in the beginning of the reigne of Gordianus. In his epistles decretall (which seeme likewise to be fained) he appeareth very deuout after the common example of other bishops to vphold the dignitie of priests and of clergie men, saying; that God hath them so familiar with him, that by them he accepteth the offerings and oblations of others, & forgiueth their sins, and reconcileth them vnto him: also, that they do make the bodie of the Lord with their owne mouth, and giue it to others, &c: which doctrine how it standeth with the testament of God and glorie of Christ, let the reader vse his owne iudgement.

Pontianus bishop of Rome. Diuersitie betweene Damasus and Eusebius. Pontianus banished.

This doctrine seemeth derogatorie to Christ and blasphemous.

Other notable fathers also in the same time were raised vp in the church, as Philetus bishop of Antioch, which succeeded after Asclepiades afore mentioned, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred and twentie, and after him Zebennus bishop of the same place, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred thirtie & one.

To these also may be added Ammonius the schoolmaster of Origen, as Suidas supposeth, also the kinsmen of Porphyrie the great enimie of Christ: notwithstanding, this Ammonius indued with better grace, as he left diuers bookes in defence of Christs religion, so did he constantly perseuere (as Eusebius reporteth) in the doctrine of Christ which he had in the beginning receiued, who was about the daies of Alexander.

Ammonius a christian writer.

Julius Aphricanus also about the time of Gordianus aforesaid, is numbred among the old and ancient writers, of whom Nicephorus writeth to bee the scholar of Origen, and a great writer of histories of that time.

Julius Aphricanus writer.

Unto these doctors and confessors may be adioyned the storie of Natalius mentioned in the first booke of Eusebius. This Natalius had suffered persecution before like a constant confessor, who being seduced & perswaded by Asclepiodotus & Theodorus (which were the disciples of Theodocus) to take vpon him to bee bishop of their sect, promising to giue euery moneth an hundred and fiftie pieces of siluer, and so he ioyning himselfe to them, was admonished by vision & reuelation from the Lord, for such was the great mercy of God & of our Lord Christ Jesu, that he would not his martyr which had suffered so much for his name before, now to perish out of his church: for the which cause (saith Eusebius) God by certaine visions did admonish him; but he not taking great heed thereunto, being blinded partly with lucre, partly with honor, was at length all the night long scourged of the angels, in so much that he being made therby very sore, and early on the morrow putting on sackecloth, with much weeping & lamentation went to Zephirinus the bishop aboue mentioned, where he falling downe before him & all the christian congregation, shewed them the stripes of his body, and prayed them for the mercies of Christ, that he might be receiued into their communion againe, from which he had sequestred himselfe before, and so was admitted according as he desired.

Natalius, confessor. Ex Euseb. libro 5. cap. 28.

The Lord will not lose them which haue done or suffered any thing for him.

After the decease of Pontianus bishop of Rome afore mentioned, succeeded next in that place Anterius, of whom Isuardus writeth, that Pontianus departing away, did substitute him in his roome: but Eusebius writeth that he succeeded immediatly after him. Damasus saith, that because he caused the acts and deaths of the martyrs to be written, therfore he was put to martyrdome himselfe by Maximinus the iudge. Concerning the time of this bishop our writers do greatly iar. Eusebius and Marianus Scotus affirme that he was bishop but one moneth, Sabellicus saith that not to be so. Damasus assigneth to him twelue yeers & one moneth. Volateranus, Bergomensis, and Henricus Erford, giue to him three yeeres and one moneth. Nauclerus writeth that he sat one yeere and one moneth. All which are so far discrepant one from another, that which of them most agreeth with truth, it lieth in doubt. Next to this bishop was Fabianus, of whom more is to be said hereafter.

Hippolytus bishop and martyr.

Of Hippolytus also both Eusebius and Hieronymus maketh mention that he was a bishop, but where, they make no relation. And so likewise doth Theodoretus witnesse him to be a bishop, and also a martyr, but naming no place. Gelatius contra Eutychen saith, hee died a martyr, & that he was bishop of an head city in Arabie. Nicephorus writeth, that hee was bishop of Ostia, a port towne neere to Rome. Certaine it is, hee was a great writer, and left many workes in the church, which Eusebius and Hierome do recite: by the supputation of Eusebius, he was about the yeare of our Lord, two hundred & thirty.

Prudentius Peristephan.

Prudentius in his Peristephanon, making mention of great heapes of martyrs buried by thēselues together, speaketh also of Hippolytus, and saith that hee was drawen with wild horses through fields, dales and bushes, and describeth thereof a pitifull storie.

Philippus emperor. Anno 246

Philippus the first christian emperor.

After the emperor Gordianus, the empire fell to Philippus, who with Philip his son gouerned the space of seuen yeares, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred fortie and six. This Philippus with his son and all his familie was christened and conuerted by Fabianus and Origen, who by letters exhorted him and Seuera his wife to be baptised, being the first of all the emperors that brought in christianitie into the imperiall seat. Howsoeuer Pomponius Letus reporteth of him to be a dissembling prince, this is certaine, that for his christianitie he with his son was slaine of Decius one of his captaines. Sabellicus Bergomensis, lib. 8. sheweth this hatred of Decius against Philippus to be conceiued, for that the emperor Philip both the father and the son had committed their treasures vnto Fabianus then bishop of Rome.

The seuenth persecution.

Decius emperor. Anno 250

The seuenth persecution.

THus Philippus being slaine, after him Decius inuaded the crowne about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and fifty, by whom was moued a terrible persecution against the christians, which Orosius noteth to be the seuenth persecution. The first occasion of this hatred and persecution of this tyrant conceiued against the christians, was chiefly (as is before touched) because of the treasures of the emperor which were committed to Fabian the bishop.

The cause and occasion of this persecution.

Fabianus bishop of Rome.

Euseb. l. b. 6.

This Fabian first being a maried man (as Platina writeth) was made bishop of Rome after Anterius aboue mentioned by the miraculous appointment of God, which Eusebius doth thus describe in his sixth book. When the brethren (saith he) were together in the congregation about the election of their bishop, and had purposed among themselues vpon the nomination of some noble and worthie personage of Rome, it chanced that Fabianus among others was there present, who of late before was newly come out of the countrie to inhabit in the citie. This Fabian, as is said, thinking nothing lesse then of any such matter, suddenly commeth a doue flying from aboue, and sitteth vpon his head, whereupon all the congregation being moued, with one mind and one voice did chuse him for their bishop, in the which function he remained the space of thirteene yeares, as Eusebius writeth; Damasus, Marianus, and Sabellicus say fourteene yeares vnto the time of Decius: who, whether for that Philippus had committed to him his treasures, or whether for the hatred he bare to Philippus, in the beginning of his raigne caused him to be put to death, sending out moreouer his proclamation into all quarters, that all which professed the name of Christ should be slaine.

The miraculous election of Fabianus.

Fabianus martyr.

The ordinances of Fabianus pretended. Dyle and creame. Accusing of bishops. Appealing to the see apostolicall. Marriage not within the fifth degree.

To this Fabian be ascribed certaine ordinances, as of consecrating new oyle once euery yere, and burning the old, of accusations against bishops, of appealing to the see apostolike, of not marying within the fift degree, of communicating thrice a yeare, of offring euery sunday, with such other things more in his three epistles decretall: the which epistles, as by diuers other euidences may be supposed to be vntruely named vpon him, giuing no signification of any matter agreeing to that time: so doe I find the most part of the third epistle word for word standing in the epistle of Sixtus the third, which followed almost two hundred yeares after him, beside the vnseemely doctrine also in the end of the said epistles contained, where he contrarie to the tenor of the gospell applieth remission of sins (onely due to the blood of Christ) vnto the offrings of bread and wine by men and women euery sunday in the church.

Origen.

To this Fabianus wrote Origen De orthodoxia suæ fidei, that is, Of the righteousnes of his faith: wherby is to be vnderstood, that he continued to the time of Decius: some say also to the time of Gallus. Of this Origen partly mention is touched before, declaring how bold & feruent he was in the daies of Seuerus, in assisting, comforting, exhorting and kissing the martyrs that were imprisoned and suffred for the name of Christ, with such danger of his owne life, that had not been the singular protection of God, he had been stoned to death many times of the heathen multitude. Such great concourse of men and women was daily to his house to bee catechised and instructed in the christian faith by him, that souldiers were hired of purpose to defend the place where he taught them. Againe, such search sometime was set for him, that vneth any shifting of place or countrie could couer him. In whose laborious trauels and affaires of the church, in teaching, writing, confuting, exhorting, and expounding, he continued about the space of fiftie two yeares, vnto the time of Decius and Gallus. Diuers and great persecutions he sustained, but especially vnder Decius, as testifieth Eusebius in his sixth booke, and declaring that for the doctrine of Christ he sustained bands and torments in his body, rackings with bars of iron, dungeons, besides terrible threats of death and burning. All this he suffred in the persecution of Decius, as Eusebius recorded of him, and maketh no relation of any further matter. But Suidas and Nicephorus following the same, saith further concerning him, that the said Origen after diuers and sundrie other torments which he manfully and constantly suffred for Christ, at length was brought to an altar, where a foule filthie Ethiop was appointed to be, and there this option or choice was offered vnto him, whether he would sacrifice to the Idol, or to haue his body polluted with that foule and vglie Ethiop. Then Origen (saith hee) who with a philosophicall mind euer kept his chastitie vndefiled, much abhorring that filthie villanie to bee done to his bodie, condescended to their request: whereupon, the iudge putting incense in his hand, caused him to set it to the fire vpon the altar: for the which impietie hee afterward was excommunicated of the church. Epiphanius writeth that he being vrged to sacrifice to idols, and taking the boughes in his hand, wherewith the heathen were wont to honor their gods, called vpon the christians to carie them in the honor of Christ. The which fact the church of Alexandria misliking remoued him from their communion: whereupon Origen driuen away with shame and sorrow out of Alexandria, went into Iurie, where being in Jerusalem among the congregation, and there requested of the priests and ministers (he being also a priest) to make some exhortation in the church, refused a great while so to doe. At length by importunate petition being constrained thereunto, rose vp, and turning the booke, as though he would haue expounded some place of the scripture, onely read the verse of the fortie ninth psalme; But God said to the sinner, why dost thou preach my iustifications, and why dost thou take my testament in thy mouth? &c. Which verse being read, he shut the booke, and sat downe weeping and waling, the whole congregation also weeping and lamenting with him. Suid. Niceph. More what became of Origen it is not found in histories, but onely that Suidas addeth, he died and was buried at Tyrus. Eusebius affirmeth, that hee departed vnder the emperor Gallus, about the yeare of our Lord two hundred fiftie and fiue, and the seuentith yere of his age, in great miserie (as appeareth) and pouertie.

The repentance of Origen.

In this Origen diuers blemishes of doctrine bee noted, whereupon Hierome sometimes doth inueigh against him; albeit in some places againe he doth extoll and commend him for his excellent learning, as in his apologie against Ruff. and in his epistle to Pammachius and Ocean, where he praiseth Origen, although not for the perfection of his faith and doctrine, nor for an apostle, yet for an excellent interpretor, for his wit, and for a philosopher: and yet in his prologue vpon the homilies of Origen on Ezechiell, he calleth him another master of the churches, after the apostles. And in an other preface vpon his questions vpon Genesis, hee wisheth to himselfe the knowledge of the scriptures, which Origen had, also with the enuie of his name. Athanasius moreouer calleth him singular and laborious, and vseth also his testimonies against the Arians. Socrates, Lib. 6. cap. 13.

Origen commended for his learning.

Ex Socrat. lib. 6. cap. 13.

After Origen, the congrue order of historie requireth next to speake of Heraclas his vsher, a man singularly commended for his knowledge, not onely in philosophie but also in all such faculties as to a christian diuine doe appertaine. This great towardnes of wit & learning when Origen perceiued in him, he appointed him aboue all others to be his vsher or vndertaker, to helpe in his schole or Vniuersitie of Alexandria in the reigne of Antoninus Caracalla sonne of Seuerus. And after in the tenth yeare of Alexander, Origen departing vnto Cesaria, he succeeded in his roome to gouerne the schole in Alexandria. Further also, in the time of Gordianus after the decease of Demetrius bishop of Alexandria, this Heraclas succeeded to be bishop of the said citie: Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 29. In the which function he ministred the terme of thirteene yeres. Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 35. Of this Heraclas writeth Origen himselfe, that hee, although being priest, yet ceased not to read ouer and perusse the bookes of the Gentiles, to the intent he might the better out of their owne bookes confute their error, &c.

Heraclas bishop of Alexandria.

Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 29.

After Heraclas succeeded Dionysius Alexandrinus in the bishoprike of Alexandria, like as he succeeded him in the schole before: which Dionysius also writeth of the same Heraclas vnto Philemon a priest of Rome, thus saying; Hunc ego canonem & typum a beato Heracla papa nostro accepi, &c.: that is, This canon and type I receiued of blessed Heraclas, our pope, &c. This Heraclas was no martyr, which died three yeares before Decius about the yeare of our Lord two hundred and fiftie. After whom succeeded next in the same seat of Alexandria Dionysius Alexandrinus, who also suffered much vnder the tyrannie of Decius, as hereafter shall be shewed (Christ willing) when we come to the time of Valerian.

be so great and so innumerable martyrs to suffer in the same, that he saith it is as easie to number the sands of the sea, as to recite the particular names of them whom this persecution did deuour. In the which persecuton the cheefest doers and tormentors vnder the emperor, appeere in the historie of Vincentius to be these: Optimus the vnder consull, Secundianus, Uerianus, and Marcellianus, &c. Although therefore it be hard heere to infer all and singular persons in order that died in this persecution, yet such as remaine most notable in stories, I will briefly touch by the grace of him for whose cause they suffred.

Persecutors.

Alexander bishop of Hierusalem, martyr.

In the former tractation of the first persecution, mention was made before of Alexander bishop of Hierusalem, and of his troubles suffred vnder Seuerus, and how afterward by the miracle of God he was appointed bishop of Hierusalem, where he continued a verie aged man aboue the terme of fortie yeeres gouernor of that church, till the time of the first yeere of Decius, at what time he being brought from Hierusalem to Cesarea into the iudgement place, after a constant and euident confession of his faith made before the iudge, was committed vnto prison, and there finished his life, as testifieth Dionysius Alexandrinus in the first booke of Eusebius. After whome succeeded in that seat Mezabanes the thirtie and first bishop of that citie, after Iames the apostle.

Ex Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 41.

Asclepiades bishop of Antioch, martyr.

Ex specu. Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 52.

A place of Vincentius reprooued.

Mention was made also before of Asclepiades bishop of Antioch, who succeeded after Serapion, and in the persecution of Seuerus did likewise perseuere a constant confessor, and as Vincent. testifieth in his eleuenth booke, suffred martyrdome at last vnder this Decius. But this computation of Vincentius can in no wise agree with the truth of time, forsomuch as by probable writers, as Zonaras, Nicephorus, and others, the said Asclepiades after Serapion, entred the bishops seat of Antioch, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred and fourteene, & sat seuen yeeres before the time of Gordianus, after whom succeded Philetus, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred twentie & one, gouerning the function twelue yeeres. And after him Zebinus followed in the yeere of our Lord two hundred thirtie and two, and so after him Babylas, which Babylas if he died in this persecution of Decius, then could not Asclepiades also suffer in the same time, who died so long before him, as is declared.

Babylas bishop of Antioch, martyr.

Ex Chrysost. lib. contra Gentiles.

The storie of Babylas.

Of this Babylas bishop of Antioch, Eusebius and Zonaras record, that vnder Decius he died in prison, as did Alexander bishop of Hierusalem aboue rehearsed.

We read in a certeine treatise of Chrysostome, intituled Contra Gentiles, a notable and a long historie of one Babylas a martyr, who about these times was put to death for resisting a certeine emperor, not suffring him to enter into the temple of the Christians after a cruell murder committed, the storie of which murder is this. There was a certeine emperor, who vpon conclusion of peace made with a certeine nation, had receiued for hostage or suretie of peace the sonne of the king being of yong and tender age, with conditions vpon the same, that neither he should be molested of them, nor that they should euer be vexed of him. Upon this the kings sonne was deliuered not without great care & feare of the father vnto the emperor, whom the cruell emperor contrarie to promise, caused in short time without all iust cause to be slaine. This fact so horrible being committed, the tyrant with all hast would enter into the temple of the christians, where Babylas being bishop or minister, withstood him that he should not into that place approch. The emperor therwith not a little incensed, in great rage bade him forthwith to be laid in prison with as manie irons as he could beare, & from thence shortlie after to be brought forth to death and execution. Babylas going constantlie and boldlie to his martyrdome, desired after his death to be buried with his irons & bands, & so he was. The storie procedeth moreouer, and saith; that in continuance of time in the reigne of Constantinus, Gallus then made the ouerseer of the east parts, caused his bodie to be translated into the suburbs of Antioch called Daphnes, where was a temple of Apollo, famous with diuellish oracles and answers giuen by that idoll, or by the diuell rather in that place. In the which temple after the bringing of the bodie of Babylas, the idoll ceased to giue anie more oracles, saying, that for the bodie of Babylas hee could giue no more answers, but complaining that that place was wont to be consecrated vnto him, but now it was full of dead mens bodies. And thus the oracles there ceased for that time till the comming of Julianus, who inquiring out the cause why the oracles ceased, caused the bones of the holie martyr to be remoued againe from thence by the christians, whom he then called Galileans. They comming in a great multitude both men, maidens, & children, to the tomb of Babylas, transported his bones according to the commandement of the emperor, singing by the waie as they went, the verse of the psalme in words as followeth; Confounded be all that worship images, and all that glorie in idols, &c. Which coming to the emperors ears, set him in great rage against the christians, stirring vp persecution against them. Albeit Zonaras declareth the cause something otherwise, saying, that so soone as the bodie of him & other martyrs were remoued awaie incontinent the temple of the idoll with the image, in the night was consumed with fire: for the which cause (saith Zonaras) Julian stirred vp with anger, persecuted the christians, as shall be shewed (Christ willing) in his order & place hereafter.

The bodie of Babylas stoppeth the oracles of idols.

Ex Zonara, tom. 3.

And thus much of Babylas, which whether it was the same Babylas bishop then of Antioch, or an other of the same name, it appeereth not by Chrysostome, which neither maketh mention of the emperors name, nor of the place where this Babylas was bishop. Againe, the stopping of the emperor out of the church importeth as much, as that emperor to haue bene a christian: for otherwise, if he had come in as an heathen and as a persecutor, it was not then the maner of christian bishops violentlie to withstand the emperors or to stop them out. Euer and beside the testimonie of Eusebius, Zonaras doth witnesse contrarie in his first booke, that this Babylas which was then bishop of Antioch after Zebinus, was not put to death by the tormentors, but died in prison: wherefore it is not impossible, but this Babylas and this emperor which Chrysostome speaketh of, may be an other Babylas then that which suffered vnder Decius. Nicephorus in his fift booke maketh mention of an other Babylas beside this that suffred vnder Decius, which was bishop of Nicomedia.

In the forenamed citie of Antioch, Vincentius lib. 11. speaketh of fortie virgins martyrs, which suffred in this persecution of Decius.

Fortie virgins martyrs.

Peter of Phrygia martyr.

In the countrie of Phrygia, and in the towne of Lampsar, the same Vincentius also speaketh of one Peter which there was apprehended, & suffred bitter torments for Christs name vnder Optimus the proconsull. And in Troada likewise of other martyrs that there suffered, whose names were, Andrew, Paul, Nicomachus, and Dionysia a virgin. Lib. 11. cap. 46.

Andreas, Paulus, Nicomachus, Dionysia virgin, martyrs.

Also in Babylon (saith he) diuers christian confessors were found of Decius which were led awaie into Spaine, there to be executed: Lib. eodem, cap. 43.

Martyrs of Babylon, Germanus, Theophilus, Cesarius, Vitalis, Polychronius, Nestor.

In the countrie of Cappadocia, at the citie of Cesarea, in like maner of the said author is testified of Germanus, Theophilus, Cesarius, and Vitalis, to suffer martyrdome for Christ. Eodem, cap. 52. and in the same booke mention also is made of Polychronius bishop of Babylon, cap. 89. and in Pamphilia of Nestor there bishop that died martyr, cap. 52.

At Perside in the towne of Cardala, Dimpiades & Maximus: in Tyrus also Anatolia virgin, and Audar gaue their liues likewise to death for the testimonie of Christs name.

Dimpiades, Maximus noble men. Anatolia virgin, Audar, martyrs.

Eusebius moreouer in his first booke reciteth out of the epistles of Dionysius Alexandrinus, diuers that suffred diuerslie at Alexandria; the which places of Dionysius, as they be cited in Eusebius, I thought heere good for the antientnesse of the author to insert and notifie in his owne words, and in our language, as he wrote them to Fabius bishop of Antioch, as followeth.

Ex Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 40. 41. 42.

The epistle of Dionysius bishop of Alexandria to Fabius.

This persecution (saith he) began not with the proclamation set forth by the emperor, but began a whole yeere before, by the occasion and meanes of a wicked person, a southsaier, and a follower of wicked arts: who comming to our citie heere, stirred vp the multitude of the heathen against vs, and incited them to maintein their owne old superstition and gentilitie of their countrie, whereby they being set agog, and obteining full power to prosecute their wicked purpose, so thought and no lesse declared, all their pietie and religion to consist onelie in the idolatrous worship of diuels, and in our destruction. And first flying vpon a certeine priest of ours named Metra, apprehended him, and brought him forth to make him speake after their wicked blasphemie, wich when he would not do, they laid vpon him with staues and clubs, and with sharpe reeds pricked his face and eies, & afterward bringing him out into the suburbs, there they stoned him to death. Then they tooke a faithfull woman called Quinta, & brought hir to the temple of their idols to compell hir to worship with them: which when she refused to doe, and abhorred their idols, they bound hir feet, & drew hir through the whole street of the citie vpon the hard stones, and so dashing hir against millstones, and scourging hir with whips, brought hir to the same place of the suburbs as they did the other before, where she likewise ended hir life. This done, in a great outrage and with a multitude running together, they burst into houses of the religious and godlie christians, spoiling, sacking, and carying awaie all that they could find of any price. The rest of things, such as were of lesse value and of wood, they brought into the open market and set them on fire. In the meane time the brethren voided aside, and withdrew themselues, taking patientlie and no lesse ioifullie the spoiling of their goods, then did they of whome S. Paul doth testifie: neither doe I know anie of them all (one onlie excepted) apprehended of them, which reuolting from his profession, denied the Lord yet to this present daie.

Metra, martyr.

Quinta a faithfull woman and martyr.

Patience and ioy in affliction. The constancie of the martyrs of Alexandria.

Among the rest that there were taken, there was a certeine virgin well stricken in yeeres named Apollonia, whome they brought forth, and dashing all hir teeth out of hir iawes, made a great fire before the citie, threatning to cast hir into the same, vnlesse she would blaspheme with them and denie Christ: whereat she staying a little with hir selfe as one that would take a pause, suddenlie leaped into the midst of the fire, and there was burned.

Apollonia a blessed virgin and martyr.

There was one also Serapion, whome they tooke in his owne house, and after they had assailed him with sundrie kinds of torments, and had broken almost all the ioints of his bodie, they cast him downe from an vpper loft, and so did he complet his his martyrdome. Thus was there no way neither priuie nor publike, nor corner nor alley left for vs, neither by day nor by night to escape, all the people making an outcrie against vs, that vnlesse we vttered words of blaspheme, we should bee drawne to the fire and burned. And this outragious tumult indured a certaine space, but at length as the Lord would the miserable wretches fell at dissension among themselues, which turned the crueltie they exercised against vs vpon their owne heads. And so had we a little breathing time for a season, while the furie of the heathen people by this occasion all aged.

The first punishment of God turning the crueltie of aduersaries vpon themselues.

Shortly then after this, word was brought vnto vs of the state of the empire, which before was something fauourable to vs, to be altered and changed against vs, putting vs in great feare. And consequently vpon the same followed the edict of the emperor so terrible & cruell, that according to the forewarning of the Lord, the elect (if it had been possible) might haue been thereby subuerted. Vpon that edict such feare came ouer vs all, that many there were, especially of the richer sort, of whom some for feare came running, some were led by the occasion of time, some were drawne by their neighbors being cited by name, to those impure and idolatrous sacrifices. Other some came trembling and shaking, as men not which should doe sacrifice, but which should be sacrificed themselues, the multitude laughing them to scorne. Some againe came boldly to the altars, declaring themselues neuer to haue been of that profession, of whom it is said, that hardly they shall bee saued. Of the residue, some followed one part, some an other, some ran away, some were taken; of whom certaine continued to bands and torments constant; others again after long imprisonment, before they should come before the iudge, renounced their faith. Some also after they suffered torments, yet after reuolted. But others being as strong as blessed, and valiant pillers of the Lord, fortified with constancie agreeing to their faith, were made faithfull martyrs of the kingdome of God.

Iulianus martyr.

Of whom the first was Iulianus, a man diseased with the gout, and not able to go, being caried of two men, of whom the one quickely denied; the other Cronion surnamed Eunus, with the foresaid Iulianus the old man, confessing the Lord with a perfect faith, were laid vpon camels, and there scourged, at length cast into the fire, with great constancie were so consumed.

A certaine souldier martyr.

As these aforesaid were going to their martyrdome, there was a certaine souldier, who in their defence take part against them that railed vpon them. For the which cause the people crying out against him, he also was apprehended, and being constant in his profession, was forthwith beheaded.

Macar a blessed martyr.

Likewise one Macar, a man borne in Libia, being admonished and exhorted of the iudge to denie his faith, and not agreeing to his persuasions was burned aliue.

Epimachus, Alexander, with foure women, martyrs.

After these suffered Epimachus, and one Alexander, who being long detained in prison and in bands, after innumerable paines and torments with razors and scourges, were also cast into the burning fire with foure other women with them, which all there ended their martyrdome.

Ammonarion virgin, martyr.

Also Ammonarion an holy virgin, whom the cruell iudge had long and bitterly tormented, for that shee promising the iudge before, that for no punishment she would yeeld to his request, and constantly performing the same, suffered likewise martyrdome, with two other women, of whom there was an aged matrone, named Mercuria, the other was called Dionysia, being a mother of many faire children, whom yet notwithstanding she loued not aboue the Lord. These after they could not be ouercome by any torments of the cruell iudge, but he rather ashamed and confounded to be ouercome of silly women, at length they being past feeling of all torments, were slaine with the sword, first Ammonarion like a valiant captaine suffering before them.

Mercuria, Dionysia, martyrs.

Heron, Ater, Isidorus, Dioscorus, martyrs.

Heron, Ater, and Isidorus Egyptians, and with them Dioscorus, also a child of fifteene yeares, were crowned with the same crowne of martyrdome. And first the iudge began with the child, thinking him more easie to bee won, with words to intice him, then with torments to constraine him: but hee persisted immoueable, giuing neither place to persuasions nor punishments. The rest, after he had grieuously tormented being constant in their profession, he committed to the fire. At Dioscorus the iudge greatly marueling for his wise answeres and graue constancie dismissed him, sparing (as he said) his age to a longer respit: which Dioscorus is yet also with vs at this present, waiting for a longer triall.

Nemesion martyr. Theeues in the old time amongst the Romans burned.

Nemesion being also an Egyptian, first was accused for a companion of theeues, but being purged thereof before the centurion, was then accused of christianitie, and for that cause being in bands, was brought to the president, who most vnrighteously tormenting and scourging him double to all other theeues and fellons; at length among the theeues burned him to death, making him a blessed martyr.

Ammon, Zenon, Ptolomeus, Ingenuus, Theophilus. martyr confessors.

There were standing before the tribunall seat certaine of the warriers or knights, whose names were Ammon, Zenon, Ptolomeus, Ingenuus, and with them a certaine aged man called Theophilus, who standing by, at what time a certaine christian man was before the iudge examined, and there seeing him for feare ready to incline and fal away, did burst almost for sorrow within themselues, making signes to him with their hands, and all gestures of their bodie, to be constant. This being noted of all the standers by, they were readie to lay hold vpon them, but they preuenting the matter, prested vp of their owne accord before to the bench of the iudge, professing themselues to be christians. In so much that both the president with the benchers were all astonied, the christians which were iudged, more imboldened to suffer, and the iudges thereby terrified. This done, they departed away from the place, glad and reioycing for the testimonie that they had giuen of their faith. Many other besides were in other cities and townes rent and torne asunder by the heathen, among whom one I will speake of for cause worthie of memorie.

A notable example of a christian courage in confessing Christ.

Ischirion martyr.

Ischirion, one that was in seruice with a certaine noble man, was commanded of his master to make sacrifice, who for not obeying, was therefore rebuked: after persisting in the same, was grieuously threatened with sharpe and menacing words. At last his master, when he could not preuaile against him, taking a stake or pike in his hands, ran him through into the body and slue him.

Cheremon, martyr. Cheremon, a bishop had a wife.

What shall I speake of the multitude of them, which wandering in deserts and mountaines, were consumed with hunger, thirst, cold, sickneſſe, theeues, or wild beasts, of whole blessed victorie they which be aliue are yet witnesses? In the number of whom, one I will speake of, among diuers others, named Cheremon bishop of the citie called Nilus, an aged man; he with his wife flying to the mountaine of Arabia, neuer returned againe, nor euer could be seene after. And though they were sought for diligently by their brethren, yet neither they nor their bodies were found: many others there were, which flying to these mountaines of Arabia, were taken of the barbarous Arabians: of whom some with much money could scarce be ransomed, some were neuer heard of yet to this present day. Thus much out of the epistles of Dionysius in Euseb. lib.6.cap.41.42.,&c.

Euseb. lib. 6. cap. 40. 41. 42.

The epistle of Dionysius Alexandrinus, to Germanus.

Moreouer, the foresaid Dionysius in an other place writing to Germanus, of his owne dangers and of others, sustained in this persecution, and before this persecution of Decius, thus inferreth as followeth: I (saith he) behold before the sight of God, I lie not, and he knoweth, I lie not, how that I hauing no regard of mine owne life, and not without the motion of God, did flie and auoid the danger of this persecution. Yea and also before that this persecution of Decius did rage against vs, Sabinus the same houre sent a farmer to seeke me, at what time I remaining at home waited three daies for his comming. But he searching narowly for me by all waies, fields, flouds, and corners, where he thought I might best haue hid my selfe, or to haue passed by, was stricken with such blindnes, that he could not find my house, thinking with himselfe nothing lesse then ỳ I would abide at home in such so dangerous persecution. Thus these three daies being past, vpon the fourth day, the Lord God so willing and commanding me to flie, and also marueilously opening to me the way, I with my * children and many other brethren went out together. And this not to come of my selfe, but to be the worke of Gods prouidence, the sequell of those things declared, wherein afterward I was not vnprofitable peraduenture to some, &c.

This Germanus was a bishop in that time, which charged Dionysius for his flying persecution, against whom he purgeth himselfe. God willed Dionysius to flie in persecution.

* Ergo bishops then had wiues and children.

Againe in another place shortly after, the foresaid Dionysius proceeding in the narration of himselfe, thus inferreth: Then I comming to Ierusalem with them which were with me, was brought by souldiers vnto Taposiris, where as Timotheus (by the prouidence of God) neither was present, nor yet taken. Who then returning home, found his house desert, and officers watching about the same, and vs within taken, &c. And againe shortly after it followeth: And to see (saith hee) the admirable disposing of God his workes; as Timotheus was thus flying with much haste and great feare, a certaine man, as happened, a dweller neere by met him by the way, and asked whither he went so hastily? to whom Timotheus answering declared al the matter simplie as it was. Which done, the man proceedeth on his iourny, whither he was purposed to go, which was to a marriage, the maner of which mariages then was to sit vp all the night long feasting and drinking. Thus as he was come sitting with them at the feast, he telleth his companions what was done, and what he heard by the way. This was no sooner told, but all they forthwith vpon a head, as stricken with a sudden furie rushing out togither, made toward vs as fast as they could, with such crying and noise as might seeme very terrible. At the first hearing whereof, the souldiers that had vs in keeping, being afraid ran away, by reason whereof we were left alone, and found as we were lying vpon formes and benches. I then (the Lord knoweth) thinking with my selfe that they had been theeues, which came to spoile and rob, being in my couch, lay still in my shirt onely as I was, the rest of my garments lying by me, I offered to them: they then willed me in all hast to rise and get away, whereby I then perceiuing the cause of their comming, cried vnto them, desiring that they would suffer vs so to doe: and if they would do any benefit for me, for so much as I could not escape the hands of them which would pursue me and carie me away, I prayed them that they would preuent them, and cut off my head before. And as I was crying thus vnto them, calling my selfe grouelling vpon the pauement as my companions can testifie, who were partakers of all these things, they burst forth violently, taking mee by the hands and feet, and caried me out of the doores, and led me away. There followed me Gaius, Faustus, Petrus, Paulus (who were witnesses of all the same) which brought me also out of the citie, and so setting me vpon a bare asse, conueied me away. Thus much writeth Dionysius of himselfe, the example of whose epistle is cited in the ecclesiasticall storie of Eusebius lib. 6. cap. 40. also Lib. 7. cap. 11.

Ex Niceph. lib. 5. cap. 27.

Nicephorus in his first booke, cap. 27. maketh mention of one named Christophorus, which also suffered in this persecution of Decius. Of which Christophorus, whether the fable riseth of that mightie giant set vp in churches, wading through the seas with Christ on his shoulder, and a tree in his hand for a walking staffe, &c: it is vncertaine. Georgius Wicelius alleageth out of Ruggerus Fuldens. and mentioneth of one Christophorus, borne of the nation of Cananites, which suffred vnder Decius, being, as he saith, of twelue cubits high. But the rest of the historie painted in churches the said Wicelius derideth as fables of Centaurus, or other poeticall fictions.

Christophorus martyr. The fable of great S. Christopher.

Bergomensis in his eight booke maketh relation of diuers martyred vnder Decius, as Meniatus which suffered at Florens, of Agatha an holy virgin of Sicile, who is said to suffer diuers & bitter torments vnder Quintilianus the proconsul, with prisonment, with beatings, with famine, with racking, rolled also vpon sharpe shels and hote coles, hauing moreouer hir breests cut from hir bodie, as Bergomensis and the martyrologe of Ado record. In the which authors as I deny not but that the rest of the storie may be true, so againe concerning the miracles of the aged man appearing to hir, & of the yong man clothed in a silken vesture, with an hundred yong men after him, and of the marble table with the inscription, Mentem sanctam, &c: I doubt.

Meniatus, Agatha, martyrs. Ex Bergomens. lib. 8. Ex Martyrologio Adonis.

Hard it is to recite all that suffered in this persecution, when as whole multitudes went into wildernesses & mountaines, wandring without succour or comfort, some starued with hunger and cold, some with sicknesse consumed, some deuoured of beasts, some with barbarous theeues taken and carried away. Vincentius in his eleuenth booke speaking of Asclepiades, writeth also of fortie virgins and martyrs, which by sundrie kinds of torments were put to death about the same time, in the persecution of this tyrant.

Martyrs wandring in mountaines.

Likewise in the said Vincentius, mention is made of Triphon, a man of great holinesse, and constant in his suffering, who being brought to the citie of Nice, before the president Aquilus for his constant confession of Christs name, was afflicted with diuers and grieuous torments, and at length with the sword put to death.

Fortie virgins martyrs. Triphon martyr.

At what time Decius had erected a temple in the midst of the citie of Ephesus, compelling al that were in the city there, to sacrifice to the idols: Seuen christians were found, whose names were Maximianus, Malchus, Martianus, Dionysius, Joannes, Serapion, and Constantinus, who refusing the idolatrous worship, were accused for the same vnto the emperor to be christians. Which when they constantly professed and did not deny, notwithstanding, because they were souldiers, retaining to the emperors seruice, respit was giuen them for a certaine space, to deliberate with themselues, till the returne againe of the emperor, which then was going to war. In the meane space, the emperor being departed, they taking counsell together, went and hid themselues in secret caues of the mount Celius. The emperor returning againe, after great inquisition made for them, hearing where they were, caused the mouth of the place where they were to be closed vp with heaps of stones, that they not able to get out, should bee famished within. And thus were those good men martyred. The storie (if it bee true) goeth further, that they betweene feare and sorrow fell asleepe, in which sleepe they continued the space of certaine ages after, til the time of Theodosius the emperor, before they did awake, as reporteth Vincentius, Nicephorus, lib. 5. cap. 27; and partly also Henricus Erfordiens. But of their awaking, that I refer to them that list beleeue it. Certaine it is, that at the last day they shall awake in deed without any fable.

Maximianus, Malchus. Martinianus, Dionysius, Joannes, Serapion, Constantinus, seuen martyrs.

The fable of the awaking of these seuen martyrs. Ex Vincent. Nicepho. Erfordiens.

Hieronymus in the life of Paulus the heremite reciteth a story of a certain souldier, whom when the prætor could not otherwise with torments remoue from his christiantie; he deuised another way, which was this: he commanded the souldier to be laid vpō a soft bed in a pleasant garden among ỹ flourishing lilies and red roses; which done, all others being remoued away, and himselfe there left alone, a beautifull harlot came to him, who imbracing him, and with all other inticements of an harlot laboured to prouoke him to hir naughtinesse. But the godly souldier fearing God more then obeying flesh, bit off his owne tongue with his teeth, and spit it in the face of the harlot, as she was killing him, and so got hee the victorie, by the constant grace of the Lord assisting him.

A souldier martyr. Ex Hieron. in vita Pauli Eremitæ. A notable example of a chast souldier biting off his tongue, & spitting it in the face of an harlot.

An other like example of singular chastitie is written of the virgin Theodora, and an other souldier, by Ambrose lib. 2. de Virginibus. At Antioch, this Theodora refusing to do sacrifice to the idols, was condemned by the iudge to the stewes, which notwithstanding by the singular prouidence of God was well deliuered. For as there was a great companie of wanton yong men readie at the doore to presse into the house where she was, one of the brethren, named Didimus (as Ado saith) moued with faith and motion of God, putting on a souldiers habit, made himselfe one of the first that came in, who rounding hir in the eare, told hir the cause and purpose of his comming, being a christian as she was: his counsell was that she should put on the souldiers habit, and so slip away; and he putting on hir garments would there remaine to abide their force. And so did, whereby the virgin escaped vnknowne. Didimus left vnto the rage and wondering of the people, being a man in stead of a woman, was presented vnto the president, vnto whom without delay he vttered all the whole matter as it was done, professing him so as he was, to bee a christian, and thereupon was condemned to suffer. Theodora vnderstanding thereof, and thinking to excuse him by accusing hir selfe, offered hir selfe as the partie guiltie vnto the iudge, claming and requiring the condemnation to light vpon hir, the other as innocent to be discharged. But the cruell iudge (crueller then Dionysius, which spared Damon and Pithias) neither considering the vertue of the persons, nor the innocencie of the cause, vntuskly and inhumanely proceeded in execution against them both, who first hauing their heads cut off, after were cast in the fire: Ambros. Ado. Although what time, or in what persecution these did suffer, in the authors of this narration it doth not appeare.

Theodora, Didimus, martyrs.

Agathon a man of armes in the citie of Alexandria, for rebuking certaine lewd persons, scornefullie deriding the dead bodies of the christians, was cried out of and railed on of the people; afterward accused to the iudge, was condemned to lose his head. Erfordiensis.

Agathon, martyr.

The said Erfordiensis also maketh mention of Paulus, and Andreas, whom the proconsull of Troada gaue to the people, being scourged, and after drawne out of the citie, they were troden to death with the feet of the people. Hen. de Erford.

Paulus, Andreas, martyrs.

Among others that suffered vnder this wicked Decius, Bergomensis also maketh mention of one Iustinus a priest of Rome, and of an other Nicostratus a deacon. To these Vincentius also addeth Portius a priest of Rome, whom he reporteth to be the conuerter of Philip the emperor afore mentioned.

Iustinus, Nicostratus, Portius, martyrs.

Of Abdon and Sennas we read also in the foresaid Bergomensis and Vincentius, two noble men, who because they had buried the christians, whom Decius had brought from Babylon to Cordoua, and there put them to death, were therefore accused to Decius, and brought to Rome, where they being commanded to sacrifice to dead idols, would not obey, and for the same were giuen to the wilde beasts to bee deuoured: but when the wild beasts more gentle then the men would not touch them, they were at length with the sword beheaded. Bergom. Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 4. Albeit to me it seemeth not vnpossible nor vnlike, this Abdon and Sennas to be the same, whom in other stories we find, and before haue mentioned to be Ammon and Zenon.

Abdon, Sennas, martyrs.

One Secundianus was accused to Valerian a captaine of Decius, to be a christian, which profession when he stoutly did maintaine, was commanded to prison. By the way as the souldiers were leading him to the gaile, Verianus and Marcellianus seeing the matter, cried to the souldiers, asking them whither they drew the innocent: At the which word when they also confessed themselues to bee christians, they were likewise apprehended, and brought to a citie named Centumcellas: where being willed to sacrifice, they did spit vpon the idols, and so after sentence and iudgement giuen, first they were beaten with wasters or trunchions, after that were hanged and tormented vpon the gibbet, hauing fire set to their sides. Vincentius addeth moreouer that the tormentors some of them falling suddenly dead, other some being taken with wicked spirits, the martyrs with the sword at length were beheaded. Vinc. lib. 11. cap. 51.

Secundianus, Verianus, Marcellianus, martyrs. Ex Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 51.

To prosecute in length of history the liues and sufferings of all them, which in this terrible persecution were martyred, it were too long, and almost infinit; briefly therefore to rehearse the names of such as we find alleaged out of a certaine briefe treatise of Bede intituled De temporibus, cited by Henricus de Erford, it shall bee at this time sufficient. Vnder Decius suffered Hippolitus and Concordia, Hiereneus and Abundus, Victoria a virgine, being noble personages of Antioch, Bellias bishop of the citie of Apollonia, Leacus, Tirsus, and Gallinetus, Nazanzo, Triphon in the citie of Egypt called Tanais, Phileas bishop, Philocomus, with many other in Perside, Philetonius bishop of Babylon, Thesiphon bishop of Pamphilia, Nestor bishop in Corduba, Parmenius priest with diuers more. In the prouince called Colonia, Circensis, Marianus and Jacobus. In Africa, Nemesianus, Felix, Rogatianus priest, Felicissimus. At Rome Iouinus, Basileus, also Rufina, and Secunda virgins, Tertullianus, Valerianus, Nemesius, Sempronianus, and Olympius. In Spaine, Teragon. At Verona, Zeno bishop. At Cesarea, Marinus and Archemius. In the towne of Milaine Priuatus bishop, Theodorus surnamed Grecorius bishop of Pontus. Hæc Beda.

the same persecution, in a citie of Tuscia called Aretium, whose names I find not, except they be Pergentius and Laurentius mentioned in Equilinus, lib. 5. cap. 80.

Such as revolted and fell in this persecution.

Now that I haue recorded of them sufficiently, which vnder this tempest of Decius constantly gaue their liues to martyrdome for the testimonie of Christ: it remaineth, that a few words also be spoken of such that for feare or frailty in this persecution did shrinke and slide from the truth of their confession. In the number of whom first commeth in the remembrance of Serapion an aged old man. Of whom writeth Dionysius Alexandrinus vnto Fabius, declaring: that this Serapion was an old man, which liued amongst them a sincere and vpright life of long time, but at length fell. This Serapion oft and many times desired to bee receiued againe, but no man listened to him, for he had sacrificed before. After this, not long after he fell into sicknesse, where hee remained three daies dumbe, and benummed of all senses. The fourth day following, beginning a little to recouer, hee called to him his sisters sonne, and said How long, how long (my sonne) do ye hold me here? Make hast I pray you that I were absolued. Call hither some of the ministers to me: and so saying no more, held his peace as dumbe and speechlesse. The boy ran, it was then night, vnto the minister, who at the same time being sicke, could not come with the messenger, but said: For so much as he willed heretofore (as he said) that such as lay a dying, if they couet to be receiued and reconciled, and especially if they required it earnestly, should be admitted, whereby with the better hope and confidence they may depart hence: therefore he gaue to the boy a little of the * eucharist, willing him to crumble it into the cup, and so to drop it into the mouth of the old man. With this the boy returned, bringing with him the holy eucharist. As he was now neere at hand before hee had entred in, Serapion the old man, speaking againe: Commest thou (said he) my sonne? The priest, quoth the messenger, is sicke and can not come, but doe as he willeth you, and let me goe. And the boy immired the eucharist, and dropt it in softly into the mouth of the old man, who after he had tasted a little, immediately gaue vp the ghost, &c. Hæc Dionys. ex. Euseb.

The repentance and reconciliation of Serapion.

In the citie of Troad, as the proconsul was grieuously tormenting one Nicomachus, he cried out that he was no christian, and so was let downe againe. And when after he had sacrificed, he was taken eftsones with a wicked spirit, and so throwne downe vpon the ground, where hee biting off his tongue with his teeth, so departed. Hen. de Erford.

The goodnes of God shewed to Serapion. Ex Henr. de Erford.

A terrible example of denying, shewed vpon Nicomachus. Dyonisius ad Fabium.

Dionysius in his epistles also writing to Fabius, and lamenting the great terrour of this persecution declareth how that many worthie and notable christians, for feare and horror of the great tyranny therof, did shew themselues feeble & weake men. Of whom some for dread, some of their owne accord, others after great torments suffred, yet after reuolted from the constancie of their profession. Also saint Cyprian in his treatise De lapsis reciteth with great sorrow, and testifieth, how that a great number at the first threatning of the aduersarie, neither being compelled nor throwne downe with any violence of the enemie, but of their voluntarie weakenesse, fell downe themselues. Neither (saith he) tarying while the iudge should put incense in their hands, but before any stroke stricken in the field, turned their backes, and played the cowards; not only comming to their sacrifices, but preuenting the same, and pretending to come without compulsion, bringing moreouer their infants and children either put into their hands, or taking them with them of their owne accord, and exhorting moreouer others to do the like after their example.

Cyprianus Serm. de lapsis.

The weakenesse of christians denying their faith.

Of this weakenesse and falling, the said author sheweth two causes, either loue of their goods and patrimonie, or feare of torments: and addeth moreouer examples of the punishments of them which reuolted; affirming that many of them were taken and vered with wicked spirits; and of one man among other, which after his voluntarie dentall, suddenly was stricken dumbe. Againe, an other after his abiuration, as hee should communicate with others, in stead of bread receiued ashes in his hand. Item, of a certaine maiden, who being taken & vered with a spirit, did teare her own tongue with her teeth, & tormented with paine in her belly & inward parts so deceased.

Examples of God his punishment after denial. S. Cyprian de lapsis.

Among others of this sort, S. Cyprian. lib. 2. cap 8. maketh also mention of one Euaristus a bishop in Africa, who leauing his charge, and making shipwracke of his faith, went wandring about in other countries, forsaking his owne flocke. In like maner he maketh also mention of Nicostratus a deacon, who forsaking his deaconship, and taking the goods of the church with him, fled away into other countries, &c. Albeit Bergomensis giueth that this Nicostratus the deacon afterward died a martyr. Thus then, although some did relent, yet a very great number (saith he) there was, whom neither feare could remoue, nor paine could ouerthrow to cause them to betray their confession, but that they stood like glorious martyrs vnto the end. Cyprian.

Cyprian. lib. de mortalitate.

The same Cyprianus also in an other booke De mortalitate, reciteth a notable story of one of his owne collegues and fellow priest, who being oppressed with weakenesse, and greatly afraid with death drawing at hand, desired leaue to depart, and to be discharged. As hee was thus intreating, and almost now dying, there appeared by him a yong man, of an honorable and reuerend maiestie, of a tall stature, and comely behauiour, so bright and cleare to behold, that scarce mans carnall eyes were able so to doe, which was now readie to depart this world. To whom this yong man speaking with a certaine indignation of minde and voice, thus said: Pati timetis, exire non vultis, quid faciam vobis? To suffer ye dare not, to goe out ye will not, what would ye me to doe vnto you?

A notable voice of God to a priest of Carthage.

Upon the occasion of these and such others, which were a great number, that fell and did renounce, as is aforesaid, in this persecution of Decius, rose vp first the quarrell and heresie of Nouatus, who in these daies made a great disturbance in the church, holding this opinion, that they which once renounced the faith, and for feare of torments had offered incense to the idols, although they repented therefore, yet could not afterward be reconciled, nor admitted to the church of Christ. This Nouatus being first priest vnder Cyprian at Carthage, afterward by stirring vp discord and factions, began to disturbe the bishoprike of Cyprian, to appoint there a deacon called Felicissimus, against the bishops mind or knowledge; also to allure and separate certaine of the brethren from the bishop; all which Cyprian, lib. 2. epist. 8. doth well declare. After this the said Nouatus going to Rome, kept there the like stirre with Cornelius (as the same Cornelius in Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. doth testifie) setting himselfe vp as bishop of Rome against Cornelius, which was the lawfull bishop of Rome before. The which to bring to passe, hee vsed this practise. First he had allured to him to bee his adherents, three or foure of good men and holy confessors, which had suffered before great torments for their confession, whose names were Maximus, Urbanus, Sidonius, and Celerinus. After this he enticed three simple bishops about the coasts of Italie to repaire to Rome, vnder pretence to make an end of certaine controuersies then in hand. This done, he caused the same, whether by making them drunke, or by other craftie counsell, to lay their hands vpon him, and to make him bishop, and so did. Wherefore the one of those three bishops hardly was reconciled to the communion, by the great intercession of his people: the other two by discipline of the church were displaced from their bishoprikes, and others possessed with their romes. Thus then were there two bishops together in one church of Rome, Nouatus and Cornelius, which was vnseemely, and contrarie to the discipline of the church. And hereupon riseth the true cause and meaning of saint Cyprian, writing in his epistles so much of one bishop, and of the vnitie to be kept in ecclesiasticall regiment, as appeareth, Lib. 4. epist. 2. de simplicitate prælat. Item lib. 3. epist. 11, &c. And in like sort writeth also Cornelius himselfe of one bishop, saying: Itaque vindex ille euangelij, ignorauit vnum esse debere episcopum in catholica ecclesia, &c: that is, He knew not that there ought to bee one bishop in a catholike church, &c. This by the way, not out of the way I trust, I haue touched briefly, to detect or refute the caulling wrestling of the papists, which falsely applie these places of Cyprian and Cornelius to maintaine the popes supreme mastership alone, ouer the whole vniuersall church of Christ in all places; when their meaning is otherwise, how that euery one catholike church or diocesse ought to haue one bishop ouer it, not that the whole world ought to be subiect to the dominion of him onely that is bishop of Rome. Now to the storie againe. Nouatus being thus bishop tooke not a little vpon him, going about by all meanes to defeate Cornelius, and to allure the people from him. In so much that (as in the foresaid booke of Eusebius appeareth) when Nouatus came to the distributing of the offerings, and should giue euery man his part, hee compelled the simple persons euery man to sweare, before they should receiue of the benediction, and of the collects or oblations, holding both their hands in his, and holding them so long, speaking these words vnto them (Sweare to me by the body and blod of our Lord Iesu Christ, that thou wilt not leaue me and goe to Cornelius) till that they swearing vnto him, in stead of amen (to bee said at the receiuing of the * bread) should answere, I will not returne to Cornelius, &c. Where note by the way, that the Latine booke of Christoforsons translation, in this place, craftily leaueth out the name of bread. This storie being written in Eusebius, also contained in Nicephorus, although not in the same order of words, yet in effect drawne out of him, doth declare in plaine words in both the authors (who so will marke the same) that the sacrament of the body of Christ is tearmed with the plaine name of bread, after the consecration.

It followeth more in the storie, that Maximus, Urbanus, Sidonius, and Celerinus, before mentioned, perceiuing at length the craftie dissimulation and arrogancie of Nouatus, left him, and with great repentance returned againe to the church, and were reconciled to Cornelius, as they themselues writing to Cyprian, and Cyprian likewise writing to them an epistle gratulatorie doth declare: lib 3. epist. 3. and Cornelius also in his epistle to Fabius witnesseth the same. In this epistle the said Cornelius moreouer writeth of one Moses a worthie martyr, which once being a follower also of Nouatus, after perceiuing his wickednesse forsoke him, & did excommunicate him. Of him Cyprian also maketh mention, and calleth leth him a blessed confessor. lib. 2. epist. 4. Damasus in his pontificall saith, that he was apprehended with Marinus and Nicostratus aboue mentioned, and was put with them in prison, where he ended his life. And thus much of Nouatus, against whom (as Eusebius testifieth) a synod was holden at Rome of three score sundrie bishops in the time of Cornelius, and vnder the reigne of Decius, in the yere of our Lord two hundred fiftie & fiue; whereby it may be supposed that the heat of the persecution at that time was somewhat calmed.

A synod at Rome.

Anno 255.

After Fabianus (or as Zonaras calleth him Flauianus) next succeeded into the bishoprike of Rome Cornelius, whom Cyprian noteth to be a worthie bishop, & for his great vertue and maidenlie continencie much commendable, chosen to that rome, not so much of his own consent, as of the full agreement both of the clergiemen, and also of the people. Hierome addeth also that he was a man of great eloquence: whereby it may appeare those two epistles decretall, which go in his name not to be his, both for the rudenesse of the barbarous & grosse stile, and also for the matter therein conteined, nothing talking of that time, nor of that age nor doings then of the church. Whereof in the first he writeth to all ministers and brethren of the church, concerning the lifting vp of the bodies and bones of Peter and Paul, De cathecumbis, & transposed to Vaticanum, at the instance of a certaine deuout woman named Lucina, hauing no great argument or cause to write thereof vnto the churches, but onelie that he in that letter doth desire them to pray vnto the Lord, that through the intercession of those apostolicall saints, their sinnes might be forgiuen them, &c. In the second epistle writing to Rufus a bishop of the East church, he decreeth and ordeineth that no oth ought of be required or exacted of any head or cheefe bishop, for any cause, or by any power. Also that no cause of priests or ministers ought to be handled in any strange or forreine court, without his precinct, except onelie in the court of Rome by appellation: whereby who seeth not the traine of our latter bishops, going about craftilie to aduance the dignitie of the court of Rome, vnder and by the pretensed title of Cornelius, and of ancient bishops? If Cornelius did write any epistles to any indeed in those so turbulent times of persecution, no doubt but some signification thereof he would haue touched in the said his letters, either in ministring consolation to his brethren, or in requiring consolation and praiers of others. Neither is there any doubt, but he would haue giuen some touch also of the matter of Nouatus, with whom he had so much to doe; as in deed he did: for so we find it recorded both in Eusebius, and in Hierome, that he wrote vnto Fabius bishop of Antioch, of the decrements of the councell of Rome, and an other letter of the maner of the councell; the third also of the cause of Nouatus, and againe of the repentance of such as fell, whereof there is no word touched at all in these foresaid epistles decretall.

Cornelius bishop of Rome, and martyr.

Bishops were chosen then not without the voice of the people.

A censure of the decretall epistles of Cornelius.

What trouble this Cornelius had with Nouatus, sufficientlie is before signified. In this persecution of Decius, he demeaned himselfe verie constantlie and faithfully, which susteined great conflicts with the aduersaries, as saint Cyprian giueth witnesse, li. 1. epist. 1. Hierome testifieth that he remained bishop after the death of Decius, to the time of Gallus, and so appeareth also by saint Cyprian, which hath these words: Et tyrannum armis & bello postmodum victum, prior sacerdotio suo vicit. But Damasus and Sabellicus, his followers, affirme that he was both exiled & also martyred vnder the tyrannous reigne of Decius. Of whom Sabellicus writeth this storie, taken out (as it seemeth) of Damasus, and saith: that Cornelius by the commandement of Decius, was banished a towne called Centumcellas, bordering in Hetruria, from whence he sent his letters to Cyprian bishop of Carthage, and Cyprian againe to him. This comming to the eares of Decius the emperor, he sendeth for Cornelius, asking him: how he durst be so bold to shew such stubbornesse, that he neither caring for the gods, nor fearing the displeasure of his princes, durst against the commonwealth giue and receiue letters from others? To whom Cornelius answering againe, thus purged himselfe, declaring to the emperor, that letters indeed he had written and receiued againe concerning the praises and honoring of Christ, and of saluation of soules, but nothing as touching any matter of the common wealth. And it followeth in the storie: Then Decius moued with anger commanded him to be beaten with plumbats (which, as saith Sabellicus, a kind of scourging) and so to be brought to the temple of Mars: either there to doe sacrifice, or to suffer the extremitie. But he rather willing to die, then to commit such iniquitie, prepared himselfe to martyrdome, being sure that hee should die. And so commending the charge of the church vnto Stephanus his archdeacon, was brought to the way of Appius, where he ended his life in faithfull martyrdome. Eusebius in one place saith that he sat two yeres, in an other place he saith that he sat three yeres, and so doth Marianus Scotus, following also the diuersitie of the said Eusebius. Damasus giueth him onlie two yeres.

In this foresaid persecution of Decius, it seemeth by some writers also that Cyprian was banished: but I suppose rather his banishment to be referred to the reigne of Gallus next emperor after Decius, whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) in this place hereafter. In the meane time the said Cyprian in his second booke, epist. 5. & 6. maketh mention of two that suffered either in the time of this Decius, or much about the same time. Of whom one was Aurelius a worthie and valiant young man, who was twice in torments for his confession, which he neuer denied, but manfully and boldly withstood the aduersarie till he was banished, and also after: and therefore was commended of Cyprian to certaine brethren to haue him for their lectorer, as in the forenamed epistle of Cyprian appeareth. The other was named Mappalicus, who in the date before he suffered, declaring to the proconsull in the midst of his torments, and saying; Videbis cras agonem: that is, To morrow you shall see the running for a wager, &c: was brought forth, according as he foresaid, to martyrdome, and there with no lesse constancie then patience did suffer.

Mappalicus martyr.

And thus much of the tyrannie of this wicked Decius against God his saints. Now to touch also the power of God his vengeance and punishment against him. Like as we see commonlie a tempest that is vehement, not long to continue: so it hapned with this tyrannicall tormentor, who reigning but two yeres, as saith Eusebius, or three at most, as writeth Orosius, among the middle of the Barbarians with whom he did warre was there slaine with his sonne, like as he had slaine Philippus and his sonne his predecessors before. so was he with his sonne slaine by the righteous iudgement of God himselfe. Eusebius lib. 7. cap. 1. Platin. Pomponius affirmeth that he warring against the Gothians, and being by them ouercome, lest he should fall into their hands, ran into a whirlepit, where he was drowned, and his bodie neuer found after.

The death and destruction of Decius.

Orosius lib. 4. cap. 14.

Neither did the iust hand of God plague the emperor onlie, but also reuenged as well the heathen Gentils and persecutors of his word throughout all prouinces and dominions of the Roman monarchie, amongst whom the Lord immediatlie after the death of Decius, sent such a plague and pestilence, lasting for the space of ten yeres together, that horrible it is to heare, and almost incredible to beleeue. Of this plague or pestilence testifieth Dionysius to Hierar a bishop in Egypt: Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 21. 22. where he declareth the mortalitie of this plague to be so great in Alexandria where he was bishop, that there was no house in the whole citie free. And although the greatnesse of the plague touched also the christians somewhat, yet it scourged the heathen idolaters much more: beside that the order of their behauior in the one and in the other was much diuers. For as the foresaid Dionysius doth record, the christians through brotherlie loue and pietie, did not refuse one to visit and comfort an other, and to minister to him what need required, notwithstanding it was to them great danger: for diuers there were who in closing vp their eies, in washing their bodies, & interring them in the ground, were nert themselues which followed them to their graues. Yet all this staied not them from doing their dutie, and shewing mercie one to an other: whereas the Gentils contrarilie being extremelie visited by the hand of God felt the plague, but considered not the striker, neither yet considered they their neighbor, but euerie man shifting for himselfe, neither cared one for an other, but such as were infected, some they would cast out of the doores halfe dead to be deuoured of dogs and wild beasts, some they let die within their houses without all succor, some they suffered to lie vnburied for that no man durst come neere him: and yet notwithstãding for all their voiding and shifting, the pestilence followed them whither so euer they went, and miserablie consumed them. In so much that Dionysius bishop the same time of Alexandria, thus reporteth of his owne citie, that such a mortalitie was then among them, that the said citie of Alexandria had not in number of all together both old and yong, as it was wont to conteine before of the old men onlie from the age of three score to seuentie, such as were found in time past commonlie almost in that citie. Pomponius Letus and other Latine writers also making mention of the said pestilitie, declare how the beginning thereof first came (as they thinke) out of Ethiope, and from the hot countries, and so inuading and walking first the south parts, from thence spread into the east, and so further running and increasing into all other quarters of the world. especiallie wheresoeuer the edicts of the emperor went against the christians, it followed after and consumed the most part of the inhabitants, whereby many places became desolat and void of all concourse, and so continued the terme often yeres together.

This pestiferous mortalitie (by the occasion whereof Cyprian tooke the ground to write his booke De mortalitate) began as is said, immediatlie after the death of Decius the persecutor, in the beginning of the reigne of Albias Gallus, and Volusianus his sonne, who succeeded through treason next vnto Decius, about the yere of our Lord two hundred fiftie and fiue, and continued their reigne but two yeres.

Cyprianus lib. de mortalitate.

Gallus and Volusianus emperors.

Anno 255.

This Gallus, although the first beginning of his reignie was some thing quiet, yet shortlie after following the steps of Decius, by whom rather he should haue taken better heed, set forth edicts in like maner for the persecution of christians, albeit in this edict we find no number of martyrs to haue suffered, but onlie all this persecution to rest onlie in the exilement of bishops or guides of the flocke. Of other sufferings or executiõs we doe not read, for the terrible pestilence following immediatlie kept the barbarous heathen otherwise occupied. Unto this time of Gallus, rather then to the time of Decius, I refer the banishment of Cyprian, who was then bishop of Carthage, of the which banishment he himselfe testifieth in diuers of his epistles, declaring the cause thereof to rise vpon a commotion or sedition among the people, out of the which he withdrew himselfe, lest the sedition should grow greater; notwithstanding the said Cyprian though being absent, yet had no lesse care of his flocke and of the whole church, then if he had been present with them, and therefore neuer ceased in his epistles continuallie to exhort and call vpon them to be constant in their profession, and patient in their afflictions. Amongst diuers others whom he doth comfort in his banishment, although he was in that case to be comforted himselfe, writing to certaine that were condemned to mining for mettals, whose names were Nemesianus, Felix, Lucius, with other bishops, priests and deacons, declareth vnto them; How it is no shame but a glory not to be feared, but to be reioiced at, to suffer banishment or other paines for Christ; and confirming them in the same, or rather commending them, signifieth how worthily they doe shew themselues to be as valiant captaines of vertue, prouoking both by the confessions of their mouth, and by the suffering of their bodie, the hearts of the brethren to christian martyrdome, whose example was and is a great confirmation to many, both maids and children to follow the like: as for punishmẽt and suffering, it is (saith he) a thing not execrable to a christian: for a christian mans brest, whose hope doth wholie consist in the * tree, dreadeth neither bat nor club: wounds and skarres of the bodie be ornaments to a christian man, such as bring no shame nor dishonestie to the partie, but rather preferreth and freeth him with the Lord. And although in the mines where the mettals be digged there be no beds for christian mens bodies to take their rest, yet they haue their rest in Christ: and though their wearie bones lie vpon the cold ground, yet is it no paine to lie with Christ. Their feet haue been fettered with bands and chains, but happilie he is bound of man, whom the Lord Christ doth loose: happilie doth he lie tied in the stocks, whose feet thereby are made swifter to run to heauen. Neither can any man tie a christian so fast, but he runneth so much the faster for his garland of life. They haue no garments to saue them from cold, but he that putteth on Christ is sufficientlie coted. Doth bread lacke to their hungrie bodies? But man liueth not onlie by bread, but by euerie word proceeding from the mouth of God. Your deformitie (saith he) shall be turned to honor, your mourning to ioy, your paine to pleasure, and felicitie infinit. And if this doo grieue you that ye cannot now employ your sacrifices and oblations after your wonted maner, yet your sacrifice dailie ceaseth not, which is a contrite and humble heart, as when you offer vp dailie your bodies a liuelie and a glorious sacrifice vnto the Lord, which is the sacrifice, that pleaseth God. And though your trauell be great, yet is the reward greater, which is most certaine to follow: for God beholding and looking downe vpon them that confesse his name, in their willing mind approoueth them, in their striuing helpeth them, in their victorie crowneth them, rewarding that in vs which he hath performed, and crowning that which he hath in vs perfected. With these, and such like comfortable words he doth animat his brethren, admonishing them that they are now in a ioifull iourney, hasting apace to the mansions of the martyrs, there to enioy after this darknesse a stable light and brightnesse greater then all their passions, according to be apostles saying: These sufferings of this present time be nothing like comparable to the brightnesse of the glory that shall be reuealed in vs, &c.

And after the like words of sweet comfort and consolation writing to Seagrius and Rogatianus, which were in prison and bonds for the testimonie of truth, Doth encourage them to continue stedfast and patient in the way wherein they haue begun to run: for that they haue the Lord with them their helper and defender, who promiseth to be with vs to the worlds end, and therefore willeth them to set before their eies in their death immortalitie, in their paine euerlasting glory, of the which it is written: Pretious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. Item, although before men they suffered torments, yet their hope is full of immortalitie, and being vexed in small things, they shall be well requited in great matters: for the Lord hath tried thẽ as gold in the fire. And writeth moreouer, admonishing them that it is appointed from the beginning of the world, that righteousnesse heere should suffer in secular conflicts, for so iust Abel was slaine in the beginning of the world, and after him all iust and good men, the prophets also & the apostles sent of the Lord himselfe, vnto whom all, the Lord first gaue an example in himselfe, teaching that there is no comming to his kingdome, but by that way which he entred himselfe, saying by these words: He that loueth his life in this world shall lose it, &c. And againe, Feare ye not them that slaie the bodie, but haue no power to slaie the soule. And S. Paul likewise admonishing all them whosoeuer couet to be partakers of the promises of the Lord, to follow the Lord, saith: If we suffer togither with him, we shal reigne togither, &c.

Furthermore, as the same Cyprian doth encourage heere the holie martyrs which were in captiuitie, to persist: so likewise writing to the priests and deacons which were free, exhorteth them to be seruiceable and obsequious with all care and loue, to cherish and embrace them that were in bonds. Cypriã. lib. 3. epist. 6. Whereby maie appeare the feruent zeale and care of this good bishop toward the church of Christ, although being now in exile in the time of this emperor Gallus.

In the same time and vnder the said Gallus reigning with his sonne Volusianus, was also Lucius bishop of Rome sent to banishment who, next succeeded after Cornelius in that bishoprike, about the yeere of our Lord two hundred fiftie and six. Albeit in this banishment he did not long continue, but returned home to his church, as by the epistle of S. Cyprian, lib. 3. epist. 1. may appeare. As to all other bishops of Rome in those primitiue dates certaine decretall epistles with seuerall ordinances be ascribed, bearing their names & titles as hath been afore declared: So also hath Lucius one epistle fathered vpon him, in the which epistle he writing to the brethren of France and of Spaine, appointeth such an order and forme of the church as seemeth not to agree with the time then present: for so he declareth in that epistle that a bishop in all places whither so euer he goeth, should haue two priests with three deacons waiting vpon him to be witnesses of all his waies and doings. Which ordinance although I denie not but it may be and is conuenient, yet I see not how that time of Lucius could serue then for a bishop to carie such a pompe of priests and deacons about him, or to studie for any such matter: for so much as bishops commonlie in those dates were seldome free to go abroad, went they neuer so secret, but either were in houses close and secret, or in prison, or els in banishment. Moreouer in the said epistle how pompoulie writeth he to the church of Rome? This holie and apostolicall church of Rome (saith he) the mother of all churches of Christ, which by the grace of God omnipotẽt hath neuer been prooued to swarue out of the path of apostolicall tradition, neither hath euer fallen or been depraued with heretical innouations: but euen as in the first beginning it receiued the rule of the apostolicall faith by his first instructors, the princes of the apostles, so it continueth euer immaculat and vndefiled vnto the end.

Vnto this Lucius also is referred in the decrees of Gratian this constitution, that no minister what soeuer after his ordination, should at any time reenter to the chamber of his owne wife in paine of losing his ministerie in the church, &c. Eusebius in his seuenth booke making mention of the death of Lucius, and not of his martyrdome, saith that he sat but eight months: but Damasus in his martyrologe holdeth that he sat three yeeres, and was beheaded the second yeere of Valerian and Galienus emperors, and so doth also Martianus Scotus and Nauclerus, with other that follow Damasus affirme the same.

After him came Stephanus next bishop of Rome following Lucius, whom Damasus, Platina, and Sabellicus, affirme to haue sit seuen yeeres and fiue months, and to die a martyr. Contrarie Eusebius and Volaterane holding with him, giue him but two yeers: which part cõmeth most neere to the truth, I leaue to the readers iudgement. Of his two epistles decretal, and of his ordinances out of the same collected, I need not much to tarie for two respects, either for that cõcerning these decretall epistles suspitiouslie intituled to the names of the fathers of the primitiue church, sufficientlie hath been said before, or els because both the phrase barbarous and incongrue, and also the matter it selfe therein conteined is such, that although no testimonie came against it, yet it easilie refelleth it selfe. As where in the second epistle he decreeth, That no bishop being expulsed out of his seat, or depriued of his goods, ought to be accused of any, or is bound to answere for himselfe, before that by the law regularly he be restored againe fully to his former state, and that the primats and the synod render vnto him againe all such possessions and fruits as were taken from him before his accusation, as is agreeing both to the lawes canon and also secular. First heere I would desire the reader a little to stay, and this to cõsider with himselfe, who be these heere ment which either vsed or might despoile these bishops of their goods, and expulse them from their seats for such wrongfull causes, but onely kings and emperors which at this time were not yet christened nor vsed any such proceedings against these bishops, in such sort as either primats or synods could restore them againe to their places and possessions: againe, what priuat goods or possessions had bishops then to be taken from them, when as churches yet neither were indued with patrimonies nor possessions? And if any treasures were committed to the church, it pertained not properly to the bishop, but went in generall to the subuention of the poore in the church, as in the epistle of Cornelius to Fabius may appeare, alleaged in Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. where he speaking of his church, and declaring how there ought to be but one bishop in the same, inferreth mention of fortie and six priests, seuen deacons, with seuen subdeacons, fortie two acoluthes, of widowes and poore afflicted persons to the number of fiftéene hundred and aboue, found and nourished in the same by the mercifull benignitie and prouidence of God: Eusebius, lib. 6. cap. 43. It followeth more in the end of the said canon, Which thing is forbidden both by the lawes ecclesiasticall, call, and also secular, &c. Now what lawes secular were in the time of Steuen for Bishops not to be charged with any accusation before they were restored againe to their state, let any reader marking well the state of the heathen lawes that then were, iudge, and in iudging I doubt not but this matter alone though there were no other, will be enough to descrie the vntruth hereof.

Moreouer, by diuers other probable notes and arguments in the said second epistle of Stephanus it may be easily espied, this epistle to be feined and misauthorised, especially by the fift canon of the said epistle, where he so solemnely entreateth of the difference betweene primats, metropolitans, and archbishops, which distinction of degrees and titles sauouring more of ambition then of persecution, giueth me verily to suppose this epistle not to be written by this Stephan, but by some other man either of that name, or of some other time when the church began to be setled in more prosperitie, and orders therein to be taken for euery man to know his degree and limits of his authoritie, according as is specified by the first and seuenth canon of Nicen councell, decreeing of the same matter.

Primats, metropolitans, archbishops.

The like estimation may be conceiued also of the seuenth canon of the said epistle, where he willeth and appointeth all causes iudiciarie to be decided and determined within the precinct of their owne proper prouince, and not to passe ouer the bounds thereof, vnlesse (saith he) the appeale be made to the apostolicall sea of Rome, which sauoureth in my nose rather of a smacke of poperie, then of the veine of christianitie, especially in these times, during ths terrible persecution among the bishops of Christ. And thus much of the second decretall epistle of Stephanus, although of the first epistle also written to Hilarius some thing may be said, as where he speaketh in the said epistle of holy vestiments, and holy vessels, and other ornaments of the altar serving to diuine worship, and therefore not to be touched nor handled of any man, sauing of priests alone. Concerning all which implements, my opinion is this, that I thinke the church of Rome not to haue bin in so good state then, that either Stephanus or Sixtus before him being occupied about other more earnest matters, and scarce able to hide their owne heads, had any mind or cogitation to studie vpon such vnnecessarie inuentions serving in publike churches: neither do I see how the heathen in those daies would haue suffered these ornaments to be vnconsumed, which would not suffer the bishops themselues to liue amongst them, notwithstanding Isidorus and Polydorus iudge the contrarie. Betweene this Stephan and Cyprian bishop of Carthage was a great contention about rebaptising of heretikes, whereof more hereafter (Christ willing) shall be said.

Vestiments and holy vessels serving for the altar.

Besides these bishops above specified, diuers others there were also sent into banishment vnder the forenamed emperors Gallus and Volusianus, as appeareth by Dionysius writing to Hermannus on this wise: That Gallus not seeing the euill of Decius, nor foreseeing the occasion of his seduction & ruine, stumbled himselfe also at the same stone, lying open before his eyes: for at the first beginning when his empire went prosperously forward, and all things went luckily with him, afterward he draue out holy men, which prayed for his peace and safegard, and so with them reiected also the prayers which they made for him, &c. Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 1. Otherwise of any bloodshed or any martyrs that in the time of this emperor were put to death, we do not reade.

Bishops banished in the time of Gallus.

After the raigne of which emperour Gallus and of his son Volusianus being expired, who raigned but two yeares, Emilianus which slue them both by ciuill sedition, succeeded in their place, who raigned but three months, and was also slaine. Next to whom Valerianus and his sonne Galienus were aduanced to the empire.

Gallus and Volusianus emperours slaine. Emilianus emperour three months. Valerianus and Galienus his sonne emperour.

About the changing of these emperors the persecution which first began at Decius, and afterward slacked in the time of Gallus was now extinguished for a time, partly for the great plague raigning in all places, partly by the change of the emperors, although it was not very long. For Valerianus in the first entrance of the empire for the space of three or foure yeares was right curteous and gentle to the people of God, and well accepted to the senat. Neither was there any of all the emperours before him, no not of them which openly professed Christ, that shewed himselfe so louing and familiar toward the christians as he did: in so much that (as Dionysius writing to Herman doth testifie) all his whole court was replenished with holy saints and seruants of Christ and godly persons, so that his house might seeme to be made a church of God. But by the malice of Satan through wicked counsell these quiet daies endured not very long. For in processe of time this Valerian being charmed or incensed by a certaine Egyptian, a chiefe ruler of the heathen synagogue of the Egyptians, a master of the charmers or inchanters, who indeed was troubled for that he could not do his magicall feats for the christians, was so far infatuated and bewitched, that through the detestable prouocations of that diuellish Egyptian, he was wholly turned vnto abominable idols, and to execrable impietie, in sacrificing yong infants, and quartering bodies, and diuiding the intrals of children new borne, and so proceeding in his furie, moued the eight persecution against the christians, whom the wicked Egyptian could not

The chiefe executors of this persecution.

What was the chiefe originall cause of this persecution, partly is signified before, where mention was made of the wicked Egyptian: but as this was the outward and politicall cause, so S. Cyprian sheweth other causes more speciall and ecclesiasticall in his fourth booke, epist. 4. whose words be these: But we (saith he) must vnderstand and confesse, that this turbulent oppression and calamitie, which hath walked for the most part all our whole companie, and doth daily consume, riseth chiefely of our owne wickednesse and sinnes, while we walke not in the way of the Lord, nor obserue his precepts left vnto vs for our institution. The Lord obserued the will of his Father in all points, but we obserue not the will of the Lord, hauing all our minde and studie set vpon lucre and possessions, giuen to pride, full of emulation and dissension, void of simplicitie and faithfull dealing, renouncing this world in word onely, but nothing in deed, euery man pleasing himselfe, and displeasing all others. And therefore are we thus scourged, and worthily: for what stripes and scourges doe we not deserue, when the confessors themselues (such as haue bid the triall of their confession) and such as ought to bee an example to the rest of well doing, do keep no discipline? And therefore because some such there be, proudly puft vp with this swelling and vnmannerly bragging of their confession, these torments come, such as do not easily send vs to the crowne, except by the mercie of God, some being taken away by quicknesse of death, doe preuent the tediousnesse of punishment. These things doe wee suffer for our sinnes and deserts, as by the Lords censure we haue been forewarned, saying: If they shall forsake my law and wil not walke in my iudgements; if thy shall prophane my institutions, and will not obserue my precepts, I will visit their iniquities with the rod, and their transgressions with scourges. These rods and scourges (saith he) wee feele, which neither please God in our good deeds, nor repent in our euil deeds. Wherfore the said Cyprian adding this exhortation withall, exhorted them to pray and entreat from the bottome of their heart and whole mind, the mercie of God, which promiseth, saying: But yet my mercie I will not scatter from them, &c. Let vs aske, and we shall obtaine; and though (saith Cyprian) it be with variance, yet for so much as wee haue grieuously offended, let vs continue knocking, for to him that knocketh it shall be opened, if our praiers, sighings & weepings knock stil at the doore with continuance, and if our praiers be ioined together with brotherly agreement, &c. Moreouer, what vices were then principally raigning among the christians, hee further specifieth in the said epistle, vvhich chiefly were diuision & dissension among the brethren. For when it was spoken to them in a vision by these words, Petite & impetrabitis, that is, Pray, and ye shall obtaine; afterward it was required of the congregatiō there present, to direct their prayers for certaine persons assigned to them by name: but they could not agree and condescend altogether of the names and persons of them which they should pray for, but were dissonant in their consent and petition: which thing (saith Cyprian) did greatly displease him that spake vnto them; Pray, and ye shall obtaine, for that there was no vniforme equalitie of voice and heart, nor one simple and ioynt concord among the brethren, wherof it is written in the sixty and seuenth Psalme; God which maketh to dwell in the house together men of one accord, &c. And so by the occasion hereof, hee writeth vnto them in the foresaid epistle, and moueth them to prayer and mutuall agreement. For (saith he) if it be promised in the gospell to be granted whatsoeuer any two consenting together shall aske, what shall then the whole church do agreeing together? Or what if this vnanimity were among the whole fraternity? Which vnanimitie (saith Cyprian) if it had bin then among the brethren, Non venissent fratribus haec mala, si in vnum fraternitas fuisset animata, that is: These euils had not hapned to the brethren, if the brethren had ioyned together in brotherly vnanimitie, &c.

After the causes thus declared of this or other persecutions, the said S. Cyprian moreouer in the forenamed epistle (worthie to be read of all men) describeth likewise a certaine vision, wherein was shewed vnto them by the Lord before the persecution came, what should happen. The vision was this. There was a certaine aged father sitting, at whose right hand sat a yong man verie sad and pensiue, as one with an indignation sorrowfull, holding his hand vpon his brest, his countenance heauie and vncheerefull. On the left hand sate another person, hauing in his hand a net, which he threatned to lay to catch the people that stood about. And as he was marueling that saw the sight thereof, it was said vnto him: The yong man whom thou seest sit on the right hand, is sad & sorie that his precepts be not obserued. But he on the left hand danceth and is merrie, for that occasion is giuen him to haue power of the aged father to afflict mẽ. And this vision was seene long before this tempest of persecution hapned, wherin is declared the same that before is said; The sinnes of the people to be the cause why satan in this persecution and all others, hath had and hath still such power with his net of destruction, to rage against the blood of christian men, and all because (saith Cyprian) we forslacke our praying, or be not so vigilant therein as we should: wherefore the Lord because he loueth vs, correcteth vs; correcteth vs to amend vs, amendeth vs to saue vs, &c. Cyprian.

Our sins giue satan power against vs.

Another reuelation shewed to S. Cyprian.

Furthermore, the same Cyprian, and in the same epistle writing of his owne reuelation or message sent to him, thus saith: And to his least seruant both sinfull and vnworthie (meaning by himselfe) God of his tender goodnesse hath vouchsafed to direct this word; Tell him (saith he) that he be quiet and of good comfort, for peace will come, albeit a little stay there is for a while, for that some remaine yet to be proued and tried, &c. And sheweth also in the same place of another reuelation of his, wherein he was admonished to be spare in his feeding, and sober in his drinke, lest his mind giuen to heauenly meditation might be caried away with worldly allurements, or oppressed with too much surfet of meats and drinkes, should be lesse apt or able to prayer and spirituall exercise.

Spare diet and sober drinke conuenient in christian bishops.

The peace of the church to come, foreshewed by the Lord.

Finally, in the latter end of the foresaid epistle mention also followeth of other reuelations or shewings: Wherein the Lord (saith Cyprian) doth vouchsafe in many of his seruants to foreshew to come the restauring of his church, the stable quiet of our health and safegard; after raine faire weather, after darknesse light, after stormie tempest peaceable calme, the fatherly helpe of his loue, the wont and old glorie of his diuine maiesty, whereby both the blasphemie of the persecutor shall be repressed, and the repentance of such as haue fallen be reformed, and the strong and stable confidence of them that stand shal reioyce and glorie. Thus much hath S. Cyprian, writing of these things to the clergie. Lib. 4. epist. 4.

Crimes and causes falsely laid to the christians.

As touching now the crimes and accusations in this persecution laid to the charge of the christians, this was the principall: First, because they refused to do worship to their idols and to the emperors; then, for that they professed the name of Christ; besides, al the calamities and euils that hapned in the world, as warres, famine, and pestilence, were only imputed to the christians. Against all which quarelling accusations, Cyprian doth eloquently defend the christians in his booke Contra Demetrianum: like as Tertullian had done before, writing Contra Scapulam. And first touching the obiection for not worshipping idols, hee cleareth the christians both in his booke Contra Demetr. and also De vanitate idol. prouing those idols to be no true gods, but images of certaine dead kings, which neither could saue themselues from death, nor such as worship them. The true God to be but one, and that by the testimonie of Sosthenes, Plato, and Trismegistus, the which God the christians do truly worship. And as concerning that the christians were thought to be the causes of publike calamities, because they worshipped not the Gentiles idols, he purgeth the christians therof, prouing that if there be any defect in increase of things, it is not to be ascribed to them, but rather to the decrease of nature, languishing now towards her age and latter end. Againe, for that it hath been so foresaid and prophesied, that toward the end of the world should come warres, famine, and pestilence. Moreouer, if there be any cause thereof more proper then other, it is most like to be imputed to their vaine idolatrie, and to the contempt of the true God. Also that such euils be encreased by the wickednesse of the people, so that to speake in his owne words, Famem maiorem facit rapacitas quàm siccitas, that is, Famine commeth more by auarice of men, then by drought of the aire, but especially the cause thereof to proceed of the cruell shedding of the innocent blood of the christians, &c.

The apologie of Cyprian for the christians.

Cypr. contra Demetrianum.

Cypr. de idolorum vanitate.

Thus with many other mo probations doth Cyprian defend the christians against the barbarous exclamations of the heathen gentiles. Of which Cyprian, for so much as he suffered in the time of this persecution, I mind (Christ willing) to recapitulat heere in ample discourse the full summe, first of his life and bringing vp, then of his death and martyrdome, as the worthinesse of that man deserueth to be remembred. Of this Cyprian therfore, otherwise named Statius, thus writeth Nicephorus, Nazianzenus, Iacobus de Morazine, Henricus de Erfordia, Volateranus, Hieronymus, and others; that he being an African and borne in Carthage, first was an idolater and gentile, altogether giuen to the studie and practise of the magicall arts, of whose parentage and education in letters from his youth, no mention is made but that he was a worthie rhetorician in Africa: of whose conuersion and baptisme he himselfe in his first booke and second epistle, writeth a flourishing and eloquent historie. Which his conuersion vnto the christian faith as Hieronymus affirmeth in his commentarie vpon Ionas, was through the grace of God and the meanes of Cecilius a priest, whose name after he bare, and through the occasion of hearing the historie of the prophet Ionas. The same Hierome moreouer testifieth how he immediatly vpon his conuersion distributed among the poore all his substance, and after that being ordained a priest, was not long after constituted bishop of the congregation of Carthage. But whether he succeeded Agrippinus of whom he often maketh mention, which also was the first author of rebaptisation, or some other bishop of Carthage, it remaineth vncertain. But this is most true, he himselfe shined in his office and dignitie with such good gifts and vertues, that as Nazianzenus writeth, he had the gouernment of the whole east church, and church of Spaine, and was called the bishop of the christian men.

The countrie and education of Cyprian.

The conuersion of Cyprian.

Cyprian made first priest, then bishop of Carthage.

And to the further setting forth (to the praise of God) of his godly vertues wherewith he was endued, appearing as well in his owne works to them that list to perule the same, as also described by other worthie writers: he was curteous and gentle, louing and full of patience, and therwithall sharpe and seuere in his office, according as the cause required, as appeareth in his first booke and third epistle. Furthermore, as he was most louing and kind toward his brethren, and tok much paine in helping and relieuing the martyrs, as appeareth by his letters to the elders and deacons of his bishoprike, that with all study and endeuour they should gently entertaine and shew pleasure vnto the martyrs in his absence, as partly is touched before.

The vertues of Cyprians like described.

The care of Cyprian toward the afflicted brethren.

The third epistle of his first booke doth declare of what stomacke and godly courage he was in executing his office, and handling his matters. Neither was he void of prudence and circumspection, but was adorned with maruellous modestie, whereby he attempted nothing vpon his owne head and iudgement, but with the consent of his fellow bishops and other inferior ministers: and that chiefely (among others) doth the tenth epistle of his third booke witnesse. He was of a maruellous liberall disposition towards the poore brethren of other countries: for so often as he had cause of absence, hee committed the care of those poore men to his fellow officers, and wrote vnto them, that of their owne proper goods they would helpe their banished brethren to that which was necessarie for them, as witnesseth the twentie and fourth epistle of his third booke. He reciteth among other gifts wherewith he was indued, as touching the visions and heauenly admonitions of the persecutions that should follow, and of other matters touching the gouernment of the church in his first booke and third epistle, and fourth booke and fourth epistle, where he reciteth and expounded the forme or manner of a certaine vision which we haue before sufficiently expressed.

The modestie of Cyprian in conferring with his fellow brethren.

Visions concerning the troubles and peace of the church, recited and expounded by Cyprian.

Hee had moreouer great skill in the foreknowledge of things that should chance, as may be gathered in the first epistle of his fourth booke. Also Augustine doth attribute vnto him many worthie vertues, who writeth much in setting forth his gifts of humilitie, in his second booke of baptisme, the fourth chapter, against the Donatists, and in his seuenth booke and eleuenth chapter, of his long sufferance and patience; also of his courtesie and meekenesse: by which vertues he concealed nothing that he vnderstood, but vttered the same meekely and patiently. Also that he kept the ecclesiasticall peace and concord with those that were of another opinion then hee was of. Lastly, that hee neither circumuented nor did preiudice any man, but followed that thing which seemed good in his iudgement, it is manifest in S. Augustine his first booke, De baptismo contra Donatistas. Neither is this to be passed with silence, that Hierome writeth that hee was verie diligent in reading, especially the workes of Tertullian: for he saith that he saw a certaine old man whose name was Paulus, which told him he saw the notarie of blessed Cyprian, being then an old man when he himselfe was but a sprigall in the citie of Rome, and told him that it was Cyprians wont, neuer to let one day passe without some reading of Tertullian, and that he was accustomed oftentimes to say vnto him: Giue me my master, meaning thereby Tertullian.

Cyprian meeke and patient.

Cyprian a great reader of Tertullian.

Now a few words touching his exile and martyrdome. Of his epistles which he wrote backe to his congregation, leading his life in exile, mention is made aboue, wherein he sheweth the vertue beseeming a faithfull pastour, in that he toke no lesse care as well of his owne church, as of other bishops being absent, then he did being present. Wherein also hee himselfe doth signifie that voluntarily hee absented himselfe, lest hee should do more hurt then good to the congregation, by reason of his presence, as is likewise declared before. Thus from the desolat places of his banishment, wherein he was oftentimes sought for, hee writeth vnto his brethren, as in his third booke and tenth epistle is manifest, which thing seemeth to bee done in the raigne of Decius or Gallus. But after that hee returned againe out of exile in the raigne of this Valerianus, he was also after that the second time banished of Paternus the proconsull of Africa into the citie of Thurbin, as the oration of Augustine touching Cyprian sheweth; or else as Pontius the deacon saith, into a citie named Furabilitana, or Curabilitana. But when Paternus the proconsull was dead, Galienus Marinus succeeded in the rome and office of Paternus, who finding Cyprian in a garden, caused him to be apprehended by his sergeants, and to bee brought before the idols to offer sacrifice. Which when hee would not do, then the proconsull breaking forth in these words, said: Long hast thou liued in a sacrilegious mind, and hast gathered together men of a wicked conspiracie, and hast shewed thy selfe an enemie to the gods gods of the Romans, and to their holy lawes: neither could the sacred emperours Valerianus and Galienus reuoke thée to the sect of their ceremonies. At length the wicked tyrant condemning him to haue his head cut off, he patiently and willingly submitted his necke to the stroke of the sword (as Hieronymus affirmeth.) And so this blessed martyr ended this present life in the Lord, Xistus then being bishop of Rome, as Eusebius noteth, in the yeare of our Lord two hundred fiftie and nine. Sabellicus saith that he was martyred in the raigne of Gallus and Volusianus, Lucius being bishop of Rome: but that séemeth not like.

The martyrdome of Cyprian.

Anno 259

Now remaineth to speake something likewise of his workes and bookes left behind him, although all peraduenture do not remaine that he wrote: whereof some are missing, some againe which in the liuerie of his name and title, are not his: but such as be certainly his by the stile and sense may some be discerned: such is the eloquence of his phrase, and grauitie of his sentence, vigor of wit, power in perswasion, so much differing from many others, as hée can lightly be imitated but of few. Of the which his bookes with vs extant, as the flourishing eloquence is worthily commended, proceeding out of the schole of Rhetoricians, so is the authoritie thereof no lesse of reputation, not only among vs of this age of the church, but also among the ancient fathers. Whereof Saint Augustine speaking in his commendation, saith: Ego (inquit) litteras Cypriani non vt canonicas habeo, sed eas ex canonicis considero: & quod in eis diuinarum scripturarum autoritati congruit cum laude eius accipio: quod autem non congruit, cum pace eius respuo, &c. By which words it may appeare that Augustine, although he did not repute the bookes and writings of Cyprian to be equiualent with the holy Scripture, yet notwithstanding next after the holy Scriptures he had the same in exceeding great admiration.

The bookes of Cyprian.

The iudgement of Augustine vpon the books of Cyprian. August. contra Cresconium. lib. 12. cap. 32.

Vincentius and Lazarus Celestinus reciting the names of diuers bookes, bearing the title of Cyprian (more perchance then be truly his) do collect out of them a certaine extract of his most pithie sentences, all which héere to repeat were too tedious. To giue a taste of the speciall, I thought it not impertinent. As where he speaking of the treasures of a rich man, exhorteth, saying:

Sentences of Cyprian collected. Ex Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 63.

Ne dormiat in thesauris tuis, quod pauperi prodesse potest.
Let it not sléepe in thy treasures, that may profit the poore.
Duo nunquam veterascunt in homine, cor semper nouas cogitationes machinando: lingua, cordis vanas conceptiones proferendo.
Two things neuer wax old in man, the heart euer imagining new cogitations, the tongue euer in vttering the vaine conceptions of the heart.
Quod aliquando de necessitate amittendum est, sponte pro diuina remuneratione distribuendum est.
That which a man must néeds forgo of necessitie, wisedome it is a man to distribute so, that God may euerlastingly reward him.
Disciplina est morum præsentium ordinata correctio, & malorum præteritorum regularis obseruatio.
Discipline is an ordinat amendment of manners present, and a regular obseruation of euils past.
Integritas ibi nulla esse potest, vbi qui improbos damnent, desunt: & soli qui damnentur, occurrunt.
There can be no integritie, where as they which should condemne the wicked are euer wanting: and they only which are to be condemned, are euer present.
Auari ad hoc tantum possident quæ habent, vt ne alteri possidere liceat.
A couetous man only possesseth his goods for this, because another should not possesse them.
Sericum & purpurum indutæ, Christum induere non possunt.
Women that aduance themselues in putting on silkes and purple, cannot lightly put on Christ.
Fœminæ crines suos inficiunt malo præsagio: capillos enim sibi flammeos auspicari non metuunt.
They which colour their lockes with red and yellow, begin betime to prognosticat of what colour their haire shall be in hell.
Qui se pingunt in hoc seculo, aliter quàm creauit Deus; metuant ne cum resurrectionis venerit dies, artifex creaturam suam non recognoscat.
They which loue to paint themselues in this world otherwise then God hath created them: let them feare, lest when the day commeth of resurrection, the Creator will not know them.
Qui pauperi eleemosynam dat, Deo suauitatis odorem sacrificat.
He that giueth an almes to the poore, sacrificeth to God an odor of sweet smell.
Contemnenda est omnis iniuria præsentium malorum, fiducia futurorum bonorum.
All iniurie of euils present is to be neglected, for the good hope of good things to come.
Nihil prodest verbis proferre virtutem, & factis destruere.
To set out vertue in words, and to destroy the same in facts, is nothing worth.
Quo plures domi sunt tibi liberi, hoc plus tibi non recondendum sed erogandum est, quia multorum iam delicta redimenda sunt, multorum purgandæ conscientiæ.
The more children and greater household thou hast at home, the more cause thou hast not to hord vp, but to disperse abroad, for that many sinnes are to be redeemed, many consciences are to be purged.

¶ Moreouer lest the papists héere should take an occasion by this text, grounded vpon the text of Tob. cap. 4. Almes (saith he) deliuereth from all sinne and death: to build vp the workes of satisfaction, the said Cyprian, lib. 4. epist. 2. more plainly expoundeth both himselfe, and that place of Scripture, writing in these words: Quia scriptum est, Eleemosyna ab omni peccato & morte liberat: Tob. 4. Non vtique ab ea morte, quam semel Christi sanguis extinxit, & à qua nos salutaris baptismi & redemptoris nostri gratia liberauit, sed ab illa quę per delicta postmodum serpit, &c. that is, Almes doe deliuer from all sinne and from death: Tob. 4. Not from that (saith Cyprian) which the blood of Christ hath once extincted, and from which the wholesome grace of our baptisme, and of our redeemer hath deliuered vs, but from that death which afterwards creepeth in by sinne, &c. Cyprian, lib. 4. epist. 2. By which words it is apparant, that Cyprian meaneth this deliuerance (which commeth by almes giuing) from death and sinne, not to be expounded nor to be taken for death euerlasting, from which only the blood of Christ doth saue vs: but for temporall or transitorie punishment, which is wont to be inflicted in this bodie of sinne. For so it is nothing repugnant, but that temporall vertues may haue their temporall rewards in this life, and likewise sinnes committed may haue temporall punishments both of vs and in our families, our eternall saluation standing euermore firme in Christ yet notwithstanding.

The place of Scripture expounded, Eleemosyna ab omni peccato & morte liberat. Tob. 4. Ex Cypr. lib. 4. epist. 2.

The forsaid Vincentius moreouer speaking of another booke of Cyprian (although the said book be not numbred in the catalogue of his workes) maketh mention of twelue abuses, or absurdities in the life of man, which in order be these:

1 Sapiens sine operibus. A wise man without good workes.
2 Senex sine religione. An old man without religion.
3 Adolescēs sine obediētia. A yong man without obedience.
4 Diues sine eleemosyna. A rich man without almes.
5 Fœmina sine pudicitia. A woman shameleſſe.
6 Dominus sine virtute. A guide without vertue.
7 Christianus contentiosus. A christian man contentious.
8 Pauper superbus. A poore man proud.
9 Rex iniquus. A king vnrighteous.
10 Episcopus negligens. A bishop negligent.
11 Plebs sine disciplina. People without discipline.
12 Populus sine lege. Subiects without law.

Twelue abuses in the life of man noted out of Cyprian.

As we haue hitherto set forth the commendation of Cyprian this blessed martyr: so must we now take héed againe, that we do not héere incur the old and common danger, which the papists are commonly accustomed to run into, whose fault is alwaies almost to be immoderat and excessiue in their proceedings, making too much almost of euery thing. So in speaking of the holy Sacraments, they make more of them then doth the nature of Sacraments require; not vsing them, but abusing them, not referring or applying them, but adoring them, not taking them in their kind for things godly as they are, but taking them for God himselfe, turning religion into superstition, and the creature to the Creator, the things signifying to the things themselues signified, &c. To the church likewise and ceremonies of the church, to generall councels, to the blessed virgin Marie mother of Christ, to the bishop of Rome, and to all other in like case, not contented to attribute that which is sufficient, they exceed moreouer the bounds of iudgement and veritie, iudging so of the church, and generall councels, as though they could neuer, or did neuer erre in any iot. That the blessed mother of Christ amongst all women was blessed, and a virgin full of grace, the Scripture and truth doth giue; but to say that she was borne without all originall sinne, or to make of her an aduocat, or mother of mercie, there they runne further then truth will beare. The ceremonies were first ordained to serue but onlie for order sake, vnto the which they haue attributed so much at length, that they haue set in them a great part of our religion, yea and also saluation. And what thing is there else almost, wherein the papist haue not exceeded?

The learning of Cyprian ioyned with his blemishes.

The fault of papists to make too much of euerie thing.

Wherefore to auoid this common error of the papists, we must beware in commending the doctors and writers of the church, and so commend them, that truth and consideration go with our commendation. For though this cannot be denied, but that holy Cyprian, and other blessed martyrs were holy men; yet notwithstanding they were men, that is, such as might haue, and had their falles and faults; men I say, and not angels, nor gods, saued by God, not sauiours of men, nor patrons of grace. And though they were also men of excellent learning, and worthie doctors, yet with their learning they had their errours also annexed. And though their bookes be (as they ought to be) of great authoritie, yet ought they not to be equall with the Scriptures. And albeit they said well in most things, yet it is not therefore enough that what they said it must stand for a truth. That preheminence of authoritie only belongeth to the word of God, and not to the pen of man. For of men and doctors, be they neuer so famous, there is none that is void of his reprehention. In Origen (although in his time the admiration of his learning was singular) yet how many things be there, which the church now holdeth not? But examining him by Scriptures, where he said well, they admit him, where otherwise they leaue him. In Polycarpus ꝙ church hath corrected and altered that which he did hold in celebrating the Easter day after the Iewes. Neither can holy and blessed Ignatius be defended in all his sayings: as where he maketh the fasting vpon the Sunday or the Sabbath day as great an offence, as to kill Christ himselfe: Ignat. epist. ad Philip. contrarie to this saying of Saint Paul, Let no man iudge you in meat and drinke: also where the said Ignatius speaketh De virginitate, and of other things more. Irenæus did hold that man was not made perfect in the beginning. He seemeth also to defend free will in man, in those things also that be spirituall. He saith that Christ suffered after he was fifty yeares old, abusing this place of the Gospell: Quinquaginta annos nondum habes, &c. Tertullian (whom Saint Cyprian neuer laid out of his hands almost) is noted to be a Chiliast: also to haue been of Montanus sect. The same did hold also with Iustine, Cyprian, and others, that the Angels fell first for the concupiscence of women: Lib. de habitu mulierum. He defendeth free will of man after the corruption of nature, inclining also to the errour of them, which defend the possibilitie of keeping Gods law. Concerning marriage; Vnum matrimonium (inquit) nouimus, sicut vnum Deum: that is, Wee know (saith he) one marriage, as we know one God; condemning the second marriage, Lib. de Monogam. Diuers other things of like absurditie in him be noted. Iustinus also seemeth to haue inclined vnto the errour of the Chiliasts, of the fall of certaine Angels by women, of free will of man, of possibilitie of keeping the law, and such others. Neither was this our Cyprian, the great scholler of Tertullian, vtterly exempt from the blot of them, who contrarie to the doctrine of the church, did hold with rebaptising of such, as were before baptised of heretikes, whereof speaketh Saint Augustine, misliking the same error of Cyprian, in these words contained in his second booke Contra Cresconium. Cypriani, inquit, laudem ego consequi non valeo, eius multis literis mea scripta non comparo, eius ingenium diligo, eius ore delector, eius charitatem miror, eius martyrium veneror: non accipio quod de baptisandis hæreticis & schismaticis sensit, &c. Upon the which matter there was a great contention betweene the said Cyprian, and Stephan bishop of Rome, as partly afore is noted. Of Augustine himselfe likewise, of Ambrose, Hierome, Chrysostome, the same may be said, that none of them all so clearely passed away, but their peculiar faults and errors went with them, whereof it were too long, and out of our purpose at this present to intreat. And thus much concerning the storie of Cyprian the holy learned martyr of Christ.

Albeit heere is to be noted by the way, touching the life and storie of Cyprian, that this Cyprian was not he whom the narration of Nazianzen speaketh of (as is aboue mentioned) who from art magike was conuerted to be a christian, which Cyprian was a citizen of Antioch, and afterward bishop of the same citie, and was martyred vnder Diocletian: whereas this Cyprian was bishop of Carthage, and died vnder Valerianus, as is said, &c. By the decrees of Gratian, dist. 10. quoniam, it appeareth moreouer that there was also a third Cyprian in the time of Julianus the emperour apostata, long after both these aforenamed: for so giueth the title prefixed before the said distinction, Cyprianus Iuliano imperatori: the distinction beginning: Quoniam idem mediator Dei & hominum homo Christus Iesus, sic actibus proprijs, & dignitatibus distinctis officia potestatis vtriusque discernit, &c. Upon the which distinction the glosse commeth in with these words, saying: that the popedome, and the seat imperiall, haue both one beginning of one, that is, Christ: who was both bishop, and king of kings. And that the said dignities be distincted, albeit the pope notwithstanding hath both the swords in his hand, and may exercise them both some time. And therefore although they be distincted, yet in exercise the one standeth lineally vnder the other, so that the imperiall dignity is subiect vnder the papal dignitie, as the inferiour is subiect vnder the superiour: that as there is one ruler ouer the whole world, which is God; so in the church is one monarch, that is, the pope, to whom the Lord hath committed the power and lawfull right both of the heauenly and terrene dominion. Hæc glossa.

Thus much I thought heere to note by the way, because this distinction is fathered vpon Cyprian, which is false, for this Cyprian was not in the time of Julian, not by two hundred yeares, and so likewise by the other Cyprian, which died martyr vnder Diocletian. Of any Cyprian besides these two we reade not; neither is it credible, that if there were any such Cyprian, he would euer haue written of any such matter, of the difference and mutuall need of christian emperours and christian popes: when as that emperour being an apostata, neither regarded Christ, nor cared for any pope.

About this time, and vnder the same emperour Valerianus suffered also Xistus, or Sixtus, the second of that name, bishop of Rome, who being accused of his aduersaries, to be a christian, was brought with his fiue deacons to the place of execution, where hee with Nemesius and other his deacons were beheaded and suffered martyrdome. Laurence in the same time being also deacon, followed after, complaining to Xistus (as one being grieued) that he might not also suffer with him, but to be secluded as the sonne from the father. To whom the bishop answering againe, declared that within three daies he should follow after. In the meane time he willed him to go home & to distribute his treasures, if he had any, vnto the poore. The iudge belike hearing mention to be made of treasures to be giuen to the poore, and thinking that Laurence had great store of treasure in his custodie, commanded him to bring the same to him, according as in the discourse of his storie heere vnder written more fully may appeare. Which historie, because it is set forth more at large in Prudentius, Ambrose and other writers, and containeth in it more things worthie to bee noted of the reader; we haue therefore with the more diligence heere inserted the more ample description of the same, to the further admiration of his patience, and God his glorie shewed in him.

Now then as order requireth, let vs enter the storie of that most constant and couragious martyr of Christ S. Laurence, whose words and workes deserue to be as fresh and greene in christian hearts, as is the flourishing laurell tree. This thirstie hart longing after the water of life, desirous to passe vnto it through the strait doore of bitter death, when on a time he saw his vigilant shepheard Xistus, led as an harmelesse lambe of harmefull tyrants to his death, cried out with open mouth and heart inuincible, saying; O deere father whither goest thou without the companie of thy deare sonne? Whither hastnest thou, O reuerend priest without thy deacon? Neuer wast thou wont to offer sacrifice without thy minister. What crime is there in me that offendeth thy fatherhood? hast thou proued me vnnaturall? Now trie sweet father whether thou hast chosen a faithfull minister or not? Denest thou vnto him the fellowship of thy blod, to whom thou hast committed the distribution of the Lords blod? See that thy iudgement bee not misliked, whilest thy fortitude is liked and lauded. The abasing of the scholar, is the disgracing of the master. What? Haue we not learned that worthie masters haue obtained most worthie fame by the worthie acts of their disciples and scholars? Finally Abraham sacrificed his onely begotten Isaac; stoned Stephan prepared the way to preaching Peter: euen so father declare thy manifold vertues by me thy sonne. Offer thou him that proffereth himselfe; grant that the bodie of thy scholar may be sacrificed, whose mind with good letters thou hast beautified. These words with teares Saint Laurence vttered, not because his master should suffer, but for that he might not be suffered to taste of deaths cup which hee thirsted after.

Then Xistus to his sonne shaped this answere: I forsake thee not O my sonne, I giue thee to wit, that a sharper conflict remaineth for thee. A feeble and weake old man am I, and therefore run the race of a lighter and easier death: but lustie and yong thou art, and more lustilie, yea more gloriously shalt thou triumph ouer this tyrant; thy time approcheth, cease to weepe and lament, three daies after thou shalt follow me: decent is it that this space of time come betweene the priest and the Leuit. It may not beseeme thee, O sweet pupill, to triumph vnder thy master, lest it bee said hee wanted an helper. Why crauest thou to be partaker with me in my passion? I bequeath vnto thee the whole inheritance. Why requirest thou to enioy my presence? Let weake scholars go before, and the stronger come after, that those without master may get the victorie, which haue no need by master to be gouerned. So Helias left behind him his beloued Heliseus. I yeeld vp into thy hands the succession of my vertues. Such was their contention not vnmeet for so godly a priest, and so zealous a minister, striuing with themselues who should first suffer for the name of Christ Jesus.

In tragicall histories we haue it mentioned, that through ioy and admiration, people clapped their hands, when Pilades named himselfe Orestes; Orestes (as truth it was) affirmed himselfe to be Orestes: Pilades wishing to die for Orestes, Orestes not suffering Pilades to lose his life for his sake, but neither of them might escape death, for both these louers were guiltie of blod, the one committing the fact, the other consenting. But this our Laurence the martyr most constant, was by no meanes enforced to make this proffer, saying only by his ardent zeale and feruent spirit, who thirsting after the cup of martyrdome, had it shortly after filled to the hard brim.

Now let vs draw neere to the fire of martyred Laurence, that our cold hearts may be warmed thereby. The mercilesse tyrant vnderstanding this vertuous Leuit, not onely to bee a minister of the sacraments, but a distributer also of the church riches (whereof mention is made before in the words of Xistus) promised to himselfe a double prey by the apprehension of one silly soule. First with the rake of auarice to scrape to himselfe the treasure of poore christians? then with the fierie forke of tyrannie so to tosse and turmoile them, that they should war wearie of their cruell profession: with furious face and cruell countenance the greedie wolfe demanded where this this deacon Laurence had bestowed the substance of the church. Who craving three daies respite, promised to declare where the treasure might be had. In the meane time he caused a good number of poore christians to be congregated. So when the day of his answere was come, the persecutor strictly charged him to stand to his promise. Then valiant Laurence stretching out his armes ouer the poore, said: These are the pretious treasure of the church, these are the treasure indeed, in whom the faith of Christ raigneth, in whom Jesus Christ hath his mansion place. What more pretious iewels can Christ haue, then those in whom he hath promised to dwell? For so it is written, I was hungrie and ye gaue me to eat: I was thirstie, and yee gaue me to drinke: I was harborlesse, and ye lodged me. And againe: Loke what ye haue done to the least of these, the same haue ye done to me. What greater riches can Christ our master possesse, then the poore people, in whom he loueth to be seene? Oh, what tongue is able to expresse the furie and madnesse of the tyrants heart! Now he stamped, he stared, he ramped, he fared as one out of his wits: his eyes like fire glowed, his mouth like a bore foamed, his teeth like a helhound grinded. Now not a reasonable man, but a roaring lion he might be called. Kindle the fire (he cried) of wood make no spare. Hath this villaine deluded the emperour? Away with him, away with him: whip him with scourges, yerke him with rods, buffet him with fists, braine him with clubs. Jesteth the traytor with the emperour? Pinch him with firie tongs, gird him with burning plates, bring out the strongest chaines, and the fire forks, and the grated bed of iron: on the fire with it, bind the rebell hand and foot, and when the bed is fire hot, on with him: rost him, broile him, tosse him, turne him: on paine of our high displeasure do euery man his office, O ye tormentors. The word was no sooner spoken, but all was done.

The true treasure of Christ his church.

Laurence tormented on the firie gridiron.

After many cruell handlings, this meeke lambe was laid, I will not say on his firie bed of iron, but on his soft bed of downe. So mightily God wrought with his martyr Laurence, so miraculously God tempered his element the fire, not a bed of consuming paine, but a pallet of nourishing rest was it vnto Laurence. Not Laurence, but the emperor might seeme to be tormented: the one broyling in the flesh, the other burning in the heart. When this triumphant martyr had been pressed downe with fire-pikes for a great space, in the mightie Spirit of God he spake to the vanquished tyrant:

The singular patience of Laurence in his paines.

This side is now rosted enough, turne vp ô tyrant great:
Assay whether rosted or raw, thou thinkst the better meat.

O rare and vnaccustomed patience! O faith inuincible! that not only not burnest, but by meanes vnspeakable dost recreat, refresh, stablish, and strengthen those that are burned, afflicted and troubled. And why so mightily comfortest thou the persecuted? Because through thee they beleeue in Gods promises infallible. By thee this glorious martyr ouercommeth his torments, vanquisheth this tyrant, confoundeth his enemies, confirmeth the christians, slæpeth in peace, and raigneth in glorie. The God of might and mercie grant vs grace, by the life of Laurence to learne in Christ to liue, and by his death to learne for Christ to die, Amen.

The martyrdome and end of blessed Laurence.

Such is the wisedome and prouidence of God, that the blood of his deare saints (like good seed) neuer falleth in vaine to the ground, but it bringeth some encrease: so it pleased the Lord to worke at the martyrdome of this holy Laurence, that by the constant confession of this worthie and valiant deacon, a certaine souldier of Rome being therewith compunced and conuerted to the same faith, desired forthwith to be baptised of him: for the which he being called for of the iudge, was scourged, and afterward beheaded. Under the same Valerianus suffered also Dionysius bishop of Alexandria much affliction and banishment, with certaine other brethren: of the which he writeth himselfe, and is alledged in the ecclesiasticall storie of Eusebius, lib. 7. cap. 11. the words whereof tend to this effect. Dionysius with three of his deacons, to wit, Marimus, Faustus, and Cheremon also with a certaine brother of Rome, came to Emilianus then president, who there declared vnto them in circumstance of words how he had signified vnto them the clemencie of his lords and emperors: who had granted them pardon of life, so that they would returne to them, and worship the gods and keepers (as he called them) of their emperie, asking them what answere they would giue him thereunto: trusting as he said that they would not shew themselues ingrateful to the clemencie of them which so gently did exhort them. To this Dionysius answering, said: All men worship not all gods, but diuers men diuers gods; so as euery one hath in himselfe a mind or phantasie to worship. But wee worship not many nor diuers gods, but only that one God, who is the Creator of all things, and hath committed to our lords Valerianus and Galienus the gouernement of their emperie, making to him our prayers incessantly for their prosperous health and continuance. Then the president said: And what hurt is it, but that you may both worship your God, what god soeuer he be, and these our gods also? For you are commanded to worship such gods as all men know to be gods. Dionysius answered, We worship none other, but as we haue said. Emilianus the president said: I see you are vngratefull men, and consider not the benignitie of the emperor, therefore you shall remaine no longer in this citie, but shall be sent out to the parts of Libia, vnto a towne called Cephro: for that place by the commandement of the emperor I haue chosen for you. Neither shall it be lawfull for you, to conuent your assemblies, or to resort, as ye are wont to your buriall places. And if any of you shall be found out of your places whereunto you are appointed, at your perill be it. And thinke not contrarie, but ye shall be watched well enough. Depart therefore to the place as is commanded you. And it followeth more in the said Dionysius speaking of himselfe: And as for me (saith he) although I was sicke, yet he urged me so strictlie to depart, that he would not giue me one daies respit. And how (saith he, writing to Germanus) could I congregat or not congregat any assemblies? And after a few lines it followeth: And yet neither am I altogether absent from the corporall societie of the Lords flocke, but I haue collected them together, which were in the citie, being absent, as though I had been present, absent in bodie, yet present in spirit. And in the same Cephro, a great congregation remained with me, as well of those brethren which followed me out of the citie, as also of them which were remaining there out of Egypt. And there the Lord opened to me the doore of his word, although at the first entrance I was persecuted and stoned among them, yet afterward a great number of them fell from their idols and were conuerted vnto the Lord. And so by vs the word was preached to them which before were infidels: which ministerie after that we had accomplished there, the Lord remoued vs to another place. For Emilianus translated vs from thence to more sharpe and stritter places of Libia, commanded vs to meet all together at the citie Mareota, thinking there to separate vs seuerally into sundrie villages, or thinking rather to take and preuent vs by the way. After we were come thither, it was assigned to me (saith Dionysius) to go to Colluthion, which place I neuer heard of before: which was the more griefe to me, yet some solace it was to me, that the brethren told me it was neere to a citie named Paretonium. For as my being at Cephro got me the acquaintance of many brethren of Egypt, so my hope was that the vicinitie of that place (where I should be) to the citie, might procure the familiaritie and concourse of certaine louing brethren, which would resort and assemble with vs, and so it came to passe, &c.

Dionysius in his epistle Ad Domitium & Dydimum, making mention of them which were afflicted in this persecution of Valerian, recordeth in these words, saying: It were superfluous (saith he) heere to recite the names peculiarly of all our brethren slaine in this persecution, which both were many and to me vnknowne. But this is certaine, that there were men, women, yong men, maidens, old wiues, souldiers, simple innocents, and of all sorts and ages of men. Of whom some with scourgings and fire, some with sword obtained victorie, and got the crowne. Some continued a great time, and yet haue been reserued. In the which number am I reserued hitherto to some other opportune time knowne vnto the Lord, which saith: In the time accepted I haue heard thee, and in the day of saluation I haue helped thee, &c. Now as concerning my selfe in what state I am, if thou desire to know first how I and Caius, and Faustus, Petrus and Paulus, being apprehended by the Centurion, were taken away by certaine of the towne of Mareota, I haue declared to you before. Now I and Caius, and Petrus alone are left heere included in a weak place of Libia, distant the space of three daies iourney from Paretonium, &c. And in processe further hee addeth: In the citie (saith hee) were certaine priuily which visit the brethren: of priests, Marimus, Diostorus, Demetrius, and Lucius. For they which were more notable in the world, Faustinus and Aquila, do wander abroad in Egypt. Of the deacons besides them whom sickenesse hath consumed, Faustus, Eusebius, and Cheremon, are yet aliue. Eusebius hath God raised and stirred vp to minister to the confessors lying in bands, and to burie the bodies of the blessed martyrs, not without great peril. Neither doth the president ceale yet to this day, cruelly murthering such as be brought afore him, some tearing with torments, some imprisoning and keeping in custodie, commanding that no man should come to them, enquiring also who resorted vnto them. Yet notwithstanding God with cheerefulnes and daily resort of the brethren doth comfort the afflicted. Hæc Dionysius.

Martyrs of all sorts and ages.

Concerning these deacons aboue recited, heere is to be noted, that Eusebius afterward was made bishop of Laodicea in Syria. Marimus the priest aforesaid had the ministration of the church of Alexandria after Dionysius. Faustus long after continued in great age, vnto the latter persecution, where he being a verie old man at length was beheaded, and died a martyr.

As touching Dionysius himselfe, thus the stories report, that hee surviuing all these troubles and persecutions, by the prouidence of God, continued after the death of Valerian vnto the twelfth yeare of the raigne of Galienus, which was about the yeare of our Lord two hundred threescore and eight, and so departed in peace in great age, after that he had gouerned the church of Alexandria the space of seuenteene yeares, and before that had taught the schole of the said citie of Alexandria

Pilæus, Malchus, Alexander, a woman, martyrs.

In Cesarea Palestine suffered also the same time, Pilæus, Malchus, and Alexander, the which three dwelling in the countrie, and good men, seeing the valiant courage of the christians, so boldly to venture, and constantly to stand, and patiently to suffer in this persecution, as men being grieued with themselues, began to repent and accuse their so great sluggishnesse, and cowardly negligence, to see others so zealous and valiant, and themselues so cold and faint hearted, in laboring for the crowne of christian martyrdome: first consulting and agreeing with themselues, came to Cesarea, and there stepping to the iudge, declared themselues what they were, and obtained the end they came for, being giuen to the wilde beasts. After which like manner also and in the same citie of Cesarea, a certaine woman whose name Eusebius expresseth not, who had been before of the sect of Marcion was brought before the president, and likewise obtained the same martyrdome. Three hundred martyrs in Carthage. Ex specul. Vincent. lib. 11. cap. 83.

Neither was the citie of Carthage all this while free from the stroke of this persecution, if credit should be giuen to the speculatiue glasse of Vincentius, who citing out of Hugo, recordeth of three hundred martyrs, of which three hundred martyrs the historie saith thus, that the president setting before them coales and incense to do sacrifice, by a lime kilne, which was there neere at hand, offered vnto them this condition, either to set incense to the coales for sacrifice to Iupiter, or else to go into the fornace of lime: wher vpon they all together with a generall motion suddenly rushed into the kilne, and there with the dulling smoke of the lime were smothered. Maxima, Donatilla, Secunda, virgins, martyrs.

In Africa also in the citie of Tuburba, the said Vincentius out of the martyrologe inferreth mention of three constant virgins, Maxima, Donatilla, and Secunda, who in the persecution of this Valerian and Galienus, first had giuen for their drinke vineger and gall, then with scourges were tried, after that vpon the gibbet were tormented, and rubbed with lime: then were scorched vpon the fierie gridiron, at last were cast to the wilde beasts, who being not touched of them, finally with the sword were beheaded. In Simela a citie in Italie, vnder the Alps, one Pontius being there apprehended, by the commandement of Claudius the president, was hanged first vpon the racke, then was cast to the wilde beasts, of whom hee being nothing hurt, was after committed to the fire; and finally neither touched therewith, (if the storie of Vincentius be true) was beheaded by the riuers side, and his bodie throwne into the flood, where immediatly the same houre, the foresaid Claudius with his assistant Anabius, were taken with wicked spirits, by whom they were so miserablie vexed, that they bit off their tongues, and died.

Zenon martyr.

Zenon also bishop of Verona is said also in the same persecution to sustaine martyrdome.

Bergomensis reproued.

Moreouer in the same citie of Alexandria aforesaid, Bergomensis in his eight booke, writing of the storie of Valerianus emperor, maketh mention of Philippus, bishop of the said sea of Alexandria, who (as he saith) was vnder the said Valerian beheaded. But that is not to be found in any approued storie, nor standeth with the truth of time that any such Philippus then was bishop of Alexandria, or any other except only Dionysius. After whom next succeeded Maximus, who remained eighteene yeares, and after him Theonas, &c. So that by the ancient records of old writers it appeareth not, that Philippus or any other of that name was bishop of Alexandria, during this time signified by Bergomensis.

Although in some other latter writers, as Equilinus, Antoninus, and Bergomensis, I find a certaine historie of one Philippus, president of Alexandria about the same time of Valerian and Galienus, elected by the emperour and senat of Rome, to gouerne those quarters, where he was at length conuerted to the christian faith, and after made priest or bishop (as they say) of Alexandria: but that not to be so, the testimonie of ancient writers doth refell. The historie of this Philippus witnessed in our latter chronicles, is this: Philippus being promoted to the presidentship of Alexandria, came downe with his wife Claudia, and his two sons, Auitus, and Sergius, and with his daughter named Eugenia, of the which Eugenia a long historie full of strange and prodigious miracles is written of Antoninus and others, whereof many things I will cut off, and briefly touch the effect of the storie, leauing to the iudgement of the reader the credit of mine authors, as he shall see cause.

Ex Antonin. part. 1. cap. 6.

The storie of Philippus and Eugenia.

Eugenia, Protus, Hiacinthus, conuerted.

This Eugenia daughter of Philippus, being of singular beautie, and diligently brought vp by her parents in the studie of science and learning, was by occasion of hearing christians, reduced and brought vp to christianite, with two other eunuchs her schole-fellowes, called Protus, and Hiacinthus: with whom shee taking counsell, vpon occasion, whether to auoid the danger of persecution, or refusing to marrie with a pagan, vnknowne to her parents and friends did flie away; and because the more boldly she might resort to heare the readings of Helenus then an aged bishop and of others, changed her selfe into mans apparell, and named her selfe Eugenius, vnder the which name she was at length admitted vnto a certaine monasterie, or a societie of christians in the suburbs of Alexandria (although I hardly beleeue that any monasterie of christians was then in the suburbs of Alexandria permitted) where also at the last for her excellencie of learning and vertue, she was made head of the place.

Eugenia leauing her parents, changeth her selfe into mans apparell.

Helenus bishop of Hierapolis.

Here by the way I omit the miracles of the foresaid Helenus, bishop (as the storie saith) of Hieropolis) how he caried burning coales in his lap, and how he aduentured himselfe to go in the burning fire, to refell wicked Zereas a pagan, remaining in the same vnburned. Here also I omit the carefull search of her parents for her, and of the answere of the Pithonisse againe vnto them, that she was taken vp to the heauen among the goddesses. I omit moreouer the miracles done by the said Eugenia, in healing the diseases and sicknesses of such as came to her, &c. The storie proceedeth thus: Among others which were by this Eugenius cured and restored, there was a certaine matrone of Alexandria named Melancia, who after she had vsed the helpe and acquaintance of Eugenius, supposing her to be a man, fell into an inordinate loue, seeking by all meanes how to accomplish the lust of her concupiscence. In so much that in her daily visiting of her, at length shee began secretly to breake her minde, and to entice her to her leaudnesse. Eugenius contrarie exhorted her to vertue and honestie, shewing her the miseries of this life, and the perill of that folly. Melancia seeing that by no meanes she would be allured nor by force drawne to her desire, and fearing moreouer that she in detecting of her would bring her to shame, beginneth first to make an outcrie of Eugenius, declaring how that shee went about corruptly to defloure her, and so presented her accusation before Philippus the president, as well against Eugenius, as also against the rest of that companie. This matter being heard, and the woman well knowne, the crime began to seeme suspicious, and so much the more, because it was obiected against the christians. By reason whereof Eugenius with her fellow christians was now not only in great hatred, but also in danger of present death and destruction. Then Eugenius purging her selfe and her honestie, although with sufficient probation, yet notwithstanding perceiuing that it could take no place, whatsoeuer shee said, and seeing no time now to dissemble any longer, for the danger as well of her owne selfe, as specially of her brethren which troubled her more: desired of the iudge place and time to make manifest to him the truth, and so shewed her selfe what she was, and how she was his daughter, the other to be Protus and Hiacinthus the two eunuchs, her schole-fellowes, vttering moreouer to him and to her brethren the cause of her departing from them. At the narration whereof Philippus her father, and her two brethren comming to the knowledge of her, conceiued no little ioy, in receiuing their Eugenia againe, whom they thought had been lost. No lesse gladnesse was among the people, to see the euidence of the matter so plainly to trie out the truth of the one, and the falsenesse of the other. Wherat the malignant accuser was with double shame confounded, first for her dishonestie falsely cloaked, secondly for the vntruth of her accusation openly detected. Bergomensis addeth moreouer, that the said accuser was stricken presently with lightning. Thus Eugenia trying her honestie to her parents and friends, not only was receiued of them againe, but also by the grace of the Lord working with her, in the space of time did winne them to Christ. Whereby Philippus the father of her by nature, now by grace was begotten of his owne daughter to a more perfect life, and whom once he thought to haue been lost, not only he found againe, but also with her found his owne soule, and his owne life, which before he had lost indeed. This Philippus (saith the storie) was made afterward bishop of Alexandria, and there suffered martyrdome. Concerning whose martyrdome I deme not but it may be true; but that hee was bishop of Alexandria, that cannot be admitted, as is before sufficiently proued out of Eusebius and other ancient historicians.

Philippus martyr.

Likewise it is said, that Eugenia after the martyrdome of her father, returning to Rome with Protus and Hiacinthus, by occasion of conuerting Basilla (who should haue been married to a pagan husband, and was then beheaded) to the christian faith, was assailed with sundrie kinds of death, first being tied to a great stone and cast into Tiber, where she was carried vp from drowning, then put in the hot baths, which were extincted, and she preserued: afterward by famishment in prison, where they say she was fed at the hand of our Sauiour: all which legendarie miracles I leaue to the reader to iudge of them as shall seeme good vnto him. At last the storie saith, shee was with the sword beheaded. Antonin. Bergom. Ado.

Basilla, Eugenias, martyrs.

And because in this present historie mention was made of Helenus, whom Antoninus with his fellowes noteth to be the bishop of Hieropolis, heere is to be vnderstood and obserued by the way, that as Philippus in the foresaid historie is falsely said to be bishop of Alexandria, so likewise vntrue it is that Helenus was bishop of Hieropolis. For by Eusebius it appeareth, lib. 7. cap. 5. alledging the words of Dionysius, that hee was bishop Fructuosus bishop of Tarracona in Spaine with his two deacons Augurius, Eulogius, martyrs. Ex Prudent. perist. eph.

Aurelius Prudentius in his book intituled Peristephanon, inferreth mention of Fructuosus bishop of Tarracona in Spaine, who with his two deacons Augurius and Eulogius, suffered also martyrdome, being burned after six daies imprisonment vnder the foresaid emperors in this persecution. The cause of their punishment was for the profession of Christs name; their iudge and condemner was Emilianus; their imprisonment indured six daies; the kind of death ministred vnto them was fire; wherin they being all together cast with their armes bound behind them, their bands (as Prudentius writeth) were dissolued, their hands vntouched with the fire, and their bodies remaining whole. The charge of this iudge vnto the bishop was this, that he should worship the gods whom the emperor Galienus worshipped. To whom Fructuosus the bishop answering; Nay (said he) I worship no dumbe God of stocks and blocks, whom Galienus doth worship, but I worship the Lord and maker of Galienus, the father and creator of all times, and his only sonne sent downe to vs, of whose flocke I am here the pastor and shepheard. At this word Emilianus answering againe; Nay (saith he) say not thou art, but say thou wilt. And forthwith commanded them to be committed to the fire, where (as is said) their bands and manicles being losed by the fire, they lifted vp their hands to heauen, praising the liuing God to the great admiration of them that stood by, praying also that ẏ element which seemed to flie from them, might worke his full force vpon them, and spéedilie dispatch them; which was after their request obtained. In the meane space as they were in the fire, there was a certaine souldier in the house of Emilianus, who did sée the heauens aboue to open and these foresaid martyrs to enter in the same, which souldier likewise shewed the sight the same time vnto the daughter of Emilianus the president, who beholding the same sight with the souldier, was a present witnesse of the blessednesse of them whom her cruell father had condemned.

Fructuosus and his deacons strengthned in the fire.

The fauour of God toward his martyrs openly declared.

As this godly bishop was preparing to his death (saith Prudentius) the brethren approching to him, brought him drinke, desiring him with much weeping to receiue and drinke with them; but that he refused to doe, requiring them moreouer to refraine their teares. With like readinesse the brethren also were diligent about him to plucke off his shoes and hose as hee was addressing himselfe to the fire: but neither would he suffer any seruants helpe in that wherein he was no lesse willing as able to helpe himselfe. And thus this blessed and fruitfull bishop Fructuosus with his two deacons Augurius and Eulogius, being brought to the fire, witnessed the constant confession of the name of Christ with the shedding of their bloud. Aurel. Prudentius, Ado, Equilinus.

The modestie of Fructuosus.

And thus far continued wicked Valerian in his tyrannie against the saints of Christ. But as all the tyrants before, and oppressors of the christians had their deserued reward at the iust hand of God, which rendreth to euery man according to his works: so this cruell Valerian, after he had raigned with his sonne Galienus the terme of sixe or seuen yéeres, and about two yéeres had afflicted the church of Christ, felt the iust stroke of his hand, whose indignation before he had prouoked, wherof we haue to witnesse Eutropius, Pollio, Sabellicus, Volaterranus: for making his expedition against the Persians, whether by the fraud & treason of some about him, or whether by his owne rashnesse, it is doubtfull: but this is certaine, that hée fell into the hands of his enemies, being about the age of foure score yéeres, where he led his wretched age in a more wretched captiuitie. In so much that Sapores the king of the Persians vsed him (and well worthie) not for his riding sole, but for his riding blocke: for whensoeuer the king should light vpon his horse openlie in the sight of the people, Valerian emperor Quondam, was brought forth in stead of a blocke for the king to tread vpon his backe in going to his horsebacke. And so continued this blockish butcherlie emperour with shame and sport enough vnto his finall end, as witnesseth Letus and Aurelius Victor.

The notable plague of God against Valerian the persecutor.

Gods punishment to be noted.

Albeit Eusebius, in a certaine sermon to the congregation, declareth a more cruell handling of him, affirming that he was slaine, writing in these words: Sed & tu Valeriane, quoniam eandem homicidiorum sæuitiam erga subditos Dei exercuisti, iustum Dei iudicium declarasti, dum captiuus ac vinctus vna cum ipsa purpura ac reliquo imperatorio ornatu abductus, ac tandem a Sapore Persarum rege excoriari iussus, salóque conditus, perpetuum infœlicitatis tuæ trophæum erexisti, &c: that is, And thou Valerian for so much as thou hast exercised the same crudelitie in murthering of the subiects of God, therefore hast prooued vnto vs the righteous iudgement of God, in that thy selfe hast been bound in chaines, and caried away for a captiue slaue with thy gorgeous purple, and thy imperiall attire, and at length also being commanded of Sapores king of the Persians, to be slaine and powdered with salt, hast set vp vnto all men a perpetuall monument of thine owne wretchednesse, &c. Euseb.

Ex Euseb. in sermone ad conuentum Sanctorum. Valerian the persecuting emperor excoriat of the Persians.

The like seueritie of God his terrible iudgement is also to be noted in Claudius his president and minister of his persecutions. Of which Claudius Henricus de Erfordia thus writeth, that he was possessed and vexed of the diuell, in such sort, that he biting off his owne tongue in many small péeces, so ended his life. Erford.

The punishment of God vpon Claudius president to the emperor.

Neither did Galienus the sonne of Valerian after the captiuitie of his father vtterly escape the righteous hand of God: for beside the miserable captiuitie of his father, whom he could not rescue, such portents strange and out of the course of nature, such earthquakes did happen; also such tumults, commotions and rebellions did follow, that Trebellio doth reckon vp to the number of thirtie together, which in sundry places all at one time tooke vpon them to be tyrants and emperors ouer the monarchie of Rome, by the means whereof he was not able to succor his father though he would. Notwithstanding the said Galienus being (as is thought) terrified by the example of his father, did remooue; at least did moderat the persecution stirred vp by the edicts of Valerian his father, directing forth his imperiall proclamation, the tenor wherof proceedeth after this effect, as is to be séene in Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 13. Emperor and Cæsar, Publius Licinius, Galienus, Pius Fortunatus, Augustus, vnto Dionysius, to Pinna, and to Demetrian, and to all other the like bishops. The bountifull benignitie of my gift, I haue willed and commanded to be proclamed through the whole world, to the intent that such which are detained in banishment for discipline sake, may safelie returne home againe from whence they came; and for the same cause I haue heere sent to you the example of my rescript for you to peruse and to enioy, so that no man so hardie to vexe or molest you; and this which you may now lawfullie enioy, hath been long since by me granted. And therefore for your more warrant in the same, I haue committed the exemplar heereof to the custodie of Aurelianus Cirenius my chiefe steward, where you may fet the copie to see at your pleasure.

Galienus giueth ouer his persecution.

Peace granted to the church.

Euseb. lib. 7. cap. 13.

This mandat aboue prefixed did Galienus send to Dionysius Alexandrinus, and other bishops as is premised. Another rescript also the said emperor sent to other christian bishops, permitting to them full libertie to receiue againe their wonted places where they were wont to associat together, called of them Cœmiteria.

Another grant of Galienus vnto the christian bishops.

Anno 263 Marinus martyr.

By this it may appeare that some peace was grãted then vnder this Galienus to the church of Christ: albeit not so, but that some there were which suffered, of whom was one Marinus mentioned in Eusebius lib. 7. This Marinus being a warrior and a noble man in Cesarea, stood for the dignitie of a certaine order, which by a order of course was next to fall vpon him by right, had not the enuious ambition of him that should follow next after him, supplanted him both of office and life: for he accused him to be a christian, and therefore said that he was not to be admitted vnto their offices, which was against their religion. Whereupon Achaius then being iudge examined him of his faith, who finding him to be a christian in déede, and constantly to stand to his profession, gaue him three houres to deliberat and aduise with himself. There was the same time in Cesarea a bishop named Theotechnus, otherwise called Theodictus, who perceiuing him to stand in doubtfull deliberation and perplexitie in himselfe, tooke him by the hand and brought him into the house or church of the christians, laying before him a sword (which he had vnder his cloke for the same purpose) and a booke of the new testament, and so willed him to take his frée choice which of them both he would prefer. The souldier immediatlie without delay ran to the booke of the gospell, taking that before the sword. And thus he being animated by the bishop, presented himselfe boldlie before the iudge, by whose sentence he was beheaded, and died a martyr. Eusebius ibidem.

Whose bodie being dead, one Asyrius a noble senator of Rome, and a man very wealthie among the chiefe of that order (who in the same time was there present at his martyrdome) tooke vp and bare vpon his owne shoulders, wrapping it in a rich and sumptuous weed, and so honorablie committed it to the buriall. Of which Asyrius the said author writeth moreouer this storie: how that in the foresaid citie of Cesarea, the Gentils vsed there of an ancient custome to offer vp a certaine sacrifice by a fountaine side, the which sacrifice by the working of the diuell was wont suddenly to vanquish out of their eies, to the great admiration of the inhabiters by. Asyrius séeing this, and pitying the miserable error of the simple people, lifting vp his eies to heauen, made his prayer to almightie God in the name of Christ, that the people might not be seduced of the diuell any longer: by the vertue of whose prayer the sacrifice was séene to swim in the water of the fountaine, and so the strange wonder of that sight was taken away, and no such matter could be there wrought any more. And

A miracle noted in Euseb. lib.7. cap.18.

And because mention is made here of Cesarea, there followeth in the next chapter of the same author a strange miracle if it be true, which he there reporteth; how that out of the same citie was the woman which in the gospell came to our saviour, and was healed of her bloudie issue, her house being in the citie of Cesarea. Before the dore therof was set vp a certaine pillar of stone, and vpon the pillar an image was made of brasse, of a woman mékelie kneeling on her knees, and holding vp her hands as one that had some suit. Against the which there was another image also of a man proportioned of the same mettall, cunningly ingraven in a short sémelie vesture, and stretching forth his hand to the woman. At the foote of which pillar grew vp a certaine herbe of a strange kind, but of a more strange operation, which growing vp to the hem of his vesture, and once touching the same, is said to haue such vertue, that it was able to cure al maner of diseases. This picture of the man (they say) represented the image of Christ. The historie is written in Eusebius, as is said, the credit whereof I referre to the reader, whether he will thinke it true or false. If he thinke it false, yet I haue shewed him mine author: if he thinke it true, then must he thinke withall that this miraculous operation of the herbe proceéded neither by the vertue of the picture, nor by the prayer of the other, being both dumbe pictures, and ingraven no doubt at that time by the hand of infidels, but to be wrought by some secret permission of God his wisdome, either to reduce the infidels at that time to the beléefe of the storie, or to admonish the christians to consider with themselues what strength & health was to be looked for only of Christ and no other aduocat, séeing the dumbe picture ingraven in brasse, gaue his efficacy to a poore herbe to cure so many diseases. This picture (saith Eusebius) remained also to his time which was vnder Constantinus the great.

A miraculous operation of an herbe touching the hem of Christs picture to heale diseases.

No vertue to be ascribed to pictures.

As touching the line and order of the Roman bishops hitherto intermitted, after the martyrdome of Xistus aboue specified, the gouernment of that church was committed next to one Dionysius, about the yéere of our Lord two hundred sixtie and six, who continued in the same the space of nine yéeres, as Eusebius saith; as Damasus recordeth but onlie fiue yéeres and two moneths. Of his decretall epistles because sufficient hath been said before concerning that matter, I omit to speake. After whom succeéded Felix in the first yéere of Probus the emperor, about the yéere of our Lord two hundred and eightie, who gouerned that church fiue yeres, and died as Platina saith a martyr. After him followed Eutychianus, and then Gaius, both martyrs, as the histories of some doe record.

Dionysius bishop of Rome. Anno 266.

Gaius bishop of Rome and martyr.

About the time of these bishops liued Theodorus bishop of Neocesarea, who is otherwise called Gregorius Magnus, whom also Nicephorus for his miracles calleth Θαυματουργὸν.

Thus Galienus the foresaid emperor raigned as is declared, with his father Valerian seuen yéeres, after whose captiuitie he ruled the monarchie alone about nine yéeres, with some peace and quietnesse granted to the church.

The daies of this Galienus being expired, followed Claudius a quiet emperor, as most stories doe record. Although Vincentius affirmeth that he was a mouer of persecution against the christians, and maketh mention of two hundred sixtie and two martyrs, which in his time did suffer; but because no such record remaineth to be found in Eusebius, who would not haue omitted some memoriall thereof if it had been true, therefore I refer the same to the frée iudgement of the reader to find such credit as it may. This Claudius raigned but two yéeres, after whom came Quintilianus, his brother next emperor, and a quiet prince, who continued but only seuentéene daies, and had to his successor Aurelianus, vnder whom Orosius in his seuenth booke doth number the ninth persecution against the christians.

The ninth persecution. Aurelianus emperour.

HItherto from the captiuitie of Valerian the church of Christ was in some quietnesse till the death of Quintilianus, as hath been declared: after whom Aurelianus the next successor possessed the crowne, who in the first beginning of his raigne (after the common maner of all princes) shewed himselfe a prince moderat and discréet, much worthie of commendation, if his good beginning had continued in a constant course agréeing to the same. Of nature hee was seuere and rigorous in correcting, dissolute in maners, in so much that it was said of him in a vulgar prouerbe, that he was a good physician, sauing that he gaue too bitter medicines. This emperor being sicke, neuer sent for physician, but cured himselfe with abstinence, and as his beginning was not vnfruitfull to the commonwealth, so neither was he any great disturber of the christians, whom he did not only tolerat in their religion, but also in their councell, & being the same time assembled at Antioch, séemed not to be against them. Notwithstanding in continuance of time through sinister motion and instigation of certaine about him (as commonlie such are neuer absent in all places from the eares of princes) his nature somewhat inclinable to seueritie, was altered to a plaine tyrannie, which tyrannie first he shewed beginning with the death of his owne sisters sonne, as witnesseth Eutropius. After that he proceéded either to moone, or at least to purpose persecution against the christians; albeit that wicked purpose of the emperor, the mercifull working of God his hand did soone ouerthrow. For as the edict or proclamation should haue been denounced for the persecuting of the christians, and the emperor now readie to subscribe the edict with his hand, the mightie stroke of the hand of the Lord suddenly from aboue did stop his purpose, binding (as a man might say) the emperors hands behind him, declaring (as Eusebius saith) to all men, how there is no power to worke any violence against the seruants of God, vnlesse his permission do suffer them, and giue them leaue. Eusebius lib.7. cap.30. Eutropius and Aurelius affirme, that as the said Aurelianus was purposing to raise persecution against vs, he was suddenly terrified with lightning, and so stopped from his wicked tyrannie. Not long after about the fift or sixt yéere of his raigne, he was slaine betweene Bisance and Heraclea, in the yéere of our Lord two hundred seuentie and eight. Thus Aurelianus rather intended then moued persecution. Neither is there any more then this found concerning this persecution in ancient histories and records of the church: wherefore I marueil the more that Vincentius collecting out of the martyrologies, hath comprehended such a great catalogue of so many martyrs, which in France and in Italy (saith he) suffered death and torments vnder this emperor Aurelianus, whereunto Orosius also séemeth to agrée in numbring this to be the ninth persecution vnder the said Aurelian.

A notable example of Gods hand stopping persecution.

The death of Aurelianus. Anno 276

Next after Aurelianus the succession of the emperie fell to Publius Annius Tacitus, who raigned but sixe moneths, him succeéded his brother Florianus, who raigned but three score daies, and after him followed Marcus Aurelius, surnamed Probus. Of whom more hereafter (God willing) shall appeare.

Ex Eutropio; Tacitus emperour. Florianus emperour.

In the meane time within the compasse of these emperors falleth in a storie recorded of Eusebius & not vnworthie here to be noted, whereby to vnderstand the faithfull diligence of good ministers, what good it may doe in a commonwealth.

Mention is made before of Eusebius the deacon of Dionysius, whom God stirred vp to visit and comfort the saints that were in prison and bands, & to burie the bodies of the blessed martyrs departed, not without great perill of his owne life, and after was made bishop (as is said) of Laodicea. But before he came to Laodicea to be bishop there, it chanced the said Eusebius remaining as yet at Alexandria, the citie to be besieged of the Romans, Pyrrhus being there captaine. In which siege halfe of the citie did hold with the Romans, the other halfe withstood them. In that part which went with the Roman captaine was Eusebius, being also in great fauor with the captaine for his worthie fidelitie and seruice shewed: with the other halfe that resisted the Romans, was Anatholius gouernor or moderator then of the schole of Alexandria, who also was bishop after the said Eusebius, of Laodicea. This Anatholius perceiuing the citizens to be in miserable distresse of famine and destruction, by reason of penurie and lacke of sustenance, sendeth to Eusebius being then with the Romans, & certifieth him of the lamentable penurie and perill of the citie, instructing him moreouer what to doe in the matter. Eusebius vnderstanding the case, repaireth to the captaine, desiring of him so much fauour, that so many as would flie out of the city from their enemies, might be licenced to escape and freélie to passe; which was to him eftsoones granted. As Eusebius was thus labouring with the captaine, on the other side Anatholius for his part laboured with the citizens, mouing them to assemble together, and persuading them to giue themselues ouer, in yéelding to the force and might of the Romans. But when the citizens could not abide the hearing thereof; Yet (said Anatholius) this I trust you will be contented, if I shall counsel you in this miserable lacke of things to auoid out of your citie all such superfluities and vnnecessarie impediments vnto you, as old women, young children, aged men, with such other as be féeble and impotent, and not to suffer them here to perish with famine, whose presence can do no stead to you if they die, and lesse if they liue, for spending the victuals which otherwise might serue them that be more able to defend the citie. The senat hearing this sentence, and vnderstanding moreouer the grant of the captaine, promising them their safetie, were well consenting thereunto. Then Anatholius hauing a speciall care to them that belonged to the church of Christ, calleth them together with the rest of the multitude, and perswading them what they should do, and what had been obtained for them, caused them to void the citie, and not onlie them, but also a great number of other mo, who perswaded by him vnder that pretense, changing themselues in womens apparell, or feining some impotencie, so escaped out of the citie. At whose comming out, Eusebius on the other side was readie to receiue them, and refreshed their hungrie and pined bodies, whereby not only they, but the whole citie of Alexandria was preserued from destruction. Marcus Aurelius Probus emperor. Peace in the church.

The next emperour to Florianus (as is said) was Marcus Aurelius Probus a prince both wise and vertuous, and no lesse valiant in martiall affaires, as fortunat in the successe of the same. During his time we read of no persecution greatly stirring in the church but much quietnesse, as well in matters of religion, as also in the commonwealth. In so much that after his great and many victories, such peace insued, that his saying was, there needed no more souldiers, seeing there were no more enemies to the commonwealth to fight against. It was his saying also, that his souldiers need not to spend corne and victuall, except they laboured to serue the commonwealth. And for the same cause he caused his souldiers to be set aworke about certain mountaines in Smyrna and in Pellia to be planted with vines, and not so much as in winter suffered them to be at rest, therefore by them at length he was slaine, after he had raigned the space of fiue yéeres and foure moneths, in the yéere of our Lord two hundred eightie and foure: Eutrop.

Carus with his two sonnes Carinus and Numerianus succéeded next after Probus in the empire, the raigne of which emperors continued in all but three yéeres. Of the which three first Carus, warring against the Persians, was slaine with lightning. Of Numerianus his sonne, being with his father in his warres against the Persians, we find much commendation in Eutropius, Vopiscus, and other writers, which testified of him to be a valiant warriour, an eloquent orator, as appeared by his declamations and writings sent to the senat; thirdlie, to be an excellent poet. This Numerianus sorrowing and lamenting for the death of his father, through immoderat weeping fell into a great sorenesse of his eies, by reason whereof he keeping close, was slaine not long after of his father in law, named Aper, who traitorously aspiring to the empire, dissembled his death with a false excuse to the people, asking for him, saying, for the paine of his eies he kept in from the wind and weather, till at length by the stinch of his bodie being carried about, his death was vttered.

Correction of a certaine place of Eutropius, ex editione Frobeniana.

In the life of this emperour Carus aforesaid, written by Eutropius in the latter edition set forth by Frobenius, I find (which in other editions of Eutropius doth not appeare) that Numerianus the sonne of this Carus, was he that slue Babylas the holy martyr, whose historie before we haue comprehended. But that seemeth not to be like, both by the narration of Chrysostom, and also for that Vrspergensis declaring the same historie, and in the same words, as it is in Eutropius, saith that it was Cyrillus whom Numerianus killed, the storie whereof is this: What time Carus the emperour in his iourney going toward the Persians, remained at Antioch, Numerianus his son would enter into the church of the christians, to view and behold their mysteries. But Cyrillus their bishop would in no wise suffer him to enter into the church, saying that it was not lawfull for him to see the mysteries of God, who was polluted with sacrifices of idols. Numerianus full of indignation at the hearing of these words, not suffering that repulse at the hands of Cyrillus, in his furie did slay the godly martyr. And therefore iustly (as it seemed) was he himselfe slaine afterward by the hands of Aper.

Ex Chron. Vrspergen.

Thus Carus with his sonne Numerianus being slaine in the east parts, as is declared, Carinus the other sonne raigned alone in Italie, where he ouercame Sabinus straining for the empire, and raigned there with much wickednesse, till the returning home of the armie againe to the Persians, who then set vp Diocletian to be emperor, by whom the foresaid Carinus for the wickednesse of his life, being forsaken of his host, was ouercome, and at length slaine with the hand of the tribune, whose wife before he had defloured. Thus Carus with his two sonnes, Numerianus and Carinus, ended their liues, whose raigne continued not aboue three yéeres.

Adulterie punished.

All this meane space we read of no great persecution stirring in the church of Christ, but was in meane quiet state and tranquillitie, vnto the nintenth yéere of the raigne of Diocletian, so that in counting the time from the latter end of Valerian, vnto this aforesaid yéere of Diocletian, the peace of the church which God gaue to his people, séemeth to continue aboue foure and fortie yéeres. During the which time of peace and tranquillitie, the church of the Lord did mightily increase and florish, so that the more bodies it lost by persecution, the more honor and reuerence it won daily among the Gentiles in all quarters, both Greeks and barbarous, in so much that (as Eusebius in his seuenth booke describeth) amongst the emperours themselues, diuers there were which not onely bare singular good will and fauor to them of our profession, but also did commit vnto them offices and regiments ouer countries and nations, so well were they affected to our doctrine, that they priuileged the same with libertie and indemnitie. What needeth to speake of them which not onely liued vnder the emperors in libertie, but also were familiar in the court with the princes themselues, intertained with great honour and speciall fauour beyond the other seruitors of the court? As was Dorotheus with his wife, children, and whole familie, highly accepted and aduanced in the palace of the emperour, also Gorgonius in like maner with diuers others more, who for their doctrine & learning which they professed, were with their princes in great estimation. In like reuerence also were the bishops of cities and diocesses, with the presidents and rulers where they liued: who not onely suffered them to liue in peace, but also had them in great price and regard, so long as they kept themselues vpright, and continued in God his fauor. Who is able to number at that time the mightie and innumerable multitudes and congregations assembling together in euery citie, and the notable concourses of such as daily flocked to the common oratories to pray? For the which cause they being not able to be contained in their old houses, had large and great churches new builded from the foundation, for them to frequent together. In such increasement (saith Eusebius) by processe of time did the church of Christ grow and shoot vp daily more and more, prospering and spreading through all quarters, which neither enuie of men could infringe, nor any diuell could inchant, neither the craftie policie of mans wit could supplant, so long as the protection of God his heauenly arme went with his people, keeping them in good order, according to the rule of christian life.

The peaceable state of the church described.

But as commonly the nature of all men, being of it selfe vnrulie and vntoward, alwaies seeketh and desireth prosperitie, and yet can neuer well vse prosperitie; alwaies would haue peace, and yet hauing peace alwaies abuseth the same: so here likewise it happened with these men, which through this so great libertie and prosperitie of life began to degenerat and languish vnto idlenesse and delicacie, and one to worke spite and contumelie against another, striuing and contending amongst themselues for euery occasion, with railing words after most despitefull maner: bishops against bishops, and people against people, mouing hatred and sedition one against another, besides also cursed hypocrisie and simulation with all extremitie increasing more and more. By reason whereof the iudgement of God after his wonted maner (whilest yet the congregation began to multiplie) began by a little and a little to visit our men with persecution, falling first vpon our brethren which were abrode in warfare, but when that touched the other nothing or very little, neither did they seeke to appease Gods wrath, and call for his mercie, but wickedlie thinking with our selues, that God neither regarded nor would visit our transgressions, we heaped our iniquities daily more and more one vpon another, and they which seemed to be our pastors, refusing the rule of pietie, were inflamed with mutuall contentions one against another. And thus whilest they were giuen onely to the study of contentions, threatnings, emulations, mutuall hatred, and discord, euerie man seeking his owne ambition, and persecuting one another after the manner of tyrannie: then, then, I say, the Lord according to the voice of Jeremie tooke away the beautie of the daughter of Sion, and the glorie of Israel fell downe from heauen, neither did he remember the footstoole of his feet in the day of his wrath. And the Lord ouerturned all the comelie ornaments of Israel, and destroyed all her gorgious buildings, and according to the saying of the psalme, subuerted and extinguished the testament of his seruant, and prophaned his sanctuarie in destruction of his churches, and in laying waste the buildings thereof, so that all passengers spoiling the multitude of the people, they were made an obloquie to all the dwellers about. For he hath exalted the strength of his enemies, and turned away the helpe of his sword from her, nor aided her in the battell, but ceased from the purging of her and her seat. He stroke downe to the ground, and diminished her daies, and ouer all this powred vpon her confusion. All these things were fulfilled vpon vs, when we saw the temples raced from the top to the ground, and the sacred scriptures to be burnt in the open market place, and the pastors of the church to hide themselues some here, some there, some other taken prisoners with great shame, were mocked of their enemies, when also according to the saying of the prophet in another place: Contempt was powred out vpon the princes, and they caused to goe out of the way, and not to keepe the straight path.

Corruption through much peace and prosperitie crept into the church.

Hatred and debate among the churchmen.

The wrath of God towards his people.

The tenth persecution.

The tenth persecution.

By reason whereof (the wrath of God being kindled against his church) insued the tenth and last persecution against the christians, so horrible and grieuous, that maketh the pen almost to tremble to write vpon it; so tedious that neuer was any persecution before or since comparable to it for the time it continued, lacking the space of ten yéeres together. This persecution although it passed through the hands of diuers tyrants & workers more then one or two, yet principally it beareth the name of Diocletian who was emperor as is aboue noted, next after Carus and Numerianus. This Diocletian euer hauing an ambitious mind, aspired greatlie to be emperour. To whom Prisca his concubine said, that first he should kill a wild bore before he should be emperor. He taking effect at these words, vsed much with hands to kill wild bores: but seeing no successe to come thereof, vsed this prouerbe: Ego apros occido, alius pulpamento fruitur, that is: I kill the bores, but others do eat the flesh. At length the said Diocletian being nominated to be emperor, and seeing Aper (who had killed Numerianus the emperour) perour) standing thereby sware to the souldiers that Numerianus was wrongfully killed, and forthwith running vpon Aper with his sword, slue him: Vopisc. After this he being stablished in the empire, and seeing on euery side diuers and sundrie commotions rising vp against him, which he was not well able himselfe to sustaine, in the first beginning of his raigne he chooseth for his collegue Maximianus surnamed Herculius, father of Maxentius. Which two emperors, because of diuers warres that rose in many prouinces, chose to them two other noble men, Galerius and Constantius, whom they called Cesars. Of whom Galerius was sent into the east parts against the Persians. Constantius was sent ouer to Britane to this our countrie of England to recouer the tribute, where he tooke to wife Helena the daughter of king Coill, which was a maiden excelling in beautie, and no lesse famoustie brought vp in the studie of learning, of whom was borne Constantinus the great.

All this while hitherto no persecution was yet stirred of these foure princes against the church of Christ, but quietly and moderately they gouerned the common wealth; wherefore accordingly God prospered their doings & affaires, & gaue them great victories, Diocletian in Egypt, Maximiam in Aphrike and in France, Galerius in Persia, Constantius in England and in France also. By reason of which victories, Diocletian and Maximian puft vp in pride, ordained a solemne triumph at Rome, after which triumph Diocletian gaue commandement that he would be worshipped as God, saying, that he was brother to the sunne and moone, and adorning his shoes with gold and pretious stones, commanded the people to kisse his feet.

Pryde in Diocletian.

And not long after by the iudgement of God, for certaine enormities vsed in the church, aboue touched, began the great and grieuous persecution of the christians, mooued by the ragious crueltie of Diocletian, which was about the nineteenth yeere of his raigne, who in the moneth of March, when the feast of Easter was nie at hand, commanded all the churches of the christians to be spoiled and cast to the earth, and the bookes of holy scripture to be burned.

Cruelties followeth pride.

Anno 308

Persecution against the christians.

Thus most violent edicts and proclamations were set forth, for the ouerthrowing, as is said, of the christians temples throughout all the Romane empire. Neither did there want in the officers any cruell execution of the same proclamations. For their temples were defaced euen when they celebrated the feast of Easter: Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 2. And this was the first edict giuen out by Diocletian. The next proclamation that came forth, was for the burning of the bookes of the holy scripture; which thing was done in the open market place as before: then next vnto that were edicts giuen forth for the displacing of such as were magistrats, and that with great ignominie, and all other whatsoeuer bare any office; imprisoning such as were of the common sort, if they would not abiure christianitie, and subscribe to the heathen religion: Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 3. & Nicephorus lib. 7. cap. 4. Zonoras also in his second tome. And these were the beginning of the christians euils.

Bookes of the scriptures burned.

Christian magistrats displaced.

Christian subiects imprisoned Euseb. lib 8. c. 3. Nicepho. lib. 7. cap. 4. Zonoras tom. 2.

It was not long after but that new edicts were sent forth, nothing for their crueltie inferiour to the first: for the casting of the elders and bishops into prison, and then constraining them with sundrie kinds of punishments, to offer vnto their idols. By reason whereof insued a great persecution amongst the gouernours of the church, amongst whom many stood manfully, passing through many exceeding bitter torments, neither were ouercome therewith, being tormented and examined diuers of them diuerslie, some scourged all their bodies ouer with whips and scourges, some with racks, raisings of the flesh intolerable were cruciated; some one way, some another way put to death. Some againe violently were drawne to the impure sacrifice, and as though they had sacrificed, when indeed they did not, were let goe. Other some neither comming at all to their altars, nor touching any peece of their sacrifices, yet were borne in hand of them that stood by, that they had sacrificed, and so suffering that false infamation of their enemies, quietly went away. Other as dead men were caried and cast away, being but halfe dead. Some they cast downe vpon the pauement, and trailing them a great space by the legs, made the people beleeue that they had sacrificed. Furthermore, other there were which stoutly withstood them, affirming with a loud voice that they had done no such sacrifice. Of whom some said they were christians, and gloried in the profession of that name: some cried saying, that neither they had, nor would euer be partakers of that idolatrie: and those being bufketed on the face and mouth with the hands of the souldiers, were made to hold their peace, and so thrust out with violence. And if the saints did seeme ner so little to doe what the enemies would haue them, they were made much of: albeit all this purpose of the aduersarie did nothing preuaile against the holy and constant seruants of Christ. Notwithstanding, of the weake sort innumerable there were, which for feare and infirmitie fell and gaue ouer, euen at the first brunt.

Bishops and elders constrained with torments to sacrifice.

The noble courage and constancie of a christian martyr.

At the first comming downe of these edicts into Nicomedia, there chanced a deed to be done much worthie of memorie, of a christian, being a noble man borne, which mooued by the zeale of God, after the proclamation made at Nicomedia was set vp, by and by ran and tooke downe the same, and openly tare and rent it in peeces, not fearing the presence of the two emperours, then being in the citie. For which act he was put to a most bitter death, which death he with great faith and constancie endured euen to the last gaspe. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 3. & 5.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 3. 4.

After this the furious rage of the malignant emperours, being let lose against the saints of Christ, proceeded more and more, making hauoke of Gods people throughout all quarters of the world. First Diocletian (which had purposed with himselfe to subuert the whole christian religion, executed his tyrannie in the east) and Maximianus in the west. But wilie Diocletian began very subtillie, for he put the matter first in practise in his owne campe, among whom the marshall of the field, as Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 4. affirmeth, put the christian souldiers to this choice, whether they would obay the emperors commandement in that maner of sacrifie he commanded, and so both to keepe their offices, and lead their bands, or else to lay away from them their armor and weapons. Whereunto the christian men couragiouslie answered, that they were not onelie readie to lay away their armour and weapons, but also to suffer death if it should with tyrannie be inforced vnto them, rather then they would obay the wicked decrees and commandements of the emperor.

Persecution first beginning in the emperors campe.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 4.

A notable religion and faith in souldiers.

There might a man haue seene very many which were desirous to liue a simple and poore life, and which regarded no estimation and honour in comparison of true pietie and godlines. And this was no more but a subtill and wilie flatterie in the beginning, to offer them to be at their owne libertie, whether they would willingly abiure their profession or not; as also this was another, that in the beginning of the persecution, there were but a few tormented with punishment, but afterward by little and little he began more manifestlie to braik out into persecution. It can hardly be expressed with words what number of martyrs, and what bloud was shed through all cities and regions for the name of Christ. Eusebius in his eight booke and seuenth chapter saith, that he himselfe knew the worthie martyrs that were in Palestina. But in Tyre of Phenicia he declareth in the same a maruellous martyrdome made, where certaine christians being giuen to most cruell wild beasts, were preserued without hurt of them, to the great admiration of the beholders; and those lions, beares and libards (kept hungry for that purpose) had no desire to deuoure them, which notwithstanding most vehementlie raged against those by whom they were brought into the stage, & standing as they thought without danger of them, such were first deuoured. But the christian martyrs because they could not bee hurt of the beasts, being slaine with the sword, were afterward throwne into the sea. At that time was martyred the bishop of Sidon. But Syluanus the bishop of Gazensis with nine and thirtie others were slaine in the mettall mines of Phenicia. Pamphilus the elder of Cesarea, being the glorie of that congregation, died a most worthie martyr, whose both life and most commendable martyrdome Eusebius oftentimes declareth in his eight booke and thirteenth chapter, in so much that he hath written the same in a booke by it selfe. In Syria all the chiefe teachers of the congregation were first committed to prison, as a most heauie and cruell spectacle to behold, as also the bishops, elders, and deacons, which all were esteemed as menquillers, and perpetrators of most wicked facts: Eusebius lib. 8. cap. 6. After that we reade of another, whose name was Tirannion, which was made meat for the fishes of the sea, and of Zenobius which was a very good physician, which also was slaine with brickbats in the same place: Eusebius lib. 8. cap. 13.

Furthermore he maketh mention in the same place of others which were not tormented to death, but euery day terrified and feared without ceasing: of some others that were brought to the sacrifices and commanded to doe sacrifice, which would rather thrust their right hand into the fire, then to touch the prophane or wicked sacrifice; also of some others that before they were apprehended, would cast downe themselues from steepe places, lest that being taken they should commit any thing against their profession. Also of two virgins very faire and proper, with their mother also which had studiously brought them vp, euen from their infancie in all godlinesse, being long sought for, and at the last found, and strictlie kept by their keepers, whilest they made their excuse to do that which nature required, threw themselues downe headlong into a riuer: also of other two young maidens being sisters, and of a worshipfull flocke, indued with many goodly vertues, which were cast of the persecutors into the sea: and these things were done at Antioch, as Eusebius in his eight book and thirteenth chapter affirmeth. But Syluanus the bishop of Emilia the notable martyr together with certaine others, were throwne to the wild beasts: Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

paſſing and sharper torments, whereof I will hereafter make mention: Euſebius ibid. So outragious was the beginning of the perſecution which the emperor made in Nicomedia in Bithynia, as before is ſaid, that he refrained not from the ſlaughter of the children of emperors, neither yet from ſlaughter of the moſt chiefe princes of his court, who a little before he made as much of as if they had been his owne children. Such another was Peter, which among diuers and ſundrie torments (among whom he being naked was licked vp, his whole bodie being beaten with whips and drone, that a man might ſée the bare bones, and after they had mingled vinegar and ſalt together, they powred it vpon the moſt tender parts of his bodie, & laſtly roſted at a ſoft fire, as a man would roſt fleſh to eate) as a victorious martyr ended his life. Dorotheus and Gorgonius being in great authoritie and office vnder the emperour, after diuers torments were ſtrangled with a halter, which both being of the priuie chamber to him, when they ſaw and beheld the grieuous puniſhment of Peter their houſhold companion: Wherefore (ſaid they) O emperor, do you puniſh in Peter that opinion which is in all vs? Why is that accounted in him an offence, that all we confeſſe? We are of that faith, religion, and iudgement that he is of. Therefore he commanded them to be brought forth, and almoſt with like paines to bee tormented as Peter was, and afterwards hanged: Euſeb. Rufin. lib. 8. cap. 6. After whom Anthimus the biſhop of Nicomedia, after he had made a notable confeſſion, and bringing with him a great company of martyrs, was beheaded. Theſe men being thus diſpatched, the emperour vainely thought that he might cauſe the reſt to doe what euer him liſted. To this end came Lucianus the elder of the congregation of Antioch, and was martyred, after he had made his apologie before the emperor: Euſebius lib. 8. cap. 13.

Hermanus alſo, that monſter, cauſed Serena the wife of Diocleſian the emperor, to be martyred for the chriſtian religion: ſo much did the rage of perſecution vtterly forget all naturall affects. Other martyrs of Nicomedia doth Nicephorus in his ſeuenth booke & fourteenth chapter recite, as Eulampius and Eulampia, Agape, Irene, Chionia, & Anaſtaſia, vnder Illyricus chiefe officer, were bound hand & foote to a poſt & burnt: Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 66. And alſo Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 6. mentioneth ſuch another like matter full of horror & griefe. There aſſembled together in their temple many chriſtian men to celebrate the memorie of the natiuitie of Chriſt, of euery age and ſort ſome. There Maximianus thinking to haue been giuen a very fit occaſion to execute his tyrannie vpon the poore chriſtians, ſent thither ſuch as ſhould burne the temple, the doores being ſhut & cloſed round about; thither come they with fire, but firſt they commanded the crier with a loud voice to crie, that Whoſoeuer would haue life, ſhuld come out of the temple, and doe ſacrifice vpon the next altar they came to of Jupiter; & vnleſſe they would doe this, they ſhould all be burnt with the temple. Then one ſtepping vp in the temple, anſwered in the name of all the reſt with great courage & boldnes of mind, that they were all chriſtians, & beléeued that Chriſt was their only God and king, & that they would doe ſacrifice to him, with his Father & holy ghoſt, & that they were now all readie to offer vnto him. With theſe words the fire was kindled & compaſſed about the temple, & there were burnt of men, women, and children certaine thouſands. There were alſo in Arabia very many martyrs ſlaine with ares, as Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 12. There was in Phrygia a city, vnto which the emperor ſent his edicts that they ſhould doe ſacrifice to the gods, and worſhip idols; all which citizens, the maior himſelfe, the queſtor and chiefe captaine confeſſed that they were all chriſtians. The citie vpon this was beſieged and ſet on fire, and all the people: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 11. In Melitina a region of Armenia, the biſhops and elders were caſt in priſon: Euſeb. eodem cap. 6. In Arabyace a region néere adioining to Armenia Euſtratius was martyred, as Nicephorus declareth, lib. 7. cap. 14. This Euſtratius was that countrie man borne, and very skilfull in the Gréeke tongue, executing by the emperors commandement the shiriffes office at Licia in the eaſt, which alſo did execution there vpon the chriſtians, and was a ſcribe of great eſtimation, called Ordinis ducalis. This man beholding the maruellous conſtancie of the martyrs, thirſted with the deſire of martyrdome, for that he had priuily learned the chriſtian religion. Therefore he not abiding for other accuſers, detected himſelfe, & worthilie profeſſed that he was a chriſtian, openly execrating the madnes and vanitie of the wicked ethniks. He therefore being carried away, was tied vp, being firſt moſt bitterly beaten. After that hee was parched with fire being put vnto his bowels, & then baſted with ſalt & vinegar, and laſtly ſo ſcorched and bemangled with the ſhards of sharpe and cutting ſhels, that his whole bodie ſeemed to be all one continuall wound; howbeit, by Gods great goodnes afterward, it was reſtored to the firſt integritie. After this he was carried away to Sebaſtia, where, with his companion Dieſkes he was burnt. At that time alſo ſuffered Eugenius, Aurentius, Hardarius: Nicephor. lib. 7. cap. 14. And in no leſſe wiſe raged this perſecution throughout all Egypt, where Euſebius in his eight booke & thirteenth chapter maketh mention of Peleus & Nilus martyrs & biſhops in Egypt. But at Alexandria eſpecially were declared moſt notable conflicts of chriſtian and true conſtant martyrs that ſuffered: which Phileas the biſhop of Thmuitan deſcribeth, as after (God willing) ſhall be declared. In this perſecution of Alexandria, the principall that then ſuffred was Peter the biſhop of Alexandria, with the elders of the ſame, moſt worthie martyrs, as Faulus, Didius, & Ammonius, alſo Phileas, Heſichius, Pachyminus, and Theodorus, which all were biſhops of the congregations within Egypt, & beſides them many other both famous & ſingular men. The whole legio of chriſtia ſouldiers, which lay at Thebes in Egypt, vnder the chriſtian captaine Mauritius, when they would not obay the emperors commandement touching the worſhipping of images, were tithed to death once, & then again: and at laſt through the exhortatio of Mauritius, died al together like conſtant martyrs: Vincentius in ſpeculo, lib. 13. cap. 2. Likewiſe at Antino diuers chriſtian ſouldiers, notwithſtading they were ſeriouſlie diſſuaded, ſuffered death together, among whom were Aſcla, Philemon, & Apollonius, ibidé. cap. 50. And alſo in the other parts of Africa & Mauritania, was great perſecution, as Euſeb. li. 8. ca. 6. Alſo in Sammium, of which place Chronicon maketh mention, and Sicilia, where were 79. martyrs ſlaine for the profeſſion of Chriſt: Henr. de Erfordia.

Now let vs come vnto Europe. Nicephorus in his ſeuenth booke and fourteenth chapter ſaith, that at Nicopolis in Thracia the martyrs were in moſt miſerable and pitifull wiſe handled, where Liſias had the execution thereof. In Chalcedon ſuffered Euphemia vnder Priſcus the proconſull: Vincent. li. 12. ca. 77.

Henricus de Erfordia ſaith that at Rome, Johannes & Criſpus being prieſts, had the execution of martyrs. And at Boemia, Agricola, & Vitalis: Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 49. And at Aquileia the emperor commanded euery man to kill the chriſtians: Vincent. lib. eod. ca. 58. And among thoſe martyrs he maketh mention of Felices & Fortunatus. Reginus alſo writeth that in other places of Italie the perſecution became great, as at Florentia, Pergamus, Naples, Campania, Beneuentus, at Venuſa in Apulia, and in Thuſcia: Henricus de Erfordia ſaith alſo at Verona. In France doubtleſſe Rectionarus appointed to that office plaied the cruell helhound, of whole great cruelty againſt the chriſtians many hiſtories are full. At Mediolanus ſuffered Victor. And at Maſſilia. Maximianus ſet forth his decrée, that either they ſhould all do ſacrifice vnto the gods of the gentils, or elſe be all ſlaine with diuers kinds of torments. Therfore many martyrs there died for the glory of Chriſt: Antoninus & Vincent. lib. 12. ca. 2. In Beluacus ſuffered Lucian.

Vincentius and Reginus write of many places in Spaine where was great perſecution, as at Emerita, where ſuffered Eulalia, of whom more followeth hereafter, & Adula, where alſo ſuffered Vincentius, Sabina, & Chriſtina. At Toletum ſuffered Leucadia ỳ virgin, at Celarea Auguſta, where were put to death eightéene, beſide a great number of other martyrs which ſuffered vnder Decianus the gouernor, which afflicted with perſecution al the coaſt of Spaine, as ſaith Vincent. li. 13. ca. 123. 124. 128. 130. 134. The foreſaid Rectionarus made ſuch perſecution at Treuers néere the riuer of Moſella, that the bloud of the chriſtiã men that were ſlaine ran like ſmall brooks, and coloured great and maine riuers. Neither yet did this ſuffice him, but from thence ſent certain horſemen with his letters, commanding them to ride into euery place, and charge all ſuch as had taken and apprehended any chriſtians, that they ſhould immediatlie put them to death: Vincent. lib. 13. cap. 136.

Beda alſo ſaith, that this perſecution reached euen vnto the Britains, in his booke De ratione temporum. And the chronicle of Martinus, and the Nolegay of time do declare that all the chriſtians in Britannie were vtterly deſtroyed: furthermore, that the kinds of death & puniſhment were ſo great and horrible, as no mans tongue is able to expreſſe. In the beginning, when the emperor by his ſubtiltie and willineſſe rather dallied then ſhewed his rigor, he threatned them with bands and impriſonment: but within a while, when he began to worke the matter in good earneſt, hee deuiſed innumerable ſorts of torments and puniſhments, as whippings and ſcourgings, rackings, horrible ſcrapings, ſword, fire, and ſhipbotes, wherin a great number being put were ſunke and drowned in the bottom of the ſea: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 6. & 7. Alſo hanging them vpon croſſes, binding them to the bodies of dead trees with their heads downeward, hanging them by the middles vpon gallowſes, till they died for hunger, throwing them aliue to ſuch kind of wild beaſts as would deuour them, as lions, beares, libards, & wild buls: Euſeb. li. 8. cap. 8. pricking and thruſting them in with bodkins and talens of beaſts till they were almoſt dead, lifting them vp on high with their heads downward, euen as in Thebaide they did vnto the women being naked and vnclothed, one of their féet tied and lifted on high, and ſo hanging downe with their bodies, which thing to ſée was very pitifull, with other deuiſed ſorts of puniſhments moſt tragicall, or rather tyrannicall, and pitifull to deſcribe: as firſt, the binding of them to trées, and to the boughes thereof; the pulling and tearing aſunder of their members and ioints, being tied to the boughes and armes of trees: Euſeb. lib. 8. cap. 9. the mangling of them with ares, the choking of them with ſmoke by ſmall and ſoft fires, the diuiſion dismembred of their hands, eares, and feet, with other ioynts, as the holy martyrs of Alexandria suffered the scorching & broiling of them with coles, not vnto death, but euery day renewed. With such kind of torments the martyrs at Antioch were afflicted. But in Pontus other horrible punishments and feare full to be heard, did the martyrs of Christ suffer, of which, some had their fingers ends vnder the nailes thrust in with sharpe bodkins, some all to besprinkled with boiling lead, hauing their most necessarie members cut from them, some other suffering most filthie, intollerable, and indurable torments and paines in their bowels and priuie members: Eusebius eodem cap. 12.

Persecution in Pontus.

Persecution in Alexandria.

To conclude, how great the outrage of the persecution which raigned in Alexandria was, and with how many and sundrie kinds of new deuised punishments the martyrs were afflicted: Phileas, the bishop of the Thumitans, a man singularly well learned, hath described in his epistle to the Thumitans, the copie whereof Eusebius hath in his eight booke and tenth chapter, out of the which we meane here briefly to recite somewhat. Because (saith he) euery man might torment the holy martyrs as they listed themselues, some beat them with cudgels, some with rods, some with whips, some with thongs, and some with cords, and this example of beating was in sundrie wise executed, and with much crueltie. For some of them hauing their hands bound behind their backes, were lifted vp vpon timber logs, and with certaine instruments their members and ioynts were stretched foorth, whereon their whole bodies hanging, were subiect to the will of the tormentors, who were commanded to afflict them with all manner of torments, and not on their sides only, (like as homicides were) but vpon their bellies, thighs, and legs, they scratched them with the talens and clawes of wild beasts. Some others were seene to hang by one hand vpon the engine, whereby they might feele the more grieuous pulling out of the rest of their ioynts and members. Some others were in such sort bound vnto pillars with their faces turned to the wall, hauing no stay vnder their feete, and were violently weighed downe with the peise of their bodies, that by reason of their strict binding, they being drawne out, might be more grieuously tormented. And this suffered they not onely during the time of their examination, and while the shiriffe had to doe with them, but also the whole day long. And whilest the iudge went thus from one to another, he by his authoritie appointed certaine officers to attend vpon those hee left, and not to be let downe, vntill either through the intollerableneese of the paine, or by the extremitie of cold, they being neere the point of death, should be let downe: & so were they haled vpon the ground. And further they were commanded that they should shew not so much as one sparke of mercie or compassion vpon vs, but so extreamely and furiously did deale with vs, as though our soules and bodies should haue died together. And therfore yet another torment our aduersaries deuised, to augment our former plagues. After that they had most lamentablie beaten them, they deuised moreouer a new kind of racke, wherein they lying vpright, were stretched by both the feete aboue the fourth stop or hole with sharpe shels or shares strowed vnder them, after a strange kind of engine to vs here vnknowne. Othersome were cast downe vpon the pauement where they were oppressed so thicke, and so grieuously with torments, that it is not almost to be thought what afflictions they suffered.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 10.

Strange kinds of torments.

Thus they lying in paines and torments, some died therewith, not a little shaming and confounding their enemies by their singular patience. Some halfe dead and halfe aliue were thrust into prison, where shortly after by paines and wounds of their bodies they ended their bitter life. Some againe being cured of their wounds by their indurance in prison, were more confirmed, who being put to the choice whether they would come to their cursed sacrifice and inioy their wicked liberty, or else sustaine the sentence of death, did willinglie and without delay abide the extremitie, remembring with themselues what is written in the scriptures, He that sacrificeth (saith he) to strange gods, shall be exterminat, &c. Item, Thou shalt not haue any strange gods beside me, &c. Thus much wrot Phileas to the congregation where hee was bishop, before hee receiued the sentence of death, being yet in bāds, and in the same exhorteth his brethren constantly to persist after his death, in the truth of Christ professed. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 10.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 10. Ex Sabellico, lib. 7. cap. 9.

An holy martyr of Nicomedia tormented.

Sabellicus in his seuenth Ennead. and eight booke, saith that that christened man, which tore and pulled downe the wicked edict of the emperor in Nicomedia, being script and beaten that the bones appeared, and after washed in salt and vineger, was then slaine with this cruell kind of torment. But Platina writeth that Dorotheus and Gorgonius exhorted him to die so constantly.

But as all their torments were for their horriblenes, martellous and notable, and therewithall so studiously deuised, and no lesse grieuous and sharpe: so notwithstanding, therewith were these martyrs neither dismaid, nor ouercome, but rather thereby confirmed and strengthened, so merilie and ioyfullie sustained they whatsoeuer was put vnto them. Eusebius saith, that he himselfe beheld and saw the huge & great persecution that was done in Thebaide, in so much that the very swords of the hangmen and persecutors being blunt with the great and often slaughter, they themselues for wearinesse sat downe to rest them, and others were faine to take their places. And yet all this notwithstanding the murthered christians shewed their maruellous readinesse, willingnes, and diuine fortitude, which they were indued with, with stout courage, ioy, and smiling receiuing the sentence of death pronounced vpon them, & sung euen vnto the last gaspe hymnes and psalmes to God. So did also the martyrs of Alexandria, as witnesseth Phileas aboue mentioned. The holy martyrs (saith he) keeping Christ in their minds, being led with the loue of better rewards, sustained not only at one time whatsoeuer labour and deuised punishments they had to lay vpon them: but now also the second time haue done the same, and haue borne all the menaces of the cruell souldiers, not onely in words wherewith they threatned them, but also whatsoeuer in deed and worke they could deuise to their destruction, and that with most manly stomachs, excluding all feare, with the perfection of their vnspeakeable loue towards Christ, whose great strength and fortitude cannot by words be expressed. And Sulpitius saith in the second booke of his sacred history, that then the christians with more greedie desire praised and sought for martyrdome, then now they doe desire bishoprikes.

The swords blunt, and the hangmen wearied with slaughter.

Although some there were also, as I haue said, that with feare and threatnings, and by their owne infirmities were ouercome and went backe: Eusebius lib. 8. ca. 4. among whom Socrates nameth Miletius, lib. 1. cap. 6. and Athanasius in his second apologie nameth the bishop of Licus, a citie in little Egypt, whom Peter the bishop of Alexandria excommunicated, for that in this persecution he sacrificed vnto the gentiles gods. Of the fall of Marcellinus the bishop of Rome, I will speake afterwards; for he being perswaded by others, and specially of the emperour Diocletian himselfe, did sacrifice, whereupon he was excommunicated; but afterwards he repenting the same, was againe receiued into the congregation, & made martyr, as Platina, and the compiler of the booke of the generall councels affirme. The number of the martyrs increased daily, sometimes ten, sometimes twentie were slaine at once, somewhiles thirtie, and often times three score, and otherwhiles a hundred in one day, men, women, and children, by diuers kinds of death: Eusebius lib. 8. cap. 9. Also Damasus, Beda, Orosius, Honorius, and others do witnes, that there were slaine in this persecution by the names of martyrs, within the space of thirtie dates, seuenteene thousand persons, besides another great number and multitude that were condemned to the metall mines and quaries with like crueltie.

Maurittius the captaine of christian religion, with his fellowes six thousand six hundred sixtie and six. Victor in the citie of Troy now called Xanthus, with his followes three hundred and three score were slaine, as saith Otto Phrisingensis, lib. 2. cap. 45. Reginus reciteth the names of many other martyrs, to the number of one hundred and twentie.

And for so much as mention here hath been made of Maurittius and Victor, the particular description of the same history I thought here to insert, taken out of Ado and other storie writers, as insueth.

Maurittius came out of Syria into France and Italie, being captain of the band of the Theban souldiers, to the number of six thousand sixe hundred & three score, being sent for of Maximianus, to goe against the rebellious Bangandes: but rather as it should seeme by the treason of the tyrant, which thought he might better in these quarters vse his tyrannie vpon the christians then in the east part. These Thebans with Maurittius the captaine, after that they had entred into Rome, who were there of Marcellus the blessed bishop confirmed in the faith, promising by oth, that they would rather be slaine of their enemies, then forsake that faith which they had receiued, who followed the emperors host through the Alpes euen into France. At that time the Colarians were incamped not farre from the towne called Octodor, where Maximianus offred sacrifice to his diuels, and called al the souldiers both of the east and west to the same, strictly charging them by the altars of his gods, that they would fight against those rebels the Bangandes, and persecute the christian enemies of the emperors gods: which his commandement was shewed to the Thebans host, which were also encamped about the riuer of Rode, and in a place that was named Agawne; but to Octodor they would in no wise come, for that euery man did certainely appoint and perswade with themselues rather in that place to die, then either to sacrifice to the gods, or beare armour against the christians. Which thing indeed very stoutly and valiantly they affirmed, vpon their oth before taken to Maximianus when he sent for them. Wherwith the tyrant being wrathful and al moued, commanded euery tenth man of that whole band to be put to the sword, whereto shriuinglie and with great reioycing they committed their necks. To which notable thing and great force of faith, Maurittius himselfe was a great incourager, who by and by with a most graue oration exhorted & animated his souldiers both the emperour, answered in this wise saying: We are ô emperor your souldiers, but yet also to speake freely, the seruants of God. We owe to thee seruice of warre, to him innocencie: of thee we receiue for our trauell wages; of him the beginning of life. But in this we may in no wise obey thee ô emperour, to denie God our author and Lord, and not only ours, but your Lord likewise, will ye, nil ye. If we be not so extreamely enforced that we offend him, doubtlesse as we haue hitherto before, we will yet obey you: but otherwise we will rather obey him then you. We offer heere our hands against any other enemies: but to defile our hands with the blood of innocents, that we may not do. These right hands of ours haue skill to fight against the wicked and true enemies: but to spoile and murther the godlie and citizens, they haue no skill at all. We haue in remembrance how wee tooke armour in hand for the defence of the citizens, and not against them. We fought alwaies for iustice sake, pietie, and for the health of innocents. These haue been alwaies the rewards of our perils and trauell. We haue fought in the quarell of faith, which in no wise we can keepe to you, if we do not shew the same to our God. We first sware vpon the sacraments of our God, then afterward to the king: and doe you thinke the second will auaile vs, if we breake the first? By vs you would plague the christians, to do which feate we are only commanded by you. We are heere readie to confesse God the author of all things, and belieue in his Sonne Iesus Christ our Lord. We see before our eyes our fellowes and partakers of our labours and trauels, to be put to the sword, and we sprinkled with their blood; of which our most blessed companions and brethren, their end and death we haue not bewailed nor mourned, but rather haue been glad, and haue reioyced thereat, for that they haue bin counted worthie to suffer for the Lord their God. The extreame necessitie of death cannot moue vs against your maiesty, neither yet any desperation, ô emperour, which is wont in ventrous affaires to do much, shall arme vs against you. Behold here we cast downe our weapons, and resist not, for that we had rather to be killed, then kill, and guiltlesse to die, then guiltie to liue. Whatsoeuer more yee will command, appoint and enioyne vs, we are heere readie to suffer, yea both fire and sword: and whatsoeuer other torments. We confesse our selues to be christians, we cannot persecute christians, nor will do sacrifice to your diuellish idols.

Mauricius and his companie martyred.
With which their answere the king being altogether incensed and moued, commanded the second time the tenth man of them that were left to be in like case murthered. That crueltie also being accomplished, at length when the christian souldiers would in no wise condescend vnto his mind, he set vpon them with his whole host, both footmen and also horsemen, and charged them to kill them all. Who with all force set vpon them, they making no resistance, but throwing downe their armour, yéelded their liues to the persecutors, and offered to them their naked bodies.

The constant boldnes of Victor in refusing to eat with the cruell persecutors, for the which he was also slaine. Victor martyr.
Victor at the same time was not of that band, nor yet then any souldier, but one being an old souldier, and dismissed for his age. At which time he comming suddenly vpon them as they were banquetting and making merrie with the spoiles of the holy martyrs, was bidden to sit downe with them: and first asking the cause of that their so great reioycing, and vnderstanding the truth thereof, detested the guests, and refused to eate with them. And then being demanded of them whether happily he were a christian or no: openly confessed and denied not, but that he was a christian, and euer would be. And thereupon they rushing vpon him, killed him, and made him partner of the like martyrdome and honor.

The number of the christians encreased for all this persecution.
Beda in his historie writeth, that this persecution being vnder Diocletian, endured vnto the seuenth yeare of Constantinus. And Euseb. lib. cap. 6. saith, that it lasted vntill the tenth yeare of Constantinus. It was not yet one yeare from the day in which Diocletian and Maximinian ioining themselues together, began their persecution, when that they saw the number of the christians rather to encrease then to diminish, notwithstanding all the crueltie that euer they could shew, and now were out of all hope for the vtter rooting out of them. Which thing was the cause of their first enterprise, & hauing now euen their fill of blod, and lothing as it were the shedding therof, they ceased at the last of their owne accord to put any more christians to death. But yet of a great multitude they did thrust out their right eyes, and maimed their left legges at the ham with a searing iron, condemning them to the mines of mettals, not so much for the vse of their labour, as for the desire of afflicting them. And this was the clemencie and release of the crueltie of those princes, which said ý it was not meet that the cities should be defiled with the blod of citizens, and to make the emperours highnesse to be disdained with the name of crueltie, but to shew his princely beneficence and liberalitie to all men. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 10.

Diocletian and Maximinian were tired with persecution, and gaue vp their kingdome.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 10.

When Diocletian and Maximinian had raigned together emperours one and twentie yeares (Nicephorus saith two and twentie yeares) at length Diocletian put himselfe from his emperiall dignitie at Nicomedia, and liued at Salona, Maximinian at Mediolanum, and led both of them a priuat life in the three hundred and ninth yeare after Christ. This strange and marueilous alteration gaue occasion, and so came to passe, that within short space after, there were in the Roman commonwealth many emperours at one time.

{Anno 309}

The names of the tyrants. Diocletian and Maximinian emperours deposed. Galerius Maximinus, Constantius emperours.
In the beginning of this persecution, you heard how Diocletian being made emperour, tooke to him Maximinian. Also how these two gouerning as emperours together, chose other two Cesars vnder them, to wit, Galerius Maximinus, and Constantius the father of Constantine the great. Thus then Diocletian raigning with Maximinian, in the nineteenth yeare of his raigne, began his furious persecution against the christians, whose raigne after the same continued not long. For so it pleased God to put such a snaffle in the tyrants mouth, that within two yeares after, he caused both him and Maximinian (for what cause he knoweth) to giue ouer their emperiall function, and so to remaine not as emperours any more, but as priuat persons. So that they being now displaced and dispossessed, the emperiall dominion remained with Constantius and Galerius Maximinus, which two diuided the whole monarchie betweene them: so that Maximinus should gouerne the east countries, and Constantius the west parts. But Constantius as a modest prince, onely contented with the emperiall title, refused Italie and Aphrike, contenting himselfe only with France, Spaine, and Britaine. Wherefore Galerius Maximinus chose to him his two sonnes Maximinus and Seuerus. Likewise Constantius tooke Constantinus his sonne Cesar vnder him. In the meane time, while Maximinus with his two Cesars were in Asia, the Romane souldiers set vp for their emperour Maxentius the sonne of Maximinian, who had before deposed himselfe. Against whom Maximinus the emperour of the east sent his sonne Seuerus, which Seuerus was slaine in the same voyage of Maxentius, in whose place then Maximinus tooke Licinius. And these were the emperors and Cesars, which succéeding after Diocletian and Maximinian, prosecuted the rest of that persecution, which Diocletian and Maximinian before begunne, during néere the space of seuen or eight yeares, which was to the yeare of our Lord three hundred and eightéene: saue onely that Constantius with his sonne Constantinus, was no great doer therein, but rather a maintainer and a supporter of the christians. Which Constantius, surnamed Clorus for his palenesse, was the sonne of Eutropius, a man of great nobilitie of the Romane nation, as Letus affirmeth. Hée came of the line of Eneas and Claudia, the daughter of Claudius Augustus. This man had not the desire of great and mightie dominions, and therefore parted hée the empire with Galerius, and would rule but in France, Britaine and Spaine, refusing the other kingdomes for the troublesome and difficult gouernment of the same. Otherwise hée was a prince, as Eutropius maketh description of him, verie excellent, ciuill, méeke, gentle, liberall, and desirous to doe good vnto those that had any priuate authoritie vnder him. And as Cyrus once said, that hée gat treasure enough, when hée made his friends rich: euen so it is said that Constantius would often times say, that it were better that his subiects had treasure, then he to haue it in his treasure-house. Also he was by nature sufficed with a little, in so much that he vsed to eat and drinke in earthen vessels (which thing was counted in Agathocles the Sicilian a great commendation) and if at any time cause required to garnish his table, hée would send for plate and other furniture to his friends. To these vertues he added yet a more worthie ornament, that is, deuotion, loue, and affection towards the word of God, as Eusebius in his eight booke and thirteenth chapter affirmeth: after which vertues ensued great peace and tranquillitie in all his prouinces. By which word he being guided, neither leuied any warres contrarie to pietie and christian religion, neither aided he any other that did the same, neither destroyed he the churches, but commanded that the christians should be preserued and defended, and kept them safe from all contumelious iniuries. And when that in the other iurisdictions of the empire, the congregations were molested with persecution, as Sozomenus declareth in his first booke and first chapter, he only gaue licence vnto the christians to liue after their accustomed manner. This wonderfull act of his following, besides others, doth shew that he was a sincere worshipper of the christian religion.

Maximinus, Seuerus, Constantinus, Cesars.

Maxentius emperour. Licinius Cesar.

{Anno 318}

The commendation of Constantius.

Happie Constantius.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13. Constantius gratious to the christians.

Sozomenus lib. 1. cap. 6.

Those which bare the chiefe offices amongst the ethnikes, draue out of the emperours court all the godlie christians: whereupon this ensued, that the emperours themselues at the last were destitute of helpe, when such were driuen away: which dwelling in their courts, and liuing a godly life, powred out their prayers vnto God for the prosperous estate & health both of the empire and the emperor. Constantius therefore minding at a certaine time to trie what sincere and god christians he had yet in his court, called together all his officers and seruants in the same, faining himselfe to chuse out such as would do sacrifice to diuels, and that those only should dwell there and keepe their offices; and that those which would refuse to do the same should be thrust out and banished the court. At this appointment, all the courtiers diuided themselues into companies: the emperor marked which were the constantest and godliest from the rest. And when some said that they would willingly do sacrifice, other some openly and boldly denied to do the same, then the emperour sharpely rebuked those which were so readie to do sacrifice, and iudged them as false traytors vnto God, accounting them vnworthie to be in his court, which were such traytors to God, and forthwith commanded that they only should be banished the same. But greatly he commended them, which refused to do sacrifie and confessed God, affirming that they only were worthie to be about a prince, forthwith commanding them that thenceforth they should be the trustie counsellers and defenders both of his person and kingdome, saying thus much more, that they only were worthie to be in office, whom he might make account of as his assured friends, and that he meant to haue them in more estimation, then the substance he had in his treasurie. Eusebius maketh mention hereof in his first booke of the life of Constantinus, and also Sozomenus in his first booke and first chapter.

Maximinus an enemie to the christians.

With this Constantius was ioyned (as hath been afore said) Galerius Maximinus, a man, as Eutropius affirmeth, very ciuill and a valiant good souldier: furthermore, a fauourer of wise and learned men, of a quiet disposition, not rigorous, but in his drunkennesse, whereof he would soone after repent him, as Victor writeth; whether he meaneth Maximinus the father, or Maximinus his sonne, it is vncertaine. But Eusebius farotherwise describeth the conditions of him in his eight booke and first chapter. For he saith he was of a tyrannicall disposition: the fearefullest man that might be, and curious in all magicall superstition, in so much that without the diuinations and answeres of diuels he durst doe nothing at all, and therefore he gaue great offices and dignities to inchanters. Furthermore that he was an exactor and extortioner of the citizens, liberall to those that were flatterers, giuen to surfetting and riot, a great drinker of wine, and in his furious drunkennesse most like a mad man, a ribaud, an adulterer, which came to no citie but he rauished virgins and defiled mens wiues. To conclude, he was so great an idolater, that he built vp temples in euery citie, and repared those that were fallen in great decay: and he chose out the most worthie of his politicall magistrates to be the idols priests, and deuised that they should execute that their office with great authoritie and dignitie, and also with warlike pompe. But vnto christian pietie and religion he was most intensiue, and in the east churches exercised cruell persecution, and vsed as executioners of the same, Pencetius, Quintianus, and Theotechnus beside others.

The wickednes of Maximinus described.

A terrible plague sent by God to Maximinus.

Notwithstanding he was at length reuoked from his crueltie by the iust iudgement and punishment of God. For hee was suddenly vexed with a fatall disease most filthie and desperat, which disease to describe was very strange, taking the first beginning in his flesh outwardly, from thence it proceeded more and more to the inward parts of his bodie. For in the priuie members of his bodie there happened vnto him a sudden putrifaction, and after in the bottome of the same a botchie corrupt bile, with a fistula, consuming and eating vp his intrals, out of the which came swarming forth an innumerable multitude of lice, with such a pestiferous stinke that no man could abide him, and so much more, for that all the grossenesse of his bodie by abundance of meat before he fell sicke, was turned also into fat; which fat now putrified, and stinking, was so vgsome and horrible, that none that came to him could abide the sight thereof. By reason whereof, the physitians which had him in cure, some of them not able to abide the intollerable stinke were commanded to be slaine. Other some, because they could not heale him being so swollen and past hope of cure, were also cruelly put to death. At length being put in remembrance that his disease was sent of God, hee began to forethinke the wickednesse that hee had done against the Saints of God, and so comming againe to himselfe, first confesseth to God all his offences, then calling them vnto him which were about him, forthwith commanded all men to cease from the persecutions of the christians: requiring moreouer that they should set vp his emperiall proclamations, for the reforing and reedifying of their temples, and that they would obtaine this of the christians, in their assemblies (which without all feare and doubt they might be bold to make) that they would deuoutly pray to their God for the emperour. Then forthwith was the persecution stayed, and the emperiall proclamations in euery citie were set vp, containing the retraction or countermand of those things which against the christians were before decreed, the copie whereof ensueth.

Maximinus killeth his physicians.

Maximinus his countermand in the behalfe of the christians.

Amongst other things, which for the benefit and commoditie of the common weale we established, we commanded to reforme all things according to the ancient lawes and publike discipline of the Romans, and also to vse this policie, that the christians, which had forsaken the religion of their forefathers, should be brought againe to the right way. For such phantasticall singularitie was amongst them, that those things which their elders had receiued and allowed, they reiected and disallowed, deuising euery man such lawes as they thought good, and obserued the same, assembling in diuers places great multitudes of people.

Therefore when our foresaid decree was proclamed, many there were that felt the penaltie thereof, and many being troubled therefore suffered many kinds of death. And because we see yet that there be many which persuere in the same, which neither giue due worship vnto the celestiall gods, neither receiue the God of the christians, we hauing respect to our accustomed benignitie, wherewith we are wont to shew fauour vnto all men, thinke good in this cause also to extend our clemencie, that the christians may be againe tollerated, and appoint them places where againe they may meet together, so that they doe nothing contrarie to publike order and discipline. By another epistle we meane to prescribe vnto the iudges, what shal be conuenient for them to do. Wherefore according as this our bountifull clemencie deserueth, let them make intercession to God for our health, commonweale, and for themselues; that in all places the state of the commonweale may be preserued, and that they themselues may be able safely to liue within their bounds.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. vlt.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. vlt.

But one of his inferior officers, whose name was also Maximinus, was not well pleased when this countermand was published throughout all Asia, and the prouinces where he had to do. Yet he being qualified by this example, that it was not conuenient for him to repugne the pleasure of those princes which had the chiefe authoritie, as Constantinus and Maximinus, set forth of himselfe no edict touching the same: but commanded his officers in the presence of others, that they should somewhat stay from the persecution of the christians: of which commandement of the inferior Maximinus, each of them gaue intelligence vnto their fellowes by their letters. But Sabinus, which then amongst them all had the chiefest office and dignitie, to the substitutes of euery countrie wrote by his letters the emperours pleasure in this wise.

Sabinus in the fauour of the christians publisheth the decree.

The maiestie of our most gratious and soueraigne lords the emperours, hath lately decreed with speciall diligence and deuotion, to enduce all men to an vniforme life, so that they which seemed to dissent from the Romane custome by a strange manner of liuing, should exhibit to the immortall gods their due and proper worship: but the wilfull and obstinate mind of diuers so much, and so continually resisted the same, that by no lawfull meanes they might be reuoked from their purpose, neither made afraid by any terrour or punishment. Because therefore it so came to passe, that by this meanes many put themselues in perill and ieopardie: the maiestie of our soueraigne lords the emperours, according to their noble pietie, considering that it was far from the meaning of their princely maiesties that such things should bee, whereby so many men and much people should bee destroyed, gaue mee in charge that with diligence I should write vnto you, that if any of the christians from henceforth fortune to be taken in the exercise of their religion, that in no wise you molest the same, neither for that cause you do iudge anie man worthie of punishment: for that in all this time it hath euidently appeared, that by no meanes they might be allured from such wilfulnesse. It is therefore requisit that your wisdome write vnto the questors, captaines, and constables of euery citie and village, that they may know it not to be lawfull for them, or any of them, to do contrarie to the prescript of this commandement, neither that they presume to attempt the same.

Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 1.

Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 1.

Persecution ceaseth for a time.

The gouernors therefore of euery prouince supposing this to be the determinat pleasure (and not fained) of the emperour, did first aduertise thereof, the rusticall and pagan multitude: after that they released and set at libertie all such prisoners as were condemned to the mettall mines, and to perpetuall imprisonment for their faith, thinking thereby (where indeed they were deceiued) that the doing therof would please the emperor. This therefore seemed to them as vnlooked for, and as light to trauellers in a darke night. They gather themselues together in euery city, they cal their synods and councels, and much marueil at the sudden change and alteration. The infidels themselues extoll the only and true God of the christians. The christians receiue againe all their former liberties, and such as fell away before in the time of persecution, repent themselues, and after penance done, they returned againe to the congregation.

The infidels acknowledge the God of the christians.

Now the christians reioyced in euery citie, praysing God with hymnes and psalmes: Eusebius ibidem. This was a maruellous sudden alteration of the church, from a most vnhappie state into a better: but scarce suffered Maximinus the tyrant the same sir moneths vnviolated to continue. For what soeuer seemed to make for the subuersion of the same peace (yet scarcely hatched) that did he only meditate. And first of all he toke from the christians all libertie and leaue for them to assemble and congregat in churchyards vnder a certaine colour. After that he sent certaine miscreants vnto the Atheniens, to solicit them against the christians, and to prouoke them to aske of him as a recompence and great reward, that he would not suffer any christian to inhabit in their countrie: and amongst them was one Theotechnus, a most wicked miscreant, an inchanter, and a most deadly enemie against the christians. Hee first made the way whereby the christians were put out of credit and accused to the emperour, to which fraud also he erected a certaine idoll of Iupiter to be worshipped of the inchanters and coniurers, and mingled the same worship with ceremonies full of deceiueable witchcraft. Lastly, hee caused the same idoll to giue this sound out of his mouth, that is: Iupiter commandeth the christians to bee banished out of the citie and suburbs of the same, as enemies vnto him. And the same sentence sentence did the rest of the gouernours of the prouinces publish against the christians, and thus at length persecution began to kindle against them. Maximinus appointed and instituted high priests and bishops in euery citie to offer sacrifice vnto idols, and enueigled all those that were in great offices vnder him, that they should not only cease to pleasure them and to do for them, but also that they should with new deuised accusations against them, at their pleasure, put as many to death as by any meanes they might. They also did counterfeit certaine practises of Pilat against our Sauiour Christ full of blasphemie, and sent the same into all the empire of Maximinus by their letters, commanding that the same should be published and set vp in euery citie and suburbs of the same, and that they should be deliuered to the schoolemaisters, to cause their scholers to learne by rote the same.

After that, one named Præfectus castrorum, whom the Romans do call captaine, allured certaine light women, partlie by feare, and partly by punishment, dwelling at Damascus in Phenicia, and taken out of the court, wherein they were accused, that they should openly say in writing that they were once christians, and that they knew what wicked and lasciuious acts the christians were wont to execute amongst themselues vpon the sundaies, and what other things they thought good to make more of their owne head, to the slander of the christians. The captaine sheweth vnto the emperour their words, as though it had ben so indeed: and the emperour by and by commanded the same to be published throughout euerie citie. Furthermore, they did hang vp in the middest of euery city (which was neuer done before) the emperours edicts against the christians, grauen in tables of brasse. And the children in the scholes with great noyse and clapping of hands did euerie day resound the contumelious blasphemies of Pilat vnto Iesus, and what other things soeuer were deuised of the magistrates, after a most despitefull manner. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. And this is the copie of the edict, which Maximinus caused to be fastened to pillers, fraught with all arrogant and insolent hate against God and Christ.

The copie of the recountermand made against the christians.

The weake and imbecill rebellion of mans mind (all obscuritie and blindnesse of ignorance set apart, which hitherto hath wrapped the minds of impious and miserable men in the pernicious darkenesse of ignorance) is now at the length able to discerne, that the same is gouerned, as also corroborated by the prouidence of the immortall gods the louers of vertue: which thing, how acceptable it is to vs, how pleasant and gratefull, and how much proofe the same hath declared of your well disposed willing minds, is incredible to be told: although this was not vnknowne before, with what diligence and deuotion ye serued the immortal gods, whose wonderfull and constant faith is not knowne by bare and naked words, but by your worthy & notable deeds. Wherefore worthily is your citie called the habitation and seat of the immortall gods, and by many examples it appeareth that the same flourisheth, & prospereth by the presence of the celestiall gods. For behold, your citie not regarding your priuat businesses, nor esteeming that which should haue bin for the speciall commoditie thereof, when it perceiued that cursed vanitie to begin againe to creepe, and as a fire negligently quenched, when the dead brands therof began to kindle & make a great flame: by and by without delay ye hauing recourse vnto our pietie, as vnto the metropolitan of all diuine worship & religion, craued remedy and help, which wholsome mind for your pieties sake, it is most manifest that the gods haue indued you with. Therefore he, euen that most mightie Iupiter, I say, which preserueth your most famous citie: to that intent he might deliuer and make free your countrie gods, your wiues and children, your houshold gods and houses, from all detestable corruption, hath inspired you with this wholesome and willing mind, shewing and declaring how worthie, notable, and healthfull a thing it is, to worship and to sacrifice to the immortall gods. For who is so void of reason and vnderstanding, that knoweth not that this thing hapneth vnto vs by the careful studie of the goodnesse of our gods, that the ground denieth not to giue her timely increase, nor maketh frustrate the husbandmans hope, nor that wicked war dare shew her face vpon the earth, nor that the corruption of the aire is now cause of pestilence, neither that the sea swelleth with immoderat winds, neither that sudden storms are cause of hurtfull tempests: to conclude, that the ground which is as the nurse and mother of all things, is not swallowed vp of her deep chaps and gapings, by terrible earthquake; neither that the hils made leuell with the earth, are not with gaping clifts deuoured; all which euils and greater then these, before this time to haue hapned, euery man knoweth. And all these mischiefes came vpon vs for the pernicious errors sake of the extreme follie of those wicked men the christians, when filthinesse it selfe (as I may call it) so occupied their minds, and ouerran the world. Let them behold the fields now all about full of corne, and ouerflowen as it were with ears of corne. Let them view the pleasant medows clothed with flowers, & moistned with showers from heauen, and also the pleasant and temperat weather. Therefore let all men reioyce, that by your pietie, sacrifices and worshipping, the maiestie of the most sterne god of battell Mars is appeased, and that therefore wee enioy pleasant and firme peace. And how many soeuer haue left that blind errour and straying of the christians vnfainedly, and bee of a better mind, let them specially reioice, as men deliuered out of a sudden great tempest, and from a grieuous disease, and haue afterward obtained a delectable and pleasant life. For doubtlesse, if they had remained in that execrable vanitie, far off had they been chased from your city and suburbs of the same (according to your desire) that your citie by that meanes, according to your commendable diligence, clensed from all impuritie and impietie, may offer sacrifices according to the meaning of the same, with due reuerence of the immortall gods. And that you may perceiue in how good part your supplication was vnto vs (yea vnasked and desired) we are most willing and readie to further your honest endeauours, and grant vnto you for your deuotion, whatsoeuer you aske of our magnificence. And that this thing may be accomplished, forthwith aske and haue. And this thing with all speed endeuour you to obtaine, which shall be a perpetuall testimonie of pietie exhibited of your citie to the immortal gods, and shal be a president to your children and posteritie, and withall you shall obtaine of vs for this your willing desire of reformation, condigne and worthie rewards. Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 7.

Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 7.

Thus came it to passe that at the length persecution was as great as euer it was, and the magistrates of euery prouince were very disdainefull against the christians which condemned some to death, and some to exile. Among whom they condemned three christians at Emisa in Phenicia, with whom Syluanus the bishop a verie old man, being fortie yeares in the ecclesiasticall function, was condemned to death. At Nicomedia, Lucianus the elder of Antioch, brought thither, after he had exhibited to the emperor his apologie concerning the doctrine of the christians, was cast in prison, and after put to death. In Amasea a citie of Cappadocia, Bringes the lieutenant of Maximinus, had at that time the executing of that persecution. At Alexandria, Petrus a most worthie bishop was beheaded, with whom many other Egyptian bishops also died: Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 7. Niceph. li. 7. ca. 44. Quirinus the bishop of Scescanus hauing a handmill tied about his necke, was throwne headlong from the bridge into the flood, and there a long while floted aboue the water, and when he opened his mouth to speake to the lokers on that they should not be dismaid with that his punishment, was with much ado drowned: Chron. Euseb. At Rome died Marcellus the bishop, as saith Platina, also Timotheus the elder, with many other bishops and priests were martyred. To conclude, many in sundrie places euery where were martyred, whose names ye book intituled Fasciculus temporum declareth, as Victorianus, Symphorianus, Cassorius with his wife, Cassulus, Celsarius, Nemnas, Nobilis, Dorotheus, Gorgonius, Petrus, and other innumerable martyrs. Erasmus, Bonifacius, Iuliana, Cosmas, Damianus, Basilinus, with seuen others. Dorothea, Theophilus, Theodosia, Vitalis, Agricola, Acha, Philemon, Hirenæus, Ianuarius, Festus, Desiderius, Gregorius Spoletanus, Agapes, Chionia, Hirenea, Theodora, & two hundred threescore & ten other martyrs. Florianus, Primus & Felicianus, Vitus & Modestus, Crescentia, Albinus, Rogatianus, Donatianus, Pancratius, Catharina, Margareta, Lucia the virgin, & Antheus the king with many thousand martyrs mo. Simplicius, Faustinus, Beatrix, Panthaleon, Georgius, Iustus, Leocandia, Anthonia, and other more (to an infinit number) suffered martyrdome in this persecution, whose names God hath written in the booke of life. Also Felix Victor with his parents, Lucia the widow, Gemenianus with threescore and nineteene others, Sabinus, Anastasia, Chrysogonus, Felix and Audactus, Adrianus, Natholia, Eugenia, Agnes also when she was but thirteene yeeres old was martyred. Eusebius in his eight booke and fifteenth chapter rehearseth these kinds of torments and punishments, that is to say, fire, wilde beasts, the sword, crucifyings, the bottome of the sea, the cutting and burning of members, the thrusting out of eyes, dismembring of the whole bodie, hunger, imprisonment, and whatsoeuer other cruelties the magistrates could deuise. All which notwithstanding the godly ones, rather then that they would do sacrifice as they were bid, manfully endured. Neither were the women any thing at all behind them. For they being enticed to the filthie vse of their bodies, rather suffered banishment, or willingly killed themselues. Neither yet could the christians liue safely in the wildernesse, but were fetched euen from thence to death and torments, in so much that this was a more grieuous persecution vnder Maximinus the tyrant, then was the former cruell persecution vnder Maximianus the prince: Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 6.

For where the foresaid edict boasted so much of the prosperitie and plentie of all things in the same time of this persecution of the christians, suddenly befell such vnseasonable drought, with famine and pestilence among the people, besides also the wars with the Armenians, that all was found vntrue that he had bragged so much of before. By reason of which famine and pestilence the people were greatly consumed, in so much that one measure of wheat was sold for two thousand and five hundred pieces of money of Athens coine, by reason whereof innumerable died in the cities, but many more in the countrie and villages, so that most part of the husbandmen and countrimen died vp with the famine and pestilence. Diuers there were which bringing out their best treasure, were glad to giue it for any kind of sustenance, were it neuer so little. Others selling away their possessions, fell by reason thereof to extreame pouertie and beggerie. Certains eating grasse, and feeding on other vnwholesome herbs, were faine to relieue themselues with such food as did hurt and poyson their bodies. Also a number of women in the cities, being brought to extreame miserie and penurie, were constrained to depart the citie, and fall to begging throrow the countrey. Some others were weake and faint (as images without breath) wandring vp and downe, and not able to stand for feblenesse, fell downe in the middle of the streets, and holding vp their hands most pitifull, cried for some scraps or fragments of bread to be giuen them, and being at the last gaspe, readie to giue vp the ghost, and not able to vtter any other words, yet cried out that they were hungrie. Of the richer sort diuers there were, who being wearie with the number of beggers and askers, after they had bestowed largely vpon them, became hard hearted, fearing lest they should fall into the same miserie themselues, as they which begged. By reason whereof, the market place, streets, lanes, and allies lay full of dead and naked bodies, being cast out and vnburied, to the pitifull and grieuous beholding of them that saw them. Wherefore many were eaten of dogs, for which cause they that liued fell to the killing of dogs, lest they running mad, should fall vpon them, and kill them.

Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 8.

A terrible hunger among the heathen persecutors described.

Pestilence among the persecutors.

In like manner the pestilence scattering throughout all houses and ages of men, did no lesse consume them, especially those which through plentie of victuals escaped famine. Wherefore the rich princes and presidents, and other innumerable of the magistrates, being the more apt to receiue the infection, by reason of their plentie, were quickly dispatched, and turned vp their heeles. Thus the miserable multitude being consumed with famine and with pestilence, all places were full of mourning, neither was there any thing else seene, but wailing and weeping in euery corner. So that death, what for famine and pestilence, in short time brake vp and consumed whole households, two or three dead bodies being borne out together from one house to one funerall.

These were the rewards of the vaine brags of Maximinus and his edicts, which he did publish in all townes and cities against vs, when it was euident to all men, how diligent and charitable the christians were to them all in this their miserable extremitie. For they only in all this time of distresse, shewing compassion vpon them, trauelled euery day, some in curing the sicke, and some in burying the dead, which otherwise of their owne sort were forsaken. Other some of the christians calling and gathering the multitude together, which were in ieopardie of famine, distributed bread vnto them, whereby they ministred occasion to all men to glorifie the God of the christians, and to confesse them to be the true worshippers of God, as appeared by their workes. By the meanes and reason hereof, the great God and defender of the christians, who before had shewed his anger & indignation against all men, for their wrongfull afflicting of vs, opened againe vnto vs the comfortable light of his prouidence, so that by meanes thereof peace fell vnto vs, as light vnto them that sit in darkenesse, to the great admiration of all men, which easily perceiue God himselfe to bee a perpetuall directer of our doings, who many times chalteneth his people with calamities for a time to exercise them, but after sufficient correction againe sheweth himselfe mercifull and fauourable to them which with trust call vpon him.

The charitie of the christians to the enemies. Let your light so shine among men, that they may see your good workes, and glorifie your father which is in heauen.

By the narration of these things heretofore premised, taken out of the storie of Eusebius, like as it is manifest to see, so is it wonderfull to marke and note, how those counsels and rages of the gentiles atchieued against Christ and his christians, when they seemed most sure against them, were most against themselus. And whereby they thought most to confound the church and religion of Christ, the same turned most to their owne confusion, and to the profit and praise of the christians (God of his maruellous wisedome so ordering and disposing the end of things.) For where the brasen edict of the emperour promised temperat weather, God sent drought: where it promised plentie, God immediatly sent vpon them famine and penurie: where it promised health, God strooke them euen vpon the same, with grieuous pestilence, and with other more calamities, in such sort, that the most reliefe they had, was chiefely by the christians, to the great praise both of them, and to the honor of our God.

The wisedome and policie of man ouerthrowne in his owne turne. Qui comprehendit sapientes in astutia.

Thus most plainly and euidently was then verified the true promise of Christ to his church, affirming and assuring vs. that The gates of hell shall not preuaile against his church builded vpon his faith: as sufficiently may appeare by these ten persecutions aboue specified and described. Wherein as no man can denie, but that satan and his malignant world haue allayed the vttermost of their power and might to ouerthrow the church of Iesus: so must all men needs grant, that reade these stories, that when satan and the gates of hell haue done their worst, yet haue they not preuailed against this mount of Sion, nor euer shall. For else what was heere to be thought, where so many emperours and tyrants together, Diocletian, Maximinian, Galerius, Maximinus, Seuerus, Parentius, Licinius, with their captaines and officers, were let lose, like so many lions, vpon a scattered and vnarmed flocke of sheepe, intending nothing else, but the vtter subuersion of all christianity, and especially also when lawes were set vp in braue against the christians, as a thing perpetually to stand: what was heere to bee looked for, but a finall desolation of the name and religion of christians? But what followed, partly yee haue heard, partly more is to be marked, as in the storie following.

The gates of hell shall not preuaile against the church builded vpon the faith of Christ.

I shewed before how Parentius, the sonne of Maximinian, was set vp at Rome by the pretorian souldiers to be emperour. Whereunto the senat, although they were not consenting, yet for feare they were not resisting. Maximinian his father, who had before depryued himselfe with Diocletian, hearing of this, toke heart againe to him, to resume his dignitie, and so laboured to perswade Diocletian also to do the same: but when he could not moue him thereunto, he repaireth to Rome, thinking to wrest the empire out of his sonnes hands. But when the souldiers would not suffer that, of a craftie purpose he flieth to Constantinus in France, vnder pretence to complaine of Parentius his sonne, but in very deed to kill Constantinus. Notwithstanding that conspiracie being detected by Fausta the daughter of Maximinian, whom Constantinus had married, so was Constantinus through the grace of God preserued, and Maximinian retired backe. In the which his flight by the way he was apprehended, and so put to death. And this is the end of Maximinian.

The death and end of Maximinian.

Now let vs returne to Parentius againe, who all this whille raigned at Rome, with tyrannie and wickednesse intollerable, much like to another Pharao or Nero. For hee slew the most part of his noble men, and toke from them their goods. And sometime in his rage he would destroy great multitudes of the people of Rome by his souldiers, as Eusebius declareth, Lib. 8. cap. 14. Also he left no mischieuous nor lasciuious act vnattempted, but was the vtter enemie of all womanly chastitie, which vsed to send the honest wiues, whom he had adulterated, with shame and dishonestie vnto their husbands (being worthie senators) after that he had rauished them. Hee abstained from no adulterous act, but was inflamed with the inquenchable lust of deflouring of women. Letus declareth that he being at a time far in loue with a noble and chast gentlewoman of Rome, sent vnto her such courtiers of his, as were meet for that purpose, whom also he had in greater estimation then any others, and with such was wont to consult about matters for the commonweale. These first fell vpon her husband and murthered him within his owne house; then when they could by no meanes neither with feare of the tyrant, or with threatning of death pull her away from him: at length she being a christian desired leaue of them to go into her chamber, and after her praiers she would accomplish that which they requested. And when she had gotten into her chamber, vnder this pretence, she killed her selfe. But the courtiers when they saw that the woman tarried so long, they being displeased therewith, brake open the doores, and found her there lying dead. Then returned they and declared this matter to the emperour, who was so farre past shame, that in stead of repentance he was the more set on fire in attempting the like.

The wickednesse of Parentius described.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 14.

A shamefull act of incontinencie.

He was also much addict to the art magicall, which to execute, he was more fit then the emperiall dignitie. Also sometime he would rip women when they were in labor, and would search the place where the infant lay, being borne a little before. Often he would inuocate diuels in a secret manner, and by the answeres of them he sought to breake the wars, which he knew Constantinus and Licinius prepared against him. And to the end he might the rather perpetrat his mischieuous and wicked attempts, which in his vngratious mind hee had conceiued, according to his purpose, in the beginning of his raigne hee fained himselfe to be a fauourer of the christians. In which thing doing, thinking to make the people of Rome his friends, hee commanded that they should cease from persecuting of the christians. And he himselfe in the meane season abstained from no contumelious veration of them, till that he began at the last to shew himselfe an open persecutour of them: at which time as Zonaras writeth he most cruelly raged against the christians thereabouts, vexing them with all manner iniuries. Which thing he in no lesse wise did, then Maximinus, as Eusebius in his eight booke and fifteenth chapter seemeth to affirme. And Platina declareth in the life of Marcellus the bishop, that hee banished a certaine noble woman of Rome, because shee gaue her goods to the church.

A monster in the likelihood of an emperour.

A lively patterne of an hypocrite.

Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 15.

Thus by the grieuous tyrannie and vnspeakeable wickednesse of this Parentius, the citizens and senatours of Rome being much grieued and oppressed, sent their complaints with letters vnto Constantinus, with much sute and most heartie petitions, desiring him to helpe and release their countrie and citie of Rome: who hearing and vnderstanding their miserable and pitifull state, and grieued therewith not a little, little, firſt ſendeth by letters to Maxentius, deſiring and exhorting him to refraine his corrupt doings, and great crueltie. But when no letters nor exhortations would preuaile, at the length pitying the wofull caſe of the Romans, gathered together his power and armie in Britaine and France, wherewith to repreſſe the violent rage of that tyrant. Thus Conſtantinus ſufficiently appointed with ſtrength of men, but eſpecially with ſtrength of God, entred his iourney comming towards Italie, which was about the laſt yeare of the perſecution, three hundred and eightéene. Maxentius vnderſtanding of the comming of Conſtantine, and truſting more to his diuelliſh art of magike, then to the good will of his ſubiects, which he little deſerued, durſt not ſhew himſelfe out of the citie, nor encounter with him in the open field, but with priuie garrisons laid in wait for him by the way, in ſundrie ſtraits as he ſhould come. With whom Conſtantine had diuers ſkirmiſhes, & by the power of the Lord did euer vanquiſh them and put them to flight. Notwithſtanding Conſtantinus yet was in no great comfort, but in great care and dread in his mind (approching now néere vnto Rome) for the magicall charmes and ſorceries of Maxentius, wherewith he had vanquiſhed before Seuerus ſent by Galerius againſt him, as hath béen declared, which made alſo Conſtantinus the more afraid. Wherefore being in great doubt and perplexitie in himſelfe, and reuoluing many things in his mind, what helpe he might haue againſt the operations of his charming, which vſed to cut women great with child, to take his diuelliſh charms by the intrals of ỹ infants, with ſuch other like feats of diuelliſhneſſe which he practiſed: theſe things (I ſay) Conſtantinus doubting and reuoluing in his mind, in his iourney drawing foward the citie, and calling vp his eyes many times to heauen, in the ſouth part, about the going downe of the ſunne, ſaw a great brightneſſe in heauen, appearing in the ſimilitude of a croſſe, with certaine ſtarres of equall bigneſſe giuing this inſcription like Latine letters, IN HOC VINCE, that is: In this ouercome. At the ſight whereof when he was greatly aſtonied, and conſulting with his men vpon the meaning thereof, behold in the night ſeaſon in his ſléepe Chriſt appeared to him with the ſigne of the ſame croſſe, which he had ſéene before, bidding him to make the figuration thereof, and to carrie it in his wars before him, and ſo ſhould he haue the victorie.

This viſion reported and teſtified by Conſtantine himſelfe to be true.

¶ Wherein is to be noted (good reader) that this ſigne of the croſſe, and theſe letters added withall, In hoc vince, was giuen to him of God, not to enduce any ſuperſtitious worſhip or opinion of the croſſe, as though the croſſe it ſelfe had any ſuch power or ſtrength in it, to obtaine victorie: but only to beare the meaning of another thing, that is, to be an admonition to him, to ſéeke and aſpire to the knowledge and faith of him, which was crucified vpon the croſſe for the ſaluation of him, and of all the world, and ſo to ſet forth the glorie of his name, as afterward it came to paſſe. This by the way. Now to the matter.

An admonition concerning the materiall croſſe not to be worſhipped, but to be a meanes to bring Conſtantine to the faith of him which was crucified.

The next day following after this nights viſion, Conſtantinus cauſed a croſſe after the ſame figuration to be made of gold and precious ſtone, and to be borne before him in ſtead of his ſtandard: and ſo with much hope of victorie and great confidence, as one armed from heauen, ſpéedeth himſelfe toward his enemie. Againſt whom Maxentius being conſtrained perforce to iſſue out of the citie, ſendeth all his power to ioyne with him in the field beyond the riuer of Tiber, where Maxentius craftily breaking downe the bridge called Pons Miluius, cauſed another deceitfull bridge to be made of botes and whirries, being ioined together, and couered ouer with bords and planks in manner of a bridge, thinking therewith to take Conſtantine as in a trap. But héere it came to paſſe, which in the ſeuenth Pſalme is written; Hée digged a pit, and fell therein himſelfe; let his working returne vpon his owne head, and his vnrighteouſnes vpon his owne pate. Which héere in this Maxentius was rightly verified. For after the two hoſts did meet, he being not able to ſuſtaine the force of Conſtantine fighting vnder the croſſe of Chriſt againſt him, was put to ſuch a flight, and driuen to ſuch an exigent, that in retiring backe, for haſte thinking to get the citie, vpon the ſame bridge which he did lay for Conſtantine, was ouerturned by the fall of his horſe into the bottome of the flood, and there with the waight of his armour, he with a great part of his beaten men were drowned. Repreſenting vnto vs the like example of Pharao and his hoſt drowned in the red ſea, who not vnaptly ſéemeth to beare a prophetical figuration of this Maxentius. For as the children of Iſrael were in long thraldome and perſecution in Egypt vnder tyrants there, till the drowning of this Pharao their laſt perſecutour: ſo was this Maxentius and Maximinus and Licinius the laſt perſecutors in the Roman monarchie of the christians, whom this Conſtantinus, fighting vnder the croſſe of Chriſt did vanquiſh and ſet the christians at libertie, who before had béen perſecuted now three hundred yeares in Rome, as hath béen hitherto in this hiſtorie declared.

Wherefore as the Iſraelites with their Moſes at the drowning of their Pharao, ſung gloriouſly vnto the Lord, who miraculouſly had caſt downe the horſe and horſemen into the ſea: ſo no leſſe reioycing and exceeding gladneſſe was héere, to ſée the glorious hand of the Lord Chriſt fighting with his people, and vanquiſhing his enemies and perſecutors.

Exod. 15. The figure of the old teſtament verified in the new.

In hiſtories we reade of many victories and great conqueſts gotten: yet we neuer reade, nor euer ſhall, of any victorie ſo wholeſome, ſo commodious, ſo opportune to mankind as this was, which made an end of ſo much bloodſhed, and obtained ſo much libertie and life to the poſteritie of ſo many generations. For albeit that ſome perſecution was yet ſtirring in the eaſt countries by Maximinus and Licinius, as ſhall be declared: yet in Rome and in all the weſt parts, no martyr died after this heauenly victorie gotten. And alſo in the eaſt parts the ſaid Conſtantinus with the ſaid croſſe borne before him, conſequently vpon the ſame ſo vanquiſhed the tyrants, and ſo eſtabliſhed the peace of the church, that for the ſpace of a full thouſand yeares after that, we reade of no ſet perſecution againſt the christians, vnto the time of John Wickliffe, when the biſhops of Rome began with fire to perſecute the true members of Chriſt, as in further proceſſe of this hiſtorie (Chriſt granting) ſhall appeare. So happie, ſo glorious (as I ſaid) was this victorie of Conſtantine, ſurnamed the great. For the ioy and gladneſſe whereof, the citizens who had ſent for him before, with exceeding triumph brought him into the citie of Rome, where he with the croſſe was moſt honorably receiued and celebrated the ſpace of ſeuen daies together, hauing moreouer in the market place, his image ſet vp, holding in his right hand the ſigne of the croſſe, with this inſcription: Hoc ſalutari ſigno, veraci fortitudinis indicio, ciuitatem noſtram iugo tyranni ereptam liberaui: that is, With this wholeſome ſigne, the true token of fortitude, I haue reſcued and deliuered our citie from the yoke of the tyrant. By this heauenly victorie of Conſtantinus, and by the death of Maxentius no little tranquillitie came vnto the church of Chriſt. Although notwithſtanding in the eaſt churches the ſtorme of this tenth perſecution was not yet altogether quieted, but that ſome taile thereof in thoſe parts remained for the ſpace of two or three yeares. But of this we mind to ſpeake (Chriſt willing) hereafter. In the meane ſeaſon to returne againe to the weſt parts héere in Europe, where Conſtantinus then had moſt to do, grat tranquillitie followed, and long continued in the church without any open ſlaughter for a thouſand yeares together (to the time of John Wickliffe and Waldenſes, as is before touched) by the meanes of the godly beginning of good Conſtantinus, who with his fellow Licinius, being now eſtabliſhed in their dominion, eftſoones ſet forth their generall proclamation or edict, not conſtraining therein any man to any religion, but giuing libertie to all men, both for the christians to perſiſt in their profeſſion without any danger, and for other men freely to adioyne with them, whoſoeuer pleaſed. Which thing was very well taken and highly allowed of the Romans, and all wiſe men. The copie of the edict or conſtitution héere enſueth.

The copie of the emperiall conſtitution of Conſtantinus and Licinius. Euſeb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

NOt long agone we weying with our ſelues, that the libertie and freedome of religion ought not in any caſe to be prohibited, but that free leaue ought to be giuen to euery man to do therin according to his wil and mind, we haue giuen commandement to all men to qualifie matters of religion as they themſelues thought good; and that alſo the chriſtians ſhould keep the opinions and faith of their religion: but becauſe that many and ſundry opinions by the ſame our firſt licence ſpring and encreaſe through ſuch libertie granted, we thought good manifeſtly to adde therunto, and make plaine ſuch things whereby perchance ſome of them in time to come, may from ſuch their obſeruance be let or hindred. When therfore by proſperous ſucceſſe, I Conſtantinus Auguſtus, and I Licinius Auguſtus came to Mediolanum, and there ſat in councel vpon ſuch things as ſerued for the vtilitie and profit of the commonweale, theſe things amongſt others we thought would be beneficiall to all men, yea and before all other things we purpoſed to eſtabliſh thoſe things wherein the true reuerence and worſhip of God is comprehended, that is, to giue vnto the chriſtians free choice to follow what religion they think good, and whereby the ſame ſincerity and celeſtiall grace which is in euery place receiued, may alſo be imbraced & accepted of al our louing ſubiects. According therfore vnto this our pleaſure vpon good aduiſement and ſound iudgement, we haue decreed, that no man ſo hardie be denied to chuſe and follow the chriſtian obſeruance or religion: but that this libertie be giuen to euery man, that he may applie his mind to what religion he thinketh meet himſelfe, whereby God may performe vpon vs all his accuſtomed care and goodnes. To the intent therefore you might know that this is our pleasure, we thought it necessarie this to write vnto you, wherby all such errors and opinions being remoued, which in our former letters (being sent vnto you in the behalfe of the christians) are contained, and which seeme very vndiscreet and contrarie to our clemencie, may bee made frustrate and adnihilat. Now therefore firmely and freely we will and command, that euery man haue a free liberty to obserue the christian religion, and that without anie griefe or molestation he may bee suffered to doe the same. These things haue we thought good to signifie vnto you by as plaine words as we may, that we haue giuen to the christians free and absolute power to keep and vse their religion. And for so much as this libertie is absolutely giuen of vs vnto them, to vse and exercise their former obseruance, if anie be disposed, it is manifest that the same helpeth much to establish the publike tranquillitie of our time, euery man to haue licence and libertie to vse and chuse what kind of worshipping he list himselfe. And this is done of vs only for the intent, that we would haue no man to be enforced to one religion more then another. And this thing also amongst others we haue prouided for the christians, that they may haue againe the possession of such places, in which heretofore they haue been accustomed to make their assemblies; so that if any haue bought or purchased the same either of vs, or of any other: the same places without either money or other recompence, forthwith and without delay we will to be restored againe vnto the said christians. And if any man haue obtained the same by gift from vs, and shall require anie recompence to be made to them in that behalfe: then let the christians repaire to the president (being the iudge appointed for that place) that consideration may be had of those men by our benignitie: all which things we will and command, that you see to be giuen and restored freely, and with diligence vnto the societie of the christians, all delay set apart. And because the christians themselues are vnderstood to haue had not only those places wherein they were accustomed to resort together, but certaine other peculiar places also, not being priuat to any one man, but belonging to the right of their congregation and societie: you shall see also all those to be restored vnto the christians, that is to say, to euery fellowship and company of them, according to the decree, whereof we haue made mention, all delay set apart. Prouided that the order we haue take in the meane time be obserued, that if any (taking no recompence) shall restore the same lands and possessions, they shall not mistrust but be sure to be saued harmelesse by vs. In all these things it shall be your part to employ your diligence in the behalfe of the foresaid companie of the christians, whereby this our commandement may speedily be accomplished, and also in this case by our clemencie the common and publike peace may be preserued. For vndoubtedly by this meanes, as before we haue said, the good will and fauour of God towards vs (whereof in many cases we haue had good experience) shall alwaies continue with vs. And to the intent that this our constitution may be notified to all men, it shall be requisit that the copie of these our letters be set vp in all places, that men may reade and know the same, lest any should be ignorant thereof.

The effect of the decree which Maximinus made against his will, or surrecountermand for feare of C. and L. in the behalfe of the christians.

wherein he pretendeth to write to Sabinus afore mentioned, first repeating vnto him the former decree of Diocletian and Maximinian in few words, with the commandement therein contained touching the persecution against the christians. After that, he reciteth the decree which he himselfe made against them, when he came first to the emperiall dignitie in the east part ioyned with Constantius. Then the countermand of another decree of his again, for the rescuing of the christians, with such fained and pretensed causes, as is in the same to be seene. After that, he declareth how he comming to Nicomedia, at the sute and supplication of the citizens (which he also fained, as may appeare before) he applying to their sute, reuoked that his former edict, and granted them that no christian should dwell within their citie or territories. Vpon which Sabinus also had giuen forth his letters, rehearsing withall the generall recountermand sent forth by him, for the persecution againe of the christians. Last of all now he sendeth downe againe another surrecountermand, with the causes therein contained, touching the safetie of the christians, and tranquillitie of them: commanding Sabinus to publish the same. Which edict of his is at large set forth of Eusebius, lib. 9. cap. 9. But this surrecountermand he then dissembled, as he had done in the other before. Howbeit shortly after, he making wars, and fighting a battell with Licinius, wherein he lost the victorie, comming home againe, tooke great indignation against the priests and prophets of his gods, whom before that time he had great regard vnto, and honoured: vpon whose answeres he trusting, and depending vpon their inchantments, began his war against Licinius. But after that he perceiued himselfe to be deceiued by them, as by wicked inchanters and deceiuers, and such as had betrayed his safetie and person, he killed and put them to death. And he shortly after, oppressed with a certain disease, glorified the God of the christians, and made a most absolute law for the safetie and preseruation of them, with franchise and libertie: the copie whereof ensueth.

The surrecountermand of Maximinus dissembled. Ex Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 9.

The vnfained repentance and finall decree of Maximinus for the christians.

Imperator Cæsar, Gaius, Valerius, Maximinus, Germanicus, Pius, Fortunatus, Augustus. It is necessarie that we alwaies carefully prouide and see vnto the benefit and commoditie of such as be our subiects, and to exhibit such things vnto them, whereby they may best obtaine the same. But we suppose that there are none of you so ignorant, but know and vnderstand what things make best for the profit and commoditie of the commonweale, and best please euery mans disposition. But it is meet and conuenient that euery man haue recourse to that which they haue seene done before their eyes, & that all sorts of men consider the same, and beare it in their minds. When therefore, and that before this time, it came to our knowledge, vpon the occasion that Diocletianus, and Maximinianus, our progenitors of famous memorie, commanded the assemblies and meetings of the christians to be cut off, there were many of them spoiled and robbed of our officials: which thing we also perceiue is now put in practise against our subiects, that they in like case may bee spoiled of their goods and substance, which thing chiefely to preuent is our only endeuour. By our letters sent to the gouernors of euery prouince the yeare past, we ordained that if any man were disposed to leane vnto the christian religion, that he might without any iniurie done vnto him accomplish his desire, neither to be of any man either let or molested: and that he might without any feare or suspicion, do whatsoeuer he therein thought good. But now also we vnderstand that there be certain iudges which haue neglected our commandement, and haue put our subiects in doubt, whether that hath been our pleasure or not; which thing they did, that such men might be the better aduised, how they entred into such religion: wherin they followed their own phantasie. To the intent therefore that after this, all suspicion, doubt, and feare may be taken away: we haue thought good to publish this our edict, whereby it may be made manifest to euery man, that it shall be lawfull for all such as will follow that religion, by the benefit of this our grant and letters patents, to vse what religion they like best. And also hereby we grant to them licence to build them oratories or temples. And furthermore, that this our grant may more amplie extend vnto them, we vouchsafe to appoint and ordaine, that whatsoeuer lands and substance before belonging and appertaining to the christians, and by the commandement of our predecessors were transposed to our reuenue and excheker, or else be in the possession of any citie, by meanes of the franchises of the same, or else otherwise sold or giuen to any man: all and euery parcell thereof we command shall be restored vnto the proper vse of the christians againe, wherby they may all haue in this matter more experience of our godly deuotion and prouidence. Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 10.

God maketh his enemies to confesse him.

Maximinus thus being conquered of Licinius, and also plagued with an incurable disease in the guts, sent by the hand of God, was compelled by torments and aduersitie to confesse the true God, whom before he regarded not, and to write this edict in the fauour of those christians, whom before he did persecute. Thus the Lord doth make many times his enemies, be they neuer so sterne and stout, at length to stoope, and maugre their hearts to confesse him, as this Maximinus here did, who not long after, by the vehemencie of his disease ended his life. Whereby no more tyrants now were left aliue, to trouble the church, but only Licinius. Of which Licinius, and of his

The destruction of the cruell emperours.

Diocletian dieth for sorrow.

By these histories I doubt not (good reader) but thou doest right well consider and behold with thy selfe the maruellous working of Gods mightie power; to see so many emperors at one time conspired and confederat together against the Lord and Christ his annointed, whose names before we haue recited, as Diocletian, Maximinian, Galerius, Marentius, Maximinus, Seuerus, Licinius, who hauing the subiection of the whole world vnder their dominion, did bend and extend their whole might and deuices to extirpat the name of Christ, and of all christians. Wherin if the power of man could haue preuailed, what could they not do? or what could they do more then they did? If policie or deuices could haue serued, what policie was there lacking? If torments or paines of death could haue helped, what crueltie of torment by man could be inuented, which was not attempted? If lawes, edicts, proclamations, written not only in tables, but ingrauen in brasse, could haue stood, all this was practised against the weake christians. And yet notwithstanding, to see how no counsell can stand against the Lord, note heere how all these be gone, and yet Christ and his church doth stand. First, of the taking away of Maximinian you haue heard, also of the death of Seuerus, of the drowning moreouer of Maxentius enough hath been said. What a terrible plague was vpon Galerius, consuming his priuie members with lice, hath been also described. How Diocletian the quondam being at Salona, hearing of the proceedings of Constantinus, and this edict, either for sorrow died, or as some say did poison himselfe. Only Maximinus now in the east parts remained aliue, who bare a deadly hatred against the christians, and no lesse expressed the same with mortall persecution, to whom Constantine and Licinius caused this constitution of theirs to be deliuered. At the sight whereof, although he was somewhat appalled, and defeated of his purpose: yet for so much as he saw himselfe too weake to resist the authoritie of Constantinus and Licinius the superiour princes: he dissembled his counterfeit pietie, as though he himselfe had tendered the quiet of the christians: directing downe a certaine decree in the behalfe of the christians, persecutions stirred vp in the east parts, against the saints of God, now remaineth in order of storie to prosecute.

The persecution of the church vnder Licinius.

This Licinius being a Dane borne, and made first Cesar by Galerius, as is aboue specified, was afterward ioined with Constantinus in gouernment of the empire, and in setting forth the edicts, which before we haue described: although it seemeth all this to be done of him with a dissembling mind. For so is he in all histories described, to be a man passing all others in desire of vnsatiable riches, giuen to lecherie, hastie, stubborne, and furious. To learning he was such an enemy, that he named the same a poison and a common pestilence, and especially the knowledge of the lawes. He thought no vice worse became a prince then learning, because he himselfe was vnlearned. Eutropius, Lætus, Ignatius, Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

An enemie to learning. Euseb. lib. 8. cap. 13.

There was betweene him and Constantinus in the beginning great familiaritie, and such agreement, that Constantinus gaue vnto him his sister Constantia in matrimonie, as Aurelius Victor writeth. Neither would any man haue thought him to haue been of any other religion then Constantinus was of, he seemed in all things so well to agree with him. Wherevpon he made a decree with Constantinus for the behalfe of the christians, as we haue shewed: Euseb. lib. 9. cap. 9. And such was Licinius in the beginning: but after arming himselfe with tyrannie, began to conspire against the person of Constantinus, of whom he had received so great benefits, neither fauourable to the law of nature, nor mindfull of his oths, his bloud, nor promises. But when he considered that in his conspiracies hee nothing preuailed, for that he saw Constantinus was preserued and safely defended of God: and partly being puffed vp with the victorie against Maximinus, he began vehemently to hate him, and not onely to reiect the christian religion, but also deadly to hate the same. He said hee would become an enemie vnto the christians, for that in their assemblies and meetings they prayed not for him, but for Constantinus. Therefore first by little and little and that secretly, he went about to wrong and hurt the christians, and banished them his court, which neuer were by any means preiuditiall to his kingdome. Then he commanded that all those should be depriued which were knights of the honorable order, vnlesse they would do sacrifice to diuels: Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 8. The same persecution afterwards stretched hee from his court, into all his prouinces, which with most wicked and deuised lawes he set forth. First, that for no cause the bishops should in any matter communicat together: neither that any man should come at the churches next vnto them, or to call any assemblies, and consult for the necessarie matters and vtilitie of the church.

The fountaine of apostasie.

Knights of the order depriued for not doing sacrifice. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 8.

After, that the men and women together should not come in companies to pray, nor that the women should come in those places where they vsed to preach and reade the word of God; neither that they should be after that instructed any more of the bishops, but should chose out such women amongst them as should instruct them. The third most cruell and wickedst of all was, that none should helpe and succour those that were cast in prison, nor should bestow any almes or charitie vpon them, though they should die for hunger: and they which shewed any compassion vpon those that were condemned to death should be as greatly punished, as they to whom they shewed the same should bee: Eusebius libro primo de vita Constantini. These were the most horrible constitutions of Licinius, which went beyond and passed the bounds of nature.

A strict charge against the releiuing of the imprisoned christians.

Euseb. lib. 1. de vita Constatini.

After this he vsed violence against the bishops, but yet not openly, for feare of Constantinus, but priuilie and by conspiracie: by which meanes he slue those that were the worthiest men amongst the doctors and prelats. And about Amasea and other cities of Pontus, hee raced the churches euen with the ground. Other some he shut vp, that no man should come after their accustomed maner to pray and worship God: and therefore as we said before, his conscience accusing him, all this he did, for that he suspected they prayed for Constantinus, and not at all for him. And from this place in the east parts to the Libians, which bordered vpon the Egyptians, the christians durst not assemble and come together for the displeasure of Licinius, which he had conceiued against them. Sozomenus, lib. 1. cap. 2.

Secret persecution for feare of Constantinus.

Sozomenus, lib. 1. cap. 2.

Furthermore, the flattering officers that were vnder him, thinking by this means to please him, slue and made out of the way many bishops, and without any cause put them to death, as though they had bene homicides and hainous offendors: and such rigorousnes vsed they towards some of them, that they cut their bodies into gobbets and small peeces in manner of a butcher, and after that threw them into the sea to feed the fishes. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 8. What shall we speake of the exiles and confiscations of good and vertuous men? For he tooke by violence euery mans substance, and cared not by what meanes he came by the same: but threatned them with death, vnlesse they would forgo the same. He banished those which had committed none euill at all. Hee commanded that both gentlemen and men of honour should bee made out of the way; neither yet herewith content, but gaue their daughters that were vnmaried to varlets and wicked ones to be defloured. And Licinius himselfe (although that by reason of his yeres his bodie was spent) yet shamefullie did he vitiate many women, mens wiues & maids. Euseb. lib. 1. de vita Constantini. Which cruell outrage of him caused many godly men of their owne accord to forsake their houses: and it was also seene, that the woods, fields, desert places and mountains were faine to be the habitations and resting places of the poore and miserable christians. Euseb. lib. 10. cap. 14. Of those worthie men and famous martyrs, which in this persecution found the way to heauen, Nicephorus lib. 7. cap. 10. first speaketh of Theodorus, who first being hanged vpon the crosse, had nailes thrust into his armepits, and after that his head stricken off. Also of another Theodorus being the bishop of Tyre: the third was a man of Perga; Basilius also the bishop of Amasenus, Nicholaus the bishop of Myrorus, Gregorius of Armenia the great; after that Paul of Neocesaria, which by the impious commandement of Licinius had both his hands cut off with a searing iron. Besides these were in the citie of Sebastia fortie worthie men, and christian souldiers in the vehement cold time of winter soiled and drowned in a horse pond, when Lucias as yet, of whom wee spake before, and Agricolaus executing the shiriffes office vnder Licinius in the east parts, were aliue: and were in great estimation, for inuenting of new and strange torments against the christians. The wiues of those fortie good men were carried to Heraclea a city in Thracia, and there, with a certaine deacon whose name was Amones, were (after innumerable torments by them most constantly indured) slaine with the sword. These things writeth Nicephorus. Also Sozomenus in his ninth book and second chapter maketh mention of the same martyrs. And Basilius in a certaine oration seemeth to intreat of their historie, sauing that in the circumstances he somewhat varieth. And surelie Licinius was determined, for that the first face of this persecution fell out according to his desire, to haue ouerrun all the christians: to which thing neither counsell, nor good will, nor yet opportunitie perchance wanted; vnlesse God had brought Constantinus into those parts where he gouerned: where, in the warres which he himselfe began (knowing right well that Constantinus had intelligence of his conspiracie and treason) ioyning battell with him, was most cowardly ouercome.

The wicked purpose of Licinius, had he not been preuented by God and slaine by Constantinus.

Diuers battels betweene them were fought, the first fought in Hungarie, where Licinius was ouerthrowne: then he fled into Macedonia, and reparing his armie, was againe discomfited. Finally, being vanquished both by sea and land, he lastly at Nicomedia yeelded himselfe to Constantine, and was commanded to liue a priuat life in Thessalia, where at length he was slaine by the souldiers.

Licinius ouercome in battell by Constantinus.

Thus haue ye heard the end and conclusion of al the seuen tyrants which were the authors and workers of this tenth and last persecution against the true people of God. The chiefe captaine and incentour of which persecution was first Diocletian, who died at Salena as some say, by his owne poison, in the yeere of our Lord three hundred and nineteene. The next was Maximinian, who (as is said) was hanged of Constantine at Massilia, about the yeere of our Lord three hundred and tenne. Then died Galerius, plagued with an horrible disease sent of God. Seuerus was slaine by Maximinã, father of Maxentius the wicked tyrant, who was ouercome & vanquished of Constantine, in the yeere of our Lord three hundred and eightéene. Maximinus the first tyrant tarried not long after, who being ouercome by Licinius, died about the yeere of our Lord three hundred and twentie. Lastly, how this Licinius was ouercome by Constantine and slaine, in the yeere of our Lord three hundred twentie and foure, is before declared. Onelie Constantius, the father of Constantine being a good and a godlie emperour, died in the third yeere of the persecution, in the yeere of our Lord three hundred and ten, and was buried at Yorke. After whom succeeded after his godly father Constantinus, as a second Moses sent and set vp of God to deliuer his people out of this so miserable captiuitie, into libertie most ioyfull.

The end and death of the tyrants which were the authors of this tenth persecution.

Now remaineth after the end of these persecutors thus described, to gather vp the names and stories of certaine particular martyrs, which now are to be set forth worthie of speciall memorie, for their singular constancie and fortitude, shewed in their sufferings and cruell torments. The names of all which that suffered in this foresaid tenth persecution, being in number infinit, in vertue most excellent, it is impossible heere to comprehend: but the most notable, and in most approoued authors expressed, we thought here to insert, for the more edification of other christians, which may and ought to loke vpon their examples, first beginning with Albanus, the first martyr that euer in England suffered death for the name of Christ.

A briefe storie of the most notable martyrs, that suffered in this tenth persecution.

At what time Diocletian and Maximinian the pagan emperours had directed out their letters with all seueritie, for the persecuting of the christians; Alban being then an infidell, receiued into his house a certaine clerke, fleeing from the persecutors hands, whom when Alban beheld, continuallie both day and night to persenere in watching and prayer, suddenlie by the great mercie of God, hee began to imitate the example of his faith and vertuous life: whereupon by little and little hee being instructed by his wholesome exhortation, and leauing the blindnesse of his idolatrie, became at length a perfect christian. And when the forenamed clerke had lodged with him a certaine time, it was informed the wicked prince, that this good man and confessour of Christ (not yet condemned to death) was harbored in Albans house, or very nere vnto him. Wherevpon vpon immediatly he gaue in charge to the souldiers, to make more diligent inquisition of the matter. Who as sone as they came to the house of Alban the martyr, he by and by putting on the apparell wherewith his ghest and master was apparelled (that is, a garment at that time vsed, named caracalla) offered himselfe in the stead of the other to the souldiers: who binding him, brought him forthwith to the iudge. It fortuned that at that instant when blessed Alban was brought vnto the iudge they found the same iudge at the altars offering sacrifice vnto diuels, who as sone as he saw Alban, was straightwaies in a great rage, for that he would presume of his owne voluntarie will, to offer himselfe to perill, and giue himselfe a prisoner to the souldiers, for safegard of his ghest whom he harbored; and commanded him to be brought before the images of the diuels whom he worshipped, saying: For that thou haddest rather hid and conuey away a rebell, then to deliuer him to the officers, and that (as a contemner of our gods) he should not suffer punishment and merit of his blasphemie: loke what punishment he shuld haue had, thou for him shalt suffer the same, if I perceiue thée any whit to reuolt from our manner of worshipping. But blessed Alban, who of his owne accord had bewraied to the persecutors that he was a christian, feared not at all the menaces of the prince, but being armed with spirituall armour, openly pronounced that he would not obay his commandement. Then said the iudge; Of what stocke or kindred art thou come? Alban answered, What is that to you, of what stocke so euer I came of, if you desire to heare the veritie of my religion, I doe yée to wit that I am a christian, and apply my selfe altogether to that calling. Then said the iudge, I would know thy name, and sée thou tell mee the same without delay. Then said he, My parents named me Alban, and I worship and honor the true and liuing God, which hath created al the world. Then said the iudge fraught with furie, If thou wilt inioy the felicitie of this present life, doe sacrifice (and that out of hand) to these mightie gods. Alban repleth: These sacrifices which yée offer vnto diuels, can neither helpe them that offer the same, neither yet can they accomplish the desires and prayers of their suppliants: but rather shall they, whatsoeuer they be, that offer sacrifice to these idols, receiue for their méed euerlasting paines of hell fire. The iudge, when he heard these words, was passing angrie, and commanded the tormentors to whip this holy confessour of God, indeuoring to ouercome the constancie of his heart with stripes, which had preuailed nothing with words. And when he was cruellie beaten, yet suffered he the same patiently, nay rather ioyfully for the Lords sake. Then when the iudge saw that he would not with torments be ouercome, nor be reduced from the worship of christian religion, he commanded him to be beheaded.

The rest that followeth of this storie in the narration of Beda, as of drying vp the riuer, as Alban went to the place of his execution; then of making a welspring in the top of the hill, and of the falling out of the eies of him that did behead him (with such other prodigious miracles mentioned in his story) because they séeme more legendlike then truthlike: againe, because I sée no great profit nor necessitie in the relation thereof, I leaue them to the frée iudgement of the reader, to thinke of them as cause shall moue him.

Superfluous miracles in this storie written by Beda omitted.

The like estimation I haue of the long storie, wherein is written at large a fabulous discourse of all the doings and miracles of S. Alban, taken out of the librarie of S. Albans, compiled (as there is said) by a certaine pagan, who (as he saith) afterward went to Rome, there to be baptised. But because in the beginning or prologue of the booke, the said writer maketh mention of the ruinous walles of the towne of Verolamium, containing the storie of Albanus, & of his bitter punishments: which walles were then falling downe for age, at the writing of the said booke, as he saith: thereby it séemeth this storie to be written a great while after the martyrdome of Alban, either by a Britaine, or by an Englishman. If he were a Britaine, how then did the Latine translation take it out of the English tongue, as in the prologue he himselfe doth testifie? If he were an Englishman, how then did he go vp to Rome for baptisme, being a pagan, when he might haue béen baptised among the christian Britains more nére at home?

The legend of S. Alban disproued.

But among all other euidences and declarations sufficient to disproue this legendarie storie of S. Alban, nothing maketh more against it, then the very storie it selfe: as where hée bringeth in the head of the holy martyr, to speake vnto the people after it was smitten off from the bodie. Also where he bringeth in the angels going vp and comming down in a pillar of fire, and singing all the night long. Item, in the riuer which he saith S. Alban made drie, such as were drowned in the same before in the bottome, were found aliue. With other such like monkish miracles and grosse fables, wherewith these abbie monks were wont in times past to deceiue the church of God, and to beguile the whole world for their owne aduantage. Notwithstanding this I write not to any derogation of the blessed and faithfull martyr of God, who was the first that I did euer find in this realme, to suffer martyrdome for the testimonie of Christ. And worthie no doubt of condigne commendation, especially of vs héere in this land; whose christian faith in the Lord, and charitie toward his neighbour, I pray God all wée may follow. As also I wish moreouer that the stories both of him, and of all other christian martyrs might haue been deliuered to vs simplie as they were, without the admixture of all these abbeylike additions of monkish miracles, wherewith they were wont to paint out the glorie of such saints to the most, by whose offerings they were accustomed to receiue most aduantage.

S. Alban the first martyr in this realme of England.

The stories of the saints corrupted with lies.

As touching the name of the clerke mentioned in this storie, whom Alban receiued into his house, I find in the English stories to bee Amphibalus, although the Latine authors name him not, who the same time flying into Wales, was also fet from thence againe to the same towne of Verolamium, otherwise called Verlancaster, where he was martyred, hauing his bellie opened, and made to run about a stake, while all his bowels were drawne out, then thrust in with swords and daggers: and at last was stoned to death, as the forsaid legend declareth.

Moreouer the same time with Alban suffered also two citizens of the forsaid citie of Verlancaster, whose names were Aaron and Julius: beside others, whereof a great number the same time no doubt did suffer, although our chronicles of their names dos make no rehearsall.

Aaron, Julius martyrs.

The time of the martyrdom of this blessed Alban and the other, séemeth to be about the second or third yéere of this tenth persecution, vnder the tyrannie of Diocletian, and Maximinianus Herculius, bearing then the rule in England, about the yéere of our Lord three hundred and one, before the comming of Constantius to his gouernment. Where, by the way is to be noted, that this realme of Britaine being so christened before, yet neuer was touched with any other of the nine persecutions, before this tenth persecution of Diocletian and Maximinian. In which persecution our stories and Polychronicon doe record, that all christiantie almost in the whole Iland was destroyed, the churches subuerted, all bookes of the scripture burned, many of the faithfull both men and women were slaine: amongest whom the first and chiefe ringleader (as hath been said) was Albanus. And thus much touching the martyrs of Britaine. Now from England to returne againe vnto other countries, where this persecution did more behementlie rage: we will adde hereunto (the Lord willing) the stories of others, although not of all that suffred in this persecution (which were impossible) but of certaine most principall, whose singular constancie in their strong torments are chiefly renowned in latter histories: beginning first with Romanus the notable and admirable souldier and true seruant of Christ, whose historie set forth in Prudentius, doth thus proceed: so lamentablie by him described, that it will be hard for any man almost with drie cheekes to heare it.

Persecution in this realme of Britaine.

Pitiesse Galerius with his grand captaine Asclepiades violentlie inuaded the citie of Antioch, intending by force of armes to driue all christians to renounce vtterly their pure religion. The christians as God would, were at that time congregated together, to whom Romanus hastily ran, declaring that the wolues were at hand which would deuoure the christian flocke: but feare not (said he) neither let this imminent perill disturbe you my brethren. Brought was it to passe, by the great grace of God working in Romanus, that old men and matrons, fathers and mothers, young men and maidens were all of one will and mind, most readie to shed their bloud in defence of their christian profession. Word was brought vnto the captaine, that the band of armed souldiers was not able to wrest the staffe of faith out of the hand of the armed congregation, and all by reason that one Romanus so mightily did incourage them, that they sticke not to offer their naked throtes, wishing gloriouslie to die for the name of their Christ. Séeke out that rebel (quoth the captaine) and bring him to me that he may answer for the whole sect. Apprehended he was, and bound as a sheepe appointed to the slaughter house, was presented to the emperor, who with wrathfull countenance beholding him, said: What? Art thou the author of this sedition? Art thou the cause why so many shall lose their liues? By the gods I sweare thou shalt smart for it, and first in thy flesh shalt thou suffer the paines, whereunto thou hast incouraged the hearts of thy fellowes. Romanus answered: Thy sentence O emperour I ioyfully imbrace, I refuse not to be sacrificed for my brethren, and that by as cruell means as thou maist inuent: and whereas thy souldiers were repelled from the christian congregation, that so happened, because it lay not in idolaters and worshippers of diuels, to enter into the holy house of God, and to pollute the place of true prayer. Then Asclepiades wholie inflamed with this stout answer, commanded him to be trussed vp, and his bowels drawne out. The executioners themselues more pitifull in heart then the captaine, said: Not so sir, this man is of noble parentage, vnlawfull is it to put a noble man to so vnnoble a death. Scourge him then with whips (quoth the captain) with knaps of lead at the ends. In stead of teares, sighs and grones, Romanus sung psalmes all the time of his whipping, requiring them not to fauour him for nobilitie sake; Not the bloud of my progenitors (said he) but christian profession maketh me noble. Then with great power of spirit he inueied against the captaine, laughing to scorne the false gods of the heathen, with the idolatrous worshipping of them, affirming the God

God of the christians to be the true God that created heauen and earth, before whose iudiciall seat all nations shall appeare. But the wholsome words of the martyr were as oile to the fire of the captains furie. The more the martyr spake, the madder was he, in so much that he commanded the martyrs sides to be lanced with knives, vntill the bones appeared white againe. Sorie am I, O captaine (quoth ẏ martyr) not for that my flesh shall be thus cut and mangled, but for thy cause am I sorowfull, who being corrupted with damnable errours, seducest others. The second time hee preached at large the liuing God, and the Lord Iesus Christ his welbeloued sonne, eternall life through faith in his bloud, expelling therewith the abomination of idolatrie, with a vehement exhortation to worship and adore the liuing God. At these words Asclepiades commanded the tormentors to strike Romanus on the mouth, that his téeth being stricken out, his pronunciatiõ at least wise might be impaired. The commandement was obayed, his face buffeted, his eie lids torne with their nails, his cheeks scorched with knives, the skin of his beard was plucked by little and little from the flesh, finallie his seemely face was wholly defaced. The meeke martyr said: I thanke thée, O captaine, that thou hast opened vnto me many mouths, whereby I may preach my Lord and Sauiour Christ. Looke how many wounds I haue, so many mouths I haue lauding and praysing God. The captaine astonished with this singular constancy, commanded them to ceasse from the tortures. He threatneth cruell fire, he reuileth the noble martyr, he blasphemeth God, saying: Thy crucified Christ is but a yesterdaies God, the gods of the gentiles are of most antiquitie.

The preaching of Romanus to the captaine.

Antiquitie alleaged of the pagans.

Heere againe Romanus taking good occasion, made a long oration of the eternitie of Christ, of his humane nature, of the death and satisfaction of Christ for all mankind. Which done, he said: Giue me a child (O captaine (but seuen yéeres of age, which age is frée from malice and other vices, wherewith riper age is commonly infected, and thou shalt heare what he will say. His request was granted. A prettie boy was called out of the multitude, and set before him. Tell mee my babe (quoth the martyr) whether thou thinke it reason that we worship one Christ, and in Christ one father, or els that we worship infinit gods? Vnto whom the babe answered: That certainly, whatsoeuer it be that men affirme to be God, must néeds be one: which with one, is one & the same: and in as much as this one is Christ, of necessitie Christ must be the true God; for that there be many gods, we children cannot beleeue. The captaine hereat cleane amazed, said: Thou young villaine and traitor, where and of whom learnedst thou this lesson? Of my mother (quoth the child) with whose milke I sucked in this lesson, that I must beléeue in Christ. The mother was called, and she gladly appeared. The captaine commanded the child to be hoysed vp, & scourged. The pitifull beholders of this pitifull act, could not temper themselues from teares: the ioyfull and glad mother alone, stood by with drie cheéks: yea, she rebuked her sweet babe for crauing a draught of cold water, shée charged him to thirst after the cup that the infants of Bethléem once dranke of, forgetting their mothers milke and paps: shée willed him to remember little Isaac, who beholding the sword wherewith, and the altar whereon he should be sacrificed, willingly proffered his tender necke to the dint of his fathers sword. Whilest this counsell was in giuing, the butcherly tortor plucked the skin from the crowne of his head haire and all. The mother cried,

An example of vertuous education.

Suffer my child, anon thou shalt passe to him that will adorne thy naked head with a crowne of eternall glorie. The mother counselleth, the child is counselled: the mother incourageth, the babe is incouraged, and receiued the stripes with smiling countenance. The captaine perceiuing the child inuincible, and himselfe vanquished, committeth the sillie soule, the blessed babe, the child vncherished, to the stinking prison, commanding the torments of Romanus to bee renewed and increased, as chiefe author of this euill.

A godly mother of a godly child.

Thus was Romanus brought forth again to new stripes and punishments, to be renewed & receiued vpon his old sores, in so much as the bare bones appeared, the flesh al torne away: wherein no pity was shewed, but the raging tyrant puffing out of his blasphemous mouth, like a mad man these words, cried out to the tormentors, saying:

The cruell words of the tyrant.

Where is (quoth the captaine) where is your might?
What? are yee not able one bodie to spill?
Scant may it, so weake is it, stand vpright:
And yet in spite of vs, shall it liue still?

The griph with talen, the dog with his tooth,
Could soone ye dastards, this corps rent and teare:
He scorneth our gods in all that he dooth,
Cut, pricke, and pounce him, no longer forbeare.

Yea, no longer could the tyrant forbeare, but néeds he must draw neerer to the sentence of death. Is it painefull to thée (said he) to tarrie so long aliue? A flaming fire doubt thou not shall be prepared for thee by and by, wherein thou and that boy thy fellow of rebellion shall be consumed into ashes. Romanus and the babe were led to the place of execution. As they laid hands on Romanus, hee looked backe, saying: I appeale from this thy tyrannie, O Iudge vniust, vnto the righteous throne of Christ that vpright iudge: not because I feare thy cruell torments and merciless handlings, but that thy iudgements may be knowne to be cruell and bloudie. Now when they were come to the place, the tormentor required the child of the mother, for she had taken it vp in her armes: and she oncle kissing it, deliuered the babe; Farewell, she said, my sweet childe. And as the hangman applied his sword to the babes necke, shee sang on this manner:

The christian child beheaded for confessing of Christ.

All laud and praise with heart and voice,
O Lord we yeeld to thee:
To whom the death of all thy saints,
We know most deare to bee.

Nature ouercome of religion.

The innocents head being cut off, the mother wrapped it vp in her garment, and laid it to her breast. On the other side a mightie fire was made, whereinto Romanus was cast, who said, that he should not burne: wherewith a great storme arose (if it be true) and quenched the fire. The captaine gaue in commandement that his tongue should bee cut out. But was it plucked by the hard roots and cut off: neuertheleslie hee spake, saying: He that speaketh Christ shall neuer want a tongue; thinke not that the voice that vttereth Christ, hath néed of the tongue to be the minister. The captaine at this, halfe out of his wit, bare in hand that the hangman deceiued the sight of the people by some subtill sleight and craftie conueiance. Not so (quoth the hangman) if ye suspect my déed, open his mouth and diligently search the roots of his tongue. The captain at length being confounded with the fortitude and courage of the martyr, straitly commandeth him to be brought backe into the prison, and there to be strangled. Where his sorowfull life and paines being ended, he now inioyeth quiet rest in the Lord, with perpetuall hope of his miserable bodie to be restored againe with his soule into a better life: where no tyrant shall haue any power: Prudentius in hymnis de coronis martyrum.

Gordius was a citizen of Cesaria, a worthie souldier, and captaine of an hundred men. He in the time of extreame persecution, refusing any longer to execute his charge, did choose of his owne accord willing exile, and liued in the desert many yéeres a religious and solitarie life. But vpon a certaine day when a solemne feast of Mars was celebrated in the citie of Cesarea, and much people were assembled in the theatre to behold the games: he left the desert, and got him vp into the chiefe place of the theatre, and with a loud voice vttered this saying of the apostle: Behold I am found of them which sought me not, and to those which asked not for me haue I openlie appeared. By which words he let it to be vnderstood, that of his owne accord he came vnto those games. At this noise, the multitude little regarding the sights, looked about to see who it was that made such exclamation. As soone as it was knowne to be Gordius, and that the crier had commanded silence, hee was brought vnto the shiriffe, who at that instant was present, and ordained the games. When he was asked the question who he was, from whence, and for what occasion he came thither, he telleth the truth of euery thing as it was; I am come, saith he, to publish, that I set nothing by your decrees against the christian religion, but that I professe Iesu Christ to be my hope and saletie; and when I vnderstood with what crueltie yée handle other men, I tooke this as a fit time to accomplish my desire. The shiriffe with these words was greatly moued, and reuengeth all his displeasure vpon poore Gordius, commanding the executioners to be brought out with scourges, while gibbet, and whatsoeuer torments els might be deuised. Whereunto Gordius answered, saying, that it should be to him an hinderance and damage if he could not suffer and endure diuers torments and punishments for Christ his cause. The shiriffe being more offended with this his boldnesse, commanded him to feele as many kind of torments as there were. With al which Gordius notwithstanding could not be mastered or ouercome: but lifting vp his eies vnto heauen, singeth this saying out of the psalmes: The Lord is my helper, I will not feare the thing that man can doe to me: and also this saying, I will feare none euill, because thou Lord art with me.

After this, he against himselfe prouoketh the extremity of the tormentors, and blameth them if they fauour him any thing at all. When the shiriffe saw that hereby he could win but little, he goeth about by gentlenesse and inticing words, to turne the stout and valiant mind of Gordius. He promiseth to him great and large offers if he will deny Christ: as to make him a captaine of as many men as any other is, to giue him riches, treasure, and what other thing soeuer he desireth. But in vaine (as the prouerb is) pipeth the minstrell to him that hath no eares to heare, for he deriding the foolish madnesse of the magistrat saith, that it lieth not in him to place any in authoritie, which be worthie to haue a place in heauen. The magistrat with these words throughlie angred and vered, prepareth himselfe to his condemnation. Whom after that he had condemned, he causeth to be had out of the citie to be burnt. There run out of the citie great multitudes by heapes to see him put to execution, some take him in their armes, and louingly kisse him, him, perswading him to take a better way, & saue himselfe and that with weeping teares. To whom Gordius answered, Weep not I pray you for me, but rather for the enemies of God which alwaies make war against the christians; weep, I say, for them which prepare for vs a fire, purchasing hell fire for themselues in the day of vengeance: and cease off further, I pray you, to molest and disquiet my setled mind. Truly (saith he) I am readie for the name of Christ, to suffer & indure a thousand deaths if need were. Some other came vnto him, which perswaded him to denie Christ with his mouth, and to keepe his conscience to himselfe. My tongue (saith he) which by ȳ goodnes of God I haue, cannot be brought to denie the author and giuer of the same: for with the heart we beleeue vnto righteousnesse, and with the tongue we confesse vnto saluation. Many mo such like words he spake: but especially vttering to them such matter, whereby he might perswade the beholders to death, and to the desire of martyrdome. After all which, with a merrie and glad countenance, neuer changing so much as his colour, hee willinglie gaue himselfe to bee burnt. Basilius in sermone in Gordium militem Cæsariensem.

The martyrdome of Gordius.

Ex Basilio in ser. in Gordium militem Cæsariensem.

Not much vnlike to the storie of Gordius is the storie also of Menas an Egyptian, who being likewise a souldier by his profession, in this persecution of Diocletian forsoke all, and went into the desert; where a long time he gaue himselfe to abstinence, watching, and meditation of the scriptures. At length returning againe to the citie Cotis, there in the open theatre, as the people were occupied vpon their spectacles or pastimes, he with a loud voice openly proclamed himselfe to bee a christian, & vpon the same was brought to Pyrrhus the president: of whom hee being demanded of his faith, made this answer: Conuenient it is that I should (saith he) confesse God, in whom is light and no darkenesse, for so much as Paul doth teach that with heart we beleeue to righteousnesse, with mouth confession is giuen to saluation. After this the innocent martyr was most painefully pinched and cruciat with sundry punishments. In all which notwithstanding he declared a constant heart, and faith inuincible, hauing these words in his mouth being in the middest of his torments: There is nothing in my mind that can bee compared to the kingdome of heauen; neither is all the world, if it were weied in balance, able to bee conferred with the price of one soule: and said, Who is able to separate vs from the loue of Jesus Christ our Lord? shall affliction or anguish? And moreouer (said he) I haue thus learned of my Lord and my King, not to feare them which kill the bodie and haue no power to kill the soule, but to feare him rather, who hath power to destroy both bodie and soule in hell fire. To make the storie short, after manifold torments borne of him, and suffered, when the last sentence of death was vpon him pronounced, which was to be beheaded; Menas being then had to the place of execution said: I giue thee thanks my Lord God, which hast so accepted me to be found a partaker of thy pretious death, and hast not giuen me to be deuoured of my fierce enemies, but hast made mee to remaine constant in thy pure faith vnto this my latter end. And so this blessed souldier fighting valiantly vnder the banner of Christ, lost his head, and wone his soule. Simeon Metaphrast. tom. 5. In the which author there followeth a long narration of the miracles of this holy man, which here for prolixitie I doe omit.

The storie of fortie martyrs.

Basilius in a certaine sermon of fortie martyrs rehearseth this storie not vnworthie to be noted. There came (saith he) into a certaine place (of which place he maketh no mention) the emperous marshall or officer, with the edict which the emperour had set out against the christians, that whosoeuer confessed Christ, should after many torments suffer death. And first they did priuily suborne certaine, which should detect and accuse the christians whom they had found out, or had laid wait for. Vpon this the sword, the gibbet, the wheele, and the whips were brought forth: at the terrible sight whereof, the hearts of all the beholders did shake and tremble. Some for feare did flee, some did stand in doubt what to doe: certaine were so terrified at the beholding of these engins and tormenting instruments, that they denied their faith. Some others began the game, and for a time did abide the conflict and agonie of martyrdome, but vanquished at length, by the intollerable paine of their torments, made shipwracke of their consciences, and lost the glorie of their confession. Among others, fortie there were at that time, young gentlemen, all souldiers, which after the marshall had shewed the emperors edict, and required of all men the obedience of the same, freely and boldly of their owne accord confessed themselues to be christians, & declared to him their names. The marshal somewhat amazed at this their boldnes of speech, standeth in doubt what was best to doe. Yet forthwith he goeth about to win them with faire words, aduertising them to consider their youth, neither that they should change a cruell and vntimelie death for a sweete and pleasant life: after that he promiseth them monie, and honorable offices in the emperors name. But they little esteeming all these things, brake forth into a long and bold oration, affirming that they did neither desire life, dignitie, nor mony, but onely the celestiall kingdome of Christ, saying further that they are readie for the loue and faith they haue in God, to indure the affliction of the wheele, the crosse and the fire. The rude marshall being herewith offended, deuiseth a new kind of punishment. He spied out in the middle of the citie a certaine great pond, which lay full vpon the cold northerne wind, for it was in the winter time, wherin he caused them to be put all that night: but they being merrie and comforting one another, receiued this their appointed punishment, and said, as they were putting off their cloths: We put off (said they) now not our clothes, but we put off the old man, corrupt with the deceit of concupiscence; wee giue thee thanks (O Lord) that with this our apparell wee may also put off by thy grace the sinfull man: for by meanes of the serpent wee once put him on, and by the meanes of Jesus Christ we now put him off. When they had thus said, they were brought naked into the place where they felt most vehement cold: in so much that all the parts of their bodies were starke and stiffe therewith. Assoone as it was day, they yet hauing breath, were brought into the fire, wherin they were consumed, & their ashes throwne into the flood. By chance there was one of the company more liuely, and not so neere dead as the rest, of whom the executioners taking pitie, said vnto his mother standing by, that they would saue his life. But shee with her owne hands taking her sonne, brought him to the pile of wood, where the residue of his fellowes (crooked for cold) did lie readie to be burnt, & admonished him to accomplish the blessed iournie hee had taken in hand with his companions. Basil.

A like storie of fortie martyrs, which were maried men, we reade of in Nicephorus and Sozomenus, lib. 9. ca. 2. which were killed likewise in a lake or pond at Sebastia, a towne of Armenia, vnder Licinius; if the storie bee not the same with this: Niceph. Sozom.

Another storie of fortie martyred in a cold pond at Sebastia.

In this fellowship and company of martyrs cannot bee left out and forgot the storie of Cyrus. This Cyrus was a physician borne in Alexandria, which flying into Egypt, in the persecution of Diocletian and Maximian, lead a solitarie life in Arabia, being much spoken of for his learning and miracles, vnto whose companie after a certaine time did Joannes borne in the citie of Edessa, beyond the riuer Euphrates, ioyne himselfe, leauing the souldiers life which before that time he had exercised. But whilest as yet the same persecution raged in a citie in Egypt called Canope, there was cast into prison for the confession of their faith, a certaine godly christian woman, called Athanasia, and her three daughters, Theoctiste, Theodata, and Eudoxia: with whom Cyrus was well acquainted. At whose infirmities hee much fearing, accompanied with his brother John, came and visited them for their better confirmation: at which time Lucianus was chiefe captaine and lieutenant of Egypt, of whose wickednesse and crueltie, especially against women and maidens, Athanasius maketh mention in his apologies, and in his epistle to those that lead a solitarie life. This Cyrus therefore and Joannes, being accused and apprehended of the heathen men, as by whose perswasions the maidens and daughters of Athanasia contumeliously despised the gods and the emperors religion, and could by no means be brought to doe sacrifice, were after the publication of their constant confession put to death by the sword: Athanasia also and her three daughters being condemned to death. This historie writeth Simeon Metaphrastes.

Sebastian being borne in the part of France called Gallia Narbonensis was a christian, and was lieutenant generall of the vaward of Diocletian the emperour, who also incouraged many martyrs of Christ by his exhortations vnto constancie, and kept them in the faith. Hee being therefore accused to the emperor, was commanded to be apprehended, and that he should be brought into the open field, where of his owne souldiers he was thrust through the body with innumerable arrows, and after that his bodie was throwne into a lakes or sinke. Ambrosius maketh mention of this Sebastian the martyr in his commentarie vpon the hundred and eightéenth psalme; and Simeon Metaphrastes amongst other martyrs that suffered with Sebastian numbreth also these following: Nicostratus with Zoe his wife, Tranquillinus with Martia his wife, Traglinus, Claudius, Castor, Tiburtius, Castellus, Marcus, and Marcellinus, with others mo.

The storie of Sebastian martyr.

Basilius in another sermon also maketh mention of one Barlaam being a noble and famous martyr, which abode all the torments of the executioners euen to the point of death; which thing when the tormentors saw, they brought him and laid him vpon the altar, where they did vse to offer sacrifices to their idols, and put fire and frankincense into his right hand, wherein hee had yet some strength, thinking that the same his right hand, by the heat and force of the fire, would haue scattered the burning incense vpon the altar, and so haue sacrificed. But of that their hope, the pestiferous tormentors were disappointed: for the flame eat round about his hand, and the same indured euen as though it had been couered with hot embers, when as Barlaam recited out of the psalmes this saying: Blessed is the Lord my God, which teacheth my hands to fight.

Barlaam.

What desire the heathen had by some meanes to allure the christians to offer sacrifice.

To this narration of Basilius touching the martyrdome of Barlaam, wee will annex consequently another storie of Ambrose. He making a certaine exhortation to certaine virgins, in the same oration commendeth the martyrdoms of Agricola and Vitalis, who suffered also in the same persecution vnder vnder Diocleſian and Maximinian (as they ſo affirme) at Bononie. This Vitalis was ſeruant to Agricola, who both together betweene themſelues had made a compact to giue their liues with other martyrs for the name of Chriſt. Whereupon Vitalis being ſent before of his maſter to offer himſelfe to martyrdome, fell firſt into the hands of perſecutors, who laboured about him by all means to cauſe him denie Chriſt. Which when he would in no caſe doe, but ſtoutly perſiſted in the confeſſion of his faith, they began to exerciſe him with all kind of torments, ſo vnmercifully that there was no whole ſkin left on all his bodie. So Vitalis in the middeſt of the agonie and painefull torments, after he had in a ſhort prayer commended himſelfe to God, gaue vp his life. After him the tormentors ſet vpon Agricola his maſter, whoſe vertuous manners and gentle conditions, becauſe they were ſingularly well liked and knowne to the enemies, his ſuffering therfore was the longer deferred. But Agricola not abiding the long delay and driuing off, and prouoking moreouer the aduerſaries to quicker ſpeed, at length was faſtned vnto the croſſe, and ſo finiſhed his martyrdome, which he ſo long deſired. Ambroſ. in exhortatione ad virgines.

Agricola, with his seruant Vitalis martyred. Ex Ambro. in sermone Virginis. Vitalis first martyred.

Agricola deſirous of martyrdome.

Agricola died martyr vpon the croſſe.

No leſſe worthie of commemoration is the lamentable martyrdome of Vincentius, whoſe hiſtorie here followeth. This Vincentius was a Spaniard, and a Leuite moſt godly and vertuous, who at this time ſuffered martyrdome at Valence vnder Dacianus the preſident, as we may gather by Prudentius in his hymne. Bergomenſis in his ſupplement reciteth theſe words concerning his martyrdome, out of a certaine ſermon of Saint Auguſtine: Our heart conceiued not a vaine and fruitleſſe light (as it were in beholding of lamentable tragedies) but certainly a great light and maruellous, and therewith ſingular pleaſure receiued it, when the painefull paſſion of victorious Vincentius was read vnto vs. Is there any ſo heauie hearted, that will not be moued in the contemplation of this inuincible martyr, ſo manly, or rather ſo godlie, fighting againſt the craft and ſubtiltie of that ſerpent, againſt the tyrannie of Dacianus, againſt the horrors of death, and by the mightie ſpirit of his God conquering al? But let vs in few words rehearſe the degrees of his torments, though the paines thereof in many words cannot be expreſſed. Firſt, Dacianus cauſed the martyr to be laid vpon the torture, and all the ioynts of his bodie to be diſtended and racked out, vntill they crackt againe. This being done in moſt extreame and cruell manner, all the members of his painfull and pitifull bodie were grieuouſly indented with deadly wounds. Thirdly (that his dolors and griefes might be augmented) they miſerably vered his fleſh with iron combs ſharply filed. And to the end the tormentors might vomit out all their vengeance on the meeke & milde martyrs fleſh, the tormentors themſelues alſo were vſed to ſcourge at the Preſidents commandement. And leſt his paſſion through want of paines might ſeeme imperfect or elſe too eaſie, they laid his bodie being all out of ioynt, on a grate of iron, which when they had opened with iron hooks, they ſeared it with firie plates, with hot burning ſalt ſprinkling the ſame. Laſt of all into a vile dungeon was this mightie martyr drawne, the floore whereof firſt was thicke ſtrewed with the ſharpeſt ſhels that might be gotten, his feete then being faſt locked in the ſtockes, there was he left alone without all worldlie comfort: but the Lord his God was with him, the holie ſpirit of God (whoſe office is to comfort the godly afflicted) fulfilled his heart with ioy and gladneſſe. Haſt thou prepared a terrible racke (O cruel tyrant, O deuouring lion) for the martyrs bed? The Lord ſhall make that bed ſoft and ſweet vnto him. Racketſt thou his bones and ioynts al aſunder? His bones, his ioynts, his haires are all numbred. Tormenteſt thou his fleſh with mortall wounds? The Lord ſhall powre abundantlie into all his ſores of his oile of gladneſſe. Thy ſcraping combes, thy ſharpe fleſh-hookes, thine hote fearing irons, thy parched ſalt, thy ſtinking priſon, thy cutting ſhelles, thy pinching ſtockes ſhall turne to this patient martyr to the beſt. All together ſhall worke contrary to thine expectation, great plentie of ioy ſhall he reape into the barne of his ſoule, out of this mightie harueſt of paines that thou haſt brought him into. Yea thou ſhalt prooue him Vincentius in deede: that is, a vanquiſher, a triumpher, a conqueror, ſubduing thy madneſſe by his meekeneſſe, thy tyranny by his patience, thy manifold meanes of tortures by the manifold graces of God, wherewith he is plentifullie inriched.

In this catalogue or companie of ſuch holy martyrs, as ſuffered in this foreſaid tenth perſecution, many mo and almoſt innumerable there be expreſſed in authors, beſide them whom we haue hitherto comprehended. as Philoromus, a man of noble birth and great poſſeſſions in Alexandria, who being perſuaded by his friends to fauour himſelfe, to reſpect his wife, to conſider his children and familie, did not onely reiect the counſels of them, but alſo neglected the threats and torments of the iudge, to keepe the confeſſion of Chriſt inuiolat vnto the death, and loſing of his head: Euſebius lib. 8. cap. 9. Like eſtate and dignitie was alſo Procopius in Paleſtina, who after his conuerſion brake his images of ſiluer and gold, and diſtributed the ſame to the poore, and after all kind of torments, of racking, of ſeeding, of tearing his fleſh, of goring and ſtabbing in, of fiering, at length had his head alſo ſmitten off, as witneſſeth Niceph. lib. 8. cap. 15. Nicephor. lib. 7. cap. 15.

To this may be ioyned alſo Georgius a young man of Cappadocia, who ſtoutly inueying againſt the impious idolatry of the emperours, was apprehended and caſt into priſon, then torne with hooked irons, burnt with hot lime, ſtretched with cords, after that his hands and feet with other members of his bodie being cut off, at laſt with a ſword had his head cut off: Nicephorus ibid.

With theſe aforenamed adde alſo Sergius and Bacchius, Panthaleon a phyſitian in Nicomedia, mentioned in Supplem. lib. 8. Theodorus of the citie of Amaſia in Helleſpont, mentioned of Vincentius, lib. 3. Fauſtus a martyr of Egypt, mentioned of Niceph. lib. 8. cap. 5. Gereon with three hundred and eightéene fellow martyrs, which ſuffered about Colour: Petr. de nat. lib. 9. cap. 49. Hermogenes the preſident of Athens, who being conuerted by the conſtancy of one Menas, and Eugraphus in their torments, ſuffered alſo for the like faith. Item, Samonas, Gurias and Abibus, mentioned in Simeon Metaphraſt. Hieron alſo with certaine of his confellors, vnder Maximinus, mentioned in Metaphraſtes. Judes and Domuas, who ſuffered with many other martyrs aboue mentioned at Nicomedia, as recordeth Metaphraſtes. Eualaſius, Maximinus, the emperors officers, whom Faulta the virgin in her torments conuerted. Alſo Thirſus, Lucius, Callinicus, Apollonius, Philemon, Allas, Leondes, with Arriamus preſident of Thebaide, Cyprianus likewiſe a citizen of Antioch, who after he had continued a long time a filthie magitian or ſorcerer, at length was conuerted and made a deacon, then a prieſt, and at laſt the biſhop of Antioch. Vincent. lib. 12. cap. 120. of whom partlie wee touched ſomewhat before. This Cyprian with Juſtina a virgin ſuffered among the martyrs. Item Glicerius at Nicomedia, Felix a minider, Fortunatus, Achilleus, deacons in the citie of Valent. Arthemius of Rome, Ciriacus deacon to Marcellus the biſhop, Carpophorus prieſt at Thuſcia, with Abundus his deacon. Item Claudius, Sirinus, Antoninus which ſuffered with Marcellinus the biſhop: Sabel. Enead. 7. lib. 8. Cucufatus in the citie Barcinona. Felix biſhop of Apulis, with Adauctus and Januarius his prieſt, Fortunatus and Septimius his readers, who ſuffered in the citty Venuſina vnder Diocleſian: Bergom. lib. 8.

Sergius, Bacchius, Panthaleon, Theodorus, Faulſtus, Gereon, with 318. fellowes.

Hermogenes, Menas a man of Athens, Eugraphus, Samonas, Gurias, Abibus, Hieron with his fellowes, Judes, Domuas.

Eualaſius, Maximinus, Thirſus, Lucius, &c: as in the text.

It were too long a trauell or trouble to recite all and ſinguler names of them particularly, whom this perſecution of Dioclelian did conſume. The number of whom being almoſt infinit, is not to be collected or expreſſed. One ſtorie yet remaineth not to be forgotten of Callianus, whoſe pitifull ſtorie being deſcribed of Prudentius we haue here inſerted, rendring metre for metre as followeth.

The lamentable ſtorie of Callianus martyr. Ex Aurel. Prudent. lib. peri Stephan.

THrough Forum, as in Italie, I paſſed once to Roome,
Into a church by chance came I, and ſtood faſt by a roome.
Which church ſometime a place had been, where cauſes great in law
Were ſcand and tried, and iudgement giuen, to keep brute men in aw.
This place Sylla Cornelius, firſt built, he rais'd the frame;
And call'd the ſame Forum, and thus, that citie tooke the name.
In prayer feruent as I ſtood, caſting mine eie aſide,
A picture in full pitious mood (imbrude) by chance I ſpide:
A thouſand wounded marks full bad, all manged, rent, and torne;
The skin appear'd as though it had been iagd and prickt with thorne.
A ſcull of pictured boies did band, about that lothſome ſight,
That with their ſharpned gads in hand, his members thus had dighe.
Theſe gads were but their pens, wherewith their tables written were,
And ſuch as ſcholars often ſith, vnto the ſcholes doe beare.
Whom thou ſeeſt here thus pictur'd ſit, and firmelie doeſt behold,
No fable is, I doe thee wit, vnaskt a prelat told
That walkt thereby: but doth declare, the hiſtorie of one,
Which written, would good record beare, what faith was long agone.
A skilfull ſchoolemaſter this was, that here ſometime did teach:
The biſhop once of Brixia was, and Chriſt full plaine did preach.
He knew well how to comprehend, long talke in a few lines:
And at length how to amend, by order and by times.
His ſharpe precepts and his ſterne looks, his beardles boies did feare:
When hate in heart (yet for their bookes) full deadlie thy did beare.
The child that learnes, I doe yee weet, termes aie his tutor crule:
No diſcipline in youth ſeemes ſweet, count this a common rule.
Behold the raging time now here, oppreſſing ſo the faith,
Doth perſecute Gods children deere, and all that Chriſt bewraith.
This truſtie teacher of the ſwarme, profeſt the liuing God:
The chiefe good thing they count their harme, perhaps he ſhakes his (rod.
What rebels (askt the preſident) is he I heare ſo loud?
Vnto our youth an inſtrument, they ſay, and low they bowd.
Go bring the caitiffe foorth, he bids, and make no long delay:
Let him be ſet the boies amids: they doe as he doth ſay.
Let him be giuen vnto them all, and let them haue their will,
To doe to him what ſpite they ſhall, ſo that they will him kill.
Euen as they liſt let them him fray, and him deride ſo long,
Till wearineſſe prouoks their play, no longer to prolong.
Let them I ſay then vncontrold, both pricke and ſcotch his skin:
To bathe their hands let them be bold, in the hot bloud of him.
The ſcholars hereat make great game, it pleaſeth them full well:
That they may kill and quench the flame, they thought to them a hell.
They bind his hands behind his backe, and naked they him ſtrip:
In bodkin wiſe at him they nacke, they laugh to ſee him skip.
The priuie hate that each one hath in heart, it now appeares:

They

They powre it foorth in gawly wrath, they wreak them of their teares.
Some cast great stones, some other breake, their tables on his face:
Lo here thy Latine and thy Greeke (oh barren boies of grace)
The bloud runs downe his cheeks, and doth imbrue the boxen leams:
Where notes by thē were made (though loth) & wel proponed theams.
Some whet, some sharpe their pensels points, seruing to write withall:
Some other gage his flesh and ioynts, as with a pointed nall.
Sometime they pricke, sometime they rent, this worthie martyrs flesh.
And thus by turnes they doe torment this confessor afresh.
Now all with one consent on him, their bloudie hands they lay:
To see the bloud from lim to lim, drop downe they make a play.
More painefull was the pricking pang, of children oft and thicke,
Then of the bigger boies that stang, and neere the heart did sticke.
For by the feeble strokes of th'one, death was denied his will:
Of smart that made him wo begon, he had the better skill.
The deeper strokes the great ones gaue, and neerer toucht the quick:
The welcomer he thought the same, whom longing death made sick.
God make you strong, he saith, I pray, God giue you might at will:
And what you want in yeeres I say, let crueltie fulfil.
But whilest the hangman breatheth still, and me with you do match,
That weakely worke, yet want no will, my life for to dispatch;
My griefs wax great: what gron'st thou now? said some of them againe,
In schoole, aduised well art thou, whom there thou putst to paine?
Behold we pay, and now make good, as many thousand stripes,
As when with weeping eies we stood, in danger of thy gripes.
Art thou now angrie at thy band, that alwaies criedst write, write,
And neuer wouldst that our right hand, should rest in quiet plite?
We had forgot our playing times, thou churle deniedst vs of:
We now but pricke and point our lines, and thus they grin and scof.
Correct good sir your viewed verse, if ought amisse there be:
Now vse thy power and then rehearse, that haue not marked thee.
Christ pitying this groning man, with torments torne and tired,
Commands his heart to break euen then, and life that was then hired,
He yeelds againe to him that gaue, and thus he makes exchange:
Immortall for mortall to haue, that in such paine did range.
This is, saith he, that this picture, thou so beholdst, oh ghest,
Cassianus martyr. Of Cassianus martyr pure, doth preach I doe protest.
If thou prudence haue ought in store, in pietie to deale,
In hope of iust reward therefore, now shew thy louing zeale.
I could not but consent, I weepe, his tombe I doe imbracc:
Home I returne, and after sleepe, this pitifull preface
I write as a memoriall, for euer to indure,
Of Cassianus scholemaster, all others to allure
To constancie vnder the crosse, of their profession:
Accounting gaine what euer losse for Christ they take vpon.

No lesse admirable then wonderfull was the constancie also of women and maidens, who in the same persecution gaue their bodies to the torments, and their liues for the testimonie of Christ, with no lesse boldnes of spirit, then did the men themselues aboue specified, to whom how much more inferiour they were in bodilie strength, so much more worthie of praise they be, for their constant standing. Of whom some examples heere we mind (Christ willing) to infer, such as in our stories & chronicles seeme most notable, first beginning with Eulalia, whose story we haue taken out of ỹ forelaid Prudentius as followeth.

In the west part of Spaine called Portingall, is a citie great and populous, named Emerita, wherein dwelt and was brought vp a virgin, borne of noble parentage, whose name was Eulalia: which Emerita although for the apt situation thereof, was both rich and famous, yet more adorned and famous was the renowne thereof, by the martyrdome, bloud, and sepulchre of this blessed virgin Eulalia. Twelue yeeres of age was she, and not much aboue, when shee refused great and honorable offers in mariage, as one not skilfull, nor yet delighting in courtly dalliance, neither yet taking pleasure in purple and gorgious apparell, or else in pretious balmes, or costlie ornaments and iewels: but forsaking and despising all these and such like pompous allurements, then shewed shee her selfe most busie in preparing her iournie to her hoped inheritance, and heauenly patronage. Which Eulalia as shee was modest and discreet in behauiour, sage and sober in conditions, so was shee also wittie and sharpe in answering her enemies. But when the furious rage of persecution inforced her to ioyne her selfe amongst Gods children in the houshold of faith, and when the christians were commanded to offer incense and sacrifice to diuels or dead gods: then began the blessed spirit of Eulalia to kindle, and being of a prompt and readie wit, thought forthwith (as a couragious captaine) to giue a charge vpon this so great and disordered a battell: & so shee sillie woman, powring out the bowels of her innocent heart before God, more prouoketh thereby the force and rage of her enemies against her. But the godlie care of her parents, fearing lest the willing mind of the damsell, so readie to die for Christs cause, might make her guiltie of her owne death, hid her and kept her close at their house in the countrie, being a great way out of the citie. Shee yet misliking that quiet life, as also detesting to make such delay, softly stealeth out of the doores (no man knowing thereof) in the night; and in great hast leauing the common way, openeth the hedge gaps, and with weary feet (God knoweth) passed through the thornie and brierie places, accompanied yet with spirituall gard: and although darke and dreadfull was the silent night, yet had shee with her the Lord and guider of light. And as the children of Israel comming out of Egypt, had by the mightie power of God, a cloudie piller for their guide in the day, and a flame of fire in the night; so had this godly virgin, Eulalia giueth the onset, denying to sacrifice to diuels.

Eulalia kept secret by her parents.

trauelling in this darke night, when shee flying and forsaking the place where all filthie idolatrie abounded, and hastened her heauenlie iourny, was not oppressed with the dreadfull darknesse of the night: but yet shee before the day appeared in this her speedie iournie, with her selfe considered and mused on a thousand matters and more.

In the morning betime, with a bold courage shee goeth vnto the tribunall or iudgement seat, and in the midst of them all with a loud voice crying out, said: I pray you what a shame is it for you thus rashly and without aduisement to destroy and kill mens soules, and to throw their bodies aliue against the rocks, and cause them to deny the omnipotent God? Would you know (O you vnfortunat) what I am? Behold, I am one of the christians, an enemie to your diuellish sacrifices, I spurne your idols vnder my feet, I confesse God omnipotent with my heart and mouth. Isis, Apollo, and Venus, what are they? Mariminus himselfe, what is he? The one a thing of nought, for that they be the workes of mens hands; the other but a cast away, because he worshippeth the same worke. Therefore friuolous are they both, and both not worthie to bee set by. Mariminus is a lord of substance, and yet he himselfe falleth downe before a stone, and boweth the honour of his dignitie vnto those that are much inferior to his vassals. Why then doth he oppresse so tyrannicallie, more worthie stomachs and courages then himselfe? He must needs be a good guide and an vpright iudge, which feedeth vpon innocent bloud: and breathing in the bodies of godlie men, doth rent and teare their bowels, and that more is, hath his delight in destroying and subuerting the faith.

Eulalia dispraiseth the heathen iudge.

The godly confession of Eulalia.

Goe to therefore thou hangman, burne, cut and mangle thou these earthlie members. It is an easie matter to breake a brittle substance, but the inward mind shalt thou not hurt for any thing thou canst doe. The pretor then or iudge, with these words of hirs, set in a great rage, saith; Hangman take her and pull her out by the haire of her head, and torment her to the vttermost; let her feele the power of our countrie gods, and let her know what the imperiall gouernment of a prince is. But yet, O thou sturdie girle, faine would I haue thee (if it were possible) before thou die, to reuoke this thy wickednesse. Behold what pleasures thou maiest inioy by the honorable house thou camest of, thy fallen house and progenie followeth thee to death with lamentable teares, and the beauie nobilitie of thy kindred maketh dolefull lamentation for thee. What meanest thou? Wilt thou kill thy selfe so young a flower, and so neere these honorable mariages and great dowries thou maist inioy? Doth not the glittering and golden pomp of the bride bed moue thee? Doth not the reuerend pietie of thine ancestors pricke thee? Whom is it not, but that this thy rashnesse and weaknes grieueth? Behold heere the furniture readie prepared for thy terrible death: Either shalt thou be beheaded with this sword, or else with these wild beasts shalt thou be pulled in peeces, or else thou being cast into the fierie flames, shalt be (although lamentablie bewailed of thy friends & kinsfolks) consumed to ashes. What great matter is it for thee I pray thee, to escape all this? If thou wilt but take and put with thy fingers a little salt and incense into the censers, thou shalt be deliuered from all these punishments. To this Eulalia made no answere, but being in a great furie, shee spitteth in the tyrants face, shee throweth downe the idols, and spurneth abrode with her feet the heape of incense prepared to the censers. Then without further delay the hangmen with both their strengths tok her, and puld one ioynt from another, and with the talens of wild beasts scotched her sides to the hard bones: she all this while singing and praysing God in this wise; Behold O Lord I will not forget thee: what a pleasure is it for them O Christ ỹ remember thy triumphant victories, to attaine vnto these high dignities, and still calleth vpon that holy name, all stained and imbrued with her owne bloud. This sang she with a bold stomach, neither lamentinglie nor yet weepingly, but being glad and merrie, abandoning from her mind all heauinesse and gricke, when as out of a warme fountaine her mangled members with fresh bloud bathed her white & faire skin. Then proceed they to ỹ last and finall torment, which was not onely the gozing and wounding of her mangled bodie with the iron grate and hurdle, and terrible harrowing of her flesh, but burned on euery side with flaming torches her tormented breasts & sides: her haire hanging about her shoulders in two parts diuided (wherwith her shamefast chastity and virginitie was couered) reached downe to the ground. But when the cracking flame fleeth about her face, kindled by her haire, and reacheth the crowne of her head: then shee desiring swift death, opened her mouth and swallowed the flame, and so rested shee in peace.

Ex Prudent.

As yee haue heard now the christian life and constant death of Eulalia, much worthie of praise and commendation: so no lesse commendation is worthilie to be giuen to blessed Agnes, that constant damsell and martyr of God, who as she was in Rome of honorable parents begotten, so lieth she there as honorahonourably intombed & buried. Which Agnes, for hir vnspotted and vndefiled virginitie, deserueth no greater praise, and commendation then for hir willing death and martyrdome. Some writers make of hir a long discourse, more in my iudgement then necessary, reciting diuers and sundrie strange miracles by hir done in the processe of hir historie; which partly for tedious nesse, partly for the doubtfulnesse of the author (whom some father vpon Ambrose) & partly for the strangenes & incredibilitie ther of I omit, being satisfied with that which Prudentius briefly writeth of hir, as followeth: She was (saith he) yong and not mariageable, when first she being dedicated to Christ, boldly resisted the wicked edicts of the emperor; lest that through idolatry she might haue denied and forsaken the holy faith; but yet first proued by diuers and sundrie policies to induce hir to the same (as now with the flattering & inticing words of the iudge, now with the threatnings of the storming executioner) stood notwithstanding stedfast in all couragious strength: and willingly offered hir body to hard and painfull torments, not refusing (as she said) to suffer what soeuer it should bee, yea though it were death it selfe. Then said the cruell tyrant: If to suffer paine and torment be so easie a matter and lightly regarded of thee, and that thou accountest thy life nothing worth, yet the shame of thy dedicated or vowed virginitie is a thing more regarded I know, and esteemed of thée. Wherefore this is determined, that vnlesse thou wilt make obeisance to the altar of Minerua, and aske forgiuenesse of hir for thy arrogancy, thou shalt be sent or abandoned to the common stewes or brothel-house. Agnes the virgin with more spirit and vehemencie inueieth against both Minerua and hir virginitie: the youth in skuls flocke and run together, and craue that they may haue Agnes their lubrious prey. Then, saith Agnes, Christ is not forgetfull of those that be his, that he will suffer violently to be taken from them their golden and pure chastitie, neither will he leaue them so destitute of helpe: he is alwaies at hand and readie to fight for such as are shamefast and chast virgins, neither suffereth he his gifts of holy integritie or chastitie to bee polluted. Thou shalt, saith shee, willingly bath thy sword in my blood if thou wilt, but thou shalt not defile my body with filthie lust for any thing thou canst do. She had no sooner spoken these words, but hee commanded that she should bee set naked at the corner of some street (which place at that time, such as were strumpets commonly vsed) the greater part of the multitude both sorrowing and shaming to see so shameless a sight, went their waies, some turning their heads, some hiding their faces. But one amongst the rest, with vncircumcised eyes beholding the damsell, and that in such opprobrious wise, behold a flame of fire like vnto a flash of lightening falleth vpon him, striketh his eyes out of his head, whereupon hee for dead falling vnto the ground, spralleth in the kennell durt, whose companions taking him vp, and carying him away, bewailed him as a dead man: but the virgin for this hir miraculous deliuerie from the danger & shame of that place, singeth praises to God & Christ.

There be (saith Prudentius) that report, how that she being desired to pray vnto Christ for the partie, that a little before with fire from heauen for his incontinencie was stricken, was restored by hir prayer both vnto his perfect health and sight. But blessed Agnes after that she had climed this hir first greese and step vnto the heauenly palace, forthwith began to climbe another: for furie ingendring now the mortall wrath of hir bloodie enemie, wringing his hands crieth out, saying: I am vndone, O thou the executioner draw out thy sword, and do thine office that the emperor hath appointed thee. And when Agnes saw a sturdie and cruell fellow (to behold) stand behind hir, or approching neere to hir with a naked sword in his hand: I am now gladder, saith she, and reioyce, that such a one as thou being a stout, fierce, strong, and sturdy souldier art come, then one more feeble, weake, and faint should come, or elle any other yong man sweetly imbalmed, and wearing gay apparell that might destroy me with funerall shame. This, euen this is hee, I now confesse, that I do loue. I will make hast to meet him, and will no longer protract my longing desire. I will willingly receiue into my paps the length of his sword, and into my breast will draw the force thereof euen vnto the hilts, that thus I being married vnto Christ my spouse, may surmount and escape all the darkenesse of this world, that reacheth euen vnto the skies. O eternall gouernour vouchsafe to open the gates of heauen once shut vp against all the inhabitants of the earth, and receiue (oh Christ) my soule that seeketh thee. Thus speaking and kneeling vpon hir knees, she prayeth vnto Christ aboue in heauen, that hir necke might bee the readier for the sword, now hanging ouer the same. The executioner then with his bloodie hand finished hir hope, and at one stroke cutteth off hir head, and by such short and swift death doth hee preuent hir of the paine thereof.

I haue often times before complained, that the stories of saints haue been powdred and sauced with diuers vntrue additions, and fabulous inuentions of men, who either of a superstitious deuotion, or of a subtill practise, haue so mingle-mangled their stories and liues, that almost nothing remaineth in them simple and vncorrupt, as in the vsuall postues wont to bee read for daily seruice is manifest and euident to bee seene, wherein felo legends there be able to abide the touch of histo-rie, if they were truly tried. This I write vpon the occasion specially of good Katharin, whom now I haue in hand. In whom although I nothing doubt, but in hir life was great holinesse, in hir knowledge excellencie, in hir death constancie: yet that all things be true that be storied of hir, neither dare I affirme, neither am I bound so to thinke: so many strange fictions of hir be fained diuersly of diuers writers, whereof some séeme incredible, some also impudent. As where Petrus de natalibus writing of hir conuersion declareth, how that Katharine sleeping before a certaine picture or table of the crucifix, Christ with his mother Mary appeared vnto hir: and when Marie had offered hir vnto Christ to be his wife, he first refused hir for hir blacknesse. The next time, she being baptised, Marie appearing againe, offred hir to marrie with Christ, who then being liked, was espoused to him & married, hauing a golden ring the same time put on hir finger in hir sleepe, &c. Bergomensis writeth thus, that because shé in the sight of the people openly reuiled the emperor Maxentius to his face, and rebuked him for his crueltie, therefore she was commanded and committed vpon the same to prison: which séemeth hitherto not much to digresse from truth. It followeth moreouer, that the same night an angell came to hir, comforting & exhorting hir to be strong and constant vnto the martyrdome, for that she was a maid accepted in the sight of God, and that the Lord would be with hir, for whose honor she did fight, and that he would giue hir a mouth and wisdome which hir enemies should not withstand: with many other things more which I here omit. As this also I omit concerning the fiftie philosophers, whom she in disputation conuicted, and conuerted vnto our religion, & died martyrs for the same. Item of the conuerting of Porphyrius kinsman to Maxentius & Faustina the emperors wife. At length (saith the storie) after she proued the racke, and the foure sharpe cutting wheeles, hauing at last hir head cut off with the sword, so she finished hir martyrdome, about the yeere of our Lord (as Antoninus affirmeth) three hundred & ten. Simeon Metaphrastes, writing of hir, discourseth the same more at large, to whom they may resort which couet more therein to be satisfied.

Among the workes of Basil a certaine oration is extant concerning Julitta the martyr, who came to hir martyrdome (as he witnesseth) by this occasion. A certaine auaricious and greedie person of great authoritie, and (as it may appeare) the emperor his deputie, or other like officer (who abused y decrees and lawes of the emperor against the christians, to his owne lucre and gaine) violently toke from this Julitta all hir goods, lands, cattels, and seruants, contrarie to all equitie and right. She made hir pitifull complaint to the iudges: a day was appointed when the cause should be heard. The spoiled woman and the spoiling extortioner stood forth together, the woman lamentablie declareth hir cause, the man frowningly beholdeth hir face. When she had proued that of god right the goods were hir owne, and that wrongfully he had dealt with hir: the wicked and bloodthirstie wretch preferring vile worldly substance, before the precious substance of a christian body, affirmed hir action to be of no force, for that she was as an outlaw in not seruing the emperors gods, since hir christian faith hath bén first abiured. His allegation was allowed as good and reasonable. Whereupon incense and fire were prepared for hir to worship the gods, which vnlesse shee would doe, neither the emperors protection, nor lawes, nor iudgement, nor life should shee inioy in that common weale. When this handmaid of the Lord heard these words, thee said; Farewell life, welcome death; farewell riches, welcome pouertie. All that I haue, if it were a thousand times more, would I rather lose, then to speake one wicked and blasphemous word against God my creator. I yéeld thee thankes most heartie, O my God, for this gift of grace, that I can contemne and despise this fraile and transitorie world, estéeming christian profession aboue all treasures. Henceforth when any question was demanded, hir answere was: I am the seruant of Iesus Christ. Hir kindred & acquaintance flocking to hir, aduertised hir to change hir mind. But that vehemently shee refused, with detestation of their idolatrie. Forthwith the iudge with the sharpe sword of sentence, not onely cutteth off all hir goods and possessions, but iudgeth hir also to the fire most cruelly. The ioyfull martyr imbraceth the sentence as a thing most sweete and delectable. She addresseth hirselfe to the flames, in countenance, gesture, and words, declaring the ioy of hir heart, coupled, with singular constancie. To the women beholding hir, sententiously she spake: Sticke not, O sisters, to labour and trauell after true pietie and godlinesse. Cease to accuse the fragilitie of feminine nature. What? are not wee created of the same matter that men are? Yea, after Gods image and similitude are we made, as liuely as they: Not flesh onely God vsed in the creation of the woman, in signe and token of hir infirmitie and weakenes, but bone of bones is she, in token that she must be strong in the true and liuing God, all false gods forsaken; constant in faith, all idolatrie renounced; patient in aduersity, all worldly ease refused. Mar weary (my decre sisters) of your liues led in darkenesse, and bee in loue with my Christ, my God, my redéemer, my comforter, which is the true light of the world. Persuade your selues, or rather the spirit of the liuing God persuade you, that there is a Barbara, Fausta, Euelasius, Maximinus, Iuliana, Anisia, Iustina, Tecla, martyrs.

There haue been moreouer beside these aboue recited, diuers godly women and faithfull martyrs, as Barbara a noble woman in Thulcia, who after miserable prisonment, sharpe cords, and burning flames put to hir sides, was at last beheaded. Also Fausta the virgin which suffred vnder Maximinus, by whom Euelasius a ruler of the emperors palace, and Maximinus the president were both conuerted, and also suffered martyrdome, as witnesseth Metaphrastes. Item, Iuliana a virgin of singular beautie in Nicomedia, who after diuers agonies suffered likewise vnder Maximinus. Item, Anisia a maid of Thessalonica, who vnder the said Maximinus suffred: Metaph. ibid. Iustina which suffred with Cyprianus bishop of Antioch; not to omit also Tecla; although most writers doe record that she suffred vnder Nero. Platina in vita Caij maketh also mention of Lucia and Agatha. All which holy maids and virgins glorified the Lord Christ with their constant martyrdome, in this tenth and last persecution of Diocletian.

Caius, Marcellinus, Marcellus, Eusebius, Miltiades, bishops of Rome and martyrs.

During the time of which persecution, these bishops of Rome succeeded one after another, Caius who succeeded next after Eutus before mentioned, Marcellinus, Marcellus (of whom Eusebius in his story maketh no mention) Eusebius, & then Miltiades: all which died martyrs in the tempest of this persecution. First Marcellinus after the martyrdome of Caius, was ordained bishop; he being brought by Diocletian to the idols, first yelded to their idolatrie, and was seene to sacrifice, therfore being excommunicated by the christians, fell into such repentance, that hee returned againe to Diocletian, where hee standing to his former confession, and publikely condemning the idolatrie of the heathen, recouered the crowne of martyrdome, suffering with Claudius, Cyrinus, and Antoninus.

Marcellus likewise was vrged of Maxentius to renounce his bishoprike & religion, & to sacrifice with them to idols; which when he constantly refused, was beaten with cudgels, & so expelled the citie. Then hee entring into the house of Lucina a widow, assembled there the congregation; which when it came to the eares of Maxentius the tyrant, hee turned the house of Lucina into a stable, and made Marcellus the keeper of the beasts, and so with the stinke thereof & miserable handling, was put to death. Eusebius sate bishop of Rome, as Euseb. in Chro. saith, seuen moneths, Marianus Scotus saith eight moneths, Damasus affirmeth six yeares. Sabellicus alleageth certaine authors that say, that hee was slaine by Maximianus, but correcteth ỳ himselfe, affirming that Maximianus died before him.

Euseb. in Chron.

Authors dissent. Ex Sabel. Enead. 7. lib. 8.

Miltiades by the testimony of Platina, & others that follow him sat three yeares and seuen months, & suffered vnder Maximianus. But that seemeth not to be true, as both Sabellicus doth rightly note, affirming that the same cannot stand by the supputation of time: for so much as the said Galerius Maximianus raigned but two yeres, and died before Miltiades. Also Eusebius manifestly expresseth the example of a letter of Constantine written to this Miltiades bishop of Rome, plainly conuicting that to be false which Platina affirmeth.

The order and proceeding described in iudgement against the bishop of Rome.

In the booke collected of generall councels, among the decretall epistles, there is a long tractation about the iudgement and condemnation of Marcellinus: whereof the maisters and patrons of poperie in these our daies take great hold to proue the supremacie of the pope to bee aboue all generall councels, and that he ought not to be subiect to the condemnation of any person or persons, for that there is written; Nemo vnquam iudicauit pontificem, nec præsul sacerdotem suum, quoniam prima sedes nõ iudicabitur a quoquam, &c. Although this sentence of Miltiades seemeth apparantly to bee patched in rather by some Heldibrandus then by Miltiades, both for that it hangeth with little order of sense vpon that which goeth before; and againe, because that Prima sedes here mentioned, was not yet ordained nor attributed to the see of Rome before the councell of Nice, where the order and placing of bishops was first established. But to let this sentence passe, yet notwithstanding the circumstance and proceeding of this iudgement, if it be rightly weighed, maketh very little to the purpose of these men. Neither is it true that the bishops of this councell of Sinuesse, did not condemne Marcellinus, for the words of the councell bee plaine; Subscripserunt igitur in eius damnationem & damnauerunt eum extra ciuitatem, that is, They subscribed therefore to his condemnation, and condemned him to be expelled out of the citie. Moreouer by the said councell were brought in the fortie two witnesses against Marcellinus. In the said councell the verdict of the same witnesses was demanded, & also receiued. Furthermore, Quirinus there one of the bishops openly protested, that he would not depart the councell, before the malice of the bishops were reuealed: What doth all this declare, but that the bishop of Rome was called there, and did appeare before the iudgement seat of the councell, and there stood subiect to their sentence and authoritie, by the which he was expelled out of the citie? As for the words of the councell, whereupon our papists stand so much, Non enim nostro, sed tuo ipsius iudicio condemnaberis, &c. Item, Tuo ore iudica causam tuã, &c. These words import not here the authoritie of the Romane bishop to bee aboue the councell, neither doe they declare what the councell could not do, but what they would & wished rather to be done, that is, that hee should rather acknowledge his crime before God and them, with a voluntarie yeelding of his heart, then that the confession of such an hainous fact should bee extorted from him through their condemnation: for that they saw to be expedient for his soules health, otherwise their condemnation should serue him to small purpose; and so it came to passe. For he being vrged of them to condemne himselfe, so did: prostrating himselfe and weeping before them. Whereupon immediatly they proceeded to the sentence against him, condemning and pronouncing him to be expelled the citie. Now whether by this may be gathered that the bishop of Rome ought not to bee cited, accused and condemned by any person or persons, let the indifferent reader iudge simple.

The bishop of Rome condemned by the councell.

An obiection of the papists answered vnto.

The bishop of Rome cited vp and appeareth before the councell.

As touching the decretall epistles, which be intituled vnder the name of these foresaid bishops, who so well aduiseth them, and with iudgement will examine the stile, the time, the argument, the hanging together of the matter, and the constitutions in them contained (little seruing to any purpose, and nothing seruing for those troublesome daies then present) may easilie discerne them, either in no part to bee theirs, or much of the same to be clouted and patched by the doings of others, which liued in other times; especially seeing all the constitutions in them for the most part tend to the setting vp, and to exalt the see of Rome aboue all other bishops and churches, and to reduce all causes and appeales to the said see of Rome. So the epistle of Caius beginning with the commendation of the authoritie of his see, endeth after the same tenor, willing and commanding all difficult questions in all prouinces whatsoeuer emerging, to be referred to the see apostolicall. Moreouer, the greatest part of the said epistle from this place (Quicunque illi sunt, ita obcæcati, &c: to the end of this period, Quoniam sicut ait B. apostolus, magnum est pietatis, &c.) is contained in the epistle of Leo, vnto Leo the emperor; and so rightly agreeth in all points with the stile of Leo, that euident it is the same to bee borrowed out of Leo, out of the epistle of Caius, or to be patched into the epistle of Caius taken out of Leo.

The decretall epistles and constitutions of these bishops of Rome examined.

The chiefe scope of the constitutions decretall, to magnifie the church of Rome.

The epistle of Caius.

A great part of the epistle of Caius, taken out of the epistle of Leo, to Leo the emperor.

Likewise the epistle of Marcellinus, to get more authoritie with the reader, is admired with a great part of Pauls epistle to the Ephesians, word for word. And how is it like that Marcellinus, which died in the twentith yeare of Diocletian, could write of consubstantiality of the diuine persons, when that controuersie & terme of consubstantiality was not heard of in the church before ỳ Nicen councel, which was twentie three yeares after him? But especially the two epistles of Marcellus bewray themselues, so that for the confuting thereof needeth no other probation more then only the reading of the same. Such a glorious stile of ambition therin doth appeare, as it is easie to be vnderstood, not to proceed either from such an humble martyr, or to sauour any thing of the miserie of such a time. His words of his first epistle written vnto the brethren of Antioch, and alleaged in the popes decrees by Gratianus are these:

The epistle of Marcellinus.

The epistles decretall of Marcellus.

24. q. 1. Regamus vos fratres.

We desire you brethren, that you doe not teach nor conceiue any other thing but as ye haue receiued of the blessed apostle saint Peter, and of other apostles and fathers. For of him ye were first of all instructed, wherefore you must not forsake your owne father and follow others. For he is the head of the whole church, to whom the Lord said: Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my church, &c. Whose seate was first with you in Antioch, which afterward by the commandement of the Lord, was translated from thence to Rome, of the which church of Rome I am this day placed (by the grace of God) to be the gouernour. From the which church of Rome, neither ought you to separate your selues, seeing to the same church all maner causes ecclesiasticall, being of any importance (Gods grace so disposing) are commanded to bee referred: by the same to bee ordered regularly, from whence they tooke their first beginning, &c. And followeth consequently vpon the same, And if your church of Antioch, which was once the first, will now yeeld hir selfe vnto the see of Rome, there is no other church else which will not subiect it selfe to our dominion: to whom all other bishops, whosoeuer listeth, and as they must needs doe (according to the decrees of the apostles and of their successors) ought to flie vnto, as to their head, and must appeale to the same, there to haue their redresse and their protection, from whence they tooke their first instruction and consecration, &c.

In what chapter or leafe of all the Bible doth the Lord command the see of Peter to be translated from Antioch to Rome?

The church of Rome sueth to the church of Antioch to yeeld vnto hir.

Whether this be like matter to proceed from the spirit of Marcellus that blessed martyr in those so dreadfull daies, I say no more, but onely desire thee (gentle reader) to iudge.

The second epistle of Marcellus written to Maxentius.

In his second epistle moreouer, the said Marcellus writing to Maxentius the bloodie tyrant, first reprehendeth him for his crueltie, sharply admonishing him how and what to doe: to learne and seeke the true religion of God, to maintaine his church, to honor and reuerence the priests of God, and specially exhorteth him to charitie, and that he would cease from persecution, &c. All this is possible and like to bee true. But now marke (good reader) what blanched stuffe here followed withal: as where he, alleaging the statutes and sanctions of his predecessors, declareth and discussеth that no bishop nor minister ought to be persecuted or depriued of his goods. And if they be be, then ought they to haue their possessions and places againe restored (by the law) before they were bound (by the law) to answere to their accusations laid in against them: and so after that, in conuenient time, to be called to a councell; the which councell notwithstanding without the authoritie of the holy see, cannot proceed regularly (albeit it remaine in his power to assemble certaine bishops togither.) Neither can he regularly condemne any bishop, appealing to this his apostolicall see, before the sentence definite do proceed from the foresaid see, &c. And it followeth after; And therefore (saith he) let no bishop of what crime soeuer he be attached, come to his accusation or be heard, but in his owne ordinarie synod at his conuenient time: the regular and apostolicall authoritie being ioyned withall. Moreouer in the said epistle writing vnto Marentius, he decreeth that no lay men, or any suspected bishop ought to accuse prelats of the church: So that if they be either lay men, or men of euill conuersation, or proued manifest enemies or incensed with any hatred, their accusations against any bishops ought not to stand. With other such matters more, concerning the disposition of iudiciall court. Which matter, if pope Gregorie the seuenth had written vnto Henrie the third emperour, or if pope Alexander the third had written to the emperour Fredericus the first: it might haue stood with some reason and opportunitie of time. But now for Marcellus to write these decrees in such persecution of the church, to Marentius the heathen and most cruell emperor, how vnlike it is to be true, and how it serued then to purpose, the reader may soone discerne. And yet these bee the epistles and constitutions decretall, whereby (vnder the pretensed title of the fathers) all churches of late time, and all ecclesiasticall causes haue been, and yet are in this realme of England to this day gouerned, directed and disposed.

The church of England gouerned by the popes canon law without sufficient ground of antiquity.

The like discussion and examination I might also make of the other epistles that follow of Eusebius and Miltiades, which all tend to the same scope, that no prelate or bishop ought to come to his answere (or Ad litem contestatam, as the words of their writing do tearme it) before they be orderly and fully restored againe to their possessions. Who moreouer in the said their epistles still harpe vpon this key of the scripture, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram ædificabo ecclesiam meam. Declaring moreouer that this priuiledge of iudging all men & to be iudge of no man, but onely to bee left to the iudgement of the Lord, was giuen to this foresaid holy see of Rome, from time of the apostles, and chiefly left with Peter the holy key-keeper: so that although the election of the apostles was equall, yet this was chiefly granted to S. Peter, to haue preheminence aboue the rest. Concluding in the end hereby, Quòd semper maiores causæ, sicut sunt episcoporum, & potiorũ curæ negotiorum, ad vnam beati principis apostolorum Petri sedẽ confluerent; that is, That alwaies all greater causes, as bee the matters of bishops, and such other cares of weightie importance, should be brought to the see of saint Peter, the blessed prince of the apostles, &c. These be the words of Miltiades and Eusebius, whereby it may partly bee smelled of him that hath any nose, what was the meaning of them which forged these writings and letters vpon these ancient holy martyrs.

Ex epist. decretal. Miltiades.

A place of the third epistle decretall of Eusebius found untrue.

This I cannot but maruell at, in the third epistle of Eusebius the bishop of Rome, that whereas Marcellinus his late predecessor before, in his owne time and remembrance did fall so horriblie, and was condemned for the same iustly to bee expulsed the citie by the councell of three hundred bishops: yet notwithstanding the foresaid Eusebius in his third epistle alleaging that place of Tu es Petrus, bringeth in for a proofe of the same, and saith: Quia in sede apostolica extrà maculam semper est catholica seruata religio, &c: that is, For in the apostolicall see, alwaies the catholike religion hath been preserued without any spot or blemish.

Miltiades the last bishop of Rome being in danger of persecution.

But howsoeuer the forgers of these decretall epistles haue forgotten themselues, most certaine it is, that these holy bishops, vpon whom they were and are ascribed, liued perfect good men and died blessed martyrs. Of whom this Miltiades was the last among all the bishops of Rome here in the west church of Europe, that euer was in danger of persecution to be martyred, yet to this present day.

The end of these persecutions in all the west churches.

And thus haue ye heard the stories and names of such blessed saints, which suffered in the time of persecution, from the nineteenth yeare of Diocletian, to the seuenth and last yeare of Marentius, with the deaths also and plagues described vpon these tormentors and cruell tyrants, which were the captaines of the same persecution. And here commeth in (blessed bee Christ) the end of these persecutions here in these west churches of Europe, so far as the dominion of blessed Constantinus did chiefly extend.

The persecution vnder Licinius. Hermulus, Stratonicus, martyrs. Theodorus captaine, martyr.

Yet notwithstanding in Asia all persecution as yet ceased not for the space of foure yeares, as aboue is mentioned by the meanes of wicked Licinius, vnder whom diuers there were holy and constant martyrs, that suffered grieuous torments: as Hermilus a deacon, and Stratonicus a keeper of the prison, which both after their punishments sustained, were strangled in the flood Ister. Metast. Also Theodorus the captaine, who being sent for of Licinius, because he would not come, & because he brake his gods in pieces, and gaue them to the poore, therfore was fastned to the crosse, and after being pierced with sharpe prickes or bodkins, in the secret parts of his body, was at last beheaded. Adde to this also Miles, who first being a souldier, afterward was made bishop of a certaine citie in Persia, where he seeing himselfe could doe no good to conuert them, after many tribulations and great afflictions among them, cursed the citie and departed. Which citie shortly after by Sapores king of Persia was destroyed.

Miles martyr. The kings of Persia were commonly called by the name of Sapores.

Persecution in Persia. Acindinus, Pegasius, Anempodistus, Epidephorus, Simeon archbishop, Ctesiphon bishop, martyrs. 128 martyrs in Persia. The storie of Simeon archbishop of Seleucia. Ex Sozom. lib. 2. cap. 8. 9. 10.

In the same countrie of Persia, about this time suffered vnder Sapores the king (as recordeth Simeon Metaphrastes) diuers valiant and constant martyrs, as Acindinus, Pegasius, Anempodistus, Epidephorus, also Simeon archbishop of Selucia, with Ctesiphon an other bishop in Persia, with other ministers and religious men of that region, to the number of one hundred twentie eight. Of this Simeon and Ctesiphon thus writeth Sozomen lib. 2. That the idolatrous magicians in Persia, taking counsell together against the christians, accused Simeon and Ctesiphon to Sapores the king, for that they were gratefull & accepted vnto the Roman emperor, & bewaid to him such things as were done in the land of Persia. Whereupon Sapores being moued, toke great displeasure against the christians, oppressing them with taxes & tributes vnto their vtter impouerishing, killing also their priests with the sword: after that calleth for Simeon the archbishop, who there before the king declared himselfe a worthie and a valiant captaine of Christs church. For when Sapores had commanded him to be led to suffer torments, hee neither shrunke for any feare, nor shewed any great humble suite of submission for any pardon: whereat the king partly maruelling, partly offended, asked why he did not kneele downe as he was wont before to doe? Simeon to this answered: For that, saith he, before this time I was not brought vnto you in bonds to betray the true God, as I am now, so long I refused not to accomplish that which the order & custome of the realme of me required; but now it is not lawfull for me so to doe, for now I come to stand in defence of our religion and true doctrine. When Simeon thus had answered, the king persisting in his purpose, offereth to him the choice either to worship with him after his maner (promising to him many great gifts, if he would so doe) or if hee would not, threatneth to him & to all the other christians within his land, destruction. But Simeon neither allured with his promises, nor terrified with his threatnings, continued constant in his doctrine professed, so as neither he could bee induced to idolatrous worship, nor yet to betray the truth of his religion. For the which cause he was committed into bonds, and there commanded to be kept, to the kings pleasure further knowne.

The worthie answere of Simeon vnto the king.

The constancie of Simeon.

It befell in the way as he was going to the prison, there was sitting at the kings gate a certaine eunuch, an old tutor or scholemaster of the kings, named Ufthazares, who had been once a christian, and afterward falling from his profession, fell with the heathenish multitude to their idolatrie. This Ufthazares sitting at the doore of the kings palace, and seeing Simeon passing by led to the prison, rose vp and reuerenced the bishop. Simeon againe with sharpe words (as the time would suffer) rebuked him, and in great anger cried out against him, which being once a christian, would so cowardly reuolt from his profession, and returne againe to the heathenish idolatrie. At the hearing of these words the eunuch forthwith burling out into teares, laying away his courtly apparell, which was sumptuous and costly, and putting vpon him a blacke and mourning weed, sitteth before the court gates weeping and bewailing, thus saying with himselfe: Woe is me, with what hope, with what face shall I looke hereafter for my God, which haue denied my God, when as this Simeon my familiar acquaintance, thus passing by me, so much disdaineth me, that he refuseth with one gentle word to salute me?

The fall of Ufthazares.

The fruit of ecclesiasticall discipline and chastisment.

The repentance of Ufthazares.

These words being brought to the eares of the king (as such tale-carriers neuer lacke in princes courts) procured against him no little indignation. Whereupon Sapores the king sending for him, first with gentle words and courtly promises began to speake him faire, asking him what cause hee had so to mourne, and whether there was any thing in his house, which was denied him, or which he had not at his owne will & asking? Whereunto Ufthazares answering againe said: that There was nothing in that earthly house, which was to him lacking, or whereunto his desire stood. Yea would God (said he) O king, any other griefe or calamitie in all the world, what soeuer it were, had happened to me rather then this, for the which I doe most iustly mourne and sorrow! For this sorroweth me, that I am this day aliue, who should rather haue died long since, and that I see this sunne, which against my heart and mind, for your pleasure dissemblingly I appeared to worship, for which cause double wise I am worthie of death. First, for that I haue denied Christ; secondly, because I did dissemble with you. And incontinent vpon these words, swearing by him that made both heauen and earth, affirmed most certainely, that although he had played the fole before, he would neuer be so mad againe, as in stead of the creator & maker of all things to worship the creatures which hee had made and created. Sapores the king being astonied at the so sudden alteration of this man, and doubting with himselfe whether to bee angrie with those inchanters or with him; whether to intreate him with gentlenesse or with rigor, at length in this mood commanded the said Asthazares his old ancient seruant, and first tutor and bringer vp of his youth, to be had away, and to be beheaded. As he was going to the place of execution, hee desired of the executioners a little to stay, while he might send a message vnto the king, which was this (sent in by certaine of the kings most trustie eunuches) desiring him, that for all the old and faithfull seruice he had done to his father, and to him, hee would now requite him with this one office againe, to cause to be cried openly by a publike crier in these words following, That Asthazares was beheaded, not for any trechery or crime committed against the king or the realme, but onely for that he was a christian, and would not at the kings pleasure deny his God. And so according vnto his request, it was performed and granted. For this cause did Asthazares so much desire the cause of his death to bee published: because that as his shrinking backe from Christ, was a great occasion to many christians to doe the like, so now the same hearing that Asthazares died for no other cause but onely for the religion of Christ, should learne likewise by his example to bee feruent and constant in that which they profesle. And thus this blessed eunuch did consummate his martyrdome. Of the which his said martyrdome Symeon hearing, being in prison was very ioyfull, and gaue God thankes; who in the next day following, being brought forth before the king, and constantly refusing to condescend vnto the kings request, to worship visible creatures, was likewise by the commandement of the king beheaded, with a great number more, which the same day also did suffer, to the number (as is said) of an hundred and more; all which were put to death before Symeon, hee standing by, and exhorting them with comfortable words: admonishing them to stand firme and stedfast in the Lord, preaching and teaching them concerning death, resurrection, and true pietie, and proued by the scriptures that to bee true which he had said: declaring moreouer that to bee true life indeed, so to die; and that to bee death indeed, to denie or to betray God for feare of punishment: and added further, that there was no man aliue, but needs once must die: For so much as to all men is appointed necessarilie heere to haue an end. But those things which after this life follow hereafter, to be eternall, which neither shall come to all men after one sort. But as the condition and trade of life in diuers men doth differ, and is not in all men like: so the time shall come, when all men in a moment shall render and receiue according to their doings in this present life immortall rewards: such as haue here done well, of life and glorie; such as haue done contrarie, of perpetuall punishment. As touching therefore our well doing, heere is no doubt but of all other our holy actions and vertuous deeds, there is no higher or greater deed, then if a man heere lose his life for his Lord God. With these words of comfortable exhortation, the holy martyrs being prepared, willingly yéelded vp their liues to death. After whom at last followed Symeon, with two other priests or ministers of his church: Abedecalaas and Ananias, which also with him were partakers of the same martyrdome.

At the suffring of those aboue mentioned, it happened that Pusices one of the kings officers, and ouerséer of his artificers, was there present: who séeing Ananias being an aged old father, somewhat to shake and tremble at the sight of them that suffered: O father (said hee) a little moment shut thine eyes, and be strong, and shortly thou shalt sée the sight of God. Vpon these words thus spoken, Pusices immediatly was apprehended and brought vnto the king; who there confessing himselfe constantly to be a christian, and for that hee was very bold and hardie before the king in the cause of Christs faith, was extremely and most cruelly handled in the execution of his martyrdome. For in the vpper part of his necke they made a hole to thrust in their hand, and plackt out his tongue out of his mouth, and so hee was put to death. At the which time also the daughter of Pusices, a godly virgin, by the malicious acculation of the wicked, was apprehended and put to death.

The next yeare following, vpon the same day, when the christians did celebrate the remembrance of the Lords passion, which we call good friday before Easter (as witnesseth the said Sozomenus) Sapores the king directed out a cruell and sharpe edict throughout all his land, condemning to death all them, whosoeuer confessed themselues to be christians. By reason whereof an innumerable multitude of christians, through the wicked procuring of the malignant magicians, suffered the same time by the sword, both in citie and in towne: some being sought for, some offering themselues willingly, lest they should séeme by their silence to deny Christ. Thus all the christians that could bee found, without pitie were slaine, and diuers also of the kings owne court and houshold. Amongst whom was also Azades an eunuch, one whom the king did intirely loue and fauour; which Azades after that the king vnderstood to be put to death, being greatly moued with the sorrow thereof, commanded after that no christians to bee slaine, but them onely which were the doctors and teachers of christian religion.

In the same time it happened that the queene fell into a certaine disease, vpon the occasion whereof, the cruell Iewes with the wicked magicians, falslie and maliciouslie accused Trabula, the sister of Simeon the martyr, a godly virgin, with an other sister also of hirs: that they had wrought priuie charmes to hurt the queene, for the reuenging of the death of Simeon. This acculation being receiued and beleeued, innocent Trabula, with the others were condemned, and with a saw cut in sunder by the middle, whose quarters were then hanged vpon stakes, the queene going betweene them, thinking thereby to bee deliuered of hir sicknesse. This Trabula was a maid of a right comely beautie and verie amiable, to whom one of the magicians cast great loue, much desiring and labouring by gifts and rewards sent into the prison to win hir to his pleasure: promising that if she would applie to his request, she should be deliuered and set at libertie. But she vtterly refusing to consent vnto him, or rather rebuking him for his incontinent attempt, did chuse rather to die, then to betray either the religion of hir mind, or the virginitie of hir bodie. Now for so much as the king had commanded that no christians should be put to death, but onely such as were the teachers and leaders of the flocke: the magicians and archmagicians left no diligence vntried to set forward the matter. Whereby great affliction and persecution was among the bishops and teachers of the church, which in all places went to slaughter, especially in the countrie of Diobenor, for that part of Persia aboue all other was most christian. Where Acepsimas the bishop with a great number of his flocke and clergie were apprehended and taken: vpon the apprehension of whom, the magicians to satisfie the kings commandement, dismissed all the rest, onely depriuing them of their liuing and goods. Onely Acepsimas the bishop they retained, with whom one Iacobus a minister, or priest of his church was also ioyned: not of any compulsion, but onely as himselfe so desired and obtained of those magicians that he might follow him, and bee coupled in the same bonds to serue the aged bishop, and to releeue (so much as hee might) his calamities, and heale his wounds. For hee had been sore scourged before of the magicians, after they had apprehended him, and brought him to worship the sunne: which thing because he would not doe, they cast him into prison againe, where this Iacobus was waiting vpon him. At the same time likewise Athalas a priest or minister, also Azadanes and Abdiesus deacons were imprisoned, and miserablie scourged for the testimonie of the Lord Iesus. After this, the archimagus espying his time, complaineth vnto the king of them, hauing authoritie and commission giuen him (vnlesse they would worship the sunne) to punish them as hee pleased. This commandement receiued of the king, the master magus doth declare to them in prison. But they answered againe plainely, that they would neuer be either betrayers of Christ, or worshippers of the sunne; whereupon without mercie they were put to bitter torments, where Acepsimas strongly persisting in the confession of Christ, indureth to death. The other being no lesse rent and wounded with scourges, yet continued marueilouslie aline, and because they would in no case turne from their constant sentence, were turned againe into prison. Of whom Athalas in the time of his whipping was so drawne and rackt with pulling, that both his armes being losed out of the ioynts, hanged downe from his bodie: which hee so carried about without vse of any hand to feed himselfe, but as hee was fed of others.

Ex Soz. lib. 2. cap. 13. Ex Niceph. lib. 8. cap. 37.

Miserable and almost innumerable were the slaughters vnder the reigne of this Sapores, of bishops, ministers, deacons, religious men, holy virgins, and other ecclesiastical persons, such as did then cleaue to the doctrine of Christ, and suffered for the same. The names of the bishops besides the other multitude taken in persecution, are recited in Sozom. lib. 2. and in Nicephor. lib. 8. cap. 37. in this order following: Barbasimes, Paulus, Gaddiabes, Sabinus, Mareas, Mocius, Iohannes, Hormisdas, Papas, Iacobus, Romas, Maares, Agas, Bochres, Abdas, Abiesus, Ioannes, Abramius, Agdelas, Sabores, Isaac, Dausas, Bicor also with Maureanda his fellow bishop, and the rest of his churches vnder him, to the number of two hundred and fiftie persons, which were the same time apprehended of the Persians, &c. Brieflie to comprehend the whole multitude of them that suffered in that persecution, the maner of their apprehension, the cruelnesse of their torments, how and where they suffered, and in what places, it is not possible for any historie to discharge. Neither are the Persians themselues (as Sozomenus recordeth) able to recite them. In summe, the multitude and number of them, whom they are able to recite by name, commeth to the summe of sixteene thousand men and women.

Barbasimes, Paulus, Gaddiabes, Sabinus, Mareas, Mocius, Iohannes, Hormisdas, Papas, Iacobus, Romas, Maares, Agas, Bochres, Abdas, Abiesus, Ioannes, Abramius, Agdelas, Sabores, Isaac, Dausas, Bicor, Maureanda, with 250 other martyrs.

The rumor and noise of this so miserable affliction of the christians in the kingdome of Persia, comming to the eares of Constantinus the emperor, put him in great heauinesse, studying and reuoluing with himselfe, how to helpe the matter, which indeed was very hard for him to doe. It so befell the same time, that certaine ambassadors were then at Rome from Sapores king of Persia, to whom Constantinus did easilie grant and consent, satisfying all their requests and demands, thinking thinking thereby to obtaine the more friendship at the kings hands, that at his request he would be good to the christians, to whom he writeth his epistle in their behalfe, and sendeth the same by his messengers, beginning thus:

The copie and effect of the epistle of Constantine to Sapores.

Diuinam fidem seruans veritatis lucem sortior. Veritatis luce doctus diuina fide cognosco. Per ea igitur, quibus illa res agendas confirmat, sanctissimam religionem cognitam reddo, & hunc me cultum doctore cognitionis sancti Dei habere confiteor, &c. Eusebius De vita Constantini, lib. 4. The contents whereof, briefly doe tend to this effect. Declaring vnto him how hee should stand much beholden to him, if at his request hee would shew some quiet and rest to the christians, in whose religion there was nothing which he could iustly blame. For so much as in their sacrifices they vse to kill nothing, nor to shed no blood, but onely to offer vp vnbloodie sacrifices, to make their prayers vnto God, who delighteth not in bloodshedding, but only in the soule that loueth vertue, & followeth such doctrine and knowledge, which is agreeing vnto true pietie. And therefore such men as doe leade him, and learne so to beleeue and to worship God, are more to bee commended. Moreouer, hee assureth him to find God more mercifull vnto him, if he would imbrace the godly pietie and truth of the christians. And for example thereof, bringeth in the stories of Galienus and Valerianus, who so long as they were fauourers of the christians did prosper and flourish. But as soone as they moued any persecution against them, it happened to them as it did to all other emperors before them, that all went backeward with them, as especially might appeare by Valerianus, who after hee had raged so cruelly against the christians, was eftsoones ouercome of the Persians, the reuenging hand of God falling vpon him, where hee led euer a miserable life, in wretched captiuitie. Further also for the more euidence of the same, inferreth the examples of those emperors & tyrants in his time whom he vanquished and subdued only by his faith in Christ, for the which faith God was his helper, and gaue him the victorie in many battels, and triumph ouer great tyrants, whereby he hath so inlarged the dominion of the Romane monarchie from the west ocean vnto the vttermost parts well neere of all the east. To the doing and working whereof, he neither called to him the helpe of any charmer, or diuination of soothsayer, nor vsed the killing of any sacrifice: but onely the following of the crosse, and prayer made to almightie God, without any other bloodie sacrifice, was the armour wherewith hee ouercame, &c. And in the end of the epistle addeth these words. What ioy (saith he) what gladnesse would it be to my heart, to heare the state also of the Persians to flourish, as I wish it to do, by imbracing this sort of men, the christians I meane? So that both you with them, & they with you in long prosperitie may inioy much felicitie together as your hearts would desire, and in so doing no doubt ye shall. For so shall you haue God, which is the author and creator of all this vniuersall world, to be mercifull and gratious to you. These men therefore I commend vnto you vpon your kingly honor, and vpon your clemencie and pietie, wherewith you are indued, I commit them vnto you, desiring you to imbrace and receiue them according to your humanitie and benignitie, agreeing and conuenient to your estate: who in so doing shall now both procure to your selfe grace through your faith, and also shall declare to me a great pleasure and benefit worthie of thankes.

The generall care of godly Constantinus for all christians in all places.

This example wrote Constantinus to king Sapores, such care had this godly prince for them that beleeued in Christ, not onely in his owne monarchie, but also in all places of the world: neither is it to bee doubted but this intercession of the emperor did something mittigate the heate of the Persians persecution, although therof we reade no certaine thing in our histories.

Other foure persecutions in Persia. Andas bishop, martyr. The storie of Hormisda martyr. Ex Theodor. lib. 5. cap. 39. The faithfull constancie of Hormisda. Hormisda banished the countrie of Persia.

Of other troubles and persecutions we reade, which happened afterward in the said countrie of Persia, vnder Isdigerdes the king, but these followed long after about the time of the emperor Theodosius. At which time suffred Andas their bishop, and Hormisda a great noble mans sonne, and of great reputation among the Persians, whom when the king vnderstood to be a christian, and to denie to turne from his religion, condemned him to keepe his elephants naked. In processe of time, the king looking out and seeing him all swarted and tanned in the sunne, commanded him to haue a shirt put on, and to bee brought before him, whom then the king asked, if hee would denie Christ. Hormisda hearing this, tare off his shirt from his body and cast it from him, saying; If ye thinke that I will deny my faith to Christ for a shirt, haue here your gift againe, &c. And so was vpon that expelled the countrie: Theodor. lib. 5.

The storie of Beniamin, deacon and martyr.

Of Beniamin the deacon, thus writeth the said Theodoret in his first booke, that after two yeares of his imprisonment, at the request of the Romane legat he was deliuered, who afterward contrarie to the kings commandement preached and taught the gospel of Christ, & was most miserablie excarnificat, hauing twentie sharpe pricks of reeds thrust vnder his nailes; but when hee did laugh at that, then in his priuie yard had a sharpe reed thrust in with horrible paine. After that a certaine long stalke ragged & thornie, being thrust into his body by the nether part, was forced into him, with the horriblenesse of the paine wherof the valiant & inuincible souldier of the Lord gaue ouer his life. And thus much concerning the martyrs & persecutions among the Persians, although these persecutions belong not to this time, which came (as it is said) long after the daies of Constantinus, about ye yere of our Lord, 425.

Who being asked afterward of his friends, how hee could abide so sharpe torments, said that at the first beginning hee felt some paine, but afterward there stood by him a yong man, who as he was sweatting wiped away his sweat, and refreshed him with cold water oft times: wherwith he was so delighted, that when he was let downe from the engin, it grieued him more then before: Ruff. 5. cap. 26. This rage and furie of the wicked Arethusians, Sozomenus supposeth to come of this, because that Constantinus before had broken them from their countrie maner of setting forth and exposing their virgins filthily to whomsoeuer lusted, and destroyed the temple of Venus in Heliopolis, restraining the people there from their filthinesse and vile whoredome. Of the lamentable storie, or rather tragedie of Marcus Arethusius their bishop, thus writeth the said Sozomenus, and also Theodoretus in his third booke, in these words as follow.

The storie of Marcus Arethusius.

This tragedie (saith he) of Marcus Arethusius, both require the eloquence and worthinesse of Eschilus and Sophocles, which may, as the matter deserueth, set forth and beautifie his great afflictions. This man, at the commandement of Constantinus, pulled downe a certaine temple dedicated to idols, and in stead thereof built vp a church where the christians might congregat. The Arethusians remembring the little good will that Julianus bare vnto him, accused him as a traitor and enemie to him. At the first, according as the scripture teacheth, he prepared himselfe to flie: but when hee perceiued that there were certaine of his kinsmen or friends apprehended in his stead, returning againe of his owne accord, he offered himselfe to those that thirsted for his blod. Whom when they had gotten, as men neither pitying his old age and worne yeares, nor abashed at his vertuous conuersation, being a man so adorned both with doctrine and manners, first stript him naked, and pitifully beat him: then within a while after, they cast him into a foule filthie sinke, and from thence being brought, they caused boyes to thrust him in with sharpened sticks made for the nonce, to prouoke his paine the more. Lastly, they put him into a basket, and being anointed with honie and broth, they hung him abrode in the heate of the sunne as meate for wasps and flies to feed vpon. And all this extremitie they shewed vnto him, for that they would inforce him to doe one of these things, that is, either to build vp againe the temple which hee had destroyed; or else to giue so much money as should pay for the building of the same: but euen as he purposed with himselfe to suffer and abide their grieuous torments, so refused hee to doe that they demanded of him. At the length they taking him to be but a poore man, & not able to pay such a summe of money, promised to forgiue him the one halfe, so that hee would be contented to pay the other halfe. But hee hanging in the basket wounded pitifully with the sharpened sticks of boyes and children, and al to bebitten with wasps and flies, did not onely conceale his paine & griefe, but also derided those wicked ones, and called them base, low, and terrene people, and he himselfe to bee exalted and set on high. At length they demanding of him but a small summe of money, he answered thus; It is a great wickednesse to confer one halfe penie in case of impietie, as if a man should beslow the whole. Thus they being not able to preuaile against him, let him downe, and leauing him went their way, so that every man might learne at his mouth the example of true pietie and faithfulnesse.

Although the tractation of these foresaid stories and persecutions of Persia, aboue premised, doe stray somewhat out of the order and course of time and place, as which came neither in the time of Constantine nor be pertinent to the monarchie of Rome: yet because in this present historie we are in hand with the holy martyrs and saints of Christ; for so much as these also gaue such a faithfull testimonie of the Lord Jesus with their blod, I thought therefore not to passe them ouer without some testimony in this our catalogue of holy martyrs. And here an end of these persecutions of the primitiue church.

It may peraduenture bee marueiled of some, reading the historie of these so terrible persecutions aboue specified, why God the almightie director of all things, would suffer his owne people and faithfull seruants, beleeuing in his owne and onely begotten sonne Jesus, so cruelly to bee handled, so wrongfully to be vexed, so extremely to bee tormented and put to death, and that the space of so many yeares together, as in these foresaid persecutions may appeare. To the which admiration I haue nothing to answer, but to say with the words of Hierom, Non debemus super hac rerum iniquitate perturbari, videntes, &c. We ought not to be moued with this iniquitie of things, to see the wicked to preuaile against the godly: for so much as in the beginning of the world we see Abel the iust to be killed of wicked Cain, and afterward Jacob being thrust out, Esau to reigne in his fathers house: in like case the Egytians with bricke and tile afflicted the sonnes of Israel, yea and the Lord himselfe, was hee not crucified of the Iewes, Barrabas the theefe being let goe? Time would not suffice me to recite and reckon vp how the godly in this world goe to wracke, the wicked flourishing and preuailing: Briefly, howsoeuer the cause hereof procedeth, whether for our sinnes here in this life, or how else soeuer, yet this is to vs, and may bee to all men a sufficient stay, that we are sure these afflictions and persecutions of God his people in this world, not to come by any chance or blind fortune, but by the prouident appointment and forewarning of God. For so in the old law by the affliction of the children of Israel, he hath prefigured these persecutions of his christians. So by the words of Christs owne mouth in the gospell, hee did forewarne his church of these troubles to come. Againe, neither did he suffer these so great afflictions to fall vpon his seruants, before that hee had premonished them sufficiently by speciall reuelation in the Apocalyps of John his seruant, in the which Apocalyps hee declared vnto his church before, not onely what troubles were comming at hand towards them, where and by what men they should come, but also in plaine number, if the words of the prophesie bee well vnderstood, assigneth the true time, how long the said persecutions should continue, and when they should cease. For as there is no doubt but by the beast with seuen heads, bearing the whore of Babylon, drunken with the blod of saints, is signified the citie of Rome: so in my iudgement, the power of making fortie two moneths (in the thirteenth of the Apocalyps) is to be expounded, taking euery moneth for a sabbath of yeares, that is, reckoning for seuen yeares a moneth: so that fortie and two such sabbaths of yeares, being gathered together, make vp the yeares iust, betweene the time of Christs death, to the last yeare of the persecution of Marentius, when Constantinus fighting vnder the banner of Christ, ouercame him, and made an end of all persecution within the monarchie of Rome. The number of which yeares by plaine computation, come to two hundred ninetie and foure; to the which two hundred ninetie and foure yeares, if ye adde the other six yeares, vnder the persecution of Licinius in Asia, then it filleth vp full the three hundred yeares. And so long continued the persecution of Christs people vnder the heathen tyrants, and emperors of the monarchie of Rome, according to the number of the fortie two moneths which the beast had power to make, specified in the thirteenth of Apocalyps. For the better explication whereof, because the matter being of no small importance greatly appertaineth to the publike vtilitie of the church, and lest any should misdoubt me herein, to follow any priuat interpretation of mine owne, I thought good to communicate to the reader, ẏ which hath been imparted vnto me, in the opening of these mysticall numbers in the foresaid booke of Reuelation contained, by occasion as followeth.

As I was in hand with these histories, and therein considered the exceeding rage of these persecutions, the intollerable torments of the blessed saints, so cruelly rackt, rent, torne, and pluckt in peeces with all kind of tortures, paines and punishments that could bee deuised, more bitter then any death it selfe; I could not without great sorrow and passion of mind behold their sorrowfull afflictions, or write of their bloodie passions. Wherein much like it happened to me as did to Titus Liuius, who writing of the wars of Carthage, was so moued in the writing thereof: Ac si in parte aliqua laboris ac periculi ipse pariter fuisset. Further I procéded in the storie, and the hater the persecutions grew, the more my griefe with them and for them increased, not onely pitying their wofull case, but also almost reasoning with God, thus thinking like a foole with my selfe, why God of his goodnesse would suffer his children and seruants so vehemently to bee cruciated and afflicted. If mortall things were gouerned by heauenly prouidence (as must needs be granted) why did the wicked so rage and flourish and the godly goe so to wracke? If sinnes deserued punishment, yet neither were they sinners alone, and why was their death aboue all other so sharpe and bitter? At least why would the Lord suffer the vehemency of these so horrible persecutions to indure so long time against his poore church, shewing vnto them no certaine determined end of their tribulations, whereby they knowing the appointed determination of almightie God, with more consolation might indure out the same? As the Israelites in the captiuitie of Babylon had seuentie yeares limited vnto them: and vnder Pharao they were promised a deliuerance out. Also vnder the Syrian tyrants three score and two weekes were abridged vnto them. Onely in these persecutions I could find no end determined, nor limitation set for their deliuerance. Whereupon much marueiling with my selfe, I searched the booke of Reuelation, to see whether any thing there might be found; where although I well perceiued the beast there described to signifie the empire of Rome, which had power to ouercome the saints, yet concerning the time and continuance of these persecutions vnder the beast, I found nothing to satisfie my doubt. For albeit I read there, of forty two months, of a time, times, and halfe a time, of one thousand two hundred and three score daies; yet all this by computation comming but to three yeares and a halfe, came nothing neere the long continuance of these persecutions, which lasted three hundred yeres. Thus being vexed and turmoiled in spirit, about the reckoning of these numbers and yeares, it so happened vpon a sunday in the morning lying in my bed, and musing about these numbers, suddenly it was answered to my mind, as with a maiestie, thus inwardly saying within me: Thou fole, count these moneths by sabbaths, as the weekes of Daniel are counted by sabbaths. The Lord I take to witnesse thus it was. Whereupon thus being admonished, I began to reckon the fortie two moneths by sabbaths; first of moneths, that would not serue; then by sabbaths of yeares, wherein I began to feele some probable vnderstanding. Yet not satisfied herewith, to haue ẏ matter more sure, ex ciuiles I repaired to certaine merchants of mine acquaintance; of whom one is departed a true faithful seruant of the Lord, the other two be yet aliue, and witnesse hereof. To whom the number of these foresaid fortie two moneths being propounded, & examined by sabbaths of yeares, the whole summe was found to surmount vnto two hundred ninetie and foure yeares, containing the full and iust time of these foresaid persecutions, neither more nor lesse.

Now this one claspe being opened, the other numbers that follow are plaine and manifest to the intelligent reader to bee vnderstood. For where mention is made of three yeares and a halfe, of one time, two times and halfe a time, also of one thousand two hundred and three score daies, all these come to one reckoning and signifie forty & two moneths, by which months, as is said, is signified the whole time of these primitiue persecutions, as here in order may appeare.

The mysticall numbers in the Apocalyps opened.

1 One thousand two hundred and sixtie. Reuel. 11. 12.

2 Three daies and a halfe. Reuel. 11.

3 A time, times, and halfe a time. Reuel. 12.

4 Fortie two moneths or three yeares and a halfe. Reuel. 11.

First, where mention is made, Apocalyps, chapt. eleuen, that the two prophets shall prophesie 1260 daies; and also that the woman flying into the desert shall there bee fed 1260 daies: who knoweth not that 1260 daies make three yeares and a halfe? that is, moneths ——— 42.

Secondly, where we reade, cap. 11. the bodies of the two foresaid prophets shall lie in the streets of the great citie vnburied the space of three daies and a halfe, and after the said three daies and a halfe they shall reuiue againe, & call the houres of these three daies and a halfe (which be 42) be reckoned euery day for a sabbath of yeares, or else euery day for a moneth, and they come to moneths ——— 42.

Thirdly, whereas in the same booke is expressed that the woman had two wings giuen hir to flie vnto the desert for a time, times, and halfe a time: giue for one time one yeare, or one day; for two times, two yeares or two daies; for halfe a time, halfe a yeare, or halfe a day; & so it is manifest that these three yeares and a halfe, mount to moneths 42.

Fourthly, account these fortie two moneths aforesaid (which the beast had power to make, Apoc. 11.) by sabbath of yeares, that is, seuen yeares for a moneth, or euery moneth for seuen yeares; and it amounteth to the sum of yeares ——— 294.

And so haue ye the iust yeres, daies, times, & moneths of these foresaid persecutions vnder the beast, neither shorter nor longer, reckoning from the death of John Baptist vnder Herod the Romane king to the end of Marentius, and of Licinius, the two last great persecutors, the one in the west, the other in the east, who were both vanquished by godly Constantinus. And so peace was giuen to the church, albeit not in such ample wise, but that diuers tumults & troubles afterward insued, but they lasted not long; and the chiefe brunt, to speake of these Romane persecutions perſecutions which the Holie ghoſt eſpeciallie conſidered aboue all other in this his Reuelation thus ended in the time of this Conſtantinus. Then was the great dragon the diuell, to wit, the fierce rage and power of his malicious perſecuting, tied ſhort for a thouſand yeeres after this, ſo that he could not preuaile in any ſuch ſort, but that the power and glory of the goſpell by little and little increaſing and ſpreading with great ioie and libertie, ſo preuailed that at length it got the vpper hand and replenished the whole earth, rightlie verifying therein the water of Ezechiel, which iſſuing out of the right ſide of the altar, the further it ran, the deeper it grew, till at length it replenished the whole Ocean ſea, and healed all the fiſhes therin. No otherwiſe the courſe of the goſpell proceeding of ſmall and hard beginnings, kept ſtill his ſtreame; the more it was ſtopped, the ſwifter it ran: by bloud it ſeeded, by death it quickned, by cutting it multiplied, through violence it ſprung; till at laſt out of thraldome and oppreſſion it braſt forth into perfect libertie, and flouriſhed in all proſperitie, had it ſo been that the Chriſtians wiſelie and moderatlie could haue vſed this reſt and libertie, and not abuſed the ſame, forgetting their former eſtate to their owne pride, pompe, and worldlie eaſe, as it came afterward to paſſe, whereof more is to be ſéene and ſaid (the Lord willing) in place and time conuenient.

Ezech. 47.

And thus much touching the propheticall numbers in the Apocalypſe. Wherein is to be noted and magnified the eternall wiſdome and hie prouidence of almightie God, ſo diſpoſing and gouerning his church, that no aduerſitie or perturbation happeth at any time to it, which his prouident wiſdome doth not foreſee before and prepoſe; neither doth he preordeine or determine any thing which he doth not moſt truelie performe, both foreſeing the beginning of ſuch perſecutions, and limiting the end therof how long to cõtinue and when to ceaſe. In much like ſort we read in the books of Geneſis, how the ſtocke of Iſrael was foure hundred yéeres in the land of Egypt. During the ſpace of which foure hundred yeeres, after the death of Joſeph (who beareth a plaine figure of Chriſt) they were hardlie intreated and cruellie afflicted of the Egyptians, about the ſpace of three hundred yéeres, reckoning from after the death of Joſeph, to their deliuerance out of the bondage of Egypt, reſemblable as theſe chriſtians, after Chriſts time ſuffered the like bondage vnder the Romane tyrants.

The perſecuted Iſraelus bearing a figure of the perſecuted church of Chriſt.

Thus much by the waie I thought to inſinuat, leſt any ſhould muſe or take any offence in himſelfe, to ſée or read of the church ſo long and ſo many yéeres to be vnder ſo miſerable and extreme afflictions: wherein neither chance nor fortune, nor diſpoſition of man, hath had any place, but onlie the foreconſell and determination of the Lord ſo gouerned and diſpoſed the ſame, who not onlie did ſuffer them to fall, and foreſaw thoſe perſecutions before they fell, but alſo appointed the times and yéeres how long they ſhould laſt, and when to haue an end, as by the foreſaid foztie two mõths in the thirteenth and eleuenth chapters of S. Johns Apocalyps hath bin declared. Which months conteining two hundred ninetie and foure yeeres, if they be rightlie gathered, make the full time betweene the firſt yéere, of the perſecution of Chriſt vnder the Jewes and Herod, till the laſt yeere of perſecution vnder Licinius, which was from the natiuitie of Chriſt in the yéere of our Lord three hundred twentie and foure, from the firſt perſecution of Chriſt in the yeere of our Lord two hundred ninetie and foure, as is afore ſaid. After the which yeere according to the predoinat counſell of God, when his ſeueritie had been ſufficientlie declared vpon his owne houſe, it pleaſed him to ſhew mercy againe, & to bind vp ſathan the old ſerpent, according to the twentith chapter of the Reuelation, for the ſpace of a thouſand yeeres, that is, from this time of Licinius, to the time of John Wickliffe and John Huſſe. During all which time, albeit certeine conflicts and tumults haue been among chriſtian biſhops themſelues in the church, yet no vniuerſall murthering perſecution was ſtirring before the preaching of John Wickliffe, of Huſſe, and ſuch others, as in the further proceſſe of this hiſtorie (Chriſt willing and aiding vs) ſhall more appeere hereafter.

Thus hauing at large diſcourſed theſe horrible perſecutions paſt, and heauie afflictions of chriſtian martyrs, now by the grace of God, comming out of this red ſea of bloudie perſecution, leauing Pharao and his hoſt behind: let vs ſing gloriouſlie to the worthie name of our God, who through the bloud of the lambe after long and tedious afflictions, at length hath viſited his people with comfort, hath tied vp ſathan ſhort, hath ſent his meeke Moſes (gentle Conſtantine I meane) by whom it hath ſo pleaſed the Lord to worke deliuerance to his captiue people, to ſet his ſeruants at libertie, to turne their mourning into ioie, to magnifie the church of his ſonne, to deſtroie the idols of all the world, to grant life and libertie (and would God alſo not ſo much riches!) vnto them which before were the abiects of all the world, and all by the meanes of godlie Conſtantinus the meeke and moſt chriſtian emperor, of whoſe diuine victories againſt ſo many tyrants and emperors, perſecutors of Chriſts people; and laſtlie againſt Licinius, in the yéere of our Lord, three hundred twentie and foure, of whoſe other noble acts & prowelles, of whoſe bleſſed vertues and his happy birth and progenie, part we haue comprehended before, part now remaineth (Chriſt willing) to be declared.

This Conſtantine was the ſonne of Conſtantius the emperor, a good and vertuous child of a good and vertuous father, borne in Britanie (as ſaith Eutropius) whoſe mother was named Helena, daughter indeed of king Coilus: although Ambroſius in his funerall oratiõ of the death of Theodoſius ſaith, ſhe was an inholders daughter. He was a moſt bountifull and gratious prince, hauing a deſire to nourith learning and good arts, and did oftentimes vſe to reade, write, and ſtudie himſelfe. He had marueilous good ſucceſſe & proſperous atchiuing of all things he toke in hand, which then was (and truelie) ſuppoſed to proceed of this, for that he was ſo great a fauorer of the chriſtian faith. Which faith when he had once embraced, he did euer after moſt deuoutlie and religiouſlie reuerence, and commanded by eſpeciall commiſſion & proclamation, that euerie man ſhould profeſſe the ſame religion throughout all the Romane monarchie. The worſhipping of idols, whereunto he was addict by the allurement of Fauſta his wife, in ſo much that he did ſacrifice to them, after the diſcomfiture of Maxentius in battell, he vtterlie abiured: but baptiſme he deferred euen vnto his old age, becauſe he had determined a iourney into Perſia, & thought in Jordan to haue been baptiſed. As touching his naturall diſpoſition and wit, he was verie eloquent, a good philoſopher, and in diſputation ſharp and ingenious. He was accuſtomed to ſay, that an emperor ought to refuſe no labor for the vtilitie of the common weale: yea, and that to aduenture the mangling of his bodie for the remedie thereof; but if otherwiſe it may be holpen, to cherith the ſame. This doe Aurelius, Victor, Pomponius Letus, and Ignatius write of him. And Aelius Lampridius ſaith, writing vpon the life of Heliogabalus; that Conſtantinus was wont to ſay, that An empire was giuen by the determinat purpoſe of God, that he to whom it was giuen, ſhould ſo imploie his diligence, as he might be thought worthie of the ſame at the hands of the giuer; which ſame ſaying alſo Auguſtine noteth in his third booke againſt Creſconius, Epiſt. 49. and 50.

He firſt entered into the empire by the mercifulneſſe of God, minding after long waues of dolefull perſecution to reſtore vnto his church peace and tranquillitie in the yeere of our Lord three hundred and eleuen, as Euſebius accounteth in his chronicle. His reigne continued, as Eutropius affirmeth, thirtie yéeres, Letus ſaith thirtie and two yéeres lacking two months. Great peace and tranquillitie inioied the church vnder the reigne of this good emperor, which toke great paine and trauell for the preſeruation thereof. Firſt, yea and that before he had ſubdued Licinius, he ſet forth many edicts for the reſtitution of the goods of the church, for the reuoking of the chriſtians out of exile, for taking away the diſſenſion of the doctors out of the church, for the ſetting of them free from publike charges and ſuch like, euen as the copie of his conſtitutions heere vnder declareth, which Euſebius in his tenth booke and fift chapter repeateth in this wiſe.

Euſeb. lib. 10. cap. 5.

VIctor Conſtantinus Maximus Auguſtus, to our louing ſubiects inhabiting throughout ỹ eaſt parts, ſendeth greeting. The thing it ſelfe which in the ſure and moſt firme law of nature is contained, doth giue vnto all men (euen as God hath ordained the ſame) ſufficient perceiuerance and vnderſtanding, both of ſuch things as man ought to foreſee, as alſo what things preſently he ought to meditate. Neither is there any thing therin to be doubted of ſuch as haue their minds directed to the ſcope or marke of perfect vnderſtanding: ſo that the perfect comprehending of ſound reaſon, & the perceiuerance thereof be compared with the knowledge of God, being the true and perfect vertue. Wherfore let no wiſe man be troubled, although he ſees diuers men of diuers diſpoſitiõs: for wiſdome which ſpringeth of vertue, cannot abide or acquaint her ſelfe with fond idiots, vnleſſe that (on the other ſide) the malice of peruerſe litherneſſe prolong her daies, and cauſe the ſame idiocie to ſuruiue. Wherefore aſſuredlie the crowne and price of vertue lieth open vnto all men, and the moſt mighty God ordereth the iudgement of the ſame. I vndoubtedly (as manifeſtlie as poſſible is) will indeuour my ſelfe to teſtifie and confeſſe vnto you al the hope which is in me. I thinke verily that the emperors which before this time haue lately been, euen for their tyrannie had the empire taken from them: and my father onely exerciſing and vſing all meekneſſe and lenitie in his affaires, calling vpon God the father with great deuotion and humilitie, hath been exalted to the ſame: and all the reſt as men wanting their wits, and in compariſon as ſauage beaſts, rather did giue themſelues to like cruelty, then vnto any lenity and gentleneſs towards their ſubiects: in which tyranny euery one for his time being nuzzelled, vtterly ſubuerted the true and vnfallible doctrine, and ſo great malice was there kindled in their breaſts, that whe all things were in peaceable tranquillitie, they made and raiſed moſt cruell and bloudie inteſtine or ciuill warres. It is credibly informed vs, that in thoſe daies Apollo gaue anſwers, but not by any mans mouth, but out of a certaine caue and darke place (ſaying) that he was much diſquieted by thoſe that were the iuſt men & liuers vpon the the earth, so that he could or would not for them declare a truth of such things as others demanded. And heerby it came to passe that such false diuinations were giuen from the golden tables in Apollos temple. And in this thing did his propheticall priest complaine of, when he tooke vp againe the haire of his head, that other had contemptuouslie cast downe, and that the neglecting of his diuination was the cause of so manie euils amongst men. But let vs see what was the end heereof. We now boldlie and without all feare inuocat & worship the omnipotent God. When I was a child I heard, that he which then was cheefe emperor of Rome, vnhappie, yea most vnhappie man, being seduced and brought into error by his souldiors, curiouslie inquired who were those just men vpon the earth that Apollo ment? And one of his priests which was neere about him, made answer that they were the christians. This answer heereupon vnto him being as delectable as honie vnto the mouth, drew the sword giuen vnto him, to be a reuenger vpon euill doers & malefactors against the professors of the irreprehensible sanctimonie and religion, and straightwaie he gaue forth a commission (to bloudie homicides, as I may well call them) and gaue commandement to all the iudges that they should endeuor themselues with all the cunning they had, to the deuising of more greeuous and sharper punishments against the poore christians. Then, then Isaie, a man might haue seene how greatlie the honest professors of that religion were molested with cueltie, and dailie suffered no small iniuries and contumelies, and that also they suffered & susteined the same with such temperance, as though they had had no iniuries done vnto them at all. Which temperance and patience of theirs was the cause why the furious citizens were the more mad and raging against them. What fiers, what tortures, what kind of torments were there, but they without respect either of age or sexe were inforced to feele?

The sword giuen for to be auenged vpon malefactors.

A great commendation of the christians.

Then did the earth without doubt hir selfe bewaile hir children; and the round world which conteineth all things, being sprinkled and imbrued with their bloud, made dolefull lamentatiō for them, and the daie it selfe prouoked for to mourne, was made amazed for them. But what is this to purpose? Now the verie barbarous nations reioice for their sakes which receiued and harboured them, when they were afraid and fled from vs, keeping them as it were in most louing and amiable captiuitie: & they saued not onlie their liues, but also were a defense for their religion. And now also the Romane nation remembreth and hath before their eies this blame and spot, which the christians that were of that time worthilie gaue vnto them, when they by them were banished (as vnfit members of their common wealth) amongst the barbarous people. What needeth to make further rehearsall of the mourning lamentation, which the heathen people themselues thoroughout all the world made for the pitifull murther and slaughter of them? After this it came to passe, that they which were authors of all these mischiefs died also, and were committed for their reward to the most filthie and horrible dungeon of hell. They being so intangled with intestine and ciuill warres, left aliue neither name nor kinsmen of their owne; which thing vndoubtedlie had not chanced vnlesse the wicked diuinations of Apollos oracles had deceiued and bewitched them. To thee therefore now I praie, ôh most mightie God, that thou wilt vouchsafe to be mercifull, and pardon all the east parts and inhabitants of the same, being oppressed with calamitie: & that by me thy seruant thou wilt of thy goodnesse helpe & releeue the same. And these things rashlie craue I not at thy hands, ôh Lord, most mightie and holiest God of all. For I being persuaded by the onlie oracles, haue both begun and also finished wholesome and profitable things: and further, by the bearing and shewing of thine ensigne, haue ouercome a mightie and strong host, and when any necessitie of the common weale (to my charge committed) requireth thereunto (following those signes and tokens of thy vertues) I boldlie go forth and fight against mine enimies: and for this cause haue I sacrificed my soule vnto thee, purified and cleansed both with thy loue and feare. Yea trulie, thy name doe I sincerelie loue, and thy power doe I reuerence, which by many tokens & wonders hast shewed and confirmed thereby my beleefe and faith. Therefore will I doe my endeuor and bend my selfe thereunto, that I may redifie thy most holie house, which those wicked and vngodlie emperors haue with so great ruine laid wast, thy people doe I desire to bring and stablish, in firme peace and tranquillitie, & that for the publike vtilitie of all the inhabitants of the earth. Those which yet erre and are out of the waie, enioie the benefit of peace and quietnesse, with and amongst the number of the faithfull sort: for I trust the restitution of the like societie and participation may be a meanes to bring them also that erre into the perfect waie of veritie. Let no man therefore be greeuous one vnto another, but what euerie man thinketh best, that let him doe: for such as are wise ought throughlie to be persuaded, that the onlie meane to liue holilie, & as they should doe, whom the spirit of God moueth, to take their delight and recreation in reading his holie will: and if others wilfullie will go out of the waie, cleauing to the synagogues of false doctrine, they may at their owne perill. As for vs, we haue the most worthie house or congregation of Gods veritie, which he according to his owne goodnesse and nature hath giuē vs. And this also we wish vnto them, that with like participation and common consent, they may feele with vs the same delectation of mind. For this our religion is neither new, nor newlie inuented, but is as old as we beleeue the creatiō of the world to be, and which God hath commanded to be celebrated with such worship as both seemed and pleased him: but all liuing men are liers, and are deceiued with diuers and sundrie illusions. Thou ôh God for Christ thy sonnes sake, suffer not this wickednesse againe to root: thou hast set vp a cleere burning light, that thereby as manie as thou hast chosen may come vnto thee, these thy miracles approoue the same. It is thy power that keepeth vs in innocencie and fidelitie. The sunne and the moone run their appointed course. Neither yet in ranging wise wander the starres to what place of the world they list themselues. The daies, yeeres, months and times keepe their appointed turnes. The earth abideth firme and vnremooueable at thy word, and the wind at the time (by thee directed) stormeth and bloweth. The streaming waterie flouds ebbe in time according as they flow. The raging sea abideth within his bounded limits: & for that the ocean sea stretcheth out his selfe in equall length and breadth with the whole earth, this must needes be wrought with some maruellous workmanship of thine owne hand. Which thing vnlesse it were at thy will made and disposed, without all doubt so great difference & partition betweene, would ere this time haue brought vtter ruine and destruction, both to the life of man, as to all that belongeth to man beside. Which for that they haue such great and huge conflicts amongst themselues, as also the inuisible spirits haue, we giue thee thanks ôh Lord most mightie God of all gods, that all mankind hath not beene destroied thereby. Surelie, euen as greatlie as thy benignitie and gentlenes is manifested by diuers & sundrie benefits bestowed vpon vs, so much also is the same set forth and declared in the discipline of thy eternall word, to those that be heauenlie wise, & applie themselues to the attainment of sincere and true vertue. But if any such there be that little regard, or haue but small respect vnto the consideration thereof, let them not blame or lay a fault in others that doe the same: for that physicke whereby health is obteined, is manifestly offered vnto all men. Now therefore let no man go about to subuert that, which experience it selfe doth shew (of necessitie) to be pure and good. Let vs therefore altogether vse the participation of this benefit bestowed vpon vs, that is to saie, the benefit of peace & tranquillitie, setting apart all controuersie. And let no man hurt or be preiudiciall to his fellow for that thing wherin he thinketh himselfe to haue done well. If by that, which any man knoweth and hath experience of, he thinketh he may profit his neighbour, let him doe the same; if not, let him giue ouer and remit it till an other time: for there is a great diuersitie betwixt the willing and voluntarie imbracing of religion, and that when a man is thereunto inforced and coacted. Of these things haue I made a more large discourse, then indeed the scope of mediocritie requireth; especiallie because I would not haue my faith (touching the veritie) to be hid, for that I heare there be some which complaine the old accustomed haunting of their temples, and that the power of such darknesse is cut off and taken awaie. Which thing surelie I would take in better part, were it not that the violent rebellion of flagitious error were so fixed in manie mens hearts, whereby they thirst after the vtter subuersion of the common weale and empire.

Who they be that Constantine accounteth wise deuiled.

Experience a triall of the truth.

Constantinus neither for feare dissembleth his faith, neither through pollicie defaceth Gods glory.

Such was the goodnesse of this emperor Constantinus, or rather such was the prouidence of almightie God toward his church in stirring him vp, that all his care and studie of mind was set vpon nothing els, but onlie how to benefit and inlarge the commodities of the same. Neither was it to him inough to deliuer the church and people of God from outward vexation of foreen tyrants and persecutors. No lesse beneficiall was his godlie care also in quieting the inward dissensions and disturbance within the church, among the Christian bishops themselues, according as we read of Moses the deliuerer of the Israelits, in agreeing the brethren togither when he saw them at variance: Exod. 2. No lesse also did his vigilant studie extend in erecting, restoring, and inriching the churches of God in all cities, and in prouiding for the ministers of the same. And therfore writing to Anilinus his cheefe capteine, declareth his will and mind to him in letters concerning the goods which did apperteine to the churches of the christians, that he should procure vigilantlie for the same: that all such goods, houses, & gardens, belonging before to the right of churches, should againe be restored in all speedie wise, and that he therein might be certified with speed, &c.

Constantinus compared to Moses in deliuering the people, and agreeing them together.

The letter of Constantinus to Anilinus his capteine.

Moreouer, he writing to the said Anilinus in an other letter, signifieth vnto him in this effect: that For so much as the contempt of God his reuerend religion, is and hath beene euer the greatest decaie to the name and people of Rome, as contrarie the maintening & reuerencing the same hath euer brought prosperitie to all commonweales: therefore he in consideration thereof hath taken that order, and giueth to him in charge, that through that prouince where he hath to doe, which was in Africa where Cecilianus was bishop, he should there see and prouide that all such ministers and clerks, whose vocation was to serue in the church, should be freed and exempted from all publike publike duties and burthens, whereby they being so priuileged, and all impediments removed which should hinder their diuine ministration, thereby the common vtilitie of the people might the better flourish, &c.

An other letter of Constantine to Miltiades bishop of Rome.

Furthermore the said Constantinus in an other letter writing to Miltiades bishop of Rome, and to Marcus, declareth in his letters to them how Cecilianus bishop of Carthage hath beene accused vnto him by diuers of his colleagues and fellow bishops. Wherfore his will is, that the said Cecilianus with ten bishops his accusers, with ten other his defendants should repaire vp to him at Rome, where in the present assistance of the foresaid Miltiades, Rheticus, Maternus, Marinus, and of other their fellow colleagues, the cause of Cecilianus might be heard and rightlie examined, so that all schisme and diuision might be cut off from among them, wherein the feruent desire of Constantinus to peace and vnitie may well appeere.

The feruent desire of Constantinus to peace and vnitie.

Vpon the like cause and argument also, he writeth to Chrestus bishop of Syracusa, so desirous to nourish peace and concord in the church, that he offereth to him with his vnder ministers and three seruants, his free cariage to come vp to him vnto the councell of other bishops, for the agreeing of certeine matters belonging to the church.

He writeth also an other letter to the forenamed Cecilianus bishop of Carthage.

The edict of Constantinus to the rulers of the prouince of Palestina.

To the prouinces likewise of Palestina and those parts about, he directeth his edict in the behalfe of the Christians, for the releasing of such as were in captiuitie, and for the restoring againe of them which had sustained any losse in the former persecution before, and for the refreshing of such as heeretofore had beene oppressed with any ignominie or molestation for their confession sake, declaring in the said edict how that this whole bodie, life and soule, and whatsoeuer is in him, he oweth to God and to the seruice of him, &c.

The letter of Constantine to Eusebius.

Moreouer an other letter he writeth to Eusebius, for the edifying of new christian churches, and restoring of them which had beene wasted before by forren enimies. And after he had collated the synod of Nice for the studie of peace and vnitie of the church, he writeth vpon the same to Alexander and Arrius.

The councell of Nice.

The effect of the letter of Constantine to Alexander and Arrius.

In which his letters he most lamentablie vttered the great greefe of his heart, to see and heare of their contention and diuision, whereby the peace and common harmonie of the church was broken, the synod prouoked and resisted, the holie people of the Lord diuided into parts and tumults, contrarie to the office of good and circumspect men, whose dutie were rather to nourish concord & to seeke tranquillitie. And though in some small points and light trifles they did disagree from others, yet as the example of philosophers might teach them, who although in some part of a sentence or peece of a question, some might dissent from others, yet in the vnitie of their profession they did all ioine as fellowes together. In like case were it their dutie in such fruitlesse questions (or rather peeces of questions) to keepe them in the conceptions of their minds in silence vnto themselues, & not to bring them forth into publike synods, to breake therefore from the communion of the reuerend councell: declaring moreouer in the said epistle, the first origine and occasion of this their contentious dissention to rise vpon vaine and trifling termes, vile causes and light questions, and peeces rather of questions, about such matters as neither are to be moued, nor to be answered vnto being moued; more curious to be searched, and perillous to be expressed, then necessarie to be inquired, Magisque puerilibus ineptijs, quàm sacerdotum ac cordatorum virorum prudentiæ conuenientia; as he there doth term them. Wherefore by all maner meanes he doth labour them, doth intreat them, and perswade them, not onlie with reasons, but also with teares and sighing sobs, that they would restore againe peace vnto the church, and quietnesse to the rest of his life (which otherwise would not be sweet vnto him) and that they would returne againe to the communid of the reuerend councell, who in so doing should open his waie and purposed iournie into the east parts; which other wise hearing of their discord and dissension, would be sorie to see with his eies that which greeueth him now to heare with his eares: with much more in the same epistle conteined, but this is the effect of the whole: Euseb. de vita Const. lib. 2. Thus much I thought summarilie to comprehend, whereby the diuine disposition and singular gentle nature of this meeke and religious Constantine might more notoriouslie appeere to all princes, for them to learne by his example what zeale and care they ought to beare toward the church of Christ, and how gentlie to gouerne, and how to be beneficiall to the same.

Constantine set foorth a spectacle to all Princes to follow.

Manie other edicts and epistles written to other places and parties, be expressed at large in the second booke of Eusebius, De vita Constantini; wherein the zealous care and princelie beneficence of this noble emperor toward the church of Christ may appeere: whereof in a breefe recapitulation such specialties we haue collected as heere followeth, and is to be seene in Sozo. lib. 1. cap. 8. 9.

A breefe recapitulation of such benefits as were wrought by

First he commanded all them to be set free, whosoeuer for the confession of Christ had beene condemned to banishment, or to the mines of mettall, or to any publike or priuat labour to them inflicted. Such as were put to any infamie or shame among the multitude, he willed them to be discharged from all such blemish of ignominie. Souldiors which before were deprined either of their place, or put out of their wages, were put to their libertie either to serue againe in their place, or quietlie to liue at home. Whatsoeuer honor, place or dignitie had been taken away from any man, should be restored to them againe. The goods and possessions of them that had suffered death for Christ, howsoeuer they were alienated, should returne to their heires or next of kin, or for lacke of them should be giuen to the church. He commanded moreouer that onelie Christians should beare office; the other he charged and restrained, that neither they should sacrifice nor exercise any more diuinations and ceremonies of the gentils, nor set vp any images, nor to keepe any feasts of the heathen idolaters. He corrected moreouer and abolished all such vnlawfull maners and vnhoneſt vsages in cities as might be hurtfull any waies to the church, as the custome that the Egyptians had in the flowing of Nilus, at what time the people vsed to run together like brute beasts, both men and women, and with all kind of filthinesse and sodomitrie to pollute their cities in celebrating the increase of that riuer. This abomination Constantine extinguished, causing that wicked order called Androgyne, to be killed: by reason whereof the riuer afterward (through the benefit of God) yeelded more increase in his flowing, to the greater fertilitie of the ground then it did before.

Constantins vpon Christes church.

Where wickednesse is punished, there good vnesse followeth.

Among the Romans was an old law, that such as were barren, hauing no fruite of children, should be amerced of halfe their goods. Also, that such as being aboue the yeeres of twentie and fiue vnmaried, should not be numbred in the same priuileges with them that were maried, neither should be heires to them, to whom notwithstanding they were next in kin. These lawes because they seemed vnreasonable, to punish the defect of nature or gift of virgintie by mans law, he abrogated and toke away. An other order was among the Romans, that they which made their wils being sicke, had certaine prescribed and concerned words appointed to them to vse, which vnlesse they followed, their wils stood in no effect. This law also Constantine repealed, permitting to euerie man in making his testament to vse what words or what witnesses he would. Likewise among the Romans he restreined and toke away the cruell and bloudie spectacles and sights, where men were wont with swords one to kill an other. Of the barbarous and filthie fashion of the Arethusians in Phenicia, I haue mentioned before, where they vsed to expose and set forth their virgins to open fornication before they should be maried; which custome also Constantine remoued awaie. Where no churches were, there he commanded new to be made; where any were decaied, he commanded them to be repared; where any were too little, he caused them to be inlarged, giuing to the same great gifts and reuenues, not onlie of such tributes and tares comming to him from certaine sundrie cities, which he transferred vnto the churches, but also out of his owne treasures. When any bishops required any councell to be had, he satisfied their petitions; and what in their councels and synods they established, being godlie and honeſt, he was readie to confirme the same.

The liberalitie of Constantine in giuing to churches.

The armor of his souldiors which were newlie come from gentilitie, he garnished with the armes of the crosse, whereby they might learne the soner to forget their old superstitious idolatrie. Moreouer like a worthie emperor he prescribed a certaine forme of praier in stead of a catechisme for euerie man to haue, and to learne how to praie and to inuocat God. The which forme of praier is recited in the fourth booke of Eusebius De vita Constantini, in words as followeth.

Euseb. lib. 4. de vita Constantini. This forme of praier appointed of Constantine for his souldiors.

Te solum nouimus Deum, te regem cognoscimus, te adiutorem inuocamus, abs te victorias referimus, per te victorias inimicorum constituimus, tibi præsentium bonorum gratiam acceptam ferimus, & per te futura quoque speramus, tibi supplices sumus omnes: imperatorem nostrum Constantinum, ac pientissimos eius filios, in longissima vita incolumes nobis ac victores custodire supplices oramus, per Christum Dominum nostrum: Amen. In English:

We knowledge thee onlie to be our God, we confesse thee to be our king, we inuocat and call vpon thee our onlie helper, by thee we obteine our victories, by thee we vanquish and subdue our enimies, to thee we attribute whatsoeuer present commodities we enioie, & by thee we hope for good things to come: vnto thee we direct all our suite and petitions, most humblie beseeching thee to conserue Constantine our emperor and his noble children in long life to continue, and to giue them victorie ouer all their enimies, through Christ our Lord: Amen.

The souldiors prayer.

In his owne palace he set vp an house pecvliar for praier and doctrine, vsing also to praie and sing with his people. Also in his wars he went not without his tabernacle appointed for the same. The sunday he commanded to be kept holie of all men, and free from all iudiciarie causes, from markets, marts, faires, and all other manuall labors, onlie husbandrie excepted; especiallie charging that no images or monuments of idolatrie should be set vp.

The sunday appointed to be kept holie.

Men of the clergie and of the ministerie in all places he indued with speciall priuileges and immunities, so that if any were brought before the ciuill magistrat, and listed to appeale to the sentence of his bishop, it should be lawfull for him so to doe, and that the sentence of the bishop should stand in as great force as if the magistrat or the emperor himselfe had pronounced it.

¶ But heere is to be obserued and noted by the waie, that the clerks and ministers then newlie creeping out of persecution, were in those daies neither in number so great, nor in order of life, of the like disposition to these in our daies now liuing.

The prouision and liberalitie of Constantine in maintaining scholes.

No lesse care and prouision the said Constantinus also had for the maintenance of scholes perteining to the church, and to the nourishing of good arts and liberall sciences, especiallie of diuinitie, not onlie with stipends & subsidies furnishing them, but also with large priuileges and exemptions defending the same, as by the words of his owne law is to be seene and read as followeth: Medicos, grammaticos, & alios professores literarum, & doctores legum, cum vxoribus & liberis, &c. In English: Physicians, grammarians, and all other professors of liberall arts, and doctors of the law, with their wiues and children, and all other their possessions which they haue in cities, we command to be freed from all ciuill charges and functions, neither to receiue forren strangers in prouinces, nor to be burthened with any publike administration, nor to be cited vp to ciuill iudgement, nor to be drawen out or oppressed with any iniurie. And if any man shall ver them, he shall incurre such punishment as the iudge at his discretion shall award him. Their stipends moreouer and salaries we command trulie to be paid them, wherby they may more freelie instruct others in arts and sciences, &c.

The priuilege granted by Constantine to vniuersities and scholes.

The prouident care of Constantine to haue the scripture in churches.

Ouer and besides this, so far did his godlie zeale and princelie care and prouision extend to the church of Christ, that he commanded and prouided books and volumes of the scripture, diligentlie and plainlie to be written and copied out, to remaine in publike churches to the vse of posteritie. Wherupon writing to Eusebius bishop of Nicomedia in a speciall letter (recorded in the fourth booke of Eusebius, De vita Constant.) he willeth him with all diligence to procure fiftie volumes of parchment well bound and compacted, wherein he should cause to be written out of the scripture in a faire legible hand, such things as he thought necessarie and profitable for the instruction of the church, and alloweth him for that businesse two publike ministers: also writeth concerning the same to the Generall of his armie, to support and further him with such necessaries, as therunto should apperteine: &c.

Ex Euseb. lib. 4. de vita Const.

A wish of the author admonitorie to princes.

¶ In viewing, perusing, and writing this storie, and in considering the christian zeale of this emperor, I wish that either this our printing and plentie of books had been in his daies, or that this so heroicall heart toward Christs religion, as was in this so excellent monarch, might something appeere in inferior princes reigning in these our printing daies, &c.

The liberalitie of Constantine towards the poore & needie.

The liberall hand of this emperor borne to doe all men good, was no lesse also open and readie toward the needie pouertie of such, which either by losse of parents or other occasions were not able to helpe themselues: to whom he commanded and prouided due suruention both of corne and raiment to be ministred out of his owne coffers, to the necessarie releefe of the poore men, women, children, orphans, and widowes. Eusebius de vita Constant. lib. 4.

Constantine remitteth the fourth part of his rents and reuenues.

Finallie, among all the other monuments of his singular clemencie and munificence, this is not to be pretermitted; that through all the empire of Rome and prouinces belonging to the same, not onlie he diminished such tares, reuenues and imposts, as publikelie were comming to him, but also cleerelie remitted and released to the contributors the fourth part of the same.

Donation of Constantine.

This present place would require something to be said of the donation of Constantine, whereupon as vpon their cheefest anchorhold, the bishops of Rome doe ground their supreme dominion and right, ouer all the politicall gouernment of the west parts, & the spirituall gouernment of all the other sees and parts of the world. Which donation to be falslie feigned and forged, & not to proceed from Constantine, manie arguments might heere be inferred, if leisure from other matters would suffer me.

Reasons and arguments prouing the donation of Constantine to be falslie fained.

2 First, for that no ancient historie, nor yet doctor, maketh anie mention thereof.

Nauclerus reporteth it to be affirmed in the historie of Isidorus. But in the old copies of Isidorus no such thing is to be found.

3 Gratianus the compiler of the decrees, reciteth that decree, not vpon any ancient authoritie, but onlie vnder the title of Palea.

4 Gelasius is laid to giue some testimonie thereof, in Dist. 15. Sancta Romana. But that clause of the said distinction touching that matter in the old ancient books is not extant.

5 Who Phrisingensis who was about the time of Gratian, after he hath declared the opinion of the fauorers of the papacie affirming this donation to be giuen of Constantine to Siluester the pope, inducth consequentlie the opinion of them that fauor the empire, affirming the contrarie.

6 How doth this agree, that Constantine did yeeld vp to Siluester all the politicall dominion ouer the west, when as the said Constantine at his death, dividing the empire to his three sonnes, gaue the west part of the empire to one, the east part to the second, the middle part to the third?

7 How is it like that Theodosius after them, being a iust and a religious prince, would or could haue occupied the citie of Rome if it had not been his right, but had belonged to the pope, and so did manie other emperors after him?

8 The phrase of this decree, being conferred with the phrase and stile of Constantine in his other edicts and letters aboue specified, doth nothing agree.

9 Seeing the papists themselues confesse that the decree of this donation was written in Greeke, how agreeth that with truth, when as both it was written not to the Grecians, but to the Romans, and also Constantine himselfe for lacke of the Greeke tongue, was faine to vse the Latin tongue in the councell of Nice?

10 The contents of this donation (whosoeuer was the forger thereof) doth bewraie it selfe: for if it be true which there is confessed, that he was baptised at Rome of Siluester, & the fourth daie after his baptisme this patrimonie was giuen (which was before his battell against Maximinus or Licinius, in the yeere of our Lord three hundred and seuentene, as Nicephorus recordeth) how then accordeth this with that which followeth in the donation, for him to haue iurisdiction giuen ouer the other foure principall sees of Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople, and Hierusalem: when as the citie of Constantinople was not yet begun before the death of Maximinus or Licinius, and was not finished before the eight & twentith yeere of the reigne of Constantine in the yeere of our Lord three hundred thirtie and nine; or if it be true, as Hierome counteth, it was finished the three & twentith yeere of his reigne, which was the yeere of our Lord three hundred thirtie and foure, long after this donation by their owne account.

11 Furthermore, where in the said constitution is said that Constantine was baptised at Rome of Siluester, and thereby was purged of leprosie; the fable thereof agreeth not with the truth of historie, for so much as Eusebius, lib. 4. de vita Constantini, Hieronymus in chron. Ruffin. lib. 1. cap. 11. Socrates, lib. 1. cap. 39. Theod. lib. 1. cap. 31. Sozomenus, lib. 2. cap. 34. doe all together consent that he was baptised not at Rome, but at Nicomedia; and that moreouer, as by their testimonie doth appeere, not of Siluester but of Eusebius bishop of Nicomedia, not before his battell against Maximinus or Licinius, but in the thirtie and one yeere of his reigne, a little before his death.

12 Againe, wherras Constantine in this donation appointed him to haue the principalitie ouer the other foure patriarchall sees, that maketh Constantine contrarie to himselfe, who in the councell of Nice afterward agreed with other bishops, that all the foure patriarchall sees should haue equall iurisdiction, euerie one ouer his owne territorie and precinct.

13 In summe, breefle to conclude: who so desireth more abundantlie to be satisfied touching this matter, let him read the books of Marsilius Patauinus, intituled Defensor pacis, in the yeere of our Lord 1324. of Laurentius Valla, an. 1440. of Antonius archbishop of Florence, who in his historie plainlie denieth the tenor of this donation to be found in the old books of the decrees. Of Cusanus Cardinalis lib. 3. cap. 2. writing to the councell of Basill, an. 1460. of Aeneas Siluius In dialogo: of Hier. Paulus Cattalanus, an. 1496. of Raphael Volaterranus, an. 1500. of Lutherus, an. 1537, &c. All which by manie and euident probations, dispute and proue this donation taken out of a booke, De gestis Siluestri, and translated (as they faine) by one Bartholomeus Picernus, out of Greeke into Latine: not to proceed from Constantinus, but to be a thing vntrulie pretensed, or rather a fable imagined, or els to be the deed of Pipinus or Charles, or some such other, if it were euer the deed of any.

Commendation of Constantine the emperor.

And thus hast thou (beloued reader) breefle collected the narration of the noble acts and beauenlie vertues of this most famous emperor Constantine the great; a singular spectacle for all christian princes to behold and imitat, and worthie of perpetuall memorie in all congregations of christian saints: whose feruent zeale and pietie in generall, to all congregations and to all the seruants of Christ was notable; but especiallie the affection and reuerence of his heart toward them was admirable, which had suffered any thing for the confession of Christ in the persecutions before, them had he principallie in price and veneration, in so much that he imbraced and kissed their wounds and stripes, and their eies, being put out. And if any such bishops or any other ministers brought to him any complaints one against an other (as manie times they did) he would take their bils of complaint and burne them before their faces: so studious and zealous was his mind to haue them agree, whose discord was to him more greefe then it was to themselues. All the vertuous acts and memorable doings of this diuine and renowmed emperor, to comprehend or commit to historie, it were the matter alone of a great volume: wherefore contented with these aboue premised, because nothing of him can be said inough, I cease to discourse of him any further.

Constantine killed the wounds of them that suffered for Christ. Constantine burneth the bils of complaints, and breaketh strife among the bishops.

Note, that the oration Ad conuentum sanctorum, is wrongfullie ascribed to Eusebius, which indeed is the oration of Constantine.

One thing yet remaineth not to be omitted, wherein (as by the waie of a note) I thought good to admonish the learned reader, such as loue to be conuersant in reading of ancient authors: that in the ecclesiasticall historie of Eusebius, where in the latter end of the booke is added a certaine oration, Ad conuentum sanctorum, vnder the name of Eusebius Pamphilus, heere is to be vnderstood, that the said oration is wrongfullie intituled intituled vpon the name of Eusebius, which in verie trueth is the oration of Constantinus himselfe. For the probation wherof, beside the stile and matter therein conteined, and tractation heroicall (liuelie declaring the religious veine of Constantine) I allege the verie testimonie of Eusb. himselfe in his fourth booke De vita Constantini, where he in expresse words not onlie declareth that Constantine wrote such an oration intituled Ad conuentum sanctorũ, but also promiseth in the end of his booke, to anner the same: declaring moreouer what difficultie the interpretors had to translat the same from the Roman speech, to their Grecian tong: Eusb. de vita Constantini, lib. 4. pag. 211.

And heere an end of these lamentable and dolefull persecutions of the primitiue church, during the space of three hundred yeeres from the passion of our sauior Christ, till the comming of this Constantinus, by whom, as by the elect instrument of God, it hath so pleased his almightie maiestie, by his determinat purpose to giue rest after long trouble to his church, according to that S. Cyprian declareth before to be reuealed of God vnto his church: that after darknesse and stormie tempest should come peaceable, calme, and stable quietnesse to his church, meaning this time of Constantine now present. At which time it so pleased the almightie, that the murthering malice of sathan should at length be restreined, and he himselfe to be tied vp for a thousand yeeres through his great mercie in Christ, to whom therefore be thanks and praise now and for euer. Amen.

Sathan bound vp for a thousand yeeres.

The end of the first booke.

The second Booke conteining the next three hundred yeeres following, with such things speciallie touched as haue hapned in England, from the time of king Lucius to Gregorius, and so after to the time of king Egbert.

BY these persecutions hitherto in the booke before precedent, thou maiest vnderstand (christian reader) how the furie of sathan and rage of men, haue done what they could to extinguish the name and religion of Christ: for what thing did lack that either death could do or torments could worke, or the gates of hell could deuise, all was to the vttermost attempted. And yet all the furie and malice of sathan, all the wisdome of the world and strength of men, doing, deuising, practising what they could; notwithstanding the religion of Christ (as thou seest) hath had the vpper hand: which thing I wish thee greatlie (gentle reader) wiselie to note and diligentlie to ponder in considering these former histories. And because thou canst not consider them, nor profit by them vnlesse thou doe first read and peruse them: let me craue therfore thus much at thine hands, to turne and read ouer the said histories of those persecutions aboue described, especiallie aboue all the other histories of this present volume, for thy especiall edification, which I trust thou shalt find not vnworthie the reading.

A petition to the reader diligentlie to read ouer the former booke of the ten persecutions.

Now because the tying vp of sathan giueth to the church some rest, and to me some leisure to addresse my selfe to the handling of other stories, I mind therefore (Christ willing) in this present booke, leauing a while the tractation of these generall affaires perteining to the vniuersall church, to prosecute such domesticall histories, as more neere concerne this our countrie of England and Scotland done heere at home, beginning first with king Lucius, with whom the faith first began heere in this realme, as the sentence of some writers doth hold.

The first planting of Christian faith in England.

And for so much as heere may rise, yea doth rise a great controuersie in these our popish daies, concerning the first origine & planting of the faith in this our realme, it shall not be greatlie out of our purpose somewhat to staie & laie of this question;

Question.

Whether the church of England first receiued the faith from Rome or not? The which although I grant so to be, yet being so granted, it little auaileth the purpose of them which would so haue it. For be it that England first receiued the christian faith & religion from Rome, both in the time of Eleutherius their bishop 180. yeeres after Christ, and also in the time of Augustine whom Gregorie sent hither 600. yeeres after Christ, yet their purpose followeth not thereby, that we must therefore fetch our religiõ from thence still as from the chief welhead and fountaine of all godlinesse. And yet as they are not able to proue the second, so neither haue I any cause to grant the first: that is; That our Christiã faith was first deriued frõ Rome, which I may proue by sir or seuen good cõiecturall reasons. Wherof the first I take of the testimonie of Gildas our countrieman, who in his historie affirmeth plainlie, that Britaine receiued the gospell in the time of Tiberius the emperor, vnder whom Christ suffered: Lib. de victoria Aurelij Ambrosij. And saith moreouer, that Joseph of Arimathea, after dispersion of the Jewes, was sent of Philip the Apostle from France to Britaine, about the yeere of our Lord, 63, and heere remained in this land all his time: and so with his fellowes laid the first foundation of christian faith among the Britaine people, whereupon other preachers and teachers comming afterward, confirmed the same and increased it.

Whether christian religion in this realme came first from Rome.

Answere.

1 Gildas.

The second reason is out of Tertullian, who liuing neere about, or rather somewhat before the time of this Eleutherius, in his booke Contra Iudæos, manifestlie importeth the same; where the said Tertullian testifying how the gospell was dispersed abrode by the sound of the apostles, and there reckoning vp the Medes, Persians, Parthians, and dwellers in Mesopotamia, Jewrie, Capadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Egypt, Pamphilia, with manie more, at length commeth to the coast of the Moorians, and all the borders of Spaine, with diuers nations of France: and there amongst all other reciteth also the parts of Britaine, which the Romans could neuer attaine to, and reporteth the same now to be subiect to Christ, as also reckoneth vp the places of Sarmatia, of the Danes, the Germans, the Scythians, with manie other prouinces and iles to him vnknowen: in all which places (saith he) reigneth the name of Christ which now beginneth to be cõmon. This hath Tertullian. Note heere how among other diuers beleeuing nations, he mentioneth also the wildest places of Britain to be of the same number; and these in his time were christened, who was in the same Eleutherius time, as is aboue said. Then was not pope Eleutherius the first which sent the christian faith into this realme, but the gospell was heere receiued before his time either by Joseph of Arimathea, as some chronicles record, or by some of the apostles or of their scholars, which had beene heere preaching Christ before Eleutherius wrote to Lucius.

2 Ex Tertul. aduersus Iudæos.

My third probation I deduct out of Origen, Hom. 4. in Ezechielẽ, whose words be these: Britanniã in christianã consentire religionẽ. Whereby it appeareth, that the faith of Christ was sparsed heere in England before the daies of Eleutherius.

3 Ex Origen. hom. 4. in Ezech.

For my fourth probation I take the testimonie of Beda, where he affirmeth, that in his time, & almost a thousand yeeres after Christ heere in Britaine, Easter was kept after the maner of the east church, in the full of the moone, what daie in the weeke so euer it fell on, and not on the sundaie, as we doe now. Whereby it is to be collected, that the first preachers in this land haue come out from the east part of the world where it was so vsed, rather then from Rome.

4 Ex Beda.

Fiftlie, I may allege the words of Nicephorus, Lib. 2. cap. 40. where he saith, that Simon Zelotes did spread the gospell of Christ to the west ocean, and brought the same vnto the iles of Britaine.

5 Ex Nicepb. lib. 2. cap. 40.

Sirtlie may be added heere also the words of Petrus Cluniacensis, who writing to Bernard, affirmeth that the Scots in his time did celebrat their Easter, not after the Roman maner, but after the Greekes, &c. And as the said Britans were not vnder vnder the Romain order in the time of this abbat of Cluniake: so neither were they nor would be vnder the Romain legat, in the time of Gregorie, nor would admit any primacie of the bishop of Rome to be aboue them.

Ex epist. Eleutherij ad Lucium.

For the seuenth argument moreouer I may make my probation by the plaine words of Eleutherius, by whose epistle written to king Lucius we may vnderstand, that Lucius had receiued the faith of Christ in this land, before the king sent to Eleutherius for the Romain lawes: for so the expresse words of the letter do manifestlie purport, as hereafter followeth to be seene. By all which coniectures it may stand probablie to be thought, that the Britans were taught first by the Grecians of the east church, rather then by the Romans.

Peraduenture Eleutherius might helpe some thing either to conuert the king, or else to increase the faith then newlie sprung among the people; but that he precislie was the first, that cannot be proued. But grant he were, as indeed the most part of our English stories confesse, neither will I greatlie sticke with them therein: yet what haue they got thereby when they haue cast all their gaine? In few words to conclude this matter, if so be that the christian faith and religion was first deriued from Rome to this our nation by Eleutherius, then let them but grant to vs the same faith & religion which then was taught at Rome, and from thence deriued hither by the said Eleutherius, and we will desire no more: for then neither was any vniuersall pope aboue all churches & councles, which came not in before Bonifacius time, which was 400. yeres after: neither any name or vse of the masse, the parts whereof how and by whom they were compiled, hereafter in this booke following appeareth to be seene. Neither any sacrifice propitiatorie for the scowring of purgatorie was then offered vpon hallowed altars, but onlie the communion frequented at christian tables, where oblations and gifts were offered as well of the people as of the priests to God, because they should appeare neither emptie nor vnkind before the Lord, as we may vnderstand by the time of Cyprian. Neither was then any transubstantiation heard of, which was not brought in before a thousand yeres after. Neither were then any images of saints departed set vp in churches, yea a great number of the saints worshipped in this our time were not as yet borne, nor the churches wherein they were worshipped were yet set vp, but came in long after, especiallie in the time of Irene and Constans the emperor. Likewise neither relikes nor peregrinatiõs were then in vse. Priests mariage was then as lawfull, and no lesse receiued, as now: neither was it condemned before the daies of Hildebrand, almost a thousand yeres after that. Their seruice was then in the vulgar tong, as witnesseth Hierome; the sacrament ministred in both kinds as well to laie men as to priests, the witnesse whereof is Cyprian. Yea, and that temporall men which would not then communicat at Easter, Whitsuntide and Christenmasse, were not then counted for catholiks, the popes owne distinction can testifie. In funerals, priests then flocked not together, selling trentals & diriges for sweeping of purgatorie, but onlie a funerall concion was vsed, with psalms of praises and songs of their worthie deeds, and Alleluia sounding on high, which did shake the gilded seelings of the temple, as witnesseth Nazianzen, Ambrose, and Hierome, &c.

What difference betweene the late church of Rome from the old church of Rome, and in what matters.

De consecrat. dist. 2.

In the supper of the Lord and at baptisme no such ceremonies were vsed, as now of late haue been intruded; in so much that as in this storie is shewed hereafter, both Augustine and Paulinus baptised then in riuers not in hallowed fonts, as witnesseth Fabianus. The portues of Sarum, of Yorke, of Bangor, with mattens and euensong of the daie; againe, neither the orders and religions of monks and friers were not yet dreamed of, to the space almost of a thousand yeres after, &c. So that, as I said, if the papists would needs deriue the faith and religion of this realme from Rome, then let them set vs and leaue vs there where they had vs: that is, let them suffer vs to stand content with that faith and religion, which then was taught and brought from Rome by Eleutherius (as now we differ nothing from the same) and we will desire no better. And if they will not, then let the wise reader iudge where the fault is, in vs or them, which neither themselues will persist in the antiquitie of the Romish religion which they so much brag of, neither will they permit vs so to doe.

Fabianus, cap. 119. & 120.

And thus much by the waie to satisfie the foresaid obiection, whereby we may haue now a more readie passage into the order and course of the historie. Being therefore granted vnto them which they so earnestlie sticke vpon, that the christian faith and religion of this realme was brought from Rome, first by Eleutherius, then afterward by Augustine: thus write the chronicles of that matter.

Eleutherius bishop of Rome.

About the time and yere of the Lord, 180. king Lucius sonne of Coilus, which builded Colchester, king of the Britains, who then were the inhabiters and possessors of this land (which now we Englishmen call England) hearing of the miracles and wonders done by the christians at that time in diuers places (as Monumetensis writeth) directed his letters to Eleutherius bishop of Rome, to receiue of him the christian faith: although about the computation of the yere and time, great difference there is in authors when this should be. Nauclerus saith it was an. 156. but that cannot be, forsomuch as Eleutherius was not yet bishop by the space of twentie yeres after that. Henricus de Erfodia saith it was an. 169. in the nineteenth yere of Uerus emperor: but that agreeth not with approued histories, which all consent that Uerus reigned not nineteene yeres; and if he had, yet that yere commeth not to the yere of our Lord, 169. but to the yere, 181. Some others saie, that Eleutherius was made bishop in the first yere of Cõmodus, which was the yere of our Lord, 180. but that seemeth to go too far: but let the authors agree as they can. Let vs returne to Eleutherius the good bishop, who hearing the request of this king, and glad to see the godlie towardnesse of his well disposed mind, sendeth him certaine teachers and preachers called Fugatius, or by some Faganus, and Damianus, or Dimianus, which conuerted first the king and people of Britaine, and baptised them with the baptisme & sacrament of Christs faith. The temples of idolatrie and all other monuments of gentilitie they subuerted, conuerting the people from their diuers and many gods, to serue one liuing God. Thus true religion with sincere faith increasing, superstition decaied, with all other rites of idolatrie. There were then in Britaine 28. head priests which they called Flamines, & three archpriests among them, which were called Archflamines, hauing the ouersight of their maners, and as iudges ouer the rest. These 28. Flamines they turned to 28. bishops, & the three Archflamines to three archbishops, hauing then their seats in three principall cities of the realme: that is, in London, in Yorke, and in Glamorgantia, Videlicet in vrbe legionum, by Wales. Thus the countries of the whole realme being diuided euerie one vnder his owne bishop, and all things setled in a good order: the foresaid king Lucius sent againe to the said Eleutherius for the Romain lawes, thereby likewise to be gouerned, as in religion now they were framed accordinglie: vnto whom Eleutherius againe writeth after the tenor of these words insuing.

ANno 169. à passione Christi scripsit dominus Eleutherius papa Lucio regi Britanniæ, ad correctionem regis & procerum regni Britanniæ, and so forth as followeth in English.

The epistle of Eleutherius to king Lucius.

Ye require of vs the Romain lawes and the emperors to be sent ouer to you, which you may practise and put in vre within your realme. The Romain lawes and the emperors we may euer reprooue, but the law of God we may not. Ye haue receiued of late through Gods mercie in the realme of Britannie, the law & faith of Christ, ye haue with you within the realme both the parts of the scriptures. Out of them by Gods grace with the councell of your realme take ye a law, and by that law (through Gods sufferance) rule your kingdome of Britaine. For you be Gods vicar in your kingdome, according to the saying of the psalme; Deus iudicium tuum regi da, &c. that is: O God giue iudgement to the king, & thy righteousnesse to the kings sonne &c. He said not, the iudgement & righteousnesse of the emperor, but thy iudgement and iustice; that is to saie, of God. The kings sonnes be the christian people and folke of the realme, which be vnder your gouernment, & liue and continue in peace within your kingdome, as the gospell saith: Like as the hen gathereth hir chickes vnder hir wings, so doth the king his people. The people and folke of the realme of Britaine be yours, whom if they be diuided, ye ought to gather in concord and peace, to call them to the faith and law of Christ, and to the holie church, to cherish and mainteine them, to rule and gouerne them, & to defend them alwaies from such as would do them wrong, from malicious men and enimies. A king hath his name of ruling, & not of hauing a realme. You shall be a king while ye rule well; but if you doe otherwise, the name of a king shall not remaine with you, and you shall lose it, which God forbid. The almightie God grant you so to rule the realme of Britaine, that you may reigne with him for euer, whose vicar ye be in the realme.

The king Gods vicar within his owne kingdome.

After this maner (as you haue heard) was the christiã faith either first brought in, or els confirmed in this realme of Britaine by the sending of Eleutherius, not with any crosse or procession, but onlie at the simple preaching of Fagan & Damian, through whose ministerie this realme and iland of Britaine was eftsones reduced to the faith and law of the Lord, according as was prophesied by Esaie, as well of that as other ilands more, where he saith, cha. 42. He shall not faint nor giue ouer till he hath set iudgement in earth, and ilands shall wait for his law, &c. The faith thus receiued of the Britains continued among them and flourished the space of 216. yeres, till the comming of the Saxons, who then were pagans; whereof more followeth hereafter to be said, the Lord Christ assisting thereunto. In the meane time something to speake of this space before, which was betwixt the time of Lucius, and the first comming in of the Saxons: First it is to be vnderstood, that all this while as yet the emperors of Rome had not receiued the faith, what time the kings of Britaine and the subiects thereof were conuerted now, as is said, to Christ: for the which cause much trouble and perturbation was sought against them, not only heere in Britaine, but through all parts of christendome by the heathen infidels. In so much that in the persecution only of Diocletian and Maximiniant, raigning both together within one moneth, 17000 thousand martyrs are numbred to haue suffered for the name of Christ, as hath been hither to in the booke before sufficiently discoursed.

Thus therefore although the foresaid Lucius the Britaine king, through the mercifull prouidence of God, was then christened, and the gospell receiued generally almost in all the land, yet the state thereof as well of the religion as of the common wealth could not be quiet, for that the emperours and nobles of Rome were yet infidels, and enemies to the same; but especially for this cause, the cause so happening that Lucius the christian king died without issue. For thereby such trouble and variance fell among the Britaines (as it happened in all other realmes, namely in this our realme of England, whensoeuer succession lacketh) that not only they brought vpon them the idolatrous Romans, and at length the Saxons, but also inwrapped themselues in such miserie and desolation, as yet to this day amongst them remaineth. Such a thing it is (where a prince or a king is in a kingdome) there to lacke succession, as especially in this case may appeare. For after the death of Lucius, when the barons and nobles of the land could not accord within themselues vpon succession of the crowne, crept in the Romans and got the crowne into their owne hands, whereupon followed great miserie and ruine to the realme. For sometimes the idolatrous Romans, sometimes the Britaines raigned and ruled as violence and victorie would serue, one king murdering another, till at length the Saxons came and depriued them both, as in processe hereafter followeth to be seene.

Henr. Hunting. lib. 1. What incommoditie commeth by lacke of succession.

In the meane season touching the storie of king Lucius, heere is to be reproued the fable of some writers falsely fayning of him, that he should after his baptisme receiued, put off all his kingly honor, forsake the land and be made a preacher; who after long trauell in preaching and teaching, in France, in Germanie, in Augusta, and in Suecria, at length was made doctor and rector of the church of Cureac, where (as this fable saith) he suffered martyrdome. But this phantasie of whomsoeuer it first did spring, disagreeth from all our English stories, who with a full consent do for the most part concord in this; that the said Lucius after he had founded many churches, and giuen great riches and liberties to the same, deceased with great tranquillitie in his owne land, and was buried at Glocester the fourteenth yeare after his baptisme, as the booke of Flores historiarum doth count, which was the yeare of our Lord (as he saith) 201, and reckoneth his conuersion to be in the yeare 87. In some I find his decease to be the fourth, and in some the tenth yeare after his baptisme, and some hold that he raigned all the space of seuentie and seuen yeares. And thus much concerning king Lucius.

The deceasse of King Lucius. Ex Florilego.

Now to proceed in order of the storie, briefely to touch the state of the foresaid land of Britaine, betweene the time of king Lucius and the entering of the Saxons, who were the kings thereof, and in what order they succeeded or rather inuaded one after another, this catalogue heere vnder written will specifie.

Ex Beda, Polychron. Monumentenſi.

Kings of Britaine from the time of Lucius, till the comming of the Saxons:	Lucius,	a Britaine.
	Seuerus,	a Roman.
	Bassianus.	a Roman by the father.
	Cerausius,	a Britaine.
	Alectus,	a Roman.
	Asclepiodotus,	a Britaine.
	Coilus,	a Britaine.
	Constantius,	a Roman.
	Constantinus,	a Britaine by the mother named Helena, who being the daughter of Coell, and married to Constantius, father of Constantinus, is said to make the walles first of London, also of Colchester, much about the yeare of our Lord, 305, and borne in Britaine.
	Octauius,	a Getwillian.
	Maximinianus,	a Roman borne, but his mother a Britaine.
	Gratianus,	a Roman.
	Constantinus,	a Britaine by the mother.
	Constans,	a Roman by the father.
	Vortigernus,	a Getwillian or Britaine.

By this table may appeare a lamentable face of a commonwealth so miserablie rent and diuided into two sorts of people, differing not so much in countrey as in religion: for when the Romans raigned, so they were gouerned by the infidels; when the Britaines ruled, so they were gouerned by christians. Thus what quietnesse was or could be in the church in so vnquiet and doubtfull daies, may easily be considered.

Albeit notwithstanding all these foresaid heathen rulers of the Romans which heere gouerned, yet (God be praised) we reade of no persecution during all these ten persecutions aboue mentioned, that touched the christian Britaines, before the last persecution only of Diocletian and Maximianus Hercules, which heere then exercised much crueltie. This persecution as it was the last among the Romans christians, so it was the first of many and diuers that followed after in this church and realme of England, whereof we will hereafter entreat (Christ willing) as order of the matter shall leade vs. In the meane time, this rage of Diocletian as it was vniuersally through all the churches in the world fierce and vehement, so in this realme of Britaine also it was so sore, that as all our English chronicles do testifie and record, all christianitie almost in the whole land was destroyed, churches were subuerted, all bookes of the Scriptures buried, many of the faithfull both men and women were slaine. Among whom the first and chiefest was Albanus, then Julius, Aaron, and Amphibalus, of whom sufficiently hath been said before. What were the others, or how manie they were that suffered beside, stories make no rehearsall. And thus much thereof.

The Britaine neuer touched with any persecution before the time of Diocletian.

Now as concerning the gouernment of these aboue named kings of Britaine, although I haue little or nothing to note which greatly appertaineth to the matter of this ecclesiasticall history, yet this is not to be past ouer. First how in the order of these kings commeth Constantinus the great and worthie emperour, not only a Britaine borne by his mother Helena being king Coilus daughter, but also by the helpe of the Britaines armie (vnder the power of God) which the said Constantine tooke with him out of Britaine to Rome, obtained with great victorie, peace and tranquillitie to the whole vniuersall church of Christ, hauing three legions with him out of this realme of chosen and able souldiers, whereby the strength of the land was not a little impaired and endangered, as afterwards in this storie followeth.

Constantine the great, borne and bred in Britaine.

The cause how this realme of Britaine was first weakned.

After him likewise Maximian, following his steps, tooke with him also (as stories record) all the power and strength which was left, and what soeuer he could make of able and fighting men to subdue France; besides the garrisons which he had out with him before, sending for more to the number of an hundred thousand souldiers at once, to be sent to him out of Britaine into France. At which time also Conanus his partner being then in France, sent ouer for virgins from Britaine to the number of eleuen thousand, who with Vrsula, the prince Dionets daughter being shipped ouer, many perished in the sea, some were taken of the infidels marching vpon the borders, with whom because they would not be polluted, all were destroyed, being miserable dispersed (some one way some another) so that none escaped.

Britaine spoyled of souldiers. Vrsula with eleuen thousand virgins.

Thus poore Britaine being left naked and destitute on euerie side, as a maimed bodie without might or strength, was left open to his enemies not able to succour it selfe without helpe of forren friends; to whom they were then constrained to flie, especially to the Romans, to whom the Britaines sent this word or message: Ætio ter consuli gemitus Britannorum. Repellunt nos Barbari ad mare: repellit nos mare ad Barbaros. Hinc oriuntur duo funerum genera, quia aut iugulamur, aut submerginur. But the Romãs then began to forsake them, wherby they were in nearer danger to be oppressed by Gwanus and Pelga, had not Gwetelinus the archbishop of London made ouer to lesser Britaine, and obtaining there help, had brought Constantinus the kings brother to rescue his countrey against the infidels. This Constantinus was brother to Aldroenus king of little Britaine, and father to Constans, Aurelius Ambrosius, and Uter, who after raigned kings in Britaine.

Gwetelinus archbishop of London. Ex chronico Mel-numetenſi: Constantinus, Constans, Aurelius Ambrosius, Uter Pendragon.

Thus by the meanes of the good archbishop and Constantinus, the state of the religion and realme of Britaine was in some meane quiet and safetie, during the time of the said Constantine and of the good archbishop. But as the realme of Britaine almost from the beginning was neuer without ciuill warre, at length came wicked Vortigerne, who cruelly causing Constans his prince to be murdered, ambitiously inuaded the crowne, who then fearing the other two brethren of Constans, which were Aurelius and Uter, being then in little Britaine, did send ouer for the aid of the Saxons being then infidels; and not only that, but also married with an infidell, the daughter of Hengist called Rowen. Wherupon the said Vortigerne not long after by the said Hengist and the Saxons was with like treacherie dispossessed of his kingdome, and the people of Britaine driuen out of their countrie, after that the Saxons had slaine of their chiefe nobles and barons at one meeting, ioyning together subtiltie with crueltie, to the number of two hundred seuentie and one: some stories say foure hundred and fiftie. This wicked act of the Saxons was done at Almesburie, or at a place called Stoneheng. By the monument of which stones there hanging, it seemeth that the noble Britaines there were buried.

The Saxons sent for to Britaine. King Constans slaine by Vortigerne. Hengist and Horsus captaines of the Saxons.

came with privie knives contrarie to promise made, with the which knives they giving a privie watchword in their Saxon speech, Neme your sexes, slew the Britaines unarmed. And thus far concerning the historie of the Britaines. As this great plague could not come to the Britaines without Gods permission, so Gildas sheweth in his chronicle the cause thereof, writing thus: Quòd Britones propter auaritiam & rapinam principum, propter iniquitatem & iniustitiam iudicum, propter desidiam prædicationis episcoporum, propter luxuriam & malas mores populi, patriam perdidisse, &c.

A description of England as it was diuided in the Saxons time into seuen kingdomes.

The entering and raigning of the Saxons in the realme of England.

THis was the comming in first of the Angles or Saxons into this realme, being yet unchristened and infidels, which was about the yeare of our Lord, as William Malmesbury telleth, foure hundred sixtie and nine, the captains of whom were Hengistus and Horsus. Although the said Hengist and Saxons at their first comming, for all their subtill working and cruell attempt, had no quiet setling in Britaine, but were driuen out diuers times by the valiantnesse of Aurelius Ambrosius, and his brother Uter abone mentioned, who raigned after that among the Britaines: yet notwithstanding they were not so driuen out, but that they returned againe, and at length possessed all, driuing the Britaines (such as remained) into Cambria, which we call now Wales. Hengistus (as some chronicles record) raigned three and fortie yeares, and died in Kent. Galfridus in suo Britannico, saith, that he was taken in war by Aurelius Ambrosius, and beheaded at Coningsburgh, after he had raigned nine and thirtie yeares.

After the death of Hengist, his sonne Osca raigned foure and twentie yeares, leaning his sonne Octa, to whose raigne with his sonne Imenricus, histories do attribute three and fortie yeares, who also were slaine by Uter Pendragon. Polychronicon, lib. 5. cap. 4.

Ex Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 4.

The Saxons, after they were setled in the possession of England, distributed the realme among themselues first in seuen parts, euery part to haue his king, that is: the first to be the king of Kent; the second to be the king of Sussex and Southerie, holding his palace at Cicester; the third king was of Wessex; the fourth king of Essex; the fifth king was of the East angles, that is, of Cambridgeshire, Northfolke, and Suffolke; the sixth king of Mercelande, or Mercia, and in his kingdome were contained the counties of Lincolne, Leicester, Huntington, Northampton, Oxford, Derbie, Warwicke, &c. the seuenth king had all the countries beyond Humber, and was called king of Northumberland.

Seuen kings ruling in England.

Of these seuen kingdomes, although they continued not long, but at length ioyned all in one, comming all into the possession and subiection of the Westsaxons, yet for the space they continued (which was with continuall trouble and wars among themselues) this is the race and order of them, as in this table particularly followeth to be seene.

A table describing the seuen kingdomes of the Saxons, raigning heere in England.

IN the time of Uortiger aboue mentioned, began the raigne of the Saxons in this land, the which coming out of three sorts of the Germaine people (to wit) the Saxons, the Jutes & Angles, replenished the land, of thē called now Anglia. Of whom first Hengistus raigned in Kent, which countrie of Kent he had obtained by Rowen his daughter, of king Uortiger, which was about the yeare of our Lord (as some do coūt) 476, or (as I find) in the computation of our English tables 456, in some 463. After Hengist, came in Octha, with Eosa, or Ille his kinsmā: who afterward succeeded the said Hengist in Kent. Not long after came in another company of the Saxons, with Elle their captaine, which plāted themselues in Southsax. And after them againe another garrison of the Saxons with Cerdice their captaine, which did occupie the west part of the land, called by them Westsaxon. And so likewise the other multitude of the Saxons after them, which as yet being vnchristened and infidels, diuided the whole land among themselues into seuen kingdomes, as in this table followeth.

Octha, or Octha.
Emenricus, or Emericus.	26
Ethelbertus, the first of the Saxon kings that receiued the faith by Augustine, An. reg. 35.	56	This Ethelbert first of all the Saxons receiued the faith, and subdued all the other six kings, except onely the king of Northumberland.
Edbaldus.	24
Ercombertus.	24	Ercombert commanded Lent first to be fasted in his dominion.
Egebertus, or Edbrieth, slaine.	9	Egebert killed two sonnes of his vncle.
Lotharius slaine.	12
Eadrichus.	6	Vnto the time of Edricke all the bishops of Canterburie were Italians.
Nidredus.	7	Some chronicles doe place these two, Nidredus and Wilhardus, after Edricke, and giue to them seuen yeares, some againe do omit them.
Wilhardus.	7
Withredus.	33
Egfert or Edbert.	23	Betweene the raigne of Alricke, and Cuthred, some stories do insert the raigne of Eadbert, which raigned two yeares.
Ethelbert.	11
Alricus.	34
Eadbertus, surnamed Pren.	2
Cuthredus.	18
Baldredus, expulsed.	18

In the raigne of this Baldred the kingdome of Kent was translated to Egbertus, otherwise called Egbrict, king of Westsaxons, who subduing the foresaid Baldred, in the yeare 832, gaue the said kingdome to Athelstan his yonger sonne. After whose decease it came to Ethelwolfe the elder sonne of Egbrict, and so was vnited to the Westsaxons, who then began to be the monarch of the whole land. This kingdome began neere about the yeare of our Lord 456, and continued 342 yeares, and had fifteene kings.

This kingdome endured the shortest season of all others, and soonest passed into other kingdomes, in the daies (as some write) of Iue king of Westsax, and so endured not aboue an hundred and twelue yeares vnder seuen or at most eleuen kings, beginning first in the yeare of the Lord 478, and about the thirtith yeare of the first comming of the Saxons.

Elle, or Alle.	31
Cissa.		Of this Cissa came Cicester, which he builded, and where he raigned.
Nancanleus, or Nancanleodus.		This Nathanleod seemeth by some old stories to be a Britaine, and the chiefe marshall of king Uter, whom Porth the Saxon slew.
Porth.		This Porth a Saxon came in at the hauen, which now is called of him Porthmouth.
Ethelwelfus.		Because I find but little mention of these two, I thinke it rather like to be the same Ethelwold or Ethelwaldus, which after followeth.
Redwallus.
Condebertus.		Of Condebertus and Ethelred I find no mention but in one table only, supposing therefore that the true names of these were Ercombertus and Egebertus, which were kings of Kent the same time, and peraduenture might then rule in Sussex.
Ethelredus, or Ethereus.
Adelwold, or Ethelwaldus, slaine.		This Adelwold was the first king of Sussex christened, and as Fabian saith, the fourth king of the Southsaxons: as others say the seuenth, so vncertaine be the histories of this kingdome.
Adelbrich, or Berethunus, slaine.	5
Adhunus.	15

Cerdicus, or Credicus.	17	This kingdome contained Summersethire, Barkeshire, Dorsetshire, Deuonshire, Cornewall, &c.
Kenricus.	26
Chelingus.	30, 33. lib. cycl.
Celricus, or Ceolstricus.	5
Celwulfus, or Ceolulfus.	14
Kinigilsus and Quicelmus.	32	This Kinigilsus was first king christened in that prouince, conuerted by Birinus, after made monke.
Kinewalkins.	31
Serburga.	1
Elcwinus, Alcwinus, or Elkwinus.	2
Centwinus died at Rome.	7
Cedwallus.	3	Cedwalla went to Rome, and there was christened and died.
Ina, or Iue.	35	Ina also went to Rome, and was made monke.
Edelardus, or Atheslardus.	14
Cuthredus, or Cuthbert.	16	Sigebert for his pride and cruelties was deposed of his people. And as he had killed before one of his faithfull counsell, giuing him wholesome counsell: so after was he slaine of the same counsellers swineheard, as hee hid himselfe in a wood.
Sigebertus, or Sigherus, slaine.	1
Kinulfus, or Kinewlfus, slaine.	31
Brithricus.	13	This Egbert was first expelled by Brithricus, who after returned againe and raigning, was much derided and scorned with mocking rimes for a reward of Bernulfus king of Mercia. At length the said Egbert subdued him first, then all the rest, to his kingdome: causing the whole land to be called no more Britaine, but Anglia. Concerning the other kings after him in that lordship hereafter followeth.
Egbertus, or Egbrichtus, otherwise Athelbertus, or Athelbrich, &c.	37

This Egbert subdued all the other seuen kingdomes, and first began the monarchie of all the Saxons, which after by Alured was perfected, as hereafter followeth (the Lord willing) to be declared. This kingdome of the Westsaxons began the yeare of grace 522, and as it subdued all the others, so it did the longest continue, till about the comming of William Conquerour, which is about the time of 554 yeares.

547 Northūberland.

The kings of Northumberland, with the yeares of their raigne.

Ida.	12	This Ida of his wife had six children, Adda, Elricus, Olmerus, Theodedus; of concubines other six.

After Ida the kingdome of Northumberland was diuided into two prouinces, Deira and Bernicia.

Alle or Elle, Dierorum.	30	This Alle was the sonne of Ille, and raigned in Deira, 30.
Adda, Bernicorum.	7

Some chronicles set vnder Adda, to raigne in Bernicia, these kings, Glappa or Claspa, Theonulfus, or Hulla, or Theowalnus, Frithulfus, Theodoricus.

The kings of Northumberland.

Alricus, or Alfricus Deirorum. 5
Ethelfridus Bernicorum.

This Alfricus was the sonne of Ida, and raigned fiue yeares.

This Ethelfridus was hee that slew the monkes of Bangor, to the number of 2200, which came to pray for the good successe of the Britaines, and by his wife Accan, the daughter of Elle, he had seuen sons, Eanfridus, Oswaldus, Oswius, Oslacus, Osmundus, Osa, Offa: Flor. Histor.

Edwinus Northumberland, slaine. 17

This Edwinus was the first of the Northumberland kings, which was conuerted and christened by Paulinus bishop of London.

Osricus Deirorum, slaine.
Eanfridus Bernicia slaine.

These two are put out of the race of kings, because they reuolted from the christian faith, and were both slaine miserably by Cedwalla a Britaine, which then raigned in Northumberland, and in Mercia.

Oswaldus, of Northumberland, slaine.

This Oswaldus, called S. Oswald, fought with Cedwalla, and Penda with a small armie, and by strength of prayer banquished them in the field. He sent for Aedanus into Scotland to preach in his countrie, and as he preached in Scottish, the king expounded in English. He was a great giuer of almes to the poore. Of his other acts more appeareth hereafter.

Oswius, Northumberland. 28

This Oswius fighting against Penda, vowed to make his daughter Elfred a nun, giuing with her twelue lordships, to build twelue monasteries, fiue in Bernicia, fiue in Deira.

Oswinus raigned together with Oswius in Deira, slaine. 7

The same Oswius, in the beginning of his raigne toke one Oswinus the sonne of Edwine to be his partner ouer the countrie of Deira. Afterward causing him to be killed, toke to him another called Edelwald, the sonne of Oswald. Of this Oswinus more followeth hereafter to be declared.

Egfridus, Northumberland, slaine. 15

This Egfrid maried Etheldrida, who being twelue yeares married to him, could after by no meanes be allured to lie with him, but obtaining of him licence, was made nun, and then abbesse of Elie. She made but one meale a day, and neuer wore linen. At last the same Egfrid fighting against the Scots, was slaine in the field by a traine of the Scots, faining themselues to flie.

Alfridus, Northumberland, slaine. 20

Of this Alfride, Beda in his historie testifieth that he was exactly and perfectly seene in the holy scriptures, and recouered much that his predecessors had lost before: Bed. lib. 4. cap. 24. Some say he raigned not eightéene yeares.

Osred, Northumberland, slaine. 11
Kenredus, North. 2
Osricus, North. 20

Osred began his raigne, being but eight yeeres old, and raigned the space of ten yeares.

Some affirme that Osricus raigned but eleuen yeares.

Celulfus, Northum. made a monke. 9
Egbertus, or Eadbertus, Northumberland, monke. 21
Osulfus, Northumberland, slaine. 1
Mollo, or Ethelwold, Northumb. 11
In some chronicles six yeares.

This Celulfe, after he had raigned eight yeares, was made a monke. To him Beda wrote his storie.

Altredus, Northum. erpulsed. 10

Mollo by the subtill traine of Altredus was made away, which Altredus also himselfe, after hee had raigned ten yeares, was erpulsed by his owne people.

In some chronicles this Altredus raigned but eight yeares.

Ethelbertus, or Adelredus, Northumberland, erpulsed. 5
Alfwoldus, Northumberland, slaine. 11
Osredus.
Ethelbertus, or Adelwaldus North. slaine. 16

¶ After this Ethelbert, the kingdome of Northumberland ceased the space of xxv. yeares, till Egbertus king of the Westsaxons subdued also them, as he did the other Saxons to his dominion. After the which Egbert king of the Westsaxons succeded in Northumberland his sonne.

Ethelwolfus. Ethelbaldus. Ethelbertus. Ethelredus. } Kings of Westsaxons, raigning in Northumberland.

In the time of this Ethelredus, there were two vnder-kings in Northumberland, Ella and Osbright, whom the Danes ouercame, and raigned in their place, whose names were these:

Erbertus. Richil. Egebert. Gurthed. Guthred. } Danes.

¶ After the raigne of these forelaid Danes, the kingdome of Northumberland came into the hands of the Westsaxons, in the time of Athelstane and his brother Edmund. It began first in the yeare 547, and so endured 409 yeares. It contained Yorkeshire, Nottinghamshire, Darbishire, the bishoprike of Dirham, Copeland and others.

The kings of Mercia.

Grida or Creodda. 35
Wibba. 20
Ceorlus. 10
Penda, slaine. 30

Penda slew in battell Edwine and Oswald kings of Northumberland. Also Sigebert, Edrike, and Anna, kings of the Eastangles. Also he droue out Kenwalkins, king of the Westsaxons.

Peda, or Weda, slaine by his wife.

Under Peda and Wilferus, Christs faith was receiued in those parts, they being conuerted by Finianus bishop. The same Peda raigned in a part of Mercia, with his brother Wilferus, which were both the sonnes of Penda.

Wilferus. 29

This Wilferus by his wife Ermeburg had three daughters, Milburg, Mildrith, and Mildgith, holie virgins.

Adelredus, or Ethelred, made a monke 30 or 19.
Kenredus made also monke at Rome. 5
Ceolredus, or Keiredus.

This Adelredus or Ethelredus, was monke of Bardneie, whose sisters were Kinedrid, and Kinswith, holy virgins.

In the time of this Ceolred was Guthlake, otherwise called S. Guthlake, the popish heremit of Crowland.

Ethelbaldus, slaine. 41

Under Ethelbaldus died Beda. Ethelbald gaue that all churches should be free from all exactions and publike charges.

Bernredus. 1

This Bernred for his pride and stoutnesse toward his people, was by them deposed, and the same yeare by the iust iudgement of God burned: Histor. Carien.

Offa. 39

Offa causing or consenting to the death of good Ethelbert king of the Eastangles, peaceablie comming to marrie his daughter, for repentance caused the Peterpence first to be giuen to Rome, and there did his penance.

Egfredus. 1
Kenulphus slaine, 20 or 16

This Kenelme being of seuen yeares of age, was wickedly slaine, after he had raigned six moneths.

Kenelme murthered.
Ceolwolfus expelled, 1023.
Bernulphus slaine. 3
Ludecanus slaine. 2

This Ludecane, after the second yeare of his raigne, was slaine of Egbert king of the Westsaxons, by whom the rest of the Saxons were also subdued.

Some chronicles heere insert Milefred.

Wilafius, or Withlacus beheaded. 12

¶ This Withlacus in the beginning of his raigne was banquished by Egfrid king of Westsax, to whom he became tributarie with his successors heere following.

Berthulfe. 12
Buthredus. 20
Celulfus. 1
Elfredus. 1
} Some writers say that these kings were subdued by the Danes.

¶ After this Elfride, the kingdome of the Mercians was translated vnto the Westsaxons, in the latter time of king Alfred, or in the beginning of Edwardus Senior, and so was adioyned to the Westsaxons, beginning in the yeare 561. It endured for the space of 250 yeares, till about the latter end of Aluredus, by whom it was ioyned to the kingdome of Westsaxons. This kingdome stretched out to Huntingtonshire, Hertfordshire, Glocestershire, Worcester, Warwicke, Litchfield, Couentrie, Chester, Darbishire, Staffordshire, Shrowsburie, Orford, Buckingham, Dorcetr, Lincolne, Leicester, &c.

Swithredus.

The kings of the Eastsaxons.

This Sebertus nephue to Ethelbert K. of Kent, among these kings was first christened by Melitus, which made the church of Pauls.

Serred, and Seward, and Sigebert, expelled Melitus the bishop, because he would not minister to them the sacramentall bread, they being not baptised.

This Sigebertus Parvus with his brother Sebertus were slaine of Kinegilsus and Swithelinus his brother, by the iust iudgement of God, for they revolted againe from their faith, and expelled Melitus bishop of London.

This Segebertus Bonus or Sibertus, much reloyting to Oswie king of Northumberland, by his persuasion was brought to christian baptisme, baptised of Finianus bishop, to whom also was sent Cedde with other ministers to preach and to baptise in his countrie. At last he was slaine of his men about him, vsing too much to spare his enemies, and to forgiue their iniuries that repented. Flor.

This Sigherius and Sebbi first fell to idolatrie, then through the meanes of Wolferus king of Mercia, were reduced, and at last Sebbi became a monke.

Offa after he had raigned a while became a monke at Rome.

This Swithredus was subdued vnto Egbert king of Westsaxons, albeit London remained vnder the Mercians to the time that they also were subdued to the Westsaxons. This kingdome began in the yeare 561, and so continued till the time of Egbertus. Some stories say it continued to the time of Edward sonne of Aluredus, about the comming of the Danes, and contained vnder it the lordship of Middlesex and London. The metropolitane sea of this prouince of Essex was London, where the famous church of S. Paul was builded by Ethelbert king of Kent, and Sigebert king of Essex, whom Ethelbert had lately before turned to Christs faith: whereof the first bishop was Melitus, the second bishop was Ceddus, the third came in by simonie, whose name was Wine: Malmesb. de vitis pont. After him was Erkenwaldus, of whom writeth Beda, that he being diseased in his legs that he could neither go nor ride, yet would be caried about in a litter to preach in his diocesse, &c. Although William Malmesburie writing of the bishops of London, in his booke De vitis pont. saith, that Mauricius first the kings chancellour, then bishop there, did first begin this so large and famous building of the church of S. Paul in London: which worke after him Richard his successour did prosecute, bestowing all the rents of his bishoprike vpon the same, and yet was scarcely seene. Yet herein may be answered peraduenture, that the church builded before by king Ethelbert and king Sigebert, might bee ouerthrowne by the Danes, and afterward was reedified by these bishops aboue mentioned.

The kings of the Eastangles.

Of this Uffa the people of Northfolke were then called Ulfkins.

Redwaldus first was conuerted in Kent, afterward through the wicked persuasions of his wife & other, ioyned idolatrie with christiantie.

Notwithstanding his sonne Erpwaldus through the meanes of Edwin king of Northumberland, was brought to the perfect faith of Christ, and therein faithfully did continue.

This Sigebert made himselfe a monke, and afterward brought out to fight against Penda, with a white sticke in his hand, was slaine in the field.

The daughters of Anna were Sexburga, Ethelberta, and saint Etheldreda.

This Ethelredus for his holinesse and godly vertues is counted for a saint: hee innocently comming to Offa king of Mercia, to marrie with Alfrid his daughter, by the sinister suspicion of Offa, and wicked counsell of Kineswina his wife, was cruelly put to death in the house of Offa. For the which cause Offa afterwards repenting went to Rome, there he made himselfe a monke.

After this sinfull murther of Ethelbert, the kingdome of Eastangles during the time of certaine yeares, was in great trouble and desolation, vnder diuers kings and tyrants, sometime the king of Westsax, sometimes of Kent, or of Mercia, hauing dominion ouer them, till the comming of S. Edmund, which was the last king there ruling vnder the Westsaxons.

S. Edmund, martyred.	16

After the death of S. Edmund, being slaine of the infidell Danes, the kingdome remained with the Danes fiftie yeares, till at length Edward king of the Westsaxons expulsed the Danes, and ioyned it to his kingdome. It began about the yeare of our Lord 561, and continued neere about 377 yeares. Fabian numbreth but twelue kings, but in others I find more.

The metropolitan sea of this prouince of Eastangles, which was first at a towne called Dunmoke, or Dunwich, which in time past hath been a famous and populous towne, with a maior and foure bailiffes, and also diuers parish churches and hospitals, whereunto great priuiledges by diuers kings haue been granted, which towne is now fallen into ruine and decay, and more then halfe consumed by the eating in of the sea, as also greatly impouerished by losse of the hauen, which heretofore hath flourished with diuers tall ships belonging to the same (the inhabitants thereof being not able of themselues to repare it without the helpe of other good people) where the first bishop was Felix, a Burgundian, who sate there foureteene yeares. After this, vnto the time of Egbert king of Westsax, this prouince was euer ruled by two bishops, whereof the one had his sea at Dunmoke, now called Dunwich; the other at Hemaham where twelue sate one after another. From thence it was translated to Thetford, where sate three bishops. At last by bishop Herbert it was remoued to Norwich, where he erected a monasterie of monkes.

This Dunwich lieth vpon the sea side in Suffolke.

¶ And thus standeth the order and race of the Saxon kings, raigning together with the Britaines in this realme. Now followeth the description of the Britaine kings, raigning with the Saxons in like manner.

Although the miserable Britaines thus were bereaued of their land, by the cruell subtiltie of the Saxons, yet were they not so driuen out or expelled, but that a certaine kingdome remained among them in some part of the land, namely about Cornewall, and the parts of Cambria, which is diuided in two parts, Southwales called Demetia, & Northwales called Venedocia. The said Britaines moreouer through the valiant acts of their kings, sometimes raigned also in other countries, displacing the Saxons, and recouering againe their owne: sometimes more, sometimes lesse, till the time of Carecius, when as the Britaines being deposed by Gormundus (whose helpe they themselues sent for out of Ireland against Carecius their wicked king) vtterly lost their land and kingdome: being thence driuen vtterly into Wales and Cornewall, the yeare of our Lord 570. What the order of these kings was, what were their acts, their names, and times when they raigned: in this briefe table vnder written is expressed. Wherein first is to premonished, that Constantinus secundus had three children, to wit, Constans which was made a monke in Winchester, and after made a king; the second was Aurelius Ambrosius, the third was Uter Pendragon. This being premised, we will now enter the description of our table, beginning with Vortiger.

¶ A table declaring the kings of Britaine, which raigned together with the Saxons, after their comming into this land.

Kings of Britaine which heere raigned in the time of the Saxons.	Vortiger.	Constantinus 3.
	Vortimer.	Aurelius.
	Vortiger againe.	Conanus.
	Aurelius Ambrosius.	Vortiperius.
	Uter Pendragon.	Malgo.
	Arthur.	Careetius.

Heere is to be vnderstood that these Britaine kings aboue mentioned, did not so raigne heere in this land, from the time of Vortiger, that they had the full gouernment ouer all the whole realme, but only ouer parcels or parts, such as by force of armes they could either hold or winne from the

Saxons: which comming in daily and growing vpon them, did so replenish the land with multitudes of them, that the Britaines at length were neither able to hold that which they had, and countries, what it is, first to let in forren nations into their dominion, but especially what it is for princes to ioyne in mariage with infidels: as this Vortiger did with Hengists daughter, which was the mother of all this mischiefe: giuing to the Saxons not only strength, but also occasion and courage to attempt that which they did. Neither was this vnconsidered before of the Britaine lords and nobilitie: who worthily being therewith offended, iustly deposed their king, and enthroned Vortimer his sonne in his rome. By the which Vortimer being a puissant prince, the Saxons were then repulsed and driuen again into Germanie, where they stayed a while till the death of Vortimer, whom Rowen daughter of Hengist caused trayterously to be poysoned. Then Vortiger being again restored to his kingdome, through the entreatie of Rowen his wife, sent into Germanie again for Hengist, who ere[illegible] making his returne, came in with a naue of three hundred ships well appointed. The nobles of Britaine hearing this, prepared themselues of the contrarie side in all forceable wise to put them off. But Hengist through Rowen his daughter so laboured the king, excusing himselfe, and saying that he brought not the multitude to worke any violence either against him or against his countrie, but only thinking that Vortimer had yet been aliue, whom he minded to impugne for the kings sake, and to take his part. And now for so much as he heareth of the death of Vortimer his enemie, he therefore committeth both himselfe and his people to his disposition, to appoint how few or how many of them he would to remaine within his land: the rest should returne. And if it so pleased the king to appoint day and place, where they might meet and talke together of the matter, both he and his would stand to such order as the king with his counsell should appoint. With these faire words the king and his nobles (well contented) did assigne to them both day and place, which was in the towne of Ambrie, where hee meant to talke with them, adding this condition withall, that each part should come without any manner of weapon. Hengill shewing himselfe well agreed thereto, gaue prikie intelligence to his side, that each man should carrie with him secretly in his hose a long knife, with their watchword also giuen vnto them when they should draw their knines: wherewith euery Saxon should (and so did) kill the Britaine, with whom he talked, as is aboue declared. The Britaine lords being slaine, the Saxons tooke Vortiger the king and bound him: for whose ransome they required to be deliuered to them the citie of London, Yorke, Lincolne, Winchester, with other the most strongest holds within the land: which being to them granted, they begin to make spoile and hauoke of the Britaine nation, destroying the citizens, plucking downe churches, killing vp the priests, burning the bookes of the holy Scripture, leauing nothing vndone that tyrannie could worke, which was about the yeare of our Lord 462. The king seeing this miserable slaughter of the people fled into Wales.

{Anno 462}

Aurelius Ambrosius returneth into Britaine.

This while Aurelius Ambrosius, and Uter Pendragon brethren to king Constans aboue mentioned, whom Vortiger wickedly caused to be killed, were in little Britaine. To whom the Britaines sent word, desiring their aid in helping their countrie. Aurelius vnderstanding the wofull state of the realme, speedeth him ouer to satisfie their desire, and to rescue (what in him was) their necessitie. Who at his first comming ekeames being crowned for their king, seeketh out wicked Vortiger, the cause of all this trouble and murther of king Constans his brother. And finding him in Wales in a strong tower, wherein he had immured himselfe, setteth him and his castle on fire. That done, he moued his power against the Saxons, with whom, and with Elle captaine of the Southsaxons (who then was newly come ouer) he had diuers conflicts.

Aurelius crowned king of Britaine.

Vortiger burned in his tower.

Our English old chronicles make record that Horsus the brother of Hengist was slaine before in the time of Vortimer. The same also do record, that this Hengist was taken prisoner in the field, fighting against Aurelius Ambrosius: who then consulting with his nobles and barons what was to be done with him: the bishop of Glocester called Eldadus, standing vp, gaue this counsell, saying: that if all men would deliuer him, yet he with his owne hands would cut him in pieces, alledging the example of Samuel against Agag king of the Amalechits, taken by king Saul in the field, whom the said Samuel caused to be cut in pieces. Euen so (saith he) do you to this Agag here: that as he hath made many a woman widow, and without children, so his mother may be made this day of him likewise. And so was Hengist taken out of the citie by Eldo consull or maior of Glocester, and there was beheaded, if truth or credit be to be giuen to these our old Britaine stories: whereof I haue nothing certainly to pronounce, but that I may suspect the truth thereof, which was about the yere of our Lord 490. Hengist beheaded.

{Anno 490}

Ex Henr. Huntingtonensi, Galfrido, & chronico quodam Cariensi.

The vncertaintie of our old Britaine stories.

A certaine ancient written historie I haue in Latine, compiled in the fourteenth yeare of king Richard the second, and by him caused to be written as the title declareth: which because it beareth no name of the author, I call it by the name of him of whom I borrowed this booke, with many other likewise without name, Historia Cariana. This historie recordeth that Hengist died in Kent the two and thirtith yeare of his raigne: which if it be true, then is it false that he was taken at Cuninburgh, and slaine in the north. This Aurelius Ambrosius before mentioned, is thought of Polydorus Virgilius citing the authority of Beda, to descend of the stocke of the Romans: which as it is not impossible to be true, so this is certaine by the full accord of all our old written stories, that both the said Aurelius and his brother Uter Pendragon, being the sonnes of Constantinus, brother to Andoenus king of little Britaine, were nursed and brought vp in England, in their tender age, and instructed by Guitelinus archbishop of London, and after the murther of Constans their elder brother, were conueyed from hence to little Britaine: whereby it is manifest that they were borne in this land, and though their father were a Roman, as Polydorus pretendeth, yet like it is that they were Britaines borne, and had a Britaine to their mother.

Aurelius Ambrosius king.

After the death of Aurelius, who (as the storie saith) was poisoned by the craftie meanes of Valentius, sonne of Vortiger (suborning one, vnder the weed of a monke to play the physitian, and so to poison him) next succeeded his brother Uter surnamed Pendragon, about the yeare of our Lord 497, who fighting against Octa and Cosa, tooke them and brought them to London there to be kept: but they breaking out of prison returned into Germanie for more aid. In this meane time, daily recourse was of Saxons, with great companies comming out of Saxonie: with whom the Britaines had diuers and sundrie conflicts, sometimes winning, sometimes losing. Not long after Octa and Cosa, renuing their power in Germanie, in all most speedie haste did returne againe, and ioyne with the other Saxons against the Britaines. Here began the state of miserable Britaine more and more to decay, while the idolatrous Saxons preuailed in number and strength against the christian Britaines: oppressing the people, throwing downe churches and monasteries, murthering the prelats, sparing neither age nor person, but wasting christiantie almost through the whole realme. To these miseries it fell moreouer that Uter their king was sicke and could not come out: notwithstanding being grieued with the lamentable destruction of his people, caused his bed to be brought into the campe, where God gaue him victorie; Octa and Cosa there being slaine. After this victorie in short space Uter died of poison (as is said) put into a fountaine of water, whereof the king was wont to drinke, about the yeare of our Lord, 516. Flor. hist.

The christian Britaines persecuted by the heathen Saxons.

{Anno 516}

About which time and yeare came in Stuph and Wigarius two nephewes of Certhice king of Westsaxons, with their companies so violently vpon the Britaines, that they of the west part of the realme were not able to resist them. Then the mercifull prouidence of almightie God, raised vp for them king Arthur, the sonne of Uter: who was then crowned after him and victoriously raigned. To this Arthur the old Britaine histories do ascribe twelue great victories against the heathen Saxons: whose notorious and famous conquests, mentioned in the Britaine stories, I leaue them as I find them: referring them to the credit of their authors in whom they are found. Notwithstanding, as I do not thinke contrarie, but God by the foresaid Arthur, gaue to the Britaines some stay and quietnesse during his life, and certaine of his successors: so touching certaine of great victories and conquests, not only ouer this land, but also ouer all Europe, I iudge them more fabulous, then that any credit should be giuen vnto them, more worthie to be ioyned with the Iliads of Homer, then to haue place in any ecclesiastical all historie. After Arthur next king of the Britaines, was Constantinus the third. After him Aurelius Conanus. Then Vortiporius, after whom followed Malgo, noted in stories to be a Sodomite. And after him the last king of the Britaines was Careticus, all giuen to ciuill war, execrable to God and man. Who being chased out by the Britaines themselues, the land fell to the possession of the Saxons, about the yeare of our Lord 568, by whom all the clergie and the christian ministers of the Britaines were then vtterly driuen out: in so much that Theonus archbishop of London, and Thadeolus archbishop of Yorke, seeing their churches all walked, and parishes dispersed with their cariages and monuments, left their seas in Britaine, and fled into Cambria, which we now call Wales. Touching which matter, and touching also the cause of this desolation and ruine of the Britaines kingdome, the first fountaine and origin thereof partly before is declared, where was shewed in the time of Constantinus Magnus and Maximian, how these noble princes with other mo, atchieuing their venturous affaires in other countries, tooke with them great multitudes and armies out of Britaine: through the occasion whereof the land was greatly impaired and depriued of his most chiefe and principall nobles, being caried away to serue in forren warres. Which was no small cause, why the realme of Britaine (being so walked) was the lesse able to helpe it selfe against their enemies. Although this was not the chiefe occasion, but other causes there were greater, wherefore God by his iust iudgement, suffered this plague and ouerthrow to fall vpon that people, as here out of an old author, and partly out of Gildas, as I haue found it, so I thought to annex it in his owne owne words, first in Latine, then afterward Englishing the same for the more credit of that which shall be alleaged, in tenor as followeth.

The causes of the destruction of the Britains declared.

Nobiliores totius regni prædictos duces sequuti fuerunt, & ignobiles remanebant, qui cum vicem nobilium obtinere cœpissent, extulerunt se vltra quod dignitas expetebat. Et ob affluentiam diuitiarum superbi cœperunt tali & tantæ fornicationi indulgere, qualis nec inter gentes audita est. Et, vt Gildas historicus testatur, non solùm hoc vitium, sed omnia quæ humanæ naturæ accidere solent, & præcipuè quod totius boni euertit statum, odium veritatis, amor mendacij, susceptio mali pro bono, veneratio nequitiæ pro benignitate, exceptatio sathanæ pro angelo lucis: vngebantur reges, non propter dominium, sed qui cæteris crudeliores essent. Si quis verò eorum mitior, & veritati aliquatenus propior videretur, in hunc quasi Britanniæ subuersorem omnia odia telaque torquebantur. Omnia quæ Deo placebant & displicebant æquali lance inter eos pendebantur. Et non solùm hoc seculares viri, sed & ipse grex domini, eiúsque pastores sine discretione faciebant. Non igitur admirandum est degeneres tales patriam illam amittere, quam prædicto modo maculabant.

In English thus.

In English thus: The nobles of this realme following the princes and captains aboue named, by reason thereof the vulgar and rascall sort remained behind at home. Who when they had gotten the roomes and places of the nobles, they aduanced themselues aboue that their dignitie required. And through their abundance of riches, they surprised with pride, began to fall into such and so great fornication, as was neuer heard of euen among the gentils. And as Gildas the historiographer witnesseth, not into vice only, but also into all maner of wickednesse, whereto mans nature is inclined: and especially into that which is the ouerthrow of all good estats, the hatred of the truth, loue of lies, imbracing of euill in stead of goodnesse, regarding of mischiefe in stead of vertue, receiuing of the diuell in stead of an angell of light. They annointed kings, not such as could well rule a common wealth, but those which exceeded all other in crueltie. And if any might be perceiued to be somewhat more humble or meek, or to be more inclined to favor the truth then the residue, him did euery one hate and backbite as the ouerthrower and destroyer of Britaine. All things whether they pleased or displeased God, they regarded alike. And not secular men only did this, but also the congregation of the Lord and their bishops and teachers without any difference at all. Therefore it is not to be maruelled, that such people so degenerating and going out of kind should lose that countrie, which they had after this maner defiled.

And thus much hitherto concerning the historie of the Britains, till (by the grace of Christ) the order of time shall bring vs hereafter to the treatise of Cedwalla & Caluualadrus. Now remaineth it, in returning again to the matter of the Saxons, to discourse particularly, that which before in the table aboue we haue summarilie comprehended.

In this order and race of the Saxon kings aboue specified, which had thus thrust out the Britains, and now diuided their land in seuen kingdoms; as there were many naughtie and wicked kings (whose pernicious examples, being all set on war and bloudshed, are greatly to be detested and eschewed of all true godly princes) so some there were againe (although but few) very sincere and god. But none almost from the first to the last, which was not either slaine in war, or murthered in peace, or else constrained to make himselfe a monke. Such was the rage then and the tyrannie of that time. Whether we should impute it to the corruption of mans nature, or to the iust iudgement of Gods hand, so disposing the matter, that as they had violently & fallie dispossessed the Britains of their right: so they most miserablie were not only vexed of the Danes, and conquered at last by the Normans: but also more cruelly deuoured themselues, one warring still against another, till they were neither able to helpe themselues, nor yet to resist others. Of them which are noted for god among these Saxon kings, the first and principall is Ethelbertus, or Ethelbrict the first king of Kent aboue specified, who by the meanes of Austin, and partly through his wife, named Berda, first receiued and preferred the christian faith in all this land of the English Saxons, whereof more followeth hereafter to be said (the Lord so permitting) as place and opportunitie shall require. The next place I giue to Oswaldus of Northumberland, who not onely did his indeuor in furthering the faith of Christ amongst his people: but also being king, disdained not himselfe to stand vp and interpret to his nobles and subiects the preaching of Aidanus, preaching Christ to them in his Scottish language. In the same commendation also, like as in the same line, commeth his vncle Edwin, king of Northumberland, a good prince, and the first receiuer of Christs faith in that land, by the meanes of his wife, and Paulinus bishop. Ad to these also Sigebert, first christened king of Essex: of whom the one was a great furtherer of religion, and setter vp of schooles: the other, which is Sebert or Serbricht, was nephue to Ethelbert of Kent, vnder whom he ruled in Esser. By the which Ethelbert, in the time of the said Sebert the church of Pauls was builded at London, and christian faith much inlarged, &c. Of the same name there was also another Ethelbert king of the Eastangles, a god prince: who by the aduice of his counsell, perswaded to marriage (though against his will) went peaceablie to king Offa for despousage of Athelrid his daughter, where the good king meaning innocentlie, through the sinister and diuelish counsell of king Offa his wife, was secretly beheaded and made away. Whereupon Offa through repentance thereof, made the first Peter pence to be giuen to S. Peters church in Rome.

In the catalogue of these good kings is also to be numbred Kenelmus king of the Mercians, and Edmundus king of the Eastangles: of the which two, the first was falslie and abominablie circumuented and beheaded, by the meanes of his cruell sister and his tutor, as he was in his hunting at Corfe castle. The other which is called king Edmund the martyr, was slaine at Burie, or (as some write) at the castle of Halesdon by the Danes: vpon what occasion, histories do varie. The author of Flores historiarum saith, it was by reason of one Lothbrooke a Dane: who being of the kings bloud, & being with his hauke on the sea side in a little bote, was driuen by the force of weather into the coast of Northfolke, where he being presented to king Edmund was retained in the court with great favor: till at length one Bericke the kings falconer, enuying & despiting him for his great dexteritie in that facultie, priuilie did murther him in a wood. This being at last spied (as murther lightlie will come out) Bericke was set in Lothbrooks bote alone, without all tackling, to be committed vnto the sea: and as it chanced so, was driuen into Denmarke, who there being seene in Lothbrooks bote, was strictlie examined of the partie. He then to excuse himselfe, falslie said he was slaine by the commandement of the king. Vpon the occasion whereof Inguar and Hubba sonnes to the said Lothbrooke gathering an armie of Danes, inuaded first Northumberland: after that bursting into Northfolke on euery side, sent this message to king Edmund after this tenor: Signifying that king Inguar the victorious prince (dread both by sea and land) as he had subiect diuers other lands vnder him, so arriuing now to the coasts of Northfolke, where he intendeth to winter; chargeth & commandeth him to diuide with him his old treasures, and his fathers riches, and so to rule vnder him: which if he would not do, but would contemne his power so stronglie furnished with such an armie, he should be iudged as vntowrthie both of kingdome & life, &c. The king hearing this message, not a little astonished thereat, calling his counsell about him, consulted with them especially with one of his bishops, being then his secretarie, what was best to be done: who fearing the kings life, exhorteth him by words and diuers examples to agree to the message. At this a while the king holding his peace, at length thereto made answer againe in these words, saying: Go (saith he) tell your lord, and let him know that Edmundus the christened king, for the loue of this temporall life, will not subiect himselfe to a pagane duke, vnlesse before he become a christian, &c. The messenger taking his answer was not so soone out of the gates, as Inguar meeting him, and bidding him to be short in declaring his answer, caused all the kings garrison to bee set round about. Some say that the king flying to Thetford, there pitcht a field with the Danes, but the Danes preuailing, the good king from thence did flie to the castle of Halesdon aboue mentioned, where he being pursued of the Danes was there taken, and at length being bound to a stake, there, of the raging Danes was shot to death. And thus much for the good kings.

Now as concerning those kings, which made themselues monks (which in number be seuen or eight) although the example be rare and strange, and much commended of the chronclers of that time: yet I cannot rashly assent to their commendation, albeit the case thereof is no matter of our historie. First in altering their estate from kings to monks, if they did it to find more ease, and lesse trouble thereby: I see not how that excuse standeth with the office of a god man, to change his publike vocation for respect of priuat commoditie. If feare of ieopardie and danger did driue them thereunto: what praise and commendation they deserue in so doing, let the monkish histories iudge what they list. Wee seeme so much praise as they deserue in prouiding their owne safetie, so much they deserue againe to be discommended in forsaking the common wealth. If they did it (as most like it is) for holinesse sake, thinking in that kind of life to serue and please God better; or to merit more toward their saluation then in the estate of a king, therein they were farre deceiued: not knowing that the saluation which commeth of God, is to the measured and esteemed, not by mans merits, or by any perfection of life, or by difference of anie vocation more of one then another, but onely by the free grace of the gospell, which freely iustifieth all them that faithfullie beleeue in Christ Iesu. But heere will bee said againe peraduenture; In the solitarie life of monkerie be fewer occasions of euils then in kings courts, wherefore that life serueth more to holinesse, and more is to be preferred then the other. To this I answer, To auoid the occasions of euil is good where strength lacketh to resist; but otherwise, where dutie and charge bindeth to tarrie, there to auoid the occasions of euill, where rather they are to be resisted, rather declareth a weakenesse of the man then deserueth any praise. As it is truly said of Tullie: Out of Asia (saith he) to liue a good life, is no godamercie; but in Asia where where ſo great occaſions of euils abound, there to liue a good man, that is praiſe worthie. With the like reaſon I may inker, if a man be called to be a king, there not to change the vocation for voiding of occaſions, but rather to reſiſt occaſions, and to keepe his vocation, declareth a good and perfect man. Foure perſecutions in Britanie before the comming of Auſtin into England.

Theſe things now thus premiſed, concerning the order and raigne of kings, as is aboue prefixed: conſequently it remaineth to enter the tractation of ſuch things, as in the time and raigne of the foreſaid kings happened in the church: firſt putting the reader againe in mind of the former perſecutions within the realme, partly before touched in the time of the Britains kings, which ſpecially were three or foure before the comming of Auſtin into England.

The perſecution of Diocleſiã about the yeere of our Lord 210.

1 The firſt was vnder Diocleſian, and that not onlie in England, but generally throughout all the Romane monarchie, as is aboue ſpecified. In this perſecution Albanus, Iulius, Aaron, with a great number more of other good chriſtian Britains were martyred for Chriſts name.

The perſecution of Gnauius and Pelga.

2 The ſecond perſecution or deſtruction of chriſtian faith, was by the inuading of Gnauius and Pelga, whereof the firſt was captaine of the Hyms, the other of the Picts. Theſe two tyrants, after the cruell ſlaughter of Urſula, and other 11000 noble virgins, made their rode into Britaine, hearing the ſame to be deſtitute of the ſtrength of men. At what time they made miſerable murther of Chriſts ſaints, ſpoiling and waſting churches, without mercie either of women or children, ſparing none.

The perſecution of Hengiſt in Britaine.

3 The third perſecution came by Hengiſt, and the Saxons: who likewiſe deſtroyed and waſted the chriſtian congregations within the land, like raging wolues flying vpon the ſheepe, and ſpilling the bloud of chriſtians, till Aurelius Ambroſius came, and reſtored againe the churches deſtroyed.

The fourth deſtruction of chriſtian faith in Britaine by Gurmundus in the yeere 595.

4 The fourth deſtruction of the chriſtian faith and religion was by Gurmundus a pagane king of the Africans, who ioyning in league with the Saxons, wrought much grieuance to the chriſtians of the land. In ſo much that Theonus biſhop of London, and Thadioceus biſhop of Yorke, with the reſt of the people ſo many as were left, hauing no place wherein to remaine with ſafetie, did flie ſome to Cornewall, and ſome to the mountains of Wales about the yeere of our Lord 550. and this perſecution remained to the time of Ethelbert king of Kent, in the yeere 589.

This Gurmundus, as ſome ſtories record, leauing his kingdome at home to his brother, ſaid he would poſſeſſe no kingdome, but which he ſhould win with his ſword.

In the raigne of this Ethelbert, which was then the fifth king of Kent, the faith of Chriſt was firſt receiued of the Saxons or Engliſhmen, by the meanes of Gregorie biſhop of Rome, in manner and order as here followeth, out of old hiſtories collected and recorded.

Firſt then to ioyne the order of our hiſtorie together; the chriſtian faith firſt receiued of king Lucius, indured in Britaine till this time, neere vpon the ſeaſon of 400. yeeres and od: when by Gurmundus Africanus (as is ſaid) fighting with the Saxons againſt the Britains, it was neere extinct in al the land, during the ſpace about forty foure yeeres. So that the firſt ſpringing of Chriſts goſpell in this land, was in the yeere of our Lord 180. The comming of the Saxons was in the yeere 449. or 469. The comming of Auſtin was in the yeere 596. From the firſt entring in of the Saxons to their complet conqueſt, and the driuing out of the Britains (which was about the latter time of Cadwalader) were 240. yeeres. In ſumme, from Chriſt to Lucius were 180. yeeres. The continuance of the goſpell from Lucius to the entring of the Saxons, was 302. yeeres. The decay of the ſame to the entring of Auſtin, was 143. yeeres, which being added together make from Lucius to Auſtin 445. yeeres, from Chriſt to Auſtin they make 598. yeeres. In this yeere then 598. Auſtin being ſent from Gregorie came into England: the occaſion whereupon Gregorie ſent him hither was this.

King Lucius died 428. yeeres before the comming of Auſtin.

The computation of times concerning the continuance and decay of Chriſts goſpell betweene the Britains and the Saxons.

Anno 598

In the daies of Pelagius biſhop of Rome, Gregorie chancing to ſee certaine children in the market place of Rome (brought thither to be ſold out of England) being faire & beautifull of viſage, demanded out of what countrie they were: And vnderſtanding they were heathenith out of England, lamented the caſe of the land being ſo beautifull and angelicall, ſo to be ſubiect vnder the prince of darkeneſſe. And aſking moreouer out of what prouince they were: It was anſwered, out of Deira, a part of Northſaxons; whereof as it is to be thought, that which we now call Deirham taketh his name. Then he alluding to the name of Deira; Theſe people (ſaith he) are to be deliuered De Dei ira, which is, From Gods wrath. Moreouer vnderſtanding the kings name of that prouince to be Alle (aboue mentioned) alluding likewiſe to his name: There (ſaith hee) ought Alleluia to be ſung to the liuing God. Whereupon being moued and deſirous to go & helpe the conuerſion of that countrie, was not permitted of Pelagius and the Romans for that time to accompliſh his deſire. But afterward being biſhop himſelfe next after Pelagius, hee ſent thither the foreſaid Auſtin with other preachers neere about to the number of fortie. But by the way; how it hapned I cannot ſay: As Auſtin with his company were paſſing in their iournie, ſuch a ſudden fears entred into their harts that (as Antoninus ſaith) they returned all. Others write that Auſtin was ſent backe to Gregorie againe, to releaſe them of that voiage ſo dangerous and vncertaine, amongſt ſuch a barbarous people: whoſe language they neither knew, nor whoſe rudenes they were able to reſiſt. Then Gregorie with pithie perſuaſions confirming and comforting him, ſent him againe with letters both to the biſhop of Arelatenſis, willing him to helpe & aid the ſaid Auſtin, and his companie in all whatſoeuer his need required. Also other letters he directed by the foreſaid Auſtin, vnto his fellowes, exhorting them to goe forward boldly in the Lords worke: as by the tenor of the ſaid epiſtle here following may appeare.

The epiſtle of Gregorie to them which went to preach in England.

The biſhop of Rome calleth the emperour his lord.

Thus they emboldened and comforted through the good words of Gregorie, ſped forth their iournie till they came at length to the Ile of Thenet, lying vpon the eaſt ſide of Kent. Neere to the which landing place was then the manor or palace of the king, not far from Sandwich (eaſtward from Canturburie) which the inhabitants of the Ile then called Richbourgh: whereof ſome part of the ruinous walls is yet to be ſeene. The king then raigning in Kent, was Ethelbert, as aboue appeareth, the fifth king of that prouince: who at that time had maried to wife a French woman being chriſtened, named Berda, whom he had receiued of her parents vpon this condition, that he ſhould permit her with her biſhop committed vnto her, called Lebardus, to inioy the freedome of her faith and religion: by the meanes whereof he was more flexible, and ſooner induced to imbrace the preaching and doctrine of Chriſt. Thus Auſtin being arriued ſent forth certain meſſengers and interpretors to the king, ſignifying that ſuch a one was come from Rome, bringing with him glad tidings to him and all his people of life and ſaluation eternally to raigne in heauen, with the onlie true and liuing God for euer: if he would ſo willingly hearken to the ſame, as he was gladly come to preach and teach it vnto him.

What goodnes commeth to haue a good and godly wife.

The king, who had heard of this religion before by means of his wife, within a few daies after commeth to the place where Auſtin was to ſpeake with him: but that ſhould be without the houſe, after the manner of his law. Auſtin againſt his comming, as ſtories affirme, erected vp a banner of the croſſe (ſuch was then the groſſeſſe of that time) and preached to him the word of God. The king anſwering againe ſaith in effect as followeth: The words be very faire that you preach and promiſe, neuertheleſſe, becauſe it is to me vncouth and new, I cannot ſoone ſtart away from my countrie law wherewith I haue ben ſo long inured, & aſſent to you. Albeit yet notwithſtanding for that ye are come (as ye ſay) ſo far for my ſake, yee ſhall not be moleſted by me, but ſhall bee right well intreated, hauing all things to you miniſtred neceſſarie for your ſupportation. Beſides this, neither doe we debar you, but ye haue free leaue to preach to our people and ſubiects, to conuert whom yee may to the faith of your religion.

The kings anſwere to Auſtin.

The king ſtaieth vpon old cuſtome.

When they had receiued this comfort of the king, they went with procеſſion to the citie of Dorobernia, or Canturburie, ſinging Alleluia with the Letanie, which then by Gregory had been vſed at Rome in the time of the great plague raigning then at Rome, mentioned in old ſtories. The words of the Letaine were theſe: Deprecamur te Domine in omni miſericordia tua, vt auferatur furor tuus & ira tua à ciuitate iſta, & de domo ſancta tua, quoniam peccauimus, Alleluia. that is: We beſeech thee O Lord in all thy mercies, that thy furie and anger may ceaſe from this citie, and from thy holy houſe, for wee haue ſinned, Alleluia. Thus they entring in the citie of Dorobernia, the head citie of al that dominion at that time, where the king had giuen them a manſion for their abode: there they continued preaching and baptiſing ſuch as they had conuerted in the eaſt ſide of the city in the old church of S. Martine (where the queens was woont to resort) vnto the time that the king was conuerted himselfe to Christ. At length, when the king had well considered the honest conuersation of their life, and moued with the miracles wrought through Gods hand by them, he heard them more gladly, and lastly by their wholesome exhortations and example of godly life, he was by them conuerted and christened, in the yeere aboue specified 586, and the six and thirty yeere of his raigne. After the king was thus conuerted, innumerable other daily came in & were adioyned to the church of Christ, whom the king did specially imbrace, but compelled none; for so he had learned, that the faith and seruice of Christ ought to be voluntarie and not coacted. Then he gaue to Austin a place for his bishops see at Christs church in Dorobernia, and builded the abbie of S. Peter and Paul in the east side of the said citie, where after Austin and all the kings of Kent were buried, and that place is now called S. Austins.

Miracles wrought by God for the conuersion of the land.

Austin made archbishop.

In this while Austin sailed into France vnto the bishop Arelatensis, called Ethereus, by him to be consecrated archbishop by the commandement of Gregorie, and so was. Also the said Austin sent to Rome Laurentius one of his companie, to declare to Gregorie how they had sped, and what they had done in England, sending withall to haue the counsell and aduice of Gregorie concerning nine or ten questions, whereof some are partly touched before.

The tenor of his questions or interrogations, with the answers of Gregorie to the same, here follow in English briefly translated.

The questions of Austin an archbishop of Canturburie sent to Gregorie, with the answer againe of Gregorie to the same.

The first interrogation.

Ex decreto Gregory primi. Lib. concil. tom. 2.

MY first question (reuerend father) is concerning bishops, how they ought to behaue themselues toward their clerks, or of such oblations as the faithfull offer vpon the altar: what portions or diuidents ought to be made thereof?

The first interrogation.

The answere.

How a bishop ought to behaue himselfe in the congregation, the holy scripture testifieth, which I doubt not but you know right well, especiallie in the epistles of S. Paul to Timothie: wherein he laboureth to informe the said Timothy how to behaue his conuersation in the house of the Lord. The maner is of the see apostolike to warne and charge all such as bee ordained bishops, of all their stipend, or that which is giuen, to make foure partitions. One to the bishop for hospitalitie and receiuing commers in: another to the clergie; the third to the poore; the fourth to the repairing of churches. But because your brotherhood instructed with rules of monasticall discipline, can not line separated from your clerks about you, therefore in the English church (which now through the prouidence of God is brought to the faith of Christ) you must obserue this institution concerning your conuersation, which was in the first fathers in the beginning of the primitiue church, among whom there was not one, which counted any thing to bee his owne proper of all that hee did possesse: but all was common among them.

Distribution of the church goods.

The second interrogation.

The second interrogation.

I desire to know and to be instructed, whether clerks that cannot containe, may marrie: and if they doe marrie, whether then they ought to returne to the secular state againe or no?

The answere.

The answer.

If there be any clerks out of holy orders, which cannot containe, let them haue their wiues, and take their stipends or wages without. For wee reade it so written of the foresaid fathers, that they diuided to euery person according as their worke was. Therefore as concerning the stipend of such, it must be prouided and thought vpon. And they must be also holden vnder ecclesiasticall discipline, to liue a godly conuersation, to employ themselues in singing psalmes, and to refraine their tongue, hart & bodie (by the grace of God) from all things vnseemely and vnlawfull. As for the vulgar and common sort which liue after the common condition of men, to describe what partitions to make, what hospitalitie to keepe, or what works of mercie to exhibit, to such I haue nothing to say, but to giue (as our master teacheth) in all our deeds of mercie of that which aboundeth. Of that (saith he) which aboundeth or is ouerplus, giue almes, and behold all things be cleane vnto you.

The gloste vpon the 12. q. 1. Para. Si qui. saith that this now holdeth not, and alleageth the Extra. De cler. conivgan. ca. Ioh. &c. whereby note how the popes decrees be repugnant to themselues, Luke 11.

The third interrogation.

The third interrogation.

Seeing there is but one faith, how happeneth it then the ceremonies and customes of churches to be so diuers: as in the church of Rome there is one custome and manner of masse, and the French church hath another?

The answer.

Answer.

The custome of the church of Rome, what it is you know, wherein you remember that you haue been brought vp from your youth; but rather it pleaseth me better, that whether it be in the church of Rome, or in any French church: where ye find any thing that seemeth better to the seruice & pleasing of God, that ye choose the same, and so infer and bring into the English church (which is yet new in the faith) the best & profitable things chosen out of many churches: for things are not to be beloued for the place sake, but the place is to be beloued for the things that be good: wherefore such things as be good, godly, and religious, those chuse out of all churches, and induce to your people, that they may take root in the minds of Englishmen.

Note a worthie saying of Gregorie.

The fourth interrogation.

The fourth interrogation.

I pray you, what punishment iudge you for him, that shall steale or pilfer any thing out of the church?

The answer.

The answer.

This your brotherhood may soone discerne, by the person of a theefe, how it ought to be corrected. For some there be, which hauing sufficient to liue vpon, yet doe steale. Others there be which steale of meere necessitie. Wherefore considering the qualitie and difference of the crime, necessarie it is that some bee corrected by losse of goods, some by stripes, some others more sharply, and some more easie: yea, and when sharper correction is to be executed, yet that must be done with charitie, & with no furie: for in punishing offendors, this is the cause and end wherefore they are punished, because they should be saued & not perish in hell fire. And so ought discipline to proceed in correcting the faithful, as do good fathers in punishing their children, whom both they chasten for their euill, and yet being chastened, they loue to haue them their heires, and think to leaue them all they haue, notwithstanding they correct them sometimes in anger. Therefore this charitie must be kept in mind: and in the correction there is a measure to be had, so that the mind neuer do any thing without the rule of reason. We adde moreouer, with what recompence of measure those things ought to bee required againe, which bee stollen out of churches. But God forbid that the church should euer require againe with increase, that which is lost in outward things, and to seeke her gaine by indamaging others.

The fifth interrogation.

The fifth interrogation.

Item, whether two brethren may marry two sisters, being far off from any part of kindred?

The answer.

The answer.

This in no part of scripture is forbidden, but it may well and lawfullie be done.

The sixth interrogation.

The first interrogation.

Item, to what degree of kindred may the matrimonie of the faithfull extend with their kindred, or whether is it lawfull to marrie with the stepmother and her kinsfolks?

The answer.

The answer.

A certeine terren law amongst the old Romans doth permit, that either brother or sister, or the sonne and daughter of two brethren may marrie together. But by experience wee learne, that the issue of such marriage doth neuer thriue, nor come forward. Also the holy law of God forbiddeth to reueale the turpitude of thy blood or kindred. Wherefore necessary it is, that in the third or fourth degree the faithfull may lawfullie marrie; for in the second (as being vnlawfull) they must needs refraine. To be coupled with the stepmother is vtterly abominable, for it is written in the law; Thou shalt not reueale the turpitude of thy father. Forsomuch then as it is so written in the law; And they shall be two in one flesh: the sonne then that presumeth to reueale the turpitude of his stepmother, which is one flesh with his father, what doth he then but reueale the turpitude of his owne father? Likewise it was forbidden and vnlawfull to marry with thy kinswoman, which by hir first marriage was made one flesh with thy brother: for the which cause John the Baptist also lost his head, and was crowned a martyr. Who though he died not for the confession of Christ, yet forsomuch as Christ saith; I am the truth: therefore in that John Baptist was slaine for the truth, it may bee said his bloud was shed for Christ.

In what degree of kindred a man may marrie.

By this rule the marriage of king Henrie with queene Catharine Dowager was vnlawfull.

The seuenth interrogation.

The seuenth interrogation.

Item, whether such as so be coupled together in filthy and vnlawfull matrimonie ought to be separated, and denied the partaking of the holy communion?

The answer.

The answer.

Because there bee many of the nation of Englishmen which, being yet in their infidelitie, were so ioyned and coupled in such execrable marriage: the same comming now to faith, are to be admonished hereafter to abstaine from the like, and that they know the same to be a grieuous sin; that they dread the dreadfull iudgement of God, lest for their carnall delectation, they incur the torments of eternall punishment. And yet notwithstanding they are not to be secluded therefore from the participation of Christs bodie and bloud, lest we should seeme to reuenge those things in them, which they before their baptisme through ignorance did commit. For in this time the holy church doth correct some faults more feruently, some faults she suffereth againe through mansuetude and meeknesse, some wittinglie and willinglie shee doth winke at and dissemble: that many times the euill which shee doth detest, through bearing and dissembling she may stop and bridle. All they therefore which are come to the faith, must be admonished that they commit no such offence. Which thing if they doe, they are to be depriued of the communion of the Lords bodie and bloud. For like as in them that fall through ignorance, their default in this case is tollerable: so in them againe it is strongly to be inued, which knowing they do naught, yet feare not to commit.

A discreet saying of Gregorie to be noted.

The

The eight interrogation.

The eight interrogation. Item, in this I desire to be satisfied, after what maner I should deale or doe with the bishops of France, and of Britaine?

The answer. The answere.

As touching the bishops in France, I giue you no authoritie or power ouer them. For the bishop of Aralas, or Orleance hath by the old time of our predecessors receiued the pall, whom now we ought not to depriue of his authoritie. Therefore when your brotherhod shall go vnto the prouince of France, whatsoeuer ye shall haue there to do with the bishop of Orleance, so doe, that he lose nothing of that which he hath found and obtained of the ancient ordinance of our foreelders. But as concerning the bishops of Britaine, we commit them all to your brotherhod, that the ignorant may be taught, the infirme by perswasion may be confirmed, the wilfull by authoritie may be corrected.

Quest. 25. cap. 2. in Gallicanum.

The ninth interrogation.

The ninth interrogation. Whether a woman, being great with child, ought to be baptised, or after she hath childre, after how long time she ought to enter into the church? Or els, that which she hath brought forth, lest it should be preuented with death, after how many daies it ought to receiue baptisme? Or after how long time after her childbirth is it lawfull for her husband to resort to her? Or els if she be in her monthlie course, after the disease of women, whether then she may enter into the church, and receiue the sacrament of the holy communion? Or else her husband after the lying with his wife, before he be washed with water, whether is it lawful for him to enter the church, and to draw vnto the mysterie of the holy communion? All which things must be declared and opened to the rude multitude of Englishmen.

The answere. The answere.

The childing or bearing woman, why may she not be baptised, seeing that the fruitfulnesse of the flesh is no fault before the eies of almightie God: For our first parents in paradise, after they had transgressed, lost their immortalitie by the iust iudgement of God, which they had taken before. Then because almightie God would not mankind vtterly to perish because of his fall (although he lost now his immortalitie for his trespasse) yet of his benigne pitie left notwithstanding to him the fruit and generation of issue. Wherefore the issue and generation of mans nature, which is conserued by the gift of almightie God, how can it be debarred from the grace of holie baptisme?

The churching of women. As concerning the churching of women, after they haue trauelled, where ye demand after how many daies they ought to goe to the church, this you haue learned in the old law, ỹ for a man child thirtie three daies, after a woman child sixtie and six daies be appointed her to keepe in: albeit this you must take to be vnderstood in a mysterie. For if she should the houre after her trauell enter into the church to giue thanks, shee committed therein no sinne: for why? the lust and pleasure of the flesh, and not the trauell and paine of the flesh is sinne. In the conuncion of the flesh is pleasure, but in the trauell and bringing forth of the child is paine and groning: as vnto the mother of all it is said: In sorrow thou shalt trauell. Therefore if we forbid the woman after her labor to enter into the church, then what doe we else but count the same punishment giuen vnto her for sinne: Therefore for the woman after her labor to be baptised, either that which she hath trauelled forth (if present necessitie of death doth so require) yea in the selfe same houre, either shee that hath brought forth, either that which is borne in the same houre when it is borne, to be baptised we doe not forbid.

He speaketh here after the custome of the time.

Mothers that nurse not their owne children reprehended.

Moreouer, for the man to companie with his wife: that he must not, before the child that is borne be wained. But now there is a leaud and naughtie custome risen in the condition of maried folks, that mothers doe contemne to nurse their owne children which they haue borne, but set them to other women out to nurse, which seemeth only to come of the cause of incontinencie: for while they will not containe themselues, therefore they put from them their children to nurse, &c.

As concerning the women in their menstruous course, whether she ought to enter the church: To this I answer: She ought not to be forbid. For the superfluitie of nature in her ought not to be imputed for any fault, neither is it iust that she should be depriued of her accesse to the church, for that which she suffereth against her will. And if the woman did well, presuming in touching the Lords cote in the time of her bloody issue: why then may not that be granted vnto all women infirmed by the fault of nature, which is commended in one person done in her infirmitie: Therefore to receiue the mysterie of the holie communion, it is not forbidden them. Albeit if she dare not so far presume in her great infirmitie, she is to be praised, but if she doe receiue, she is not to be iudged: for it is a point of a good mind in some maner to acknowledge her sins there, where is no sinne: because many times that is done without fault which commeth of fault. As when we be hungrie, wee eate without fault, notwithstanding it commeth by the fault of our first father to vs that we are hungrie, &c.

Where ye aske, if a man after the companie with his wife may resort to the church, or to the holy communion, before hee be purged with water: The law giuen to the old people, commanded that a man (after the companie with his wife) both should bee purified with water, and also should tarrie the sunne-let before hee came to the congregation. Which seemeth to be vnderstood spiritually: for then most true it is, that the man companieth with the woman, when his mind through delectation is ioyned to vnlawfull concupiscence in his heart and cogitation. At what time, before the said fire of concupiscence shall be remooued, let the person thinke himselfe vnworthie the entrance to the congregation, through the viciousnesse of his filthie will. But of this matter sundrie nations haue euerie one their sundrie customes: some one way and some another. The ancient maner of the Romans from our forefathers, hath been, that in such case, first they purge themselues with water, then for a little they abstaine reuerendly, and so resort to the church, &c.

After many other words debated of this matter, thus hee inferreth. But if any person not for voluptuousnes of the flesh, but for procreation of children, doe companie with his wife, that man concerning either the comming to the church, or the receiuing the mysteries of the Lords bodie and bloud, is to be left to his owne iudgement: for he ought not to be forbid of vs to come, which when he lieth in the fire will not burne, &c.

There is another question also to these adioyned, with his answer likewise to the same, concerning pollutions in the night: but I thought these at this present to our English eares sufficient.

To returne now to the storie againe: Gregorie after hee had sent these resolutions to the questions of Austin, sendeth moreouer to the church of England more coadiutors, and helpers, as Melitus, Iustus, Paulinus, & Rufinianus, with bookes & such other implements as he thought necessarie for the English church. Hee sendeth moreouer to the foresaid Austin a pall with letters, wherein he setteth an order betweene the two metropolitane sees, the one to be at London, the other to bee at Yorke. Notwithstanding he granteth to the said Austin during his life to be the onely chiefe archbishop of all the land: and after his time, then to returne to the two foresaid sées of London and Yorke, as is in the same letter contained, the tenor whereof here followeth in his owne words, as insueth.

The copie of the epistle of Gregorie, sent to Austin into England.

Reuerẽdissimo & sanctissimo fratri Augustino coepiscopo, Gregorius seruus seruorum Dei. Cum certum sit, pro omnipotente Deo laborantibus ineffabilia eterni regis premia reseruari, nobis tamen eis necesse est bonorum beneficia tribuere, vt in spiritualis operis studio ex remuneratione valeãt multiplicius insudare, &c. As followeth here in English.

TO the reuerend and vertuous brother Augustine, his fellow bishop, Gregorius the seruant of the seruants of God. Although it be most certaine, that vnspeakeable rewards of the heauenlie king be laid vp for all such as labour in the words of almightie God: yet it shall be requisit for vs to reward the same also with our benefits, to the end they may be more incouraged, to go forward in the studie of their spirituall worke. And forsomuch now, as the new church of Englishmẽ is brought to the grace of almightie God, through his mightie helpe, and your trauell, therefore we haue granted to you the vse of the pall, onely to be vsed at the solemnitie of your masse: so that it shall be lawfull for you to ordaine twelue bishops, such as shall be subiect to your prouince or dition. So that hereafter alwaies the bishop of the citie of London shall be ordained and consecrated by his owne proper synod: and so to receiue the pal of honor from the holy and apostolike see, wherein I here (by the permission of God) do serue. And as touching the city of York, we will send also a bishop thither, whom you may think meet to ordaine. So that if that citie with other places bordering thereby, shall receiue the word of God, he shall haue power likewise to ordaine twelue bishops, & haue the honor of a metropolitane: to whom also if God spare me life, I intend by the fauour of God to send a pall: this prouided, that notwithstanding he shall be subiect to your brotherly appointment. But after your decease, the same metropolitane, so to be ouer the bishops who he ordreth, that he be in no wise subiect to the metropolitane of London after you. And hereafter betwixt these two metropolitans, of London and Yorke, let there bee had such distinction of honor, that he shal haue the prioritie, which shall in time first be ordained. With common counsell, and affection of heart, let them go both together, disposing with one accord such things as be to be done for the zeale of Christ. Let them forethinke and deliberat together prudentlie, and what they deliberat wisely, let them accomplish concordly, not iarring nor swaruing one from the other. But as for your part, you shall be indued with authoritie, not onely ouer those bishops, that you constitute, and ouer the other constituted by the bishop of Yorke; but also you to haue all other priests of whole Britaine, subiect vnto our Lord Iesus Christ: to the end that through your preaching and holinesse of life, they may learne both to beleeue rightlie and to liue purely, and so in directing their life, both by the rule of true faith & vertuous maners, they may attaine, when God shall call them, the fruition and kingdome

A letter of Gregorie to Mellitus.

Beſides this, the ſaid Gregorie ſendeth alſo another letter to Mellitus concerning his iudgement, what is to be done with the idolatrous temples and phanes of the Engliſhmen newlie conuerted, which phanes he thinketh not beſt to plucke downe, but to conuert the vſe thereof, and ſo let them ſtand. And likewiſe of their ſacrifices and killing of oxen, how the ſame ought to be ordered, and how to be altered: diſputing by the occaſions therof, of the ſacrifices of the old Egyptians, permitted of God vnto the Iſraelites, the end and vſe thereof being altered, &c.

A letter of Gregorie to Auſtin.

He ſendeth alſo another letter to the foreſaid Auſtin, wherin he warneth him not to be proud or puft vp for the miracles wrought of God by him, in conuerting the people of England, but rather to feare and tremble, leſt ſo much as he were puft vp by the outward worke of miracles, ſo much he ſhould fall inwardly through the vaine glorie of his heart: and therefore wiſely exhorteth him to repreſſe the ſwelling glorie of heart, with the remembrance of his ſinnes rather againſt God, wherby he rather hath cauſe to lament, then to reioyce for the other. Not all the elect of God (ſaith hee) worke miracles, and yet haue they their names written in the booke of life. And therefore he ſhould not count ſo much of thoſe miracles done, but reioyce rather with the diſciples of Chriſt, and labor to haue his name written in the booke of life, where all the elect of God be contained, neither is there any end of that reioycing. And whatſoeuer miracles it hath pleaſed God by him to haue been done, he ſhould remember they were not done for him, but for their converſion, whole ſaluation God ſought thereby, &c.

A letter of Gregorie to king Ethelbert.

Item, he directed another epiſtle to king Ethelbert, as is expreſſed at large in the chronicle of Henrie Huntington, lib. 3. in the which epiſtle, firſt he praiſeth God, then commendeth the gwdneſſe of the king, by whom it pleaſed God ſo to worke ſuch gwdneſſe of the people. Secondly, exhorteth him to perſiſt and continue in the godly profeſſion of Chriſts faith, and to bee feruent and zealous in the ſame; in conuerting the multitude, in deſtroying the temples and works of idolatrie, in ruling and gouerning the people in all holineſſe & godly converſation, after the godly example of the emperor Conſtantinus the great. Laſtly, comforting him with the promiſes of life and reward to come, with the Lord that raigneth and liueth for euer: premonithing him beſides, of the terrors and diſtreſſes that ſhall happen (though not in his daies) yet before the terrible day of Gods iudgement. Wherefore he willeth him alwaies to be ſolicitous for his ſoule, and ſuſpectfull of the houre of his death, & watchfull of the iudgement, that he may be alwaies prepared for the ſame, when that iudgement ſhall come. In the end he deſireth him to accept ſuch preſents and gifts which he thought good to ſend vnto him from Rome, &c.

{Anno 600}

Polychronic. lib. 5. cap. 9. Fab. part. 5. cap. 119.

Auſtin thus receiuing his pall from Gregorie, as is aboue ſaid, and now of a monke being made an archbiſhop, after hee had baptiſed a great part of Kent: he after made two archbiſhops or metropolitans, by the commandement of Gregorie, as witneſſeth Polychron. one at London, another at Yorke.

Archbiſhops of London and of Yorke made by Auſtin.

Mellitus biſhop of London.

Mellitus, of whom mention is made before, was ſent ſpecially to the Eaſtſaxons in the prouince of Eſſex, where after he was made biſhop of London, vnder Sigebert king of Eſſex; which Sigebert together with his vncle Ethelbert firſt builded the church and minſter of S. Paul in London, and appointed it to Mellitus for the biſhops ſee. Auſtin (aſſociat with this Mellitus and Juſtus through the helpe of Ethelbert) aſſembled and gathered together the biſhops and doctors of Britaine in a place, which taking the name of the ſaid Auſtin, was called Auſtins Oke. In this aſſemblie he charged the ſaid biſhops, that they ſhould preach with him the word of God to the Engliſhmen, and alſo that they ſhould among themſelues reforme certaine rites and vſages in their church, ſpecially for keeping of their Eaſtertide, baptiſing after the maner of Rome, and ſuch other like. To theſe the Scots and Britains would not agree, refuſing to leaue the cuſtome, which they ſo long time had continued, without the aſſent of them all which vſed the ſame. Here the ſtories both of Beda, Ceſtrenſis in Polychron. Huntingtonenſis, Iornalenſis, Fabianus, & others more, write of a certaine miracle wrought vpon a blind Engliſhman, whom when the Britains could not helpe, Auſtin kneeling downe and praying, reſtored the blind man to ſight before them all, for a confirmation (as theſe authors ſay) of his opinion in keeping of Eaſter. But concerning the credit of this miracle, that I leaue to the authors of whom I had it.

The Britains and Scots vſed not the rites of Rome.

Abbie of Bangor. Ex libro Iornalenſi, Fabiano, & alijs.

Then Auſtin gathered another ſynod, to the which came ſeuen biſhops of Britaine, with the wiſeſt men of that famous abbie of Bangor. But firſt they toke counſell of a certaine wiſe and holie man amongſt them, what to doe; and whether they ſhould be obedient to Auſtin or not. And he ſaid: If he be the ſeruant of God agree vnto him. But how ſhall we know that, ſaid they? To whom he anſwered againe: If he be meeke and humble of heart, by that know that he is the ſeruant of God. To this they ſaid againe: And how ſhall we know him to be humble & meeke of heart? By this (quoth he) Seeing you are the greater number, if he at your comming into your ſynod riſe vp, and curteouſlie receiue you, perceiue him to be an humble and a meeke man. But if he ſhall contemne and deſpiſe you (being as ye are) the greater part, deſpiſe you him againe. Thus the Britaine biſhops entring into the councell, Auſtin after the Romiſh maner keeping his chaire would not remoue. Whereat they being not a little offended, after ſome heat of words, in diſdaine & great diſpleaſure departed thence. To whom then Auſtin ſpake, and ſaid, that if they would not take peace with their brethren, they ſhould receiue warre with their enemies: and if they diſdained to preach with them the way of life to the Engliſh nation, they ſhould ſuffer by their hands the reuenge of death. Which not long after, ſo came to paſſe by the meanes of Ethelfride king of Northumberland: who being yet a pagan, and ſtirred with a fierce furie againſt the Britains, came with a great armie againſt the citie of Cheſter, where Brocmaile the conſull of that citie, a friend and helper of the Britains ſide, was readie with his force to receiue him. There was at the ſame time at Bangor in Wales an exceeding great monaſterie, wherein was ſuch a number of monks, as Galfridus with other authors do teſtifie, that if the whole companie were diuided into ſeuen parts, in euery of the ſeuen parts were contained not ſo few as 300. monks; which all did liue with the ſweat of their browes, and labour of their owne hands, hauing one for their ruler named Dino. Out of this monaſterie came the monkes to Cheſter, to pray for the good ſucceſſe of Brocmaile, fighting for them againſt the Saxons. Three daies they continued in faſting & prayer. When Ethelfride the foreſaid king, ſeeing them ſo intentiue to their prayers, demanded the cauſe of their comming thither in ſuch a company; & when he perceiued it was to pray for their conſull; Then (ſaith he) although they beare no weapon, yet they fight againſt vs, and with their prayers and preachings they perſecute vs. Whereupon after that Brocmaile, being ouercome did flee away, the king commanded his men to turne their weapons againſt the ſillie vnarmed monks, of whom hee ſlue the ſame time, or rather martyred eleuen hundred, onely fiftie perſons of that number did flee and eſcape away with Brocmaile: the reſt were all ſlaine. The authors that write of this lamentable murder, declare and ſay how the foreſpeaking of Auſtin was here verified vpon the Britains; which becauſe they would not ioyne peace with their friends, hee ſaid ſhould bee deſtroyed of their enemies. Of both theſe parties, the reader may iudge what he pleaſeth: I cannot ſee but both together were to be blamed. And as I cannot but accuſe the one, ſo I cannot defend the other. Firſt Auſtin in this matter can in no wiſe bee excuſed: who being a monke before, and therefore a ſcholar and profeſſor of humilitie, ſhewed ſo little humilitie in this aſſemblie, to ſeuen biſhops and an archbiſhop, comming at his commandement to the councell, that he thought ſcorne once to ſtir at their comming in. Much leſſe would his phariſaicall ſolemnitie haue girded himſelfe, and waſhed his brethrens feete after their trauell, as Chriſt our great maiſter did to his diſciples: ſeeing his lordſhip was ſo high, or rather ſo heaule, or rather ſo proud, that hee could not find in his heart to giue them a little mouing of his bodie, to declare a brotherly and humble heart. Againe the Britains were as much, or more to blame, who ſo much neglected their ſpirituall dutie, in reuenging their temporall iniurie, that they denied to ioyne vnto their helping labor, to turne the idolatrous Saxons to the way of life and ſaluation, in which reſpect all priuat cauſes ought to giue place, and to be forgotten. For the which cauſe, although lamentable to vs, yet no great maruell in them, if the ſtroke of Gods puniſhment did light vpon them, according to the words of Auſtin, as is before declared. But eſpecially the cruell king in this fact was moſt of all to blame, ſo furiouſlie to flee vpon them, which had neither weapon to reſiſt him, nor yet any will to harme him. And ſo likewiſe the ſame or like happened to himſelfe afterward. For ſo was he alſo ſlaine in the field by chriſtian Edwine, who ſucceeded him, as he had ſlaine the chriſtians before, which was about the yeere of our Lord 616. But to returne to Auſtin againe, who by report of authors was departed before this crueltie was done, after he had baptiſed and chriſtened ten thouſand Saxons or Angles in the weſt riuer, that is called Swale, beſide Yorke on a Chriſtmaſſe day, perceiuing his end to draw neere, he ordained a ſucceſſor named Laurentius to rule after him the archbiſhops ſee of Dorobernia. Where note by the way (chriſtian reader) that whereas Auſtin baptiſed then in riuers: it followeth, there was then no vſe of fonts. Againe, if it be true that Fabian ſaith, he baptiſed ten thouſand in one day; the rite thereof baptiſing at Rome was not ſo ceremoniall, neither had ſo many trinkets at that time, as it hath had ſince; or elſe it could not be that he could baptiſe ſo many in one day.

Ethelfride king of Northumberland.

note it, not to be true that Henrie Huntington and others doe witnesse, that Austin was dead before that battell of Ethelfride against the monks of Bangor. For if it be true that Polychronicon testifieth of this murder, to be done about the yere of our Lord 609; and the comming of Austin first into the realme to be An. 596; then Austin induring sixteene yéeres could not be dead at this battell. Moreouer Galfridus Monumetensis declareth concerning the same battell, that Ethelbert the king of Kent, being (as is said) conuerted by Austin to Christs faith; after he saw the Britaines to disdaine and denie their subiection vnto Austin, neither would assist him with preaching to the English nation: therfore stirred vp he the foresaid Ethelfride to war against the Britains: But that séemeth rather suspicious then true, that he being a christian king, either could so much preuaile with a pagan idolater, or els would attempt so far to commit such a cruell déede, But of vncertaine things I haue nothing certainly to say, lesse to iudge.

Galfridus Monumetensis.

Anno 610

About this present time aboue prefixed, which is An. 610, I reade in the storie of Ranulphus Cestrensis, the writer of Polychronicon, of John the patriarch of Alexandria, who for his rare example of hospitalitie and bountifulnesse to the poore, I thought no lesse worthie to haue place amongst good men, then I see the same now to be followed of few. This John (being before belike a hard and sparing man) as he was at his prayer, vpon a time (it is said) there appeared to him a comely virgin, hauing on her head a garland of oliue leaues, which named her selfe Mercie, saying to him, and promising that if hee would take her to wife, hir should prosper well. This, whether it were true or not, or else inuented for a moralitie, I would wish this flourishing damsell so to be married to more then to this John, that she should not liue so long a virgin now as she doth, because no man will marrie her. But to returne to this patriarch, who after that day (as the storie recordeth) was so mercifull and so beneficiall, especially to the poore and needie, that he counted them as his maisters, and himselfe as a seruant and steward vnto them. This patriarch was wont commonlie twice a weeke to sit at his doore all the day long, to take vp matters, and to set vnitie where was any variance. One day it happened, as he was sitting all the day before his gate, and saw no man come, he lamented that all that day hee had done no good: to whom his deacon standing by, answered again, that he had more cause to reioyce, séeing he had brought the citie in that order and in such peace, that there néeded no reconcilement amongst them. Another time as the said John the patriarch was at seruice, and reading the gospell in the church, the people (as their vsed manner is) went out of the church to talke and iangle: he perceiuing that, went out likewise, and sat amongst them; whereat they maruelled to sée him doe so. My children (said he) where the flocke is, there ought the shepheard to be: wherefore either come you in, that I may also come in with you; or else if you tarrie out, I will likewise tarry out together with you, &c.

Poly. lib. 1. ca. 10

Mercie may liue a maiden, for no man will marrie her.

This John was so bountifull in giuing, that he assaid to striue in a manner with the Lord, whether the Lord should giue more, or he should distribute more of that which was giuen.

The acts of Gregorie the first.

As touching the acts and déeds of Gregorie aboue mentioned, how he withstood the ambitious pride of John, patriarch of Constantinople, which would be the vniuersall priest, and onlie chiefe bishop of all others, declaring him to be no lesse then the forerunner of antichrist, that would take that name vpon him; how and with what reasons he answered againe the letters of the emperor Mauricius in that behalfe, sufficient relation is made thereof in the first entrie and beginning of this booke. This Gregorie among many other things induced into the church (the specialties whereof hereafter shall follow Christ willing more at large) first began and brought in this title among the Romane bishops, to be called Seruus seruorum Dei: putting them in remembrance thereby both of their humblenesse, and also of their dutie in the church of Christ. Moreouer as concerning his act for the sole life of priests first begun, and then broken againe; also concerning the order of Gregories masse booke to be receiued in all churches: hereof who so listeth to read more, shall find the same in other places hereafter, namelie when wee come to the time of pope Adrian the first.

Whereupon the Roman bishops vse in their stile, Seruus seruorum Dei.

Sabinianus bishop of Rome.

Bonifacius the third bishop of Rome.

After the death of Gregorie aboue mentioned, first came Sabinianus, who as he was a malicious detractor of Gregorie and of his workes, so he continued not long, scarse the space of two yeeres. After whom succéeded next Bonifacius the third, which albeit he raigned but one yéere, yet in that one yéere he did more hurt then Gregorie with so great labors, and in so many yeeres could do good before. For that which Gregorie kept out, he brought in, obtaining of Phocas the wicked emperor for him and his successors after him, that the sée of Rome aboue all other churches should haue the préeminence, and that the bishop of Rome should be the vniuersall head through all churches of Christ in christendom; alleaging for him this friuolous reason, that S. Peter had left to his successors in Rome the keies of binding and losing, &c. And thus began first Rome to take an head aboue all other churches, by the means of Bonifacethe third, who as he lacked no boldnesse nor ambition to séeke it, so neither lacked hee an emperor fit and méet to giue such a gift. This emperors name was Phocas, a man of such wickednesse and ambition, most like to his owne bishop Boniface, that to aspire to the empire, he murdered his owne maister the emperour Mauricius & his children. Thus Phocas comming vp to be emperor, after his detestable villanie done, thinking to stablish his empire with friendship and fauour of his people, and especiallie with the bishop of Rome, quicklie condescended to all his petitions, and so granted him (as it is said) to be that he would, the vniuersall and head bishop ouer all christian churches. But as bloud commonlie requireth bloud againe, so it came to passe on the said Phocas. For as he had cruellie slaine the lord and emperor Mauricius before, so he in like maner (of Heraclius the emperor succéeding him) had his hands and feet cut off, and so was cast into the sea. And thus wicked Phocas which gaue the first supremacie to Rome, lost his owne. But Rome would not so soone lose his supremacie once giuen, as the giuer lost his life: for euer since from that day it hath holden, defended, and maintained the same still, and yet doth to this présent day, by all force and policie possible. And thus much concerning Boniface, whom by the words of Gregorie, we may well call the runner before antichrist. For as Gregorie brought in their stile, Seruus seruorum Dei; so this Boniface brought into their heads first, Volumus ac mandamus, Statuimus ac præcipimus. That is: We will and command, We inioyne and charge you, &c.

Mention was made a little before of Ethelbert king of Kent, and also of Ethelfride king of Northsaron or Northumbria. This Ethelbert hauing vnder his subiection all the other Saxon kings vnto Humber, after he had first receiued himselfe, and caused to be receiued of others, the christian faith by the preaching of Austin, confirmed afterward in the same faith, amongst other costly déeds, with the helpe of Sigebert king of Essex his nephue then raigning vnder him, began the foundation of Paules church within the citie of London, & ordained it for the bishops sée of London. For the archbishops sée which before time had been at London, was by Austin and this Ethelbert at the prayer of the citizens of Dorobernia translated to the said citie: Malmesburiensis lib. de pontific. Wherefore such authors as say that Pauls was builded by Sigebert, say not amisse: which Sigebert was the king of Esser, in which prouince standeth the citie of London. This Ethelbert also founded the church of S. Andrew in the citie of Dorubrys in Kent, now called Rochester, of one Rof, distant from Dorobernia foure and twentie miles. Of this citie Iustus was bishop, ordained before by Austin. Moreouer the forenamed Ethelbert stirred vp a dweller or citizen of London to make a chapell or church of S. Peter in the west end of London, then called Thornie, now the towne of Westminster, which church or chapell was after by Edward the Confessor inlarged or new builded: lastlie of Henrie the third it was newly againe reedified and made as it is now a large monasterie, &c. After these christian and worthie acts, this Ethelbert when he had raigned the course of fiftie and fiue yéeres, changed this mortall life about the yéere of our Lord 616. whom some stories say to bee slaine in a fight betweene him and Ethelfride king of Northsarons.

In the meane time the foresaid Ethelfride king of Northumberland, after the cruell murder of the monkes of Bangor, escaped not long vnto his ire: for after he had raigned foure and twentie yéeres he was slaine in the field of Edwine, who succeded in Northumberland after him.

This Edwine being the sonne not of Ethelfride (as Galfridus Monumetensis saith) but rather of Alla (as Giraldus Cambrensis séemeth to witnesse more truely) was first a panim or idolater; afterward by Paulinus was christened and the first christened king in Northumberland. The occasion of which his calling or conuersion, as is in sundrie stories contained, was this.

Edwine first christened king in Northumberland.

Giraldus Cambrensis.

Edwin being yet a pagan, married the daughter of Ethelbert king of Kent, called Edelburge a christian woman, otherwise called Tace. But before this marriage, Edwin being yet young, Ethelfride the king conceiuing enuie against him, persecuted him so sore, that he was forced to flee to Redwaldus king of East angles, as in the table of the kings is expressed. The which Redwaldus what for feare, what with bribes being corrupted of Ethelfride, at length priuilie had intended to haue betraied Edwine. But as Gods will was, Edwine hauing warning thereof by a secret friend of his, was moued to flée, and to saue himselfe, being promised also of his friends to be safely conueyed away, if he would thereto agrée. To whom Edwine said, Whither shall I flée which haue so long fléene the hands of mine enemies, through all prouinces of the realme? And if I must needs be slaine, I had rather he should do it, then another vnworthie person. Thus he remaining by himselfe alone and solitarie, sitting in a great studie, there appeared vnto him suddenly a certaine stranger to him vnknowne, and said; I know well the cause of thy thought and heauinesse. What wouldest thou giue him that should deliuer thee out of this feare, and should reconcile king Redwald to thee againe? I would giue him (said Edwine) all that I euer could make. And he said againe: And what if I make thee a mightier king then was any of thy progenitors? He answered againe as before. Moreouer (saith he) And what if hee shew thee a better kind and way of life, then euer was shewed to any of thine ancestors before thée; wilt thou obey him and doe doe after his counsell: Yea (said Edwine) promising most firmely with all his heart so to doe. Then he laying his hand vpon his head: When (said he) this token happeth vnto thee, then remember this time of thy tribulation, and the promise which thou hast made, and the word which now I say vnto thee. And with that he vanished out of his sight suddenly. After this so done, as Edwine was sitting alone by himselfe pensiue and sad, his foresaid friend which moued him before to flie, commeth to him bidding him be of good cheere; For the heart (said he) of king Redwaldus which had before intended thy destruction, is now altered through the counsell of the queene, and is fully bent to keepe his promise with you, whatsoeuer shall fall thereupon. To make the storie short, Redwaldus the king (although Fabian following Henrie Huntington, saith it was Edwine) with all conuenient speed assembled an host, wherewith he suddenly comming vpon Ethelfride, gaue battell vnto him about the borders of Mercia, where Ethelfride king of Northumberland, also with Reiner Redwaldus sonne, was slaine in the field. By reason whereof Edwine (his enemies now being destroyed) was quietly placed in the possession of Northumberland. All this while yet Edwine remained in his old paganisme, albeit his queene (as is aboue declared) king Ethelberts daughter a christian woman, with Paulinus the bishop, ceased not to stirre and persuade the king to christian faith. But he taking counsell with his nobles and counsellers vpon the matter, was hard to be won. Then the Lord, who disposeth all things after his purpose to bring all good things to passe, sent another trouble vpon him, by meanes thereof to call him: for by affliction God vseth commonly to call them whom he will saue, or by whom he will worke saluation vnto others. So his diuine wisedome thinketh good to make them first to know themselues before they come to know him, or to teach him to others. So it was with Paul, who was stricken downe before he was lifted vp, with Constantinus, Edwinus, & many more. How long was Joseph in prison before he bare rule? How hardly escaped this our queene now being (queene Elizabeth) by whom notwithstanding it hath pleased God to restore this his gospell now preached amongst vs? In what conflicts and agonies inwardly in his spirit was M. Luther before he came to preach the iustification of Christ openly? And so be all they most commonly, which come to any liuely feeling or sensible working of Christ the Lord.

Fabianus pars. 5.

A part of a true seruant.

But to returne to Edwine againe. The occasion of his trouble was this. Quicelinus with Kinegilsus his brother, kings of Westsaxons (as aboue is mentioned in the table of the Saxon kings) conspiring the death of Edwine now king of Northumberland, vpon enuie and malice sent vpon an Easter day a swordman named Emmer, priuilie to slay the said Edwine. This swordman or cutthrote came to a citie beside the water of Darwent in Derbishire, there to wait his time, and lastly found the king small accompanied, and intended to haue run the king thorow with a sword inuenomed. But one Lilla the kings trustie seruant, disgarnished of a shield or other weapon to defend his maister, start betweene the king and the sword, and was stricken thorow the bodie and died, and the king was wounded with the same stroke. And after he wounded also the third which was a knight, and so was taken, and confessed by whom he was sent to worke that treason. The other knight that was secondly wounded, died, and the king lay after long sicke ere he were healed.

After this, about Whitsuntide the king being scantlie whole of his wound, assembled his host, entending to make against the king of the Westsaxons, promising to Christ to bee christened if he would giue him the victorie ouer his enemies: and in token thereof caused his daughter borne of Edelburge the same Easter day when he was wounded, named Eufled, to be baptised, with twelue others of his familie, of Paulinus. Thus Edwine proceeded to the battell against Quiceline and Kinegilsus with Kenwolcus and other enemies, who in the same battell being all vanquished and put to flight, Edwine through the power of Christ returneth home victorer. But for all this victorie and other things giuen to him of God, as hee was in wealth of the world, forgat his promise made, and had little mind thereof, saue only that he by the preaching of Paulinus forsoke his maumetrie; and for his excuse said that hee might not cleerely denie his old law, which his forefathers had kept so long, and suddenly to be christened without authoritie and good aduice of his counsell.

Edwine forgetteth his promise to Christ.

Prosperitie forgetfull.

Old custome in matters of religion not to be followed, but only truth.

Old custome letteth Edwine to be christened.

About the same season pope Boniface the fift sent also to the said Edwine letters exhortatorie, with sundrie presents from Rome to him, and to Edelburge the queene: but neither would that preuaile. Then Paulinus seeing the king so hard to bee conuerted, powred out his prayers vnto God for his conuersion, who the same time had reuealed to him by the holy Ghost, the oracle aboue mentioned, which was shewed to the king when hee was with Redwaldus king of the Eastangles. Whereupon Paulinus comming after to the king on a certaine day, and laying his hand vpon the kings head, asked him if he knew that token. The king hearing this, and remembring well the token, was readie to fall downe at his feet. But Paulinus not suffering that, did lift him vp againe, saying vnto him: Behold O king, you haue vanquished your enemies, you haue obtained your kingdome, now performe the third thing which you promised, that is, to receiue the faith of Christ, and to be obedient to him. Whereupon the king conferring with his counsell and his nobles, was baptised of the said Paulinus at Yorke, with many of his other subiects with him. In so much that Coifie the chiefe of the prelats of his old maumetrie, armed himselfe with his idolatrous bishops, and destroyed goo horses, which before by their old law they might not do, nor ride but only a mare: and so destroyed all the altars of the maumettie, and their temple of idols which was at Godmundham, not far from Yorke. And this was in the eleuenth yeare of his raigne.

The part of a godly bishop exemplified in Paulinus. Edwine baptised.

He was baptised in S. Peters church at Yorke, which he first caused to be made of wood, which after by S. Oswald was builded of stone.

From that time forth during the life of Edwine, which was the terme of six yeares more, Paulinus christened continually in the riuers of Glwenie and Swala, in both prouinces of Deira, and in Bernicia, vsing the said riuers for his fonts, and preached in the shire of Lincolneie, where he builded also a church of stone at Lincolne.

{Anno 628}

Note Paulinus christened in riuers.

In this time was so great peace in the kingdome of Edwine after his conuersion, that a woman laden with gold might haue gone from the one side of the sea to the other, and no man molest her. Moreouer by the high way sides, through all his kingdome he caused by euery well or spring to be chained a dish or boll of brasse, to take vp water for the refreshing of such as went by the way, which bolles of brasse there remained safe, that no man touched them during all the life of the said Edwine. Such was then the tender care and studie of christian princes for the refreshing of their subiects. But that was then the brasen world which now is growen to iron and lead, called Aetas ferrea, or rather Plumbea.

What true office of a good prince may be in a realme. Great peace and truth among the people in the daies of Edwine.

This Edwine, who first brought in the faith in the north parts continuing after his baptisme six yeares, at length was slaine in battell by Cedwalla king of the Britaines, and by wicked Penda king of the Mercians, with his son also Offricus, in the field called Hatfield.

{Anno 634}

Archbishop of Canturburie and Yorke, the one ordaineth the other.

This Paulinus was the first archbishop of Yorke, and as he was of Iustus archbishop of Canturburie ordained archbishop of the sea of Yorke, so he againe after the decease of Iustus ordained Honorius to be archbishop of Canturburie.

Paulinus after the death of godly Edwine, seeing vnmercifull Cedwalla or Cedwallon with his Britaines, and wicked Penda with the idolatrous Mercians, to spoile the land in such sort, as they made no spare neither of age nor sex, nor religion, was compelled to flie with Edelburge the queene and Eufled her daughter by water into Kent, where the said archbishop Paulinus remained bishop of Rochester the space of nineteene yeares. And so the church of Northumberland lacked a bishop for the space of thirtie yeares after. Notwithstanding he left there one James his deacon, a good man, who continued there baptising and preaching in the north parts, till that peace being recouered, and the number of the faithful encreasing, the church came againe to his stay. Hunting. lib. 3.

By meanes of this Edwine, Erpwaldus king of the Eastangles, sonne to Redwaldus aboue mentioned, was reduced to Christs faith.

Erpwaldus otherwise named Coppwaldus king of Eastangles conuerted to the faith of Christ.

After the decease of Edwine and his sonne Offride, both slaine in battell, raigned Osricus and Eanfridus, the one in Deira, the other in Bernicia. Osricus was the sonne of Elfricus which was brother to Ethelfride. Eanfridus was the eldest sonne of Ethelfride, for Ethelfride had three sonnes, to wit, Eanfridus, Oswaldus, and Osricus. These two kings of Deira and Bernicia, Osricus and Eanfride, being first christened in Scotland, after being kings, returned to their idolatrie; and so in the yeares following were slaine one after the other by the foresaid Cedwalla and wicked Penda, as is in the table aboue expressed.

After whom succeeded in Northumberland, the second sonne of Ethelfride named Oswaldus, hauing rule on both the prouinces, as well Deira, as Bernicia. Whereof when the foresaid Cedwalla (or Cadwallo) the Britaine king had vnderstanding, who before had made hauoke of the Saxons, and thought to haue roted them vtterly out of England, he sent king Penda with a mightie host of the Britaines, thinking to slay also Oswald as he had before slaine his brother Eanfride, and king Edwine before them. But Oswald, when he was warned of the great strength of this Cedwall and Penda, made his prayers to God, and besought him meekely of helpe to withstand his enemie, for the saluation of his people. Thus after Oswald had prayed for the sauing of his people, the two hosts met in a field named Denesburie, some say Heuenfield, where was fought a strong battell. But finally the armie and power of Penda with Cedwall, which were farre exceeding the number of Oswalds host, was chased and most part slaine by Oswaldus, after he raigned ouer the Britaines two and twentie yeares, leauing after him a sonne, whom Gaufridus called Cadwaladrus the last king of the Britaines.

Of this Oswald much praise and commendation is written in authors for his feruent zeale in Christs religion, and mercifull pitie towards the poore, with other great vertues more. As touching the miracles of S. Oswald, what it pleased the people of that time to report of him, I haue not heere to affirme. This I find in stories certaine, that he being well and vertuously disposed to the setting forth of Christs faith and doctrine, sent into Scotland for a certaine bishop there called Aidanus, which was a famous preacher. The king at what time he was in Scotland banished, had learned the Scotish tongue perfectly: wherefore as this Aidanus preached in his Scotish tongue to the Saxons, the king himselfe interpreting that which he had said, disdained not to preach and expound the same to his nobles and subiects in the English tongue.

King Oswald disdained not to expound and preach the gospell to his people.

Moreouer, towards the poore and needie his pitie and tenderues was such, being notwithstanding of so high and princely calling, that vpon a time being then Easter day, he sitting with the said Aidanus at meat, and serued after the manner of kings in siluer: there commeth to him one of the seruiters, bringing him word that there was a great multitude of poore people sitting in the streete, which desired some almes of the king. He hearing this, commandeth not only the meat prepared for his owne table to be caried vnto them, but also taking a siluer platter which stood before him, brake it in pieces and sent it amongst them, and so relieued his poore subiects not only with the meat of his table, but with his dishes also. Aidanus the bishop seeing this & maruelling therat, taketh him by the hand, wishing and praying in this wise: This hand (saith he) I pray God may continue and neuer putrifie. What the stories say more concerning this hand of Oswald, I intend not to meddle further then simple, true, and due probability will beare me out.

In those daies and partly by the meanes of the said Oswald, Kinigilsus king of the Westsarons was conuerted to Christs faith, especially through the godly labour of Berinus which was sent by pope Honorius to preach in England, and was then made bishop of Dorchester. To whom Quicelinus brother of Kinigilsus after he had also received baptisme of the said Berinus gaue to him the said citie to make there his see. Lands giuen to Winchester.

Of this Berinus, Malmesburie, Polychronicon, with diuers other writers do report a thing strange and miraculous, which if it be a fable, as no doubt it is, I cannot but maruell that so many authors so constantly agree in reporting and affirming the same: the matter is this. This Berinus being sent, as is said, by Honorius to preach in England, promiseth him to trauell to the vttermost borders thereof, and there to preach the gospell where the name of Christ was neuer heard. Thus he setting forward in his iourney, passeth through France, and so to the sea side, where he found a passage readie, and the winde serued so faire, that he was called vpon in such haste, that he had no leasure to remember himselfe to take all things with him which he had to carrie. At length as he was on the sea sayling, and almost in the middle course of his passage, remembred himselfe of a certaine relike left behind him for haste, which Honorius had giuen him at his comming out. Malmesburiensis calleth it Corporalia: Historia Iornalensis calleth it Pallulam super quam corpus Christi consecraret, which we call a corporas or such a like thing, and what else inclosed within it I cannot tell. Heere Berinus in great sorow could not tell what to do: if he should haue spoken to the heathen mariners, to turne their course backe againe, they would haue mocked him, and it had been in vaine. Wherefore as the stories write, he boldly stepped into the sea, and walking on foot backe againe, taketh with him that which was left behind, and so returneth to his companie againe, hauing not one shred of his garments wet. Of his miracle, or whether I should call it a fable rather, let the reader iudge thereof as he thinketh, because it is not written in the scripture we are not bound to beleeue it. But if it were true, it is then thought to be wrought of God, not for any holinesse in the man or in the corporas, but a speciall gift for the conuersion of the heathen, for whose saluation God suffereth oft many wonders to be done. This Berinus being receiued in the ship againe with a great admiration of the mariners, being therewith conuerted and baptised, was driuen at last by the weather to the coast of the Westsarons, where Kinigilsus and his brother Quicelinus aboue mentioned did raigne. Which two kings the same time by the preaching of Berinus were conuerted and made christian men, with the people of the countrie, being before rude and barbarous. It hapned the same time when the foresaid kings should be christened, that Oswaldus (mentioned a little before) king of Northumberland, was then present, and the same day married Kinigilsus his daughter, and also was godfather to the king.

Hunting. lib. 2. Berinus walking on the sea, with lie and all.

Oswaldus godfather and son in law to Kinigilsus, and all in one day.

Thus Oswald after he had raigned nine yeares in such holinesse and perfectnesse of life, as is aboue specified, was slaine at length in the field called Maxfield by wicked Penda, king of the Mercians: which Penda at length after all his tyrannie was ouercome and slaine by Alswie brother to Oswald, next king after Oswald of Northumberland, notwithstanding hee had thrice the people which Oswie had. This Penda being a paynim, had three sonnes, Wolferus, Weda, and Egfridus. To this second sonne Weda, Oswie had before time married his daughter by consent of Penda his father: the which Weda by helpe of Oswie was made king of Southmercia, the which lordship is seuered from Northmercia by the riuer of Trent.

The same Weda moreouer, at what time he married the daughter of Oswie, promised to him that he would become a christian man: which thing he performed after the death of Penda his father, but afterwards within three yeeres of his raigne, he was by reason of his wife slaine. And after him the kingdom fell to Wolferus the other brother, who being wedded to Ermenilda daughter of Ercombert king of Kent, was shortly after christened; so that he is accounted the first christened king of Mercia. This Wolferus conquered Kenwalcus king of Kent, and gat the Ile of Wight, which after he gaue to Sigbert king of the Eastangles, vpon condition he would be christened. And thus the Eastangles which before had expulsed Melitus their bishop, as is declared, recouered againe the christian faith vnder Sigbert their king, who by the meanes of the foresaid Wolferus was reduced and baptised by Finianus the bishop.

But to returne againe to Oswie, from whom we haue a little digressed, of whom we shewed before how he succeeded after Oswald in the prouince of Bernicia, to whom also was ioyned Oswine his cosin ouer the prouince of Deira, and there, with his fellow Oswie raigned the space of seuen yeares. This Oswine was gentle and liberall to his people, and no lesse deuout toward God: who vpon a time had giuen to Aidanus the bishop aboue mentioned, a princely horse with the trappers, and all that appertained thereto, because he should not so much trauell on foot, but sometimes ease himselfe withall. Thus Aidanus the Scotish bishop as he was riding vpon his kingly horse, by the way meeteth him a certaine poore man asking and craning his charity. Aidanus hauing nothing else to giue him, lighted downe, and giueth to him his horse trapped and garnished as he was. The king vnderstanding this, and not contented therewith, as he was entring to dinner with the said Aidanus: What ment you father bishop (said he) to giue away my horse I gaue you vnto the begger? Had not I other horses in my stable that might haue serued him well enough, but you must giue away that which of purpose was picked out for you amongst the chiefest? To whom the bishop made answere againe saying or rather rebuking the king: What be these words (O king said he) that you speake? Why set you more price by an horse, which is but the fole of an horse, then you do by him which is the sonne of Marie, yea which is the sonne of God? He said but this, when the king forthwith vngirding his sword from about him (as he was then newly come in from hunting) falleth downe at the feet of the bishop, desiring him to forgiue him that, and he would neuer after speake word to him for any treasure he should afterward giue away of his. The bishop seeing the king so meekely affected, he then taking him vp, and chearing him againe with words, began shortly after to weepe and to be very heaute. His minister asking the cause thereof, Aidanus answered in his Scotish language, saying to him: I weepe (saith he) for that this king cannot liue long. This people is not worthie to haue such a prince as he is to raigne amongst them. And so as Aidanus said, it came to passe. For not long after Oswie the king of Bernicia disdaining at him, when Oswine either being not able or not willing to ioyne with him in battell, caused him trayterously to be slaine. And so Oswie with his son Egfride raigned in Northumberland alone.

In the time and also in the house of this Oswie king of Northumberland, was a certaine man named Benedict, who was the bringer vp of Bede from his youth, and tooke him to his institution when he was but seuen yeeres old, and so taught him during his life. This Benedict or Benet descending of a noble stocke and rich kin, and in good fauour with Oswie: forsooke seruice, house, and all his kindred to serue Christ, and went to Rome (where he had been in his life time fiue times) and brought from thence bookes into monasteries, with other things which he thought then to serue for deuotion. This Benedict surnamed Bishop, was the first that brought in the art and vse of glasing into this land: for before that, glasse windowes were not knowne either in churches or in houses.

In the raigne of the foresaid Oswie and Egfride his son, was Botulphus abbat, which builded in the east part of Lincolne an abbey. Also Aidanus, Finianus, and Colmannus, with three Scotish bishops of Northumberland holy men, held with the Britaines against the Romish order for the keeping of Easter day. Moreouer Cutbertus, Jarumannus, Cedda, and Wilfridus liued the same time, who as I iudge to be bishops of holy conuersation, so I thought it sufficient heere only to name them. As touching their miracles wherefore they were made saints in the popes kalender, seeing they are not written in the gospell, nor in my creed, but in certaine old chronicles of that age, so they are no matter of my faith: notwithstanding as touching their conuersation, this I reade, and also do credit, that the clergie both of Britaine and England at that time plied nothing that was worldly, but gaue them to preaching and teaching the word of our Sauiour, and followed the life that they preached by giuing of good ensample. And ouer that, as our histories accord, they were so void of couetousnesse, that they receiued no possessions or territories as was forced vpon them.

Controuersie about Easter day.

nod or councell was holden against the Britaines and the Scotish bishops, for the right obseruing of Easter at Sternehalt. At what time Agilbertus bishop of Westsaxons came to Northumberland, to institute Wilfride abbat of Ripon, where this question for Easter day began to be moued: For Colman then bishop of Northumberland followed not the custome of Rome nor of the Saxons, but followed the Britaines and the Scotish bishops his predecessours in the same see before. Thus on the one side was Colman the archbishop of Yorke, and Hilda the abbesse of Sternhalt, which alledged for them the doings and examples of their predecessours, both godly and reuerend bishops, as Aidanus, Finianus, archbishops of that see of Yorke before them, and diuers more, who had vsed alwaies to celebrate the Easter from the fourteenth day of the first moneth, till the eight and twentith of the same. And specially for that S. John the euangelist at Ephesus kept and obserued that day, &c. On the other side was Agilbert bishop of the Westsaxons, James the deacon of Paulinus aboue mentioned, Wilfride abbat of Ripon, and king Alfride Oswies sonne, with his queene, holding on the same side. The full contents of which disputation heere followeth, according as in the storie of Beda at large is described, with their reasons and arguments on both sides as ensueth, &c.

Ex Beda. lib. 3. cap. 23.

The question of Easter and of shauing, and other ecclesiasticall matters being moued, it was determined that in the abbey which is called Sternhalt, of the which Hilda a deuout woman was abbesse, a conuocation should be had, and this question there determined. To the which place came both the kings the father and the sonne, bishop Colman with his clergie of Scotland, Agilbert with Agathon and Wilfride priests. James and Roman were on their sides, Hilda the abbesse with her companie was on the Scotish part, and the reuerend bishop Cedda was appointed prolocutor for both parties in that parlament. King Oswie began first with an oration, declaring that it was necessarie for such as serued one God, to liue in one vniforme order, and that such as looked for one kingdome in heauen should not differ in celebration of the heauenly Sacraments, but should rather seeke for the true tradition, and follow the same. This said, hee commanded his bishop Colman to declare what the rite and custome was in this behalfe that he vsed, and from whence it had the originall. Then Colman obeying his princes commandement, said: The Easter which I obserue, I receiued of my ancestors that sent me hither a bishop, the which all our forefathers being men of God did celebrat in like manner: and lest it should be contemned or despised of any man, it is manifestly apparant to be the verie same which the holy euangelist S. John (a disciple especially beloued of the Lord) did accustomablie vse in all churches and congregations where he had authoritie. When Colman had spoken many things to this effect, the king commanded Agilbert to declare his opinion in this behalfe, and to shew the order that he then vsed, from whence it came, and by what authoritie he obserued the same. Agilbert requested the king that his scholar Wilfride a priest, might speake for him, in as much as they both with the rest of his clergie were of one opinion herein, and that the said Wilfride could vtter his mind better and more plainly in the English tongue then hee himselfe could. Then Wilfride at the kings commandement began on this sort and said: The Easter which we keepe, we haue seene at Rome, where as the holy apostles Peter and Paul did liue and teach, did suffer and were buried. The same also is vsed in Italie and in France, the which countries we haue trauelled for learning, and haue noted it to be celebrated of them all. In Asia also and in Affrike, in Egypt and in Greece, and finally in all the world, the same maner of Easter is obserued that we vse, saue only by these heere present with their accomplices, the Picts and the Britaines: with the which two (and yet not altogether agreeing) they condescend and striue foolishly in this order against the vniuersall world. To whom Colman replied, saying: I maruell you will call this order foolish, that so great an apostle as was worthie to lie in the Lords lap, did vse, whom all the world doth well know to haue liued most wisely. And Wilfride answered, God forbid that I should reproue S. John of folly who kept the rites of Moses law according to the letter (the church being yet Jewish in many points) and the apostles not as yet able to abdicat all the obseruations of the law before ordained. As for example, they could not reiect images inuented of the diuell, the which all men that beleeue on Christ ought of necessitie to forsake and detest, lest they should be an offence to those Jewes that were amongst the Gentiles. For this cause did S. Paul circumcise Timothe, for this cause did he sacrifice in the temple, and did shaue his head with Aquila and Priscilla at Corinth: all which things were done to none other purpose then to eschew the offence of the Jewes. Hereupon also said James to Paul. Thou seest brother how many thousand Jewes do beleeue, and all these be zealous (notwithstanding) of the law. Yet seeing the gospell is so manifestly preached in the world, it is not lawfull for the faithfull to be circumcised, neither to offer sacrifice of carnall things to God. Therefore John according to the custome of the law, the fourteenth day of the first month at euening, did begin the celebration of the feast of Easter, nothing respecting whether it were celebrated in the Sabbath, or in any other festall day. But Peter when he preached at Rome, remembring that the Lord did arise from death on the first day after the sabbath, giuing thereby an hope to the world of the resurrection, thought good to institute Easter on that day, and not after the vse and precepts of the law (that was) the fourteenth day of the first month: euen so John looking for the mone at night, if it did arise, and the next day after were sunday, which then was called the sabbath, then did he celebrate the Easter of the Lord in the euening, like as we vse to do euen at this day. But if sunday were not the next day after the fourteenth day, but fell on the sixteenth day, or seuentéenth, or on any other day vnto the one and twentith, he taried alwaies for it, and did begin the holy solemnitie of Easter on the euening next before the sabbath. And so it came to passe, that Easter was alwaies kept on the sunday, and was not celebrated but from the fifteenth day vnto the one and twentith: neither doth this tradition of the apostle breake the law, but fulfill the same. In the which it is to be noted, that Easter was instituted from the fourteenth day of the first month at euening, vnto the one and twentith day of the same month at euening, the which maner all S. Johns successors in Asia after his death did follow, and the catholike church throughout the whole world. And that this is the true Easter, and only of all christians to be obserued, it was not newly decréed, but confirmed by the councell of Nice, as appeareth by the ecclesiasticall history. Whereupon it is manifest that you (Colman) doe neither follow the example of S. John, as yée thinke, nor of S. Peter, whose tradition you do willingly refuse, nor of the church, nor yet of the gospell, in the celebration of Easter. For S. John obseruing Easter according to y precepts of the law, kept it not on the first day after the sabbath; but you precisely keepe it only on the first day after the sabbath. Peter did celebrat Easter from the fifteenth day of the mone to the one and twentith day, but you keep Easter from the fourteenth vnto the twentith day; so that you begin Easter oftentimes the thirteenth day at night, of which maner neither the law nor the gospell maketh any mention. But the Lord in the fourteenth day either did eat the old passeouer at night, or else did celebrat the sacraments of the new testament in the remembrance of his death and passion. You do also vtterly reiect from the celebration of Easter the one and twentith day, the which the law hath chiefly willed to be obserued: and therefore as I said, in the keeping of Easter, you neither agree with S. John, nor with Peter, nor with the law, nor yet with the gospel. Then Colman againe answered to these things, saying: Did then Anatholius a godly man and one much commended in the foresaid ecclesiasticall storie against the law and the gospell, who writeth that the Easter was to be kept from the fourteenth day vnto the twentith? Or shall we thinke that Columba our reuerend father and his successors being men of God, who obserued the Easter after this maner, did against the holy scripture? Whereas some of them were men of such godlinesse and vertue, as was declared by their wondefull miracles. And I hereby (nothing doubting of their holinesse) do indeuour to follow their life, order and discipline. Then said Wilfride: It is certaine that Anatholius was both a godly and a learned man, and worthie of great commendation; but what haue you to do with him seeing you obserue not his order? For he following the true rule in keeping his Easter, obserueth the circle of nineteene yeares; the which either you know not, or if you do, you contemne the common order obserued in the vniuersal church of Christ. And moreouer, the said Anatholius doth so count the fourteenth day in the obseruation of Easter, as he confesseth the same to be the fifteenth day at night after the maner of the Egyptians, and likewise noteth the twentith day to be in the feast of Easter, the one and twentith in the euening: the which distinction that you know not, by this may appeare, for that you keepe the Easter on the thirteenth day before the full mone. Or otherwise I can answere you touching your father Columba and his successours, whose order you say you follow, moued thereto by their miracles. on this wise: that the Lord will answere to many that shall say in the day of iudgement, that in his name they haue prophesied and cast out diuels, and haue done many miracles, &c: that he neuer knew them. But God forbid that I should say so of your fathers, because it is much better to beleeue well of those we know not, then ill. Whereupon I denie not but they were the seruants of God, and holy men, which loued the Lord of a good intent, though of a rude simplicitie: and I thinke that the order which they vsed in the Easter, did not much hurt them, so long as they had none amongst them that could shew them the right obseruation of the same for them to follow. For I thinke, if the truth had been declared vnto them, they would as well haue receiued it in this matter as they did in others. But you and your fellowes if you refuse the order of the apostolicall sée, or rather of the vniuersall church, which is confirmed by the holy scripture; without all doubt you do sinne. And though your forefathers were holie men, * what is their seruice being but a corner of an Iland, to bee preferred before the vniuersall church of Jesus Christ dispersed throughout the whole world? And if Columba your father (and ours also being of Christ Jesus) were mightie in miracles, is hee therefore to be preferred before the prince of the holy apostles?

To whom the Lord said, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it, and I will giue thée the keyes of the kingdome of heauen.

Wilfride hauing thus ended his argument, the king said to Colman: Is it true that the Lord spake these things to S. Peter? And Colman answered, Yea. Then said the king: Can you declare any thing that the Lord gaue to Colman? Colman answered, No. Then quoth the king, Do both of you agrée and consent in this matter without any controuersie, and that these words were principally spoken to Peter, and that the Lord gaue him the keyes of the kingdome of heauen? And they both answered, Yea. Then concluded the king on this wise: For so much as S. Peter is the doore keeper of heauen, I will not gainesay him: but in that I am able, I will obey his orders in euery point, lest when I come to the gates of heauen, he shut them against me.

The king concludeth.

Upon this simple and rude reason of the king, the multitude assented, and with them also Cedda was contented to giue ouer: only Colman the Scot being then archbishop of Yorke, in displeasure left the realme, and departed into Scotland, carying with him the bones of Aidanus. Bed. lib. 3. cap. 25. And thus much concerning this matter of Easter.

Egfride or Edfrids of Northumberland.

After the decease of Oswie, Egfride his sonne was king after him in Northumberland fiftéene yeares. By this Egfride Cutbert was promoted to the bishoprike of the Ile of Farne: and Wilfride which before had béen archbishop of Yorke, was displaced through the meanes of Theodore archbishop of Canturburie, and Cedda possessed that sée. Wilfride when he was put out, went to Rome and complained of him to Agathon the bishop, and was well allowed in some things. But the king and Theodorus had there such proctors and friends, that he returned without speeding of his cause. Wherefore he returned into the Southsaxons, and builded an abbey in Sileseie, and preached vnto the Southsaxons fiftéene yeares. The king of the Southsaxons at ẏ time was Etheluold, to whom he declared a little before that Wolferus king of the Mercians gaue the Ile of Wight vpon condition that he would be christened, and so was baptised by Berinus: the said Wolferus being his godfather, and sonne in law, both in one day. Wherefore Wolferus now being licenced by Etheluold the king, preached vnto his nobles and people of Southsax, and conuerted them to Christ. In the time of whose baptising, the raine which before they lacked three yeares together, was giuen them plentifully, whereby their great famine slaked, and the countrie was made fruitfull, which before was dried vp with barrennes: in so much that (as in some stories is said) the people penured with famine, would go forth together vpon the rockes by the sea side, and taking hands together would throw themselues downe to the sea. Moreouer, where they lacked before the art of fishing, the foresaid Wilfride taught them how with nets to fish.

After Egfride who was slaine in the straits of Scotland, next succéeded Alfride his brother, and bastard sonne to Oswie, and raigned eightéene or nineteene yeares in Northumberland. This Alfride restored againe the foresaid Wilfride to the sée of Yorke, whom his brother had before expelled, and put in Cedda. Notwithstanding, the same king within fiue yeares after, expulsed the said Wilfride againe, and so went he to Rome. But at length by Osrike his successor was placed againe, the archbishop of Yorke, and Cedda was ordained by Theodorus bishop of Mercia. The which prouince of Mercia, the said Theodorus archbishop of Canturburie by the authoritie of the synod holden at Hatfield, did after diuide into fiue bishoprikes: that is, one to Chester, the second to Worcester, the third to Lichfield, the fourth to Cederna in Lindsey, the fift to Dorchester, which was after translated to Lincolne.

Néere about this time in the yéere of our Lord 666, the detestable sect of Mahumet began to take strength and place. Although Polychronicon differing a little in yeares, accounteth the beginning of this sect somewhat before, but the most diligent searchers of them which write now, refer it to this yeare, which well agréeth with the number of that beast signified in the Apocalypse, χξϛ. that is, 666. Of this Mahumet came the kingdome of Agarens (whom he after named Saracens) to whom he gaue sundrie lawes, patched of many sects and religions together: he taught them to pray euer to the south: and as we kéepe the sunday, so they kéepe the friday, which they call the day of Uenus. Hée permitted them to haue as many wiues as they were able to maintaine, to haue as manie concubines as they list, to abstaine from the vse of wine, except on certaine solemne daies in the yeare, to haue and worship only one God omnipotent, saying that Moses and the prophets were great men, but Christ was greater, and greatest of all the prophets, as being borne of the virgin Marie by the power of God, without mans séed, and at last was taken vp to heauen, but was not slaine, but another in his likenesse for him, with many other wicked blasphemies in his law contained. At length this kingdoms of the Saracens began to be conquered of the Turkes, and in processe of time wholy subdued to them.

Apoc. 13.

Anno 666

Ex Polychron. Ex Giraldo Cambrensi. Ex Stephano Cantuariensi.

But now to returne againe to the time of our English Saxons. In this meane season Theodorus was sent from Italie into England by Vitellianus the pope, to be archbishop of Canturburie, and with him diuers other monkes of Italie to set vp héere in England Latine seruice, masses, ceremonies, letanies, with such other Romish ware, &c. This Theodorus being made archbishop and metropolitan of Canturburie, began to play the rer, placing and displacing the bishops at his pleasure. As for Cedda and Wilfride archbishops of Yorke, he thrust them both out, vnder the pretence that they were not lawfullie consecrated, notwithstanding they were sufficiently authorised by their kings, and were placed against their wils. Wherefore Wilfride, as is before touched, went vp to Rome, but could haue no redresse of his cause. Yet to shew what modestie this Wilfride vsed against his enemie being so violently molested as he was, because the words of his complaint are expressed in William Malmesburie, I thought héere to expresse the same both for the commendation of the partie, and also for the good example of others, in case any such be, whom good examples will moue to well doing. This Wilfride therefore hauing such iniurie and violence offered vnto him by the hands of Theodore, although he had iust cause to do his vttermost: yet in prosecuting his complaint, how he temperd himselfe, what words of modestie hée vsed, rather to defend his innocencie, then to impugne his aduersarie, by this his suggestion offered vp to the bishop of Rome may appeare, whose words in effect were these: Quid autem acciderit, vt Theodorus sanctiss. archiepiscopus (me superstite in sede, quam licèt indignus dispensabam) absque consensu cuiuslibet episcopi ex sua autoritate (mea humilitate non acquiescente) ordinauit tres episcopos: omittere magis quàm vrgere, pro eiusdem viri reuerentia, condecet. Quem quidem, pro eo quòd ab hac apostolicæ sedis summitate directus est, accusare non audeo, &c. In English: How it chanceth that Theodorus the most holy and reuerend archbishop (my selfe being aliue in the sée, which I though vnworthie did rule and dispose) hath of his owne authoritie without the consent of any bishop (neither hauing my simple voice agreeing to the same) ordained three bishops, I had rather passe ouer in silence, then to stir any further therein, because of the reuerence of that man, and no lesse thought I it my dutie so to do. The which man for that he hath been directed by this sée apostolicall, I will not nor dare not héere accuse, &c. Thus the cause of the said Wilfride albeit it was sufficiently knowne in the court of Rome, to be well allowed for iust and innocent, yet it was not then redressed. In such estimation was this Theodorus then among the Romans. Upon this controuersie of these two bishops I may well héere inser the words of W. Malmesburie not vnworthie in my mind to be noted, which be these in his Latine storie: Vbi videri & doleri potest humana miseria, quòd videlicet quantumlibet quis sanctitate polleat, non ad plenum peruicaces mores exuat, &c. That is: In the which Theodore (saith he) the weake and miserable infirmitie of man may be séene and also lamented; considering, that although a man be neuer so holy, yet in the same man is some thing, whereby it may be perceiued that he hath not vtterly put off all his stubborne conditions, &c.

In the time of this Theodorus, and by the meanes of him, a prouinciall synod was holden at Thetford, mentioned in the storie of Bede: the principall contents whereof were these.

First, that Easter day should be vniformelie kept and obserued through the whole realme, vpon one certaine day, videlicet prima, 14. Luna mensis primi. 1

Secondly, that no bishop should intermeddle within the diocesse of another. 2

Thirdly, that monasteries consecrated vnto God, should be exempt and free from the iurisdiction of the bishops. 3

Fourthly, that the monkes should not stray from one place (that is) from one monasterie to another, without the licence of his abbat: also to kéepe the same obedience which they promised at their first entring. 4

Fiftly, that no clergieman should forsake his owne bishop, and to be receiued in any other place, without letters commendatarie of his owne bishop. 5

Sixtly, that forren bishops and clergiemen comming into the realme, should be content only with the benefit of such hospitalitie, as should be offered them: neither should intermeddle any further within the precinct of any bishop, without his speciall permission. 6

Seuenthly, that synods prouinciall should be kept within the realme at least once a yeare. 7

Eightly, that no bishop should preser himselfe before another, but must obserue the time and order of his consecration. 8

Ninthly, that the number of bishops should be augmented, as the number of the people encreaseth. 9

Tenthly, that no marriage should be admitted, but that which was lawfull, no incest to be suffered, neither any man to put away his wife for any cause, except only for fornication, after the rule of the Gospell. And these be the principall chapters of that synod, &c. 10

In the next yeare following was the first generall councell kept kept at Constance, whereat this Theodore was also present vnder pope Agatho, where mariage was permitted to Greeke priests, and forbidden to the Latine. In this councell the Latine masse was first openly said by John Portuensis the popes legat, before the patriarch and princes at Constantinople, in the temple of S. Sophie.

In the time and raigne of these foure kings of Northumberland, king Iua or Inas raigned in Westsax, who succeeding after Cadwallader, the last king of Britains, began his raigne about the yeare of the Lord, 689. and raigned with great valiantnesse ouer the Westsaxons the terme of 37. yeares. About the first yeare of the raigne of this Iua, or Iue, Polychronicon and other make mention of one Cuthlacus, whom they cal S. Cuthlake a confessor, who about the foure and twentith yeere of his age renouncing the pompe of the world, professed himselfe a monke in the abbey of Repindon, and the third yeere after went to Crowland, where he led the life of an anchor. In the which ile and place of his burying was builded a faire abbey called afterward for the great resort and gentle intertainment of strangers, Crowland the courteous. But why this Cuthlake should be sainted for his doings, I see no great cause; as neither do I thinke the fabulous miracles reported of him to be true: as where the vulgar people are made to beleue, that he inclosed the diuell in a boiling pot, and caused wicked spirits to erect vp houses, with such other fables and lying miracles. Among which lying miracles also may be reckoned that which the stories mention in the eleuenth yeare of the raigne of Iua, to be done of one Withwald or Widthelme: who being dead a long season, was restored to life againe, and told many wonders of strange things that he had seene, causing thereby great almes and deeds of charitie to be done of the people: and so the disposing of his goods giuen in three parts, went to the abbey of Malmsbury, where he continued the rest of his life.

Moreouer, about the sixteenth yeare of the said Iua, Ethelred king of Mercia, after he had there raigned thirtie yeares, was made a monke, and after abbat of Bardney.

King Ethelred made abbat of Bardney.

And about the eightéenth yeare of the raigne of Iue, died the worthie and learned bishop Adelmus, first abbat of Malmesburie, afterwards bishop of Schirborne, of whom William Malmesburie writeth plentiously with great commendation, and that not vnworthily as I suppose: especially for the notable praise of learning and vertue in him aboue the rest of that time (next after Bede) as the great number of bookes and epistles with poems by him set forth, will declare. Although concerning the miracles which the said author ascribeth to him; as first in causing an infant of nine daies old to speake at Rome, to cleare pope Sergius, which was then suspected the father of the said child. Also in hanging his casule vpon the sun-beames. Item, in making whole the altar stone of marble brought from Rome. Item in drawing a length one of the timber pieces which went to the building of the temple in Malmesburie. Item in sauing the mariners at Douer, &c. As concerning these and such other miracles, which William Malmesburie to him attributeth, I cannot consent to him therein: but thinke rather the same to be monkish deuices, forged vpon their patrons to maintaine the dignitie of their houses. And as the author was deceiued (no doubt) in beleeuing such fables himselfe, so may hée likewise deceiue vs through the dexteritie of his stile and fine handling of the matter, but that further experience hath taught the world now adaies more wisedome, in not beleeuing such practises. This Adelmus was bishop of Schirborne, which sée after was vnited to the sée of Winton. In which church of Winchester the like miracles also are to be read of bishop Adelwold, and S. Swithune, whom they haue canonized likewise for a saint.

Moreouer, neere about the fiue and twentith of Iue, by the report of Bede, S. John of Beuerley which was then bishop of Yorke died, and was buried at the porch of the minster of Beuerlay or Beuerley. In the which porch it is recorded in some chronicles, that as the said John vpon a time was praying, being in the porch of S. Michael in Yorke, the holy Ghost in the similitude of a doue sate before him vpon the altar, in brightnesse shining aboue the sun. This brightnesse being séene of others, first commeth one of his deacons running vnto the porch, who beholding the bishop there standing in his prayers, and all the place replenished with the holy Ghost, was stricken with the light thereof, hauing all his face burnt as it were with hot burning fire. Notwithstanding the bishop by and by cured the face of his deacon againe, charging him (as the storie saith) not to publish what he had séene during his life time, &c. Which tale séemeth as true as that we reade about the same time done of S. Egwine, in Polychron. abbat of Euesham, and bishop of Worcester (then called Wicts) who vpon a time when he had fettered both his feet in irons, fast locked for certaine sinnes done in his youth, and had cast the key thereof into the sea, afterward

Ranulphus in Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 23.

But to leaue these monkish phantasies, and returne to the right course againe of the storie. In the time of this foresaid Iue began first the right obseruing of Easter day to be kept of the Picts and of the Britaines. In the obseruation of which day (as is largely set forth in Bede and Polychronicon, lib. 5. cap. 17. and 22.) three things are necessarie to be obserued. First the full moone of the first month, that is, of the month of March: secondly, the dominicall letter; thirdly, the equinoctiall day, which equinoctiall was wont to be counted in the east church, and especially among the Egyptians, to be about the seuentéenth day of March. So that the full moone either on the equinoctiall day, or after the equinoctiall day being obserued, the next dominicall day following that full moone, is to be taken for Easter day. Wherein is diligently to be noted two things: First, the fulnesse of the moone must be perfectly full, so that it be the beginning of the third weeke of the moone, which is the fourtéenth or fiftéenth day of the moone: secondly is to be noted, that the said perfect fulnesse of the moone beginning the third weeke, must happen either in the verie euening of the equinoctiall day, or after the equinoctiall day: for else if it happen either on the equinoctiall day before the euening, or before the equinoctiall day, then it belongeth to the last month of the last yeare, and not to the first month of the first yeare, and so serueth not to be obserued.

Beda lib. 5. de gestis Angl. Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 22.

A generall rule seruing for the obseruation of Easter day.

This rule of Easter seemeth to be taken out of the booke of Numbers: And they going out of Rameses the fifteenth day of the first month, the next day after held their Easter, &c.

This rite and vsage in keeping Easter day being receiued in the Latie church, began now to take place among the Picts and Britaines, through the busie trauell of Theodorus Cuthlacus, but namely of Elbert the holy monke, as they learne him: and of Colfrid abbat of Sirwin in Northumberland, which wrote to Narcanus, or Naitonus the king of Piits, concerning the same: who also among other things writeth of the shauen crownes of priests, saying: that it was as necessarie for the vow of a monke, or degrée of a priest, to haue a shauen crowne for restraint of their lust; as for any christian man to bleese him against spirits, when they come vpon him. Beda, li. 5. The copie of which letter as it is in Beda, I haue heere annexed, not for any great reason therein contained, but only to delight the reader with some pastime, in séeing the fond ignorance of that monkish age: the copie of the letter thus proceeded.

Why priests crownes were shauen.

Beda de gest. lib. 5.

Of the shauing of priests, out of the fift booke of Beda the 21. chapter.

The copie of a monkish letter of Elfride to king Naiton for the shauing of priests crownes.

COncerning the shauing of priests (whereof you write also vnto me) I exhort you that it be decently obserued according to the christian faith. We are not ignorant that the apostles were not all shauen after one maner, neither doth the catholike church at this day agrée in one vniforme maner of shauing, as they do in faith, hope, and charitie. Let vs consider the former time of the patriarchs, and we shall find that Job (an example of patience) euen in the verie point of his afflictions, did shaue his head: and he proueth also; that in the time of his prosperitie, he vsed to let his haire grow. And Joseph an excellent doctor and executour of chastitie, humilitie, pietie and other vertues, when he was deliuered out of prison and seruitude, was shauen: whereby it appeareth that whilest he abode in prison he was vnshauen. Behold both these being men of God, did vse an order in the habit of their bodie one contrarie to the other, whose consciences notwithstanding within did well agree in the like grace of vertues. But to speake truely and freely, the difference of shauing hurteth not such as haue a pure faith in the Lord, and sincere charitie towards their neighbour: especiallie for that there was neuer any controuersie amongst the catholike fathers about the diuersitie thereof, as there hath been of the difference of the celebration of Easter and of faith. But of all these shauings that wee find either in the church or elsewhere, there is none in mine opinion so much to be followed and embraced, as that which he vsed on his head, to whom the Lord said; Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it, and I will giue thee the keyes of the kingdome of heauen. And contrariewise, there is no shauing so much to be abhorred and detested as that which he vsed, to whom the same Saint Peter said; Thy money be with thee to thy destruction, because thou thinkest to possesse the gift of God by thy money, therefore thy part and lot is not in this word. Neither ought we to be shauen on the crowne only because Saint Peter was so shauen, but because Peter was so shauen in the remembrance of the Lords passion: therefore we that desire by the same passion to be saued, must weare the signe of the same passion with him vpon the top of our head, which is the highest part of our bodie. For as euery church that is made a church by the death of the Sauiour, doth vse to beare the signe of the holy crosse in the front, that it may the better by the defence of that banner, be kept from the inuasions of euill spirits; and by the often admonition thereof is taught to crucifie the flesh with the concupiscence of the same: in like maner it behoueth such as haue the vowes of monkes and degrées of the clergie, to bind themselues with a stricter bit of continencie for the Lords sake.

Much said, nothing proued.

Diuersitie of rites hurteth not the church.

See how these shauelings would father their shauing vpon Peter, which is neither found in scripture, nor in any approued storie, but only in painted clothes.

Why priests and monkes be shauen in the crowne.

The shauing of the crowne what it representeth.

How doth the signe of the crosse defend churches from euill spirits, when it cannot keep them from euill priests?

If shauing of the crowne doth teach men patience in suffering, how commeth it that we see none more waspish and vnfruitfull then these shorne generations of monkish vipers?

And as the Lord bare a crowne of thorne on his head in his passion, whereby he tooke and caried away from vs the thornes and prickes of our sinnes, so must euery one of vs by shauing our heads, patiently beare and willingly suffer the mockes and scornes of the world for his sake, that we may receiue the crowne of eternall life, which God hath promised to all that loue him, and shall by shauing their corporall crownes beare the aduersitie, and contemne the prosperitie of this world. But the shauing which Simon Magus vsed, what faithfull man doth not detest together with his magicall art? The which at the first appearance hath a shew of a shauen crowne, but if you marke his necke, you shall find it curtailed in such wise, as you will say it is rather meet to be vsed of the Simonists then of the christians. And such (of folish men) be thought worthie of the glorie of the eternall crowne, whereas indeed for their ill liuing they are worthie not only to be depriued of the same, but also of eternall saluation. I speake not this against them that vse this kind of shauing, and liue catholikely in faith and good workes, but surely I beléeue there be diuers of them be verie holy and godly men; amongst the which is Adamnan the abbat and worthie priest of the Columbians: who when he came embassadour from his countrie vnto king Alfride, desired greatly to see our monasterie: where he declared a wonderfull wisdome, humilitie and religion both in his maners and words. Amongst other talke I asked him, why he that did beléeue to come to the crowne of life that should neuer haue end, did vse contrarie to his beliefe a definit image of a crowne on his head? And if you seeke (quoth I) the fellowship of S. Peter, why do you vse the fashion of his crowne whom S. Peter did accurse, and not of his rather with whom you desire to liue eternally? Adamnan answered, saying; You know right well brother, though I vse Simons maner of shauing, after the custome of my countrie, yet do I detest and with all my heart abhorre his infidelitie. I desire notwithstanding to imitate the footsteps of the holy apostle as farre forth as my power will extend. Then said I, I beléeue it is so; but then is it apparant you imitate those things which the apostle Peter did from the bottome of your heart, if you vse the same vpon your face that you know hée did: for I suppose your wisdome vnderstandeth that it is right decent to differ in the trimming your face or shauing, from his whom in your heart you abhorre. And contrariwise, as you desire to imitate the doings of him whom you desire to haue a * mediator for betweene God and you, so it is meet you imitate the maner of his apparell and shauing. Thus much said I to Adamnan, who seemed then well to like our churches: in so much that hée returning into Scotland, reformed many of his churches there after our celebration, albeit he could not doe so amongst the monkes with whom he had speciall authoritie. He endeuoured also to haue reformed their maner of shauing if he had been able. And now (O king) I exhort your maiestie to labour together with your people, ouer whom the king of kings and Lord of lords hath made you gouernour, to imitate likewise in all these points the catholike and apostolicall churches. So shall it come to passe that in the end of this your temporall kingdome, the most blessed prince of the apostles shall open you the gates of the heauenly kingdome, together with the other elect of God. The grace of the eternall king preserue you most dearely beloued sonne in Christ long time to raigne ouer vs, to the great tranquillitie of vs all.

The shauing of Simon Magus shauen, as he saith.

The difference betweene the shauing of Peter and Simon Magus.

In outward habit christians ought not to resemble wicked doers.

* There is but one mediatour betweene God and man, Christ Iesus.

The Scotish monkes and the English monks differed in their shauing.

If Peter shall set in the elect of God into heauen, Christ the sonne reigneth in little stead.

When this letter was read before king Naiton with other of his learned men, and diligently translated into his proper language, he séemed to reioyce very much at the exhortation thereof, in so much as rising vp from among his noble men, he kneeled on the ground, and gaue God thankes that he had deserued to receiue so worthie a present out of England, and so caused it forthwith by publike proclamation to be written out, learned, and obserued throughout all the prouinces of the Picts, defacing the errors that had been vsed there by the space of 704. yeares. For all the ministers of the altar and all monkes were shauen on the crowne, and all the people reioyced for the new discipline of the most blessed prince of the apostle S. Peter which they had receiued.

¶ By this monkish letter aboue prefixed, void of all scripture, of all probation and truth of history, thou mayest note gentle reader, how this vaine tradition of shauen crownes hath come vp, and vpon how light and trifling occasion: which in very déed was none other but the dreaming phantasies of monkes of that time, falsely grounded vpon the example of Peter, when by no old monument of any ancient record they can neuer proue, either Peter or Simon Magus to haue been shauen. Moreouer in the said letter also is to be noted, how the Scotish clergie at that season, did weare no such priestly crowns as our English churchmen then did.

A note to admonish the reader.

But to cut off this matter of shauing, more worthie to be laughed at then to be storied, let vs now againe returne where as we left at king Iue, of whom Wl. Malmesburie and Fabian in his chronicle do record, that when the foresaid Iue had ruled the Westsaxons by the terme of 37. yeares, by the importunat persuasion and subtill policie of his wife Ethelburga, was allured to go to Rome, there to be made a monk. Which Ethelburga after she had a long time labored him to leaue the world, and could not bring about her purpose; vpon a season when the king and she had rested them in a faire palace richly behanged, and were vpon the morrow thence departed; she by her commandement caused the palace to be replenished with all kind of filth and dung, and hogs and vile beasts therein to be laid, as well in the chambers as other houses of office; and in their owne chamber where they did lie, there was a sow laid with her yong pigs. And when she knew that this palace was thus deformed, being a certaine space out of the towne, she besought the king to visit the said palace. And when she had brought him thereunto, she said to him: I pray you my lord behold now this house, where are now the rich tapets and clothes of gold and silke, and other rich apparell, that we left héere this other day? And where be the delicacies and pleasant seruitors, and costly dishes, that you and I lately were serued with? Be not all these passed and gone? My lord (saith she) in like maner shall we vanish away, as suddenly as you see these worldly things be passed. And our bodies, which now be delicatly kept, shall fall and turne into the filth of the earth. Wherefore haue in mind my words that beforetime to you I haue often shewed and told, and busie you to purchase that palace that euer shall indure in ioy without transmutation.

Anno 724

Ethelburga the queene persuadeth her husband to be a monke.

The craftie head of a woman.

By meanes of these words and other, the queene turned so the kings mind, that shortly after he resigned the gouernance of his kingdome vnto Ethelardus his nephew; and for the loue of Christ tooke on him the habit of a poore man, and setting apart all the pompe and pride of this wicked world, associated himselfe in the fellowship of poore men, and trauelled to Rome with great deuotion, when he had been king of Westsarons (as before is said) thirtie seuen yeares. After whose departing, the said Ethelburga his wife went vnto Barking, seuen miles from London, where in the nunrie of Barking, before of Erkenwald founded, she continued and ended the rest of her life, when shée had béen abbesse of the place a certaine time. The said Malmesburie in his storie also testifieth, that this Iue was the first king that granted a penie of euery fire house through his dominion to be paid vnto the court of Rome, which afterward was called Romescot, or Peterpence, and long after was paid in many places of England.

King Iue resigning his kingdome, went to Rome and became a monk.

Ethelburga the queene made nun of Barking.

Peterpence first granted and paid to Rome.

This Iue, like as for his time he was worthie and valiant in his acts; so was he the first of the Saxon kings (that I reade of) which set forth any lawes to his countrie: the rehearsall of which lawes, to the number of foure score and odde, were not vnprofitable héere to be inserted together, with other lawes of the Westsaxon kings after him, before the time of William the Conquerour; in case it were not for the length and prolixitie of this present volume. And thus much concerning the raigne of king Iue, king of the Westsarons by the way. Now to repaire againe to the course of Northumberland kings something intermitted.

The lawes made by king Iue to his people.

Next vnto the foresaid Osricus, followed Celulfus, whom he had adopted, brother to Kenred aboue specified. This Celulfus, as he was himselfe learned, so were in his time diuers learned men then flourishing in England, among whom was Beda, who vnto the same king Celulfus offered his storie intituled Anglorum historia, not only to be ratified by his authoritie, but also to be amended, as Malmesburiensis writeth, by his knowledge and learning.

Celulfus king of Northumberland.

Beda.

And for so much as I haue héere entred into the mention of Beda, a man of worthie and venerable memorie, because of the certifying of the truth of that man; and for that I sée al writers (as touching his life) do not agrée, some saying that he was no Englishman borne: I thought so much to report of him, as I find by his owne words testified of himselfe in the latter end of his ecclesiastical history of England, offered to the said Celulfus aboue mentioned; the words of whom be these:

Anno 729

The life of Beda briefely described.

Thus much (by the helpe of God) I Beda the seruant of Christ, and priest of the monasterie of Peter and Paul at Wire, haue compiled and digested concerning the Britaine historie. And so the same Beda proceeding further in his narration, declareth that he being borne in the territorie of the said monasterie, being of the age of seuen yeares, was committed of his parents and friends, to the tuition and education of Benedict (of whom aboue relation is made) and of Ceolfride abbats of the foresaid monasterie. In the which place or monastery he continuing, from that time forth, all his life long, gaue himselfe and all his whole studie to the meditating of holy scripture. What soeuer time or leasure he had from his daily seruice in the church, that he spent either in learning, or teaching, or writing something. About nineteene yeares of his age, he was made deacon, the thirtith yeare of his age he was made priest. From the which time to the age of nine and fiftie yeares, he occupied himselfe in interpreting the works of the ancient fathers for his owne vse, and the necessitie of others; and in writing of treatises: which came in all to the number of seuen and thirtie volumes, which he digested into three score and eightéene bookes.

This Benedict maister to Beda, was the first that brought in the vse of glasse windowes into England. Also the said Benedict brought from Rome with him Iohn the archchanter, who first taught in England to sing in the quire after the maner of Rome.

Some say that he went to Rome, either there to defend his bookes to be consonant to catholike doctrine: either else if they should be found faultie, to amend and correct the same, as hee should therto be commanded. Albeit the reporter of this his life dare not certainly affirme that euer he was at Rome; but that he was inuited and called thither to come, both it is manifest in in stories, and also this epistle of pope Sergius doth sufficiently prove, declaring moreouer in what price and estimation Beda was accepted, as well in the court of Rome, as in other places besides. The epistle of Sergius sent to Celfride thus proceedeth, in tenor and forme as followeth in Latine.

The number of the workes and bookes written by Beda.

The epistle of pope Sergius sent to Celfride, abbat of Wire abbie, requiring Beda to be sent vp to him to Rome, for the fame of his worthie learning.

The famous learning of Beda.

So notable and famous was the learning of this foresaid Beda, that the church of Rome (as by this letter appeareth) both stood in need of his helpe, and also required the same, about the discussing of certain causes and controuersies appertaining to learning. Moreouer, the whole Latine church at that time gaue him the maistrie in iudgement and knowledge of the holy scriptures. In all his explanations his chiefest scope and purpose did euer driue to instruct and informe his reader, simplie and without all curiousnesse of stile, in the sincere loue of God and of his neighbour. As touching the holinesse and integritie of his life, it is not to be doubted. For how could it be, that he should attend to any vicious idlenesse, or had any leasure to the same, who in reading and digesting so many volumes consumed all his whole cogitations in writing vpon the scriptures? for so hee testifieth of himselfe in the third booke vpon Samuel, saying in these words: If my treatises and expositions, saith he, bring with them no other vtilitie to the readers thereof, yet to my selfe they conduce not a little thus, that while all my studie and cogitation was set vpon them, in the meane while of the slippery inticements and vaine cogitations of this world I had little mind. Thus in this trauell of studie he continued till the age of sixtie two yeeres: at length drawing to his latter end, being sicke seuen weekes together, besides other occuppings of his mind, and other studies which he did not intermit; he translated also the gospell of S. Iohn into English. At length with great comfort of spirit departed this life, pronouncing many comfortable sayings to them that stood about him, vpon Ascension day, the same yeere when Nothelinus was instituted archbishop of Canturburie. And thus much concerning the storie of Beda.

Beda commended for integritie of life.

Anno 735

Saint Johns gospell translated into English by Beda.

Celulfus of a king made a monke.

This Celulfus king of Northumberland, afore mentioned, after he had raigned eight yeeres was made a monke in the abbie of Farne, otherwise called Lindefar, or Holie iland: where by his meanes licence was giuen to the monks of that house to drinke wine or ale, which before by the institution of Aidanus aboue mentioned, drunke nothing but milke and water. After whom succeeded Egbert his cosine, brother to Egbert (the same time being bishop of Yorke) which brought againe thither the pall that his predecessors had forgone, since the time that Paulinus had left the see & fled to Rochester, as is before declared. The said Egbert also erected a noble library in Yorke, whose example I wish other bishops now would follow.

Egbert king of Northumberland.

About the beginning of the raigne of this Egbert, was Cutbert archbishop of Canturburie, who collected a great synod of bishops and prelats, in the yeere of our Lord 747. in the moneth of September, neere to the place called Clonesho. In the which synod assembled, these decrees were enacted.

Anno 747

Ex Malmesb. lib. de gestis pontif. Anglo.

Cutbert archbishop of Canturburie.

1 First, that bishops should be more diligent in seeing to their office, and in admonishing the people of their faults.

2 That they should liue in a peaceable mind together, notwithstanding they were in place disseuered asunder.

3 That euery bishop once a yeere should goe about all the parishes of his dioceese.

4 That the said bishops euerie one in his dioceese should monish their abbats and monks to liue regularlie: and that prelats should not oppresse their inferiors, but loue them.

5 That they should teach the monasteries which the secular men had inuaded, and could not then be taken from them, to liue regularly.

6 That none should be admitted to orders, before his life should be examined.

7 That in Monasteries the reading of holy scripture should be more frequented.

8 That priests should bee no dispolers of secular busines.

9 That they should take no monie for baptising infants.

10 That they should both learne and teach the Lords prayer and creed in the English tongue.

11 That all should ioyne together in their ministerie after one vniforme rite and maner.

12 That in a modest voice they should sing in the church.

13 That all holy and festiuall daies should be celebrated at one time together.

14 That the sabbath day be reuerently obserued and kept.

15 That the vij. houres canonicall euery day be obserued.

16 That the rogation daies both the greater and lesser should not be omitted.

The rogation daies had not then that superstition in them, as they had afterward.

17 That the feast of S. Gregory and S. Austin our patron should not be omitted.

18 That the fast of the foure times should be kept and obserued.

19 That monks & nuns should go regularly apparelled.

20 That bishops should see these decrees not to be neglected.

21 That the churchmen should not giue themselues vnto drunkennesse.

22 That the communion should not be neglected of the churchmen.

23 Item, that the same also should be obserued of the laymen, as time required.

24 That lay men first should be well tried, before they entered into monkerie.

25 That almes be not neglected.

26 That bishops should see these decrees to be notified to the people.

27 They disputed of the profit of almes.

28 They disputed of the profit of singing psalmes.

29 That the congregation should be constitute, after the abilitie of their gods.

30 That monks should not dwell among laymen.

31 That publik prayer should be made for kings & princes.

These decrees and ordinances being thus among the bishops concluded, Cutbert the archbishop sendeth the copie thereof to Boniface, which Boniface, otherwise named Winfride an Englishman borne, was then archbishop of Mentz, and after made a martyr, as the popish stories terme him.

Boniface an Englishman archbishop of Mentz.

This Boniface being, as is said, archbishop of Mentz in the time of this foresaid synod, wrot a letter to Ethelbald king of Mercelande: which Ethelbald was also present in the same synod, of whom Beda maketh mention in his historie, calling him proud Ethelbald, and the greatest of the Saxon kings in his time. First this Ethelbald after the departing of Ceolulfe into his monkerie, inuaded and spoiled the countrie of Northumberland. Moreouer, he exercised mortall and horrible warre a long space with Cudred, otherwise of some named Cutbert, king of Westsaxons: furthermore, he with other Saxon kings so impugned the Britains, that from that time they neuer durst prouoke the Saxons any more. At length the said Cudred, refusing the intollerable exactions of proud Ethelbald, doth incounter with him in battell: where notwithstanding the great power that Ethelbald had to him adioyned, of the Mercians, of the Eastsaxons, of the Eastangles, and of the Cantuarits: yet the said Cudred through Gods power, and the means of a certaine valiant warrior called Edelhim, a consull, ouerthrew the pride of Ethelbald, after a sore and terrible conflict. Which Ethelbald notwithstanding repairing his power againe the next yeere after, renewed battell with the foresaid Cudred; in the which battell Ethelbald (after hee had raigned one and fortie yeeres in Mercia) was slaine by one Beornred, who after raigned in that dition but a small time. For Offa nephue to the said Ethelbald expelled the said Beornred, and succeeded king in that prouince of Mercia, where he raigned nine & thirtie yeeres, of whom more followeth hereafter (the Lord Iesu speeding therein our purpose) to be declared, as place and time shall require. In the meane season not to forget the letter before mentioned of Boniface archbishop of Mentz, sent vnto this Ethelbald; I thought the same not vnworthie here to be inserted (at the least the effect thereof) not so much for the authors sake, as for that some good matter peraduenture may be picked thereout for other princes to behold and consider.

sto charitatis salutem. Consistemus coram Deo, qui nouit an verè atque ex animo dicam: quando prosperitatem vestram, & fidem, & bona opera audimus, lætamur: quando autem aliquid aduersum vel in euentu bellorum, vel de periculo animarum de vobis cognoscimus, tristamur. Audiuimus enim quòd eleemosynis intentus, furta & rapinas prohibes, & pacem diligis, & defensor viduarum & pauperum es, & inde gratias Deo agimus. Quòd verò legitimum matrimonium spernis, si pro castitate faceres, esset laudabile: sed quia in luxu & adulterio & cum sanctimonialibus volutaris, est vituperabile & damnabile. Nam & famam gloriæ vestræ coram Deo & hominibus confundit, & inter idololatras constituit, quia templum Dei violasti. Quapropter fili charissime pœnitere, & memorare oportet, quàm turpe sit, vt tu qui multis gentibus, dono Dei, dominaris, ad iniuriam eius sis libidinis seruus. Audiuimus præterea quòd optimates penè omnis gentis Merciorum, tuo exemplo legitimas vxores deserant, & adulteras & sanctimoniales constuprent. Quod quàm sit peregrinum ab honestate, doceat vos alienæ gentis institutio. Nam in antiqua Saxonia, vbi nulla est Christi cognitio, si virgo in materna domo, vel maritata, sub coniuge fuerit adultera, manu propria strangulatam cremant, & supra fossam sepultæ corruptorem suspendunt, aut cingulo tenus (vestibus abscissis) flagellant eam castæ matronæ, & cultellis pungunt; & de villa in villam missæ occurrunt nouæ flagellatrices, donec interimant. Insuper & Vinuli, quod est fœdissimum genus hominum, hunc habent morem, vt mulier viro mortuo, se in rogo cremantis pariter arsura præcipitet. Si ergo gentiles Deum ignorantes, tantum zelum castitatis habent, quid tibi conuenit fili charissime, qui christianus & rex es? Parce ergo animæ tuæ: parce multitudini populi tui pereuntis exemplo tuo: de quorũ animabus redditurus es rationem. Attende & illud, quid si gens Anglorum (sicut in Francia, & Italia, & ab ipsis paganis nobis improperatur) spretis legitimis matrimonijs per adulteria deficit, nasciturq; sit ex ea commixtione gens ignaua & Dei contemptrix, quæ perditis moribus patriam pessundet: sicut Burgundionibus & Prouincialibus, & Hispanis contigit, quos Saraceni multis annis infestarunt propter peccata præterita? Præterea nunciatum est nobis, quòd multa priuilegia ecclesiarum & monasteriorum auferens, ad hoc audendum duces tuos exemplo prouoces. Sed recogita quæso quàm terribilem vindictam Deus in anteriores reges exercuit, eiusdem culpæ conscios, quam in te arguimus. Nam Celredum prædecessorem tuum stupratorem sanctimonialium, & ecclesiasticorum priuilegiorum fractorem, splendidè cum suis comitibus epulantem spiritus malignus arripuit: & sine confessione & viatico, cum diabolo sermocinanti, & legem Dei detestanti animam extorsit. Osredum quoque regem Deirorum & Bernicorum, earundem culparum reum, ita effrænatum regem egit, vt regnum & iuuenilem ætatem contemptibili morte amitteret. Carolus quoque princeps Francorum monasteriorum multorum euersor, & ecclesiasticarum pecuniarum in vsus proprios commutator, longa torsione, & verenda morte consumptus est. Et mox infra: Quapropter fili charissime, paternis & obnixis precibus deprecamur, vt non despicias consilium patrum tuorum, qui pro Dei amore celsitudinem tuam appellare satagunt. Nihil enim bono regi salubrius, quàm si talia commissa cum arguuntur, libenter emendentur, quia per Salomonem dicitur: Qui diligit disciplinam, diligit sapientiam. Ideo, fili charissime, ostendentes consilium iustum, contestamur & obsecramus per viuentem Deum & per filium eius Iesum Christum, & per spiritum sanctum, vt recorderis quàm fugitiua sit vita præsens, & quàm breuis & momentanea delectatio spurcæ carnis: & quàm ignominiosum sit vt breuis vitæ homo mala exempla in perpetuum posteris relinquat. Incipe ergo melioribus moribus vitam componere, & præteritos errores iuuentutis corrigere, vt hic coram hominibus laudem habeas & in futuro æterna gloria gaudeas. Valere celsitudinem tuam, & in bonis moribus proficere optamus.

Nihil factum quod non factum prius.

The corrupt life of nuns noted.

In this epistle here is to be séene and noted, first the corruption and great disorder of life which alway from time to time hath been found in these religious houses of nuns, whose professed vow of coacted chastitie hath yet neuer been good to the church, nor profitable to the commonwealth, and least of all to themselues. Of such young and wanton widowes S. Paul in his time complaineth, 1. Tim. 5. which would take vpon them the wilfull profession of single life, which they were not able to performe, but falling into damnable luxurie, deserued worthilie to be reprehended. How much better had it been for these lasciuious nuns not to haue refused the safe yoke of christian matrimonie, then to intangle themselues in this their superstitious vow of perpetuall maidenhood, which neither was required of them, nor they were able to kéepe?

Secondly, no lesse are they also to be reprehended, which maintained these superstitious orders of vnprofitable nuns and of other religious. In the number of whom was this foresaid Boniface, otherwise called Winfride, who although in this epistle doth iustly reprehend the vicious enormities both of secular and of religious persons; yet he himselfe is not without the same or rather greater reprehension, for that he gaue the occasion thereof in maintaining such superstitious orders of such lasciuious nuns and other religious, and restraining the same from lawfull mariage. For so we find of him in stories that he was a great setter vp and vpholder of such blind superstition, and of all poperie. Who being admitted by pope Gregorie the second, archbishop of Magunce, and indued with full authoritie legantine ouer the Germans, brought diuers countries there vnder the popes obedience, held many great councels, ordained bishops, builded monasteries, canonized saints, commanded relikes to be worshipped, permitted religious fathers to carrie about nuns with them a preaching. Amongst all other he founded the great monasterie of Fulda in Germanie of English monks, into the which no women might enter but onely Lieba and Tecla, two English nuns. Item, by the authoritie of the said archbishop Boniface, which he receiued from pope Zacharie, Childericus king of France was deposed from the right of his crowne, and Pipinus betraier of his maister was confirmed, or rather intruded in. From this Boniface proceeded that detestable doctrine which now standeth registred in the popes decrées, Dist. 40. cap. Si papa. Which in a certaine epistle of his is this; That in case the pope were of most filthie liuing, and forgetfull or negligent of himselfe, and of the whole christianitie, in such sort, that hee led innumerable soules with him to hell: yet ought there no man to rebuke him in so doing, for he hath (saith he) power to iudge all men, and ought of no man to be iudged againe.

In the time of this archbishop, pope Gregorie the second, also Gregorie the third, and pope Zacharie, and before these also pope Constantine the first, wrought great masteries against the Grécke emperors Philippicus and Leo, and others, for the maintaining of images to be set vp in churches. Of whom Philippicus lost both his empire and also his eies. Leo for the same cause likewise was excommunicate of Gregorie the third. This Gregorie the third (so far as I can coniecture) was he that first wrote the foure books of dialogues in Grécke, falsely bearing the name of Gregorie the first, which bookes afterward Zacharie his successor translated out of Grécke into Latine. Item, the said Gregorie the third, first brought into the masse canon the clause for relikes, beginning Quorum solennitates hodie in conspectu, &c. Item, brought into the said canon the memoriall, the offering and sacrifice for the dead: like as Zacharie brought in the priests vesture and ornaments, and as the foresaid Constantinus also was the first that gaue his fét to be killed of the emperors. But to turne againe into the course of our English storie.

In the time of this Egbert king of Northumberland, Sigebert or Sigbert raigned in Westsaronie, a man of so cruell tyrannie to his subiects (turning the lawes and customs of his forefathers after his own will and pleasure) that when he was somewhat sharpely aduertised by one of his nobles, an earle called Combranus, to change his manners, and to behaue him more prudently toward his people; he therefore maliciouslie caused him to be put to cruell death. Whereupon the said king Sigebert continuing in his cruell conditions, by his subiects conspiring against him, was put from his kinglie dignitie, and brought into such desolation, that wandering alone in a wood without comfort, was there slaine euen by the swineheard of the said earle, whom before he had so wrongfully murthered, as partly is aboue touched. Wherby is to be séene the cruell tyrannie of princes neuer to prosper well, without the iust reuenge both of God and man.

Sigebert slaine.

Cruell tyrannie with like cruelties reuenged.

This Sigebert being slaine, in his place succéded Kenulphus, in the yeere of our Lord 748. who with the agréement of the Westsarons, was one of the chiefe doers against Sigebert his maister. This Kenulphus kept stronglie his lordship against Offa, and against the power of all his enemies, till at length after that he had raigned, as Fabian saith, one and thirtie yéeres, he resorting to a paramour which hee kept at Merton, was there beset and likewise slaine by the traine & meanes of a certaine kinsman of the foresaid Sigebert, named Clito or Cliton, in reuengement of king Sigeberts death.

Moreouer, in the raigne of the foresaid Egbert king of Northumberland, and in the eight yéere of Kenulphus king of Westsarons; Offa after he had slaine the tyrant Beorured, which before had slaine Ethelbald king of Mercia, and vncle to this foresaid Offa, raigned king of that prouince.

Offa king of Mercia.

Of this Offa are told many notable deeds, which because they concerne rather politicall affaires, and doe not greatlie appertaine to the purpose of this ecclesiasticall historie, I omit here to recite. As his wars and victories against Egbert, king of the Northumbers, as also against Ethelred king of Eastangles. Item, against Egbert king of Kent, otherwise called Wren, whom (as Fabian saith) he tooke prisoner, and led bound with him to Mercia. Malmesburie witnesseth otherwise this to be done not by Offa, but by Kenulphus, as Christ willing, hereafter shall appeare. After these victories, Offa had such displeasure vnto the citizens of Canturbury, that he remooued the archbishops sée, and lands of Lambrith archbishop of Canturburie (by the agréement of pope Adrian) vnto Lichfeeld. He also chased the Britains or Welchmen into Wales, & made a famous dich betweén Wales and the vtter bounds of Mercia or middle England, which was called Offdich, and builded there a church which long time after was called Offkirke. This Offa also maried one of his daughters to Brightricus that was king of Westsarons. And for that in his time was variance betweene him him and the Frenchmen, in so much that the passage of merchants was forbidden. Therefore he sent Alcuinus a learned man vnto Charles the great then king of France, to commune the meanes of peace: which Charles had after that the said Alcuinus in great fauour and estimation, and afterwards made him abbat of Turonia in France.

This Alcuinus is commended for his learning next to Adelmus and Beda abone all Saxons.

About the latter time of the raigne of Offa, king of Mercia, Ethelbert being then king of Eastangles (a learned and a right godly prince) came to the court of Offa, prouoked by the counsell of his nobles to sue for the mariage of his daughter, well accompanied like a prince with his men about him. Whereupon the queene conceiuing a false suspicion, and fearing that which was neuer minded: that Ethelbert with his companie vnder the pretence and made matter of marriage, was come to worke some violence against her husband, and the kingdome of Mercia, so she perswaded with king Offa and certaine of her counsell that night; that the next day following, Offa caused him to be trained into his palace alone from his companie by one called Guimbertus: who took him and bound him, and there stroke off his head, which forthwith hee then presented to the king and queene. And thus the innocent king Ethelred was wrongfully murthered, about the yeere of our Lord 793. but not without a iust reuenge at Gods hand. For (as the storie recordeth) the foresaid queene, worker of this villany, liued not three moneths after, and in her death was so tormented, that she was faine to bite and rent hir tongue in peeces with her owne teeth. Offa vnderstanding at length the innocencie of this king, and the hainous crueltie of his fact, gaue the tenth part of his goods to holy church; and to the church of Hereford, in the remembrance of this Ethelbert, he bestowed great lands. Moreouer, he builded the abbie of S. Albons, with certaine other monasteries besides. And so afterward he went vp to Rome for his penance, where hee gaue to the church of saint Peter a penie through euery house in his dominion, which was called commonly Romehot, or Peterpence, paid to the church of saint Peter: and there at length was transformed from a king to a monke, about the yeere of our Lord 794. with Kenredus king of Northumberland aboue mentioned, although some stories deny that he was a monke.

Cruell murther reuenged.

Offa and Kenredus of kings made monks at Rome.

After Offa king of Mercia, when he had raigned nine and thirtie yeeres, succeeded his sonne Egfretus, who raigned but foure moneths, of whom thus writeth the foresaid Alcuinus: Non arbitror quòd nobilissimus iuuenis Egfretus, propter peccata sua mortuus sit: sed quia pater suus, pro confirmatione regni eius multum sanguinem effudit, &c: that is, This noble young man died not so much for offences of his owne, as for that his father had spilled much blood to confirme him in his kingdome.

Next to which Egfretus, succeeded Kenulphus in the said kingdome of Mercia, which Kenulphus keeping and retaining the hatred of Offa his predecessor against the Cantuarits, made war vpon them, where he toke Egbert their king, otherwise called Wren, whom he bound and led prisoner to Mercia. Notwithstanding, shortly after being mollified with princely clemencie in the towne of Winchcombe, where he had builded the same time a church, vpon the day when hee should dedicate the same in the presence of thirteene bishops, and of Cutbert whom he had placed in the same kingdome of Canturburie before, and ten dukes, and many other great estates, king Kenulphus brought the said Egbert king of Kent out of prison into the church, where he inlarged him out of imprisonment, and restored him to his place againe. At the sight whereof, not onelie Cutbert the foresaid king reioyced, but also all the estates and people being there present, made such an exclamation of ioy and gladnesse, that the church (and not onely the church, but also the streets) rang withall. At which time such bountifulnesse of gifts and iewels was then bestowed, that from the highest estate to the lowest, none departed without something giuen, according as to euery degree was thought meet. Although Fabian referreth this storie to king Offa, yet causes there bee why I assent rather vnto Malmesburie and to Polychronicon, which attribute the same to Kenulphus the second king of Mercia, after Offa.

A little before in speaking of certaine bishops of Rome, mention was made of pope Constantine the first, pope Gregorie the second, pope Gregorie the third, and of pope Zacharie, which deposed Childerike, and set vp Pipinus the French king, &c. Next after this Zacharie in order, followed pope Stephan the second, to whom the foresaid Pipinus, to gratifie againe the see of Rome for this their benefit shewed to him, gaue and contributed to the said see of Rome, the exarchat or princedome of Rauenna, the kingdome of the Lombards, and many other great possessions of Italy, with all the cities thereto adioyning vnto the borders of Venice. And this donation of Pipin, no doubt if the truth were rightly tried, should be found to be the same, which hitherto falsly hath beene thought to be the donation of Constantine. For else how could it be that the exarchat of Rauenna could belong all this while to the emperors of Constantinople, if Constantine before had giuen it and all Italie from the empire to the see of Rome?

Pope Stephan the second.

The donation of Pipinus falsly taken to bee the donation of Constantine.

Ex Polycr. li. 5. cap. 9.

To this Pipinus, as witnesseth Polychronicon, was sent first into France, the inuention of the organs but of Grecia, by Constantine emperour of Constantinople, in the yeere of our Lord 757.

Next to this Stephan the second, succeeded Paul the first, who following his predecessors, thundered out great excommunications against Constatinus the emperor of Constantinople, for abrogating and plucking downe images set vp in temples. Notwithstanding this Constantine neglecting the popes vaine curses, perseuered in his blessed purpose, in destroying idolatrie til the end of his life. Then came to be pope Constantinus the second, a lay man, and brother to Desiderius the king of Lombardie, for the which cause hee was shortlie deposed, and thrust into a monasterie, hauing his eies put out.

In whose stead succeeded Stephan the third, who ordained after, that no lay man should be pope: condemning moreouer the councell of Constantinople the seuenth for hereticall, because in that councell the worshipping of images was reproued and condemned. Contrarie to the which councell, this pope not onely maintained the filthie idolatrie of images in christian temples, but also aduanced their veneration, commanding them most ethnically to be incensed, &c. At this time Carolus Magnus called Charles the great a little before mentioned began to raigne, by whom this pope caused Desiderius the Lombard king to be deprined.

Pope Stephan the third.

The councell of Constantinople the seuenth condemned of the pope, for condemning images.

The pope also ordained Gloria in excelsis to be sung in the masse at saint Peters altar by the cardinals.

Then in this race of popes, after this Stephan the third, commeth Adrianus the first, who likewise following the steps of his forefathers the popes, added and attributed to the veneration of images more then all the other had done before, writing a booke for the adoration and the vtilitie proceeding of them, commanding them to be taken for lay mens kalendars, holding moreouer a synod at Rome against Felix, and all others that spake against the setting vp of such stocks and images. And as Paul the first before him made much of the body of Petronilla S. Peters daughter: so this Adrian clothed the bodie of S. Peter all in siluer, and couered the altar of saint Paul with a pall of gold. This pope Adrian was hee whom we declared in the former part of this treatise, to ratifie and confirme by reuelation the order of S. Gregories masse, aboue the order of S. Ambrose masse; for vnto this time, which was about the yeere of our Lord 780. the liturgie of S. Ambrose was more vsed in the Italian churches. The storie whereof because it is registred in Durandus, Nauclerus, and Iacobus de Voragine, I thought here to insert the same to this especiall purpose, for the reader to vnderstand the time when this vsuall masse of the papists began first to be vniuersall and vniforme, and generally in churches to be receiued. Thus it followeth in the storie by the foresaid authors set forth. Iacobus de Voragine, in the life of pope Gregorie the first, telleth a tale concerning this matter.

Pope Adrian the first.

The order of the Romish masse booke when it came in.

Ex Durando, Nauclero, Iacob. de Voragine, in vita Greg.

In times past (saith he) when the seruice which Ambrose made, was more frequented and vsed in churches then was the seruice which Gregorie had appointed, the bishop of Rome then called Adrian gathered a councell together: in the which it was ordained, that Gregories seruice should bee obserued and kept vniuersally. Which determination of the councell, Charles the emperour did diligentlie put in execution, while he ran about by diuers prouinces, and informed all the clergie, partly with threatnings and partly with punishments to receiue that order. And as touching the bookes of Ambrose seruice, he burnt them to ashes in all places, and threw into prison many priests that would not consent and agree vnto the matter. Blessed Eugenius the bishop comming vnto the councell, found that it was dissolued three daies before his comming. Notwithstanding through his wisdome, he so perswaded the lord pope, that hee called againe all the prelats that had been present at the councell, and were now departed by the space of three daies. Therefore when the councell was gathered againe together, in this all the fathers did consent and agree, that both the masse bookes of Ambrose and Gregorie should be laid vpon the altar of blessed S. Peter the apostle, and the church doores diligentlie shut, and most warilie sealed vp with the signets of many and diuers bishops. Againe, that they should all the whole night giue themselues to prayer, that the Lord might reueale, open, and shew vnto them by some euident signe or token, which of these two seruices hee would haue vsed in the temples. Thus they doing in all points as they had determined, in the morning opened the church doores, and found both the missals or masse bookes open vpon the altar: or rather (as some say) they found Gregories masse booke vtterly plucked asunder one peece from another, and scattered ouer all the church. As touching Ambrose booke, they onely found it open vpon the altar in the very same place where they before laid it. This miracle pope Adrian like a wise expounder of dreames saith, that as the leaues were torne and blowne abroad all the church ouer, so should Gregories booke bee vsed throughout the world. Whereupon they thought themselues sufficiently instructed and taught of God, that the seruice which Gregorie had made ought to be set abroad and vsed throughout the world, and that Ambrose his seruice should onely bee obserued and kept in his owne church of Mediolanum, where he sometime was bishop.

Et talibus ipsa commentum plasci. Tertull.

Note well the practise of prelats in planting their popish masse.

Thus hast thou heard (brother reader) the full and whole narration of this mysticall miracle, with the popes exposition vpon vpon the same, which seemeth to be as true as that which Daniel speaketh of, how the idoll Bell did eat vp all the meat that was set before him all the night, Daniel.14. Concerning the which miracle, I need not admonish thee to smell out the blind practises of these nightcrowes, to blind the world with forged inuentions in stead of true stories. Albeit to grant the miracle to be most true and vnfallible, yet as touching the exposition thereof, another man beside the pope percase might interpret this great miracle otherwise, as thus: that God was angrie with Gregories booke, and therfore rent it in péeces, and scattered it abroad, and the other as good, lay sound, vntouched, and at the least so to be preferred. Notwithstanding, what soeuer is to be thought of this miracle with the exposition thereof, thus the matter fell out, that Gregories seruice had onelie the place, and yet hath to this day in the greatest part of Europe, the seruice of Aunbrose being excluded. And thus much touching the great act of pope Adrian for the setting vp of the masse. By the relation whereof, yet this knowledge may come to the reader, at least to vnderstand how that commonly in christian nations abroad, as yet no vniforme order of any missall or masseboke was receiued, as hath béen hitherto discoursed.

Gregories masse taketh place in Europe.

Now from the popes to returne againe to the emperours, from whence wee digressed: like as Pipinus the father of Charles (as hath bin before sufficiently told) had giuen to the see papall all the princedome of Rauenna, with other donations and reuenues and lands in Italie: so this Carolus following his fathers deuotion, did confirme the same, adding moreouer thereunto, the citie and dominion of Venice, Histria, the dukedome Forojuliense, the dukedome Spoletanum, & Beneuentanum, and other possessions more, to the patrimonie of S. Peter, making him the prince of Rome & of Italie. The pope againe to recompence his so gentle kindnesse, made him to bee intituled Most christian king, and made him Patricium Romanum, moreouer ordained him only to be taken for emperour of Rome. For these and other causes more, Carolus bare no little affection to the said Adrian aboue all other popes: as may well appeare by this letter of Carolus Magnus sent to king Offa, what time the said Offa (as is aboue prefired) sent to him Alcuinus for intreatie of peace: whereto the foresaid Carolus answereth againe to the message of Offa in a letter, the contents whereof be these.

How the pope heareth the crie of poore widowes and orphans.

The cause why this Carolus writeth so fauorably of Adrian partly is touched before, partly also was, for that Carloman his elder brother being dead, his wife called Bertha with her two children came to Adrian, to haue them confirmed in their fathers kingdome, whereunto the pope to shew a pleasure to Carolus would not agrée: but gaue the mother with her two children, & Desiderius the Lombard king with his whole kingdome, his wife and children, into the hands of the said Carolus, who led them with him captiue into France, and there kept them in seruitude during their life.

The empire translated from Greece to France.

Thus Carolus Magnus being proclaimed emperour of Rome, through the preferment of Adrian and pope Leo the third, which succeded next after him, was the empire translated from the Grecians about the yéere of our Lord 801. vnto the Frenchmen, where it continued about one hundred and two yéeres, till the comming of Conracus and his nephue Otho, which were Germans: and so hath continued after them among the Almans vnto this present time. This Charles builded so many monasteries as there be letters in the row of the A B C. he was beneficiall chiefly to churchmen, also mercifull to the poore, in his acts valiant and triumphant, skild in all languages; he held a councell at Francford, where was condemned the councell of Nice and Irene, for setting vp and worshipping images, &c.

Concerning which councell of Nice, and things there concluded and enacted (because no man shall thinke the detelling of images to be any new thing now begun) thus I find it recorded in an ancient written historie of Roger Houeden, called Continuationes Bedæ: his words in Latine be these. Anno 792. Carolus rex Francorum misit synodalem librum ad Britanniam, sibi a Constantinopoli directum. In quo lib. heu proh dolor, multa inconuenientia, & veræ fidei cōtraria reperiuntur, maximè quòd pene omnium orientalium doctorum non minus quàm 300. vel eo amplius episcoporum vnanimi assertione confirmatum sit, imagines adorari debere: quod omnino ecclesia Dei execratur. Contra quod scripsit Albinus epistolam ex autoritate diuinarum scripturarum mirabiliter affirmatam, illámque cum eodem libro ex persona episcoporum ac principū nostrorum, regi Francorum attulit. Hæc ille. That is, In the yéere of our Lord 792. Charles the French king sent a booke containing the acts of a certaine synod, vnto Britaine, directed vnto him from Constantinople. In the which booke (lamentable to be told) many things inconuenient, and cleane contrarie vnto the true faith are there to be found: especially for that by the common consent of almost all the learned bishops of the East church, not so few as 300. it was there agreed, that images should be worshipped: which thing the church of God hath alwaies abhorred. Against which booke Albinus wrote an epistle substantially grounded out of the authoritie of holie scripture, which epistle with the booke the said Albinus, in the name and person of our bishops and princes, did present to the French king.

Images written against as contrary to the true faith.

This Albinus was Alcuinus aboue mentioned.

The bishops and prince of England against images.

And thus much by the way of Romish matters: now to returne againe to the Northumberland kings, where we left at Egbert: which Egbert (as is before declared) succeeded after Ceolulphus, after he was made monke. And likewise the said Egbert also following the deuotion of his vncle Ceolulphus, and Kenredus before him, was likewise shorne monke after he had raigned twentie yéeres in Northumberland, leauing his son Osulphus after him to succéed. About which time, and in the same yéere, when Ceolulphus deceased in his monasterie, which was the yéere of our Lord 764. diuers cities were burnt with sudden fire, as the citie of Wenta, the citie of London, the citie of Yorke, Doncaster, with diuers other townes besides: Roger Houeden, lib. Contin. post Bedā. Who the first yéere of his raigne, which was the yéere of our Lord 757. being innocently slaine, next to him followed Mollo, otherwise called Adelwald, who likewise being slaine of Alcredus, after he had raigned eleuen yéeres, departed. After, Alcredus when he had raigned ten yéeres, was expulsed out of his kingdome by his people. Then was Ethelbert otherwise named Adelred, the sonne of the foresaid Mollo, receiued king of Northumberland: which Ethelbert or Adelred in like sort after he had raigned fiue yéeres, was expulsed. After whom succéeded Alfwold, who likewise when he had raigned eleuen yéeres, was vniustly slaine. So likewise after him his nephue and the sonne of Alcredus named Osredus, raigned one yéere, and was slaine. Then the foresaid Ethelbert the sonne of Mollo, after twelue yéeres banishment, raigned againe in Northumberland the space of foure yéeres, & was slaine; the cause wherof (as I find in an old written storie) was, that forsaking his old wife, hée maried a new. Concerning ỳ restoring of whom, Alcuinus writeth in this maner. Benedictus Deus qui facit mirabilia solus. Nuper Edelredus, filius Edelwaldi de carcere processit in soliū, & de miseria in maiestatem, cuius regni nouitate detenti sumus ne veniremus ad vos, &c. And afterwards the same Alcuinus againe speaking of his death, writeth vnto king Offa in these words. Sciat veneranda dilectio vestra, quòd dominus Carolus amabiliter & fideliter sæpe mecum locutus est de vobis, & in eo habetis fidelissimum amicum. Ideo & vestræ dilectioni digna dirigit munera, & per episcopales sedes regni vestri, similiter & Edelredo regi, & ad suas episcoporum sedes direxit dona. Sed heu pro dolor, donis datis, & epistolis in manus missorum, superuenit tristis legatio per missos qui de Scotia per nos reuersi sunt, de infidelitate gentis, & nece regis. Ita Carolus retracta donorum largitate in tantum iratus est contra gentem illam, vt ait, perfidam & peruersam, & homicidam dominorum suorum, peiorem eam paganis æstimans, vt nisi ego intercessor essem pro ea, quicquid eis boni abstrahere potuisset, & mali machinari, iam fecisset, &c.

Osulphus, Mollo, otherwise called Adelwold. Alcredus or Alured. Ethelbert, otherwise named Adelred, or Eardulph. Alfwold, Osredus, Adelred againe kings of Northumberland. Anno 764

The kingdome of Northumberland ceaseth.

Northumberland kingdom ceaseth.

Thus as you haue heard, after the raigne of king Egbert before mentioned, such trouble and perturbation was in the dominion of Northumberland, with slaying, expulsing and deposing their kings one after another, that after the murthering of this Edelred aboue specified, none durst take the gouernment vpon him, séeing the great danger thereupon insuing. Insomuch that the foresaid kingdome did lie void and wast the space of three and thirtie yéeres together, after the terme of which yéeres this kingdome of Northumberland, with the kingdomes also of the other Saxons besides, came also altogether into the hands of Egbert king of Westsarons, and his progenie: which monarchie began in the yeere of our Lord 827. and in the eight and twentie yeere of the raigne of the said Egbert: whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) hereafter. Of this troublesome and ragious time of Northumberland people, speaketh also the said learned man Alcuinus, otherwise called Albinus, in the same countrie borne, writing out of France into England, and complaining of the same in diuers his letters, as first to Offa, where he thus writeth: Ego paratus eram cum muneribus Caroli regis ad vos venire, & in patriam reuerti. Sed melius visum est propter pacem gentis meæ in peregrinatione remanere, nesciens quid fecissem inter eos, vbi nullus securus esse, vel in salubri consilio proficere potest. Ecclesia sancta a paganis vastata, altaria periurijs fœdata, monasteria adulterijs violata, terra sanguine dominorum & principum fœdata, &c. Moreouer the said Alcuinus writing to the foresaid Edelred a little aboue mentioned, after the same tenor reporteth: Ecce ecclesia sancti Cutberti sacerdotum Dei sanguine aspersa (omnibus spoliata ornamentis) locus cunctis in Britannia venerabilior, paganis gentibus datur ad deprædandum. Et vbi primùm post decessum S. Cutberti ab Eboraco, christiana religio in nostra gente sumpsit exordium, ibi miseriæ & calamitatis cœpit initium, &c. Item, writing to Osbert a noble peere of the Mercians, complaining on the same matter, saith: Regnum nostrum Northumbrorum penè perijt, propter intestinas dissensiones, & fallaces coniurationes, &c.

Alcuinus otherwise called Albinus.

The troubles of the kingdome of Northumberland described by Alcuinus.

Item, in another place the said Alcuinus writing to Adelard archbishop of Canturburie, complaineth moreouer: Hoc dico propter flagellum, quod nuper accidit partibus insulæ nostræ, quæ prope trecentis & quadraginta annis à parentibus inhabitata est nostris. Legitur in libro Gildæ sapientissimi Britonum, quòd ijdem Britones, propter auaritiam & rapinam principum, propter iniquitatem & iniustitiam iudicum, propter desidiam prædicationis episcoporum, propter luxuriam & malos mores populi, patriam perdidere. Caueamus hæc eadem vitia nostris temporibus inolescere, quatenus benedictio diuina nobis patriam conseruet in prosperitate bona, quam nobis misericordissima pietate perdonare dignatus est, &c.

Ex historia Malmesburiensi.

Duer and besides, the same author Alcuinus writing vnto the foresaid Edelred king of Northumberland, maketh record of a strange sight which he himselfe did see the same time in the citie of Yorke, to raine bloud: whereof his words which he wrote concerning the same vnto the said king Edelred bee these. Quid significat pluuia sanguinis, quam quadragesimali tempore in Eboraco ciuitate, quæ caput est totius regni, in ecclesia beati principis apostolorum, vidimus de borealibus partibus domus (sereno aere) de summitate minanter cadere? Nonne potest putari, à borealibus partibus venire sanguinem super terram? That is: What signifieth the raine of bloud which in time of Lent, in the citie of Yorke the chiefe citie of that dominion, and in the church of saint Peter the chiefe of the apostles, we our selues did see to fall from the church top (the element being cleere) out of the north parts of the temple, &c. This wonderous sight testified by Malmesburiensis, is thought of Fabian to happen in the second yeere of the raigne of Brightricus (as with the time doth well agree) which was the yeere of our Lord seuen hundred and eightie, and is thought of some expositors to betoken the comming of the Danes into this land, which entred shortly after about seuen yeeres, in the ninth yeere of the raigne of Brightricus king of the Westsarons. Which Brightricus in defence thereof sent forth his steward of his houshold with a small companie, which shortlie was slaine: but by the strength of the said Brightricus and the other Saxon kings, they were compelled to void the land for that time, which was in the yeere 790. To this Brightricus, king Offa, as is aforesaid, gaue his daughter Edelburga to wife, by whom he at length was impoisoned, besides certaine other of his nobles, vpon whom the said queene before him had practised the same wickednesse. Who then after that fled ouer to Charles the great into France, where shee being offered for her beautie to marrie either to him or his sonne, because shee chosed rather his sonne, married neither the one nor yet the other; but was thrust in a monasterie, where shee then playing the harlot with a monke, was expulsed from thence, and ended her life in penury and miserie.

How it rained bloud in Yorke.

Anno 780

Brightricus king of Westsarons.

Edelburga daughter to Offa, poisoned her husband.

Wickednesse reuenged.

In the meane time, while this Edelburga was thus working her feates in England, Irene empresse of the Greekes was as busie also for her part at Constantinople, who first thorough the meanes of pope Adrian, tooke vp the bodie of Constantine emperour of Constantinople, her owne husbands father. And when she had burned the same, she caused the ashes to be cast into the sea, because he disanulled images. Afterwards raigning with her sonne Constantine the first, sonne to Leo the fourth (whom also wee declared before to be excommunicated for taking away images) being at dissension with him, caused him to be taken and laid in prison, who afterward through power of friends, being restored to his empire againe, at last she caused the same her owne sonne to bee cast in prison, and his eies to bee put out so cruelly, that within short space hee died. After this the said Irene empresse, with the counsell of Therasius bishop of Constantinople, held a councell at Nicea, where it was decreed, that images should againe bee restored vnto the church; which councell after was repealed by another councell holden at Francford by Charles the great. At length shee was deposed by Nicephorus (who reigned after) and was expulsed the empire: who after the example of Edelburga aboue mentioned (condignlie punished for her wickednesse) ended likewise her life in much penurie and miserie.

The wickednes of Irene condignly rewarded.

About the time when the foresaid Brightricus was impoisoned by Edelburga his wife, died also king Offa, which was about the yeare of our Lord 795, or (as some say) 802. After which Offa (as is aforesaid) succeeded Egfert, then Kenelphus, after whom succeeded Kenelmus his sonne, who in his younger age was wickedly murthered by his sister Quinreda, and Askebertus, about the yeare of our Lord 819, and in the church of Winchcombe was counted for an holy martyr. After him succeeded his vncle Ceoluphus, whom Bernulphus in the first yeare of his reigne expulsed, and reigned in his place. Who likewise the third yeare of his raigne was ouercome and expulsed by Egbert king of the Westsarons, and afterward slaine by the Eastangles. And the kingdome of Mercia also ceased, and came into the hands of the Westsarons.

Kenelmus king of Mercia innocently slaine.

Ceoluphus, Bernulphus, kings of Mercia.

The kingdome of Mercia ceaseth.

Hitherto I haue brought (as thou seest good reader) the confused and turbulent raignes of these seuen Saxon kings, who after the expulsion of the Britains ruled and raigned asunder in sundrie quarters of this land together, vnto this present time of Egbert king of the Westsarons. By whom it so pleased God to begin to reduce and vnite all these scattered kingdomes into one monarchicall forme of dominion. Wherefore as in the foresaid Egbert beginneth a new alteration of the commonwealth here in this land among the Saxons: so my purpose is (the Lord willing) with the same Egbert to enter a new beginning of my third booke, after a briefe recapitulation first made of such things as in this second booke before are to be collected and noted, especially touching the monasteries builded, the kings which haue entred the life and profession monastike: also queenes and queenes daughters, which the same time professed solitarie life in monasteries, which they or their ancestors had erected.

The conclusion of the storie precedent, concerning the seuen kingdomes of the Saxon kings aboue mentioned.

And thus hast thou (gentle reader) concerning the seuen kingdomes of these Saxons, ruling all together in England, the course and order of their doings briefelie described and discoursed vnto thee, in such order, as the matter being so intricate, in such confusion and diuersitie of things incident together, would permit: following especiallie in this storie hitherto the line of the Northumberland kings, as the other stories most followd the line of Westsaxon kings. The which seuen kingdames of these said Saxons, after they had vntrulie expulsed and chased out the Britains from their land, like as they neuer were in quietnesse among themselues, raigning thus together till the time of this Egbert; so also after the raigne of Egbert, the whole realme being reduced into one regiment, no lesse were they impugned and afflicted by the Danes continuallie from time to time, till the last Conquest of William the Norman. Thus it pleased God (euer lightly) to reuenge with blood bloodie violence, and the vniust dealings of men with iust and like retribution. But of this let the christian reader consider, as Gods grace shall worke in him. In the meane time we, as much as in vs did lie, satisfying the part of an historician, haue thus hitherto set forth and declared concerning these seuen foresaid kingdomes: first the names and lineall descent of the kings seuerallie by themselues, as by the table precedent may appeare: then what were the doings and acts of the same, how first being pagans, they were conuerted to the christian faith: what things in their time happened in the church, how many of them of kings were made monks: how deuout they were then to holy church and to the churchmen, and especially to the church of Rome. But the churchmen then were much otherwise in life then afterwards they declared themselues to bee. Through which deuotion of the said kings, first came in the Peterpence or Romescots in this realme, as by Iue first in his dominion, then by Offa in his lordship, and afterwards by Adelwolph brought in and ratified through the whole realme: where also is to be noted, that by the foresaid kings and queenes of the said Saxons, the most part of the greatest abbies and nunneries in this realme were first begun and builded, as partly the names of some heere follow to be seene.

Vniust dealings of men iustlie rewarded.

First the church or minster of Saint Paul in London was founded by Ethelbert king of Kent, and Sigebert king of Eller, about the yeere of our Lord 604.

Paules church.

The first crosse and altar within this realme was first set vp in the north parts in Yeuelfeeld, vpon the occasion of Oswald king of Northumberland, fighting against Cadwalla, where he in the same place set vp the signe of the crosse, kneeling and praying there for victorie: Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 12. The abbie of Echlingheie, by king Alfredus, An.891.

The nunrie of Shaftesburie by the same Alfredus, the same yeere.

Thus ye see what monasteries and in what time began to be founded by the Saxon kings, newly conuerted to the christian faith, within the space of two hundred yeeres; who, as they seemed then to haue a certaine zeale and deuotion to Godward, according to the leading and teaching that then was: so it seemeth againe to me, two things to bee wished in these foresaid kings: first, that they which began to erect these monasteries and cels of monks and nuns, to liue solie and singlie by themselues out of the holy state of matrimonie, had foreseene what danger, and what absurd enormities might and also did thereof insue, both publikely to the church of Christ, and priuately to their owne soules: secondly, that vnto this their zeale and deuotion had been ioyned like knowledge & doctrine in Christs gospell, especially in the article of our free iustification by the faith of Iesu Christ; because of the lacke whereof, as well the builders & founders thereof, as they that were professed in the same, seeme both to haue run the wrong way, and to haue been deceiued. For albeit in them there was a deuotion and zeale of mind, that thought well in this their doing, which I will not here reprehend: yet the end and cause of their deeds & buildings cannot be excused, being contrarie to the rule of Christs gospel, for so much as they did these things seeking thereby merits with God, and for remedie of their soules, and remission of their sinnes, as may appeare testified in their owne records, whereof one here I thought to set forth for probation of the same. Read this chart (if it please thee gentle reader) of king Ethelbald his donation, giuen to churches & religious persons, which Ethelbald was the builder (as is said) of Peterborough. The words of his record and instrument be these.

Two things to be wished in them that first builded monkish monasteries.

The article of free iustification not knowne.

The donations and priuiledges granted and giuen by king Ethelbald to religious men of the church.

PLerumque contingere solet, pro incerta temporum vicissitudine, vt ea quæ multarum fidelium personarum testimonio consilióque roborata fuerint; fraudulenter per contumaciam plurimorum, & machinamenta simulationis, sine vlla consideratione rationis, periculosè dissipentur, nisi autoritate literarum (testamento chirographorum) æternæ memoriæ committantur. Quapropter, ego Ethelbaldus rex Merciorum, pro amore cœlestis patriæ, & remedio animæ meæ, studendum esse præuidi, vt eam per bona opera liberam efficerem in omni vinculo delictorum. Quoniam enim mihi omnipotens Deus per misericordiam clementiæ suæ, absque vllo antecedente merito, sceptra regiminis largitus est: ideo libenter ei, ex eo quod dedit, retribuo. Huius rei gratiâ hanc donationem, me viuente, concedo, vt omnia monasteria & ecclesiæ regni mei, à publicis vectigalibus, & operibus, & oneribus absoluantur: nisi instructionibus arcium, vel pontium, quæ nulli vnquam prosunt. Præterea, habeant famuli Dei propriam libertatem in fructibus syluarum & agrorũ, & in captura piscium, ne munuscula præbeant vel regi, vel principibus, nisi voluntaria; sed liberi Deo seruiant, &c.

Ex chronico Guliel. Malmesb. lib.1.

By the contents hereof may well be vnderstood (as where he saith, Pro amore cœlestis patriæ, pro remedio animæ, pro liberatione animæ, & absolutione delictorum, &c.) how great the ignorance and blindnesse of these men was, who lacking no zeale, onely lacked knowledge to rule it withall: seeking their saluation not by Christ onely, but by their owne deseruings and meritorious deeds. Which I recite not here to any infamie or reprehension of them; but rather to put vs in mind and memorie, how much we at this present are bound to God for the true sinceritie of his truth, hidden so long before to our forefathers, and opened now vnto vs by the good will of our God, in his sonne Christ Iesu. This only lamenting by the way, to see them to haue such workes and to lacke our faith, and vs to haue the right faith & to lacke their workes. And this blind ignorance of that age thus aboue prenoted, was the cause not only why these kings builded so many monasteries vpon zealous superstition: but also why so many of them, forsaking their orderly vocation of princely regiment, gaue themselues ouer to monasticall profession, or rather wilfull superstition. Concerning the names and number of which kings that were professed monks, is sufficiently in the storie before declared: the names of whom wee shewed to be seuen or eight, within the space of these two hundred yeeres. Such was then the superstitious deuotion of kings and princes in that age; and no lesse also to be noted in queenes and kings daughters, with other noble women of the same age and time; the names of whom it were too long heere to recite. As Hilda daughter to the nephue of Edwin king of Northumberland, abbesse of Elie. Erchengoda with her sister Ermenilda daughters of Ercombertus king of Kent, which Erchengoda was professed in saint Brigets order in France. Item Edelberga wife and queene to king Edwin of Northumberland, and daughter of king Anna, which was also in the same house of saint Brigit made a nun. Item, Etheldreda whom we terme saint Eldrid, wife to king Ecfride of Northumberland, who being married to two husbands, could not be obtained to giue her consent to either of them, during the space of twelue yeeres, but would needs liue a virgin, and was professed nun at Helings. Werburga was the daughter of Ulferus king of Mercians, and made nun at Elie. Kinreda sister of king Ulferus and Kinswida her sister, were both nuns professed. Sexburga daughter of king Anna king of Mercians, and wife of Ercombert king of Kent, was abbesse at Elie. Elfrida daughter of Oswie king of Northumberland was abbesse of Whitneie: Wildreda, Wilburga, & Wilgunda, all three daughters of Werwaldus king of Westmercians, entred the profession and vow of nunnish virginitie. Kineburga wife of Alfride king of Northumberland, and sister to Offricus king of Mercians, and daughter of king Penda, was professed abbesse of the monasterie in Glocester. Elfleda daughter of Oswie king, and wife of Peda, sonne of king Penda, likewise inclosed her selfe in the same profession and vow of Romish chastity. Likewise Alfritha wife to king Edgar, and Editha daughter to the said Edgar, with Wolfrith hir mother, &c. All which holy nuns with diuers mo, the Romish catholikes haue canonized for saints, and put the most part of them in their kalendar, and onely dinlie because of the vow of chastitie solemnely professed. Concerning which chastitie, whether they kept it or no, little I haue to say against them, and lesse to sweare for them. But whether they so kept it or not, if this gift of chastitie which they professed, were giuen them of God, small praise worthie was it in them to keepe it. If it were not giuen them, I will not say here of them so much, as hath been said of some other, which sufficientlie haue painted out to the world the demeanor of these holie votaries. But this will I say, that although they kept it neuer so perfectlie, yet it is not that which maketh saints before God, but onely the bloud of Christ Jesus, and a true faith in him.

Likewise remaineth, that as we haue declared the deuotion of these noble women, which professing monasticke life, haue cast off all worldlie dignitie and delights: so wee should also intreat of such noble men, who among the Saxon kings in like zeale of deuotion, haue giuen ouer themselues from the world (as they thought) vnto the contemplatiue life of monkish profession. The names of whom as in the catalogue of the Saxon kings before is described, be these, to the number of nine.

Of which kings and their doings, what is to be iudged, looke gentle reader before.

By these histories it is apparant, what mutations, what perturbations, & what alteration of state hath been in this realme of Britaine, first from Britains kings, to Romans, then to Britains againe, afterward to the Saxons. First to seuen all together raigning, then to one, &c. And this alteration not onelie hapned in the ciuill gouernment, but also followed in the state ecclesiasticall. For as in the Britans time the metropolitan see was in London, so in the Saxons time after the comming of Austin, it was remoued to Canturburie: the catalogue and order of which metropolitans, from the time of Austin to Egbertus, is thus, as in the historie of Malmesburiensis is described.

The names and order of the archbishops of Canturburie, from Augustine, to the time of king Egbert.

1	Augustinus.	16
2	Laurentius.	5
3	Mellitus.	5
4	Iustus.	3
5	Honorius.	25
6	Deusdedit.	19
7	Theodorus.	22

Hitherto from Augustine, all the archbishops of Canturburie were Italians and forreners.

8	Berctualdus English.	37	In his time the monasterie of S. Martin was builded in Dorobernia, by Witredus and his brother kings of Kent.
9	Tacuinus.	3
10	Nothelinus.	5
11	Cutbertus.	17	This Cutbert after his death forbad all funerall exequies or lamentation for him to be made: William Malm. De vitis. lib. 1.
12	Breguinus.	3
13	Lambrightus, or Lambertus.	27	In this time K. Offa translated the metropolitane see from Canturburie to Lichfeld by the grant of pope Adrian, being ouercome with apostolicall argument, as saith Flor. hist. that is, with monie.
14	Ethelardus.	13
15	Vlfredus.	28
16	Feolegeldus.	3 m	This Ethelardus by his epistles to pope Leo, obtained the metropolitane see againe to Canturburie.
17	Celnothus.	41

During the course of these seuentéene archbishops of Canturburie in Rome passed in the meane time foure and thirtie popes, of whom partly heretofore we haue declared.

And thus much touching the time of the seuen kingdomes of the Saxons, ruling together in England, from the raigne of Hengist vnto Egbert, the first king and monarch of the whole land, after the expulsion of the Britans.

NOw remaineth (by the grace of christ) in the next booke following, to prosecute the order of such kings as principally raigning alone, had this realme in their possession, from the time of Egbert king of Westsaxons, to the comming of William Conqueror the Norman, comprehending therein the rest of the next 300. yeeres, with the acts & state of religion, as in that space was in the church: wherin may appeare the declining time of the church, and of true religion, preparing the way to antichrist, which not long after followed. For here is to be noted, that during yet this meane time, Satan (as is said) was bound vp from his raging & furious violence, counting from the time of Constantinus, to the next losing out of Satan, which was foretold by the Reuelation of S. John aboue mentioned, to be a thousand yéeres; whereof by the order of the historie (Christ granting) more shall be said hereafter.

The end of the second booke.

The third Booke containing the next three hundred yeeres, from the raigne of king Egbertus vnto the time of William Conqueror.

NOw remaineth likewise, as before I did in describing the descent and diuersitie of the seuen kings, all together reigning and ruling in this land: so to prosecute in like order the lineall succession of them, which after Egbertus king of the Westsaxons, gouerned and ruled solie, vntill the conquest of William the Norman; first expressing their names, and afterwards importing such acts, as in their time happened in the church worthie to bee noted. Albeit, as touching the acts and doings of these kings, because they are sufficiently and at large described, and taken out of Latine writers into the English tongue by diuers and sundrie authors, and namelie in the historie or chronicle of Fabian; I shall not spend much trauell thereupon, but rather refer the reader vnto him or to some other, where the troublesome tumults betweene the Englishmen and the Danes at that time may bee seene, who so listeth to read them. Onelie the table of their names and raigne, and acts done vnder their raigne, I haue compendiouslie abridged, vsing such breuitie as the matter would suffer.

Here is to be noted, that before the reigne of Edward the Confessor, the Danes obtained the crowne vnder their captaine Canutus who reigned yeeres 19

Hardeknutus sonne of Canutus 2
Edward the Confessor an Englishman, son of Ethelred 24

King Egbertus.

Egbert king of the Westsaxons afterward monarch and king of the whole realme.

IN the reigne of Brightricus a little before mentioned about the yeere of Grace 795, there was in his dominion a noble personage, of some called Egbert, of some Ethelbright, who being feared of the same Brightricus because he was of a kingly blood, and neere vnto the crowne, was by the force and conspiracie of the forenamed Brightricus, chased and pursued out of the land of Britaine into France, where he indured till the death of the said Brightricus. After the hearing whereof, Egbert sped him eftsoones out of France, vnto his countrie of Westsax, where he in such wise behaued himselfe, that he obtained the regiment and gouernance of the aboue said kingdome.

In this time came in the Danes, first into the north parts and were driuen out againe.

{Anno 807}

Bernulphus king of Mercia aboue mentioned, with other kings, had this Egbert in such derision, that they made of him diuers scoffing iests, and scorning rimes, all which he sustained for a time. But when he was more established in his kingdome, and had proued the mindes of his subiects, and especially God working withall, he afterward assembled his knights, and gaue to the said Bernulphus a battell in a place called Elinden in the prouince of Hampton; and notwithstanding in that fight was great ods of number, as six or eight against one, yet Egbert (through the might of the Lord which giueth victorie as pleaseth him) had the better, and wan the field; which done, he seazed that lordship into his hand: and that also done, he made war vpon the Kentish Saxons, and at length in likewise obtained the victorie. And as it is in Polychronicon testified, he also subdued Northumberland, and caused the kings of these three kingdomes to liue vnder him as tributaries, or ioyned them to his kingdome: Ex Flor. hist. This Egbert also wan from the Britans or Welchmen, the towne of Chester, which they had kept possession of till that day. After these and other victories, he peaceably inioying the land, called a counsell of his lords at Winchester, where by their aduices he was crowned king and chiefe lord ouer this land, which before that day was called Britain: but then he sent out into all coasts of the land his commandements and commissions, charging straightly that from that day forward the Saxons should bee called Angles, and the land Anglia.

Example what it is to deuide other. Example of patience.

{Anno 826}

Of this victorie went a prouerbe: Rimus cruore rubuit, ruina refitit, figura tabuit.

This land first called Anglia.

About the thirtith yeare of the reigne of Egbert, the heathenish people of the Danes, which a little before had made horrible destruction in Northumberland, and especially in the ile of Lindefarne, where they spoiled the churches, and murdered the ministers, with men, women & children, after a cruell maner, entred now the second time with a great host into this land, and spoiled the ile of Sheppie in Kent, or neere to Kent: where Egbert hearing therof, assembled his people, & met with them at Carrum. But in that conflict he sped not so well as he was wont in times before, but with his knights was compelled to forsake the field. Notwithstanding in the next battell, the said Egbert with a small power ouerthrew a great multitude of them, and so draue them backe. The next yeare following, the said Danes presuming vpon their victorie before, made their returne again into the land westward, where ioyning with the Britains, by the helpe and power of them they assailed the lands of Egbert, and did much harme in many places of his dominion, and elsewhere, so that after this day they were continually abiding in one place of y realme of England or other, till the time of Hardeknutus last king of the Danes blod, so that many of them were married to English women, and many that now bee, or in times past were called Englishmen, are descended of them. And albeit that they were many and sundrie times driuen out of the land, and chased from one country to another, yet that notwithstanding, they euer gathered new strengths and powers, that they abode still within the land.

{Anno 833}

Danes now the second time entred in this land.

{Anno 834}

Fabian. cap. 158. Rog. Houed. lib. 5. cap. 1.

And thus (as by the stories appeareth) this troublesome land of Britain, now called England, hath been hitherto by fiue sundrie outward nations plagued. First by the Romans; then by the Scots and Picts; thirdly, by the Saxons; fourthly, by the Danes, of whose outragious cruelty and hostilitie, our English historiographers do most exclaime and complaine: fiftly by the Normans, which I pray God bee the last.

England fiue times plagued by other nations.

Ex Rog. Houed. lib. 5.

Then it followeth in the storie, that the time of this persecution of the foresaid pagans and Danes continuing, King Egbert when he had ruled the Westsaxons, and ouer the more part of England, by the terme of seuen and thirty yeares, died, and was buried at Winchester, leauing to his son Ethelwolfe his kingdome, which first was bishop of Winchester (as Houeden recordeth) & after vpon necessitie made king, leauing withall and pronouncing this saying to his sonne: Felicem fore si regnum, quod multa rexerat industria, ille consueta genti illi non interrumperet ignauia.

King Ethelwulfus.

{Anno 837}

EThelwulfus the son of Egbert, in his former age had entred into the order of subdeacon, as some others say was made bishop of Winchester; but afterwards being the only son of Egbert, was made king through the dispensation (as Fabian saith) of pope Paschalis: but that cannot bee; for Paschalis then was not bishop: so that by the computation of time, it should rather seeme to be Gregorie the fourth. This Ethelwolfe (as being himselfe once nuzled in that order) was alwaies good and deuout to holy church and religious orders, in so much that he gaue to them the tith of all his goods and lands in Westsaxons, with libertie and freedome from all seruage and ciuill charges. Whereof his chart instrument beareth testimonie after this tenor proceeding, much like to the donation of Ethelbaldus king of Mercians aboue mentioned.

A place in Fabian to be amended.

Guliel. Lib. de gestis pont. Anglor. saith this pope was Leo the fourth.

Ex Flor. histor.

Pro remisso.

Note the blind ignorance and erroneous teaching in those daies.

Hereby may it appeare, how when the churches of England began first to be indued with temporalties and lands; also with priuileges and exemptions inlarged: moreouer (and that which specialtie is to be considered and lamented) what pernicious doctrine was this, wherewith they were led, thus to set remission of their sinnes, and remedie of their soules, in this donation and such other deeds of their donation, contrarie to the information of Gods word, and no small derogation to the crosse of Christ?

These things thus done within the realme, then the said Ethelwolfe the king, taking his iourney to Rome with Alfred his yongest sonne, committed him to the bringing vp of pope Leo the fourth, where he also reedified the English schole at Rome: which being founded by king Offa, or rather by Iue king of Mercians (as in the Flowers of histories is affirmed) was lately in the time of king Ecbert his father consumed with fire. Further and besides, this king gaue & granted there vnto Rome, of euery fire house a penie to be paid throughout his whole land, as king Iue in his dominion had done before. Also he gaue and granted yeerely to be paid to Rome 300 marks, that is, to the mainteining of the light of S. Peter 100 marks, to the light of S. Paul 100 marks, to the vse of the pope also an other hundred. This done, he returning home through France, married there Judith the daughter of Carolus Caluus, the French king: whom he restored afterward (contrarie to the lawes of the Westsaxons) to the title and throne of a queene. For before it was decreed among the Westsaxons (by the occasion of wicked Ethelburga, who poisoned Brigthricus hir owne husband) that after that, no kings wife there should haue the name or place of a queene.

Peter pence throughout the realme granted to Rome.

Monie bestowed to burne daie light.

And forsomuch as I haue here entred into the mention of Judith daughter of Carolus Caluus; the occasion thereof putteth me in memorie, here to insert by the way a matter done, although not in this realme, yet not impertinent to this ecclesiasticall historie. And first to deduct the narration hereof from the first originall; the father of this Carolus Caluus, whose name was Ludouicus, first of that name, called Pius king of France, had two wiues: whereof by the first he had three sonnes, Lotharie, Pipin, and Lewis. Which three sonnes vnnaturallie & vnkindlie conspiring against their father and his second wife, with her sonne their yongest brother, persecuted him so, that through a certaine councell of lords spirituall and temporall, they deposed the same their naturall and right godly father, dispossessing and discharging him of all rule and dominion. Moreouer, caused him to renounce his temporall habit, inclosing him in the monasterie of S. Marke, for a monke or rather a prisoner. All which done, they diuided his empire and kingdome among themselues.

Note heere the holie and wholesome counsels and doings of the spirituall lords.

Ludouicus Pius emperor, king of France.

Thus was Ludouicus Pius, of impious sonnes left desolat. But the power of God, which worketh when as all earthlie power ceaseth, of his diuine mercie so aided and recouered him out of all his tribulation, to this imperiall dignitie againe, that it was to all his enimies confusion, and to all good men a miracle. But this by the way. By his second wife, whose name was Judith, he had this Charles the Bald heere mentioned. Which Judith was thought and so accused to the pope, to be within such degree of alliance, that by the popes law, she might not continue his wife without the popes dispensation. It so fell out in the meane time, that this Ludouicus the emperour, had promoted a yong man named Frederike to be bishop of Vtricht; and to him had giuen sad and good exhortation, that he remembring and following the constancie of his predecessours would maintaine right and truth without all exception of any person, and punish misdoers with excommunication, as well the rich as the poore, with such like words of godlie counsell. Frederike hearing the king thus to say, sitting at dinner with him, as the maner was, being newlie inuested, in these words answered the emperour againe: I thanke your maiestie (saith he) which with your so wholsome exhortation put me in mind of my profession. But I beseech you of your benigne fauour and patience, that I may freelie disclose that which hath long incumbred and pierced my conscience. To whom leaue being giuen, thus he began: I pray you (lord emperor) to shew me heere in your mind (pointing to the fish before him) whether is it more according, to attaine this fish heere present, beginning first at the head or at the taile: What a tale is this (quoth the emperour) of the taile and of the head: At the head (quoth he.) Then Frederike, taking thereof his occasion, proceedeth: Euen so let it be lord emperour (saith he) as you haue said. Let christian faith and charitie first begin with your selfe, as with the head, admonishing you to cease from your fact and error, that your subiects by your example be not boldened to follow your misdoing. Wherefore first forsake you your vnlawfull wedlocke, which you haue made with Judith your neere kinswoman. These words of the new bishop, although they moued Ludouicus the emperour not a little; yet he, with a gentle modestie, and modest silence was contented, suffering the bishop to go home in peace. But the word being vttered in such an audience, could not so be concealed, but spred and burst out in much talke in the whole court, and especiallie among the bishops, consulting earnestlie with themselues about the matter. Through whose counsell and labour so at length it fell, that the emperour was constrained to leaue the companie of his wife, till he had purchased a licence of the bishop of Rome to retaine her againe, who then forgaue the said bishop all that was past. But the woman hired two knights that slue him in his vestments, when he had ended his masse. Ranulphus and Guli. lib. de Pontificib. giue forth this storie in his great commendation to die a martyr. Whereof I haue not to iudge, nor heere to pronounce, but that rather I thinke him to be commended in his dying, then the woman for her killing.

Note, there were two Iudiths, one, the mother of Carolus Caluus, the other, his daughter, who king Ethelwolfe did marrie.

Frederike bishop of Vtricht iudged of some a martyr. Example of the woman more readie in reuenge then the man.

And for so much as mention hath beene made of Ludouicus Pius, heere is to be noted, that in France then was vsed of priests and churchmen, pretious and shining vestures, and golden and rich staring girdles, with rings & other ornaments of gold. Wherefore the said Lewis purchased of the bishop of Rome, a correction for all such as vsed such disordinat apparell, causing them to weare browne and sad colours, according to their sadnesse. Fab.

Of this Lewis the papists doe faine, that because he conuerted certaine of their church goods and patrimonie to the wages of his souldiers, his bodie (say they) was caried out of his tombe by diuels, and was no more seene.

And thus a little hauing digressed out of our course, now let vs returne out of France into England againe. King Ethelwolfus, who comming now from Rome by the countrie of France, was now returned againe into his owne dominion, where he continued not long after.

This Ethelwolfus had especiallie about him two bishops, whose counsell he was most ruled by, Swithinus bishop of Winchester, and Adelstanus bishop of Shireborne. Of the which two, the one was more skilfull in temporall and ciuill affairs touching the kings wars, and filling of his coffers, and other furniture for the king. The other (which was Swithinus) was of a contrarie sort, wholie disposed and inclined to spirituall meditation, and to minister spirituall counsell to the king: who had beene schoolemaster to the king before. Wherein appeared one good condition of this kings nature, among his other vertues, not only in following the precepts and aduertisements of his old schoolemaster: but also in that he like a kind and thankefull pupill did so reuerence his bringer vp, and old schoolemaster (as he called him) that he ceased not, till he made him bishop of Winchester, by the consecration of Celnoch then archbishop of Canturburie. But as concerning the miracles which are read in the church of Winchester, of this Swithinus, them I leaue to be read together with the Iliads of Homer, or tales of Robinhod.

This Gregorie the fourth heere in this present chapter aboue mentioned, was the third pope which succeded after Paschalis the first, being but foure yeeres betwixt them; which Paschalis succeded after Stephan the fourth, who followed after Leo the third next pope vnto Adrian aboue in our historie mentioned, whereas we intreated of Charles the great. From the time of that Adrian the first, vnto pope Adrian the third, the emperours had some stroke in the election (at least in the confirmation) of the Romane pope. Notwithstanding, diuers of those foresaid popes in the meane time began to worke their practises to bring that purpose about. But yet all their deuices could take no full effect, before the said Adrian the third, as hereafter (Christ willing) shall be declared. So that the emperours all this while bare some rule in chosing the popes, and in assembling generall councels. Wherefore by the commandement of Ludouicus the emperour, in the time of this Gregorie the fourth a generall synod was commensed at Aquisgrane, where it was decreed by the said Gregorie and his assistants: First, that euery church should haue sufficient of his owne proper lands & reuenues, to find the priests therof, that none should neede to lacke or goe about a begging. Item, that none of the clergie of what order or degree soeuer he be, should vse any vesture of any pretious or scarlet colour. Neither shall weare rings on their fingers, vnlesse it be when prelats be at masse, or giue their consecrations. Item, that prelats should not keep to great port or families, nor keepe great horses, vse dice, or harlots. And the monks should not exceed measure in gluttonie or riot. Item, that none of the clergie, being either anointed or shauen, should vse either gold or siluer in their shoes, slippers, or girdles, like to Heliogabalus. By this it may be coniectured, what pompe and pride in those daies was crept into the clergie. Moreouer, by the said pope Gregorie the fourth, at the commandement of Ludouicus emperour, the feast of All saints was first brought into the church.

Pope Sergius the second. When the popes names began first to be altered.

After this pope, came Sergius the second, which first brought in the altering of the popes names, because he was named before Os porci, that is, Swines snowt: which also ordained the agnus thrice to be sung at the masse, and the host to be diuided into three parts.

Agnus thrice sung at the masse.

The host diuided into three parts.

Pope Leo the fourth.

After him was pope Leo the fourth, to whom this king Ethelwolfe (as in this present chapter is aboue specified) did commit the tuition of his sonne Alured. By this pope Leo it came in, and was first enacted in a councell of his, that no bishop should be condemned vnder three score and twelue witnesses, according as ye see in the witnesses at the condemnation of Stephan Gardiner, orderlie practised.

No bishop by the popes law to be condemned vnder seuentie and two witnesses.

Item, contrarie to the law of Gregorie the fourth his predecessor, this pope ordained the crosse (all set with gold & pretious stones) to be caried before him, like a pope.

And heere next now followeth and commeth in the whore of Babylon (rightly in her true colours by the permission of God and manifestlie without all tergiuersation) to appeare to the whole world: and that not onely after the spirituall sense, but after the very letter, and the right forme of an whore in deed. For after this Leo aboue mentioned, the cardinals proceeding to their ordinarie election (after a solemne masse of the Holie ghost, to the perpetuall shame of them & of that see) in stead of a man pope, elected an whore in deed to minister sacraments, to say masses, to giue orders, to constitute deacons, priests, and bishops, to promote prelats, to make abbats, to consecrat churches and altars, to haue the reigne and rule of emperors and kings; and so she did in deed, called by name Ione the eight.

A woman pope called Ione the eight.

The church of Rome after their maner of the Holie ghost may erre.

This womans proper name was Gilberta (a Dutch woman of Magunce) who went with an English monke out of the abbey of Fulda in mans apparell vnto Athens, and after through her dexteritie of wit and learning was promoted to the popedome, where she sat two yeeres and sir moneths. At last openly in the face of a generall procession, fell in labor and trauell of child, and so died. By reason whereof, the cardinals yet to this day do auoid to come neere by that street where this shame was taken. By Benedictus the third, who succeeded next in the whorish see, was first ordained (as most writers do record) the dirge to be said for the dead. Albeit before him, Gregorie the third had done in that matter worthilie for his part alreadie.

Pope Benedictus the third. Dirge for the dead.

Pope Nicholas the first.

After him sate pope Nicholas the first, who inlarged the popes decrees with many constitutions, equalling the authoritie of them with the writings of the apostles. He ordained that no secular prince, nor the emperor himselfe, should be present at their councels, vnlesse in matters concerning the faith: to the end that such as they iudged to be heretiks, they should execute and murther. Also, that no laie men should sit in iudgement vpon the clergie men, or reason vpon the popes power. Item, that no christian magistrat should haue any power vpon any prelat, alleging that a prelat is called god. Item that all church seruice should be in Latine: yet notwithstanding, dispensing with the Sclauonians and Polonians to retaine still their vulgar language. Sequences in the masse were by him first allowed. By this pope priests began to be restrained and debarred from marrying: whereof Hulderike bishop of Ausbrough (a learned and an holie man) sending a letter vnto the pope grauely and learnedly refuteth and reclameth against his vndiscreet proceedings touching that matter. The copie of which letter, as I thought it vnworthie to be suppressed, so I iudged it heere worthie and meet for the better instruction of the reader to be inserted. The words thereof heere follow out of Latine into English translated.

The marriage of priests begun to be forbidden.

A learned epistle of Hulderike bishop of Ausbrough, sent to pope Nicholas the first, proouing by probations substantiall, that priests ought not to be restrained from marriage.

Anno 867

Nicholao domino & patri, peruigili sanctæ Romanæ ecclesiæ prouisori, Huldericus solo nomine episcopus, amorē vt filius, timorē vt seruus. Cùm tua (ô pater & domine) decreta super clericorum continentiam, &c. The same in English.

A letter written to pope Nicholas concerning priests not to refraine from marriage.

Hulderike bishop onely by name, vnto the reuerend father Nicholas the vigilant prouisor of the holie church of Rome, with due commendation sendeth loue as a sonne, and feare as a seruant. Vnderstanding (reuerend father) your decrees which you sent to me concerning the single life of the clergie, to be far discrepant from all discretion, I was troubled partly with feare, and partly with heauinesse. With feare, for that (as it is said) the sentence of the pastor, whether it be iust or vniust, is to be feared. For I was afraid for the weake hearers of the scripture (which scarslie obey the iust sentence of their pastour) much more despising this vniust decreement, through the onerous and importable transgression of their pastor, should shew themselues disobedient. With heauinesse I was troubled, and with compassion, for that I doubted how the members of the bodie should do, their head being so greatly out of frame. For what can be more grieuous or more to be lamented, touching the state of the church, then for you, being the bishop of the principall see, to whom apperteineth the regiment of the whole church, to swerue neuer so little out of the right way? Certes in this you haue not a little erred, in that you haue gone about to constraine your clergie to singlenesse of life, through your imperious tyrannie: whom rather you ought to stir vp to the continencie of marriage. For is not this to be counted a violence and tyrannie to the iudgement of all wise men, when a man is compelled by your decrees to doe that which is against the institution of the gospell and the proceeding of the Holie ghost? Seeing then there be so many holie examples both of the old and new testament, teaching vs (as you know) due information: I desire your patience not to thinke it grieuous for me to bring a few heere out of many.

Priests marriage in the old law permitted, in the new law not forbidden.

First in the old law, the Lord permitteth marriage vnto the priests, which afterward in the new law we do not reade to be restrained, but in the gospell thus he saith: There be some eunuchs which haue gelded themselues for the kingdome of heauen, but all men do not take this word; he that can take it, let him take it. Wherefore the apostle saith, concerning virgins, I haue no commandement of the Lord, but onlie I giue counsell. Which counsell also all men do not take, as in the commandement of the Lord before; but many there be, false dissemblers and flatterers, going about to please men and not God, whom we see vnder a false pretence of continencie, to fall into horrible wickednes: some to lie with their fathers wiues, some to be Sodomits, & not to abhor to play the beasts with brute beasts. And therefore lest through the infection of this wicked pestilence, the state of the church should too much go to ruine: therfore he said, Because of fornication, let euery man haue his owne wife. Touching which saying, our false hypocrits falslie do lie and faine: as though only it pertained to the laitie, and not to them. And yet they themselues seeming to be set in the most holie order, are not afraid to abuse other mens wiues, and as we see (with weeping eies) all they doe outrage in the foresaid wickednesse.

The inconuenience of single life.

The saying of the apostle, Let euery one haue his owne wife.

These men haue not rightlie vnderstood the scripture, whose brests while they sucke so hard in stead of milke they sucke out bloud. For the saying of the apostle: Let euery man haue his owne wife, doth except none in very deed, but him only which hath the gift of continencie, prefixing with himselfe to keepe and to continue his virgin in the Lord. Wherefore (ô reuerend father) it shall be your part to cause and ouersee, that whosoeuer, either with hand or mouth, hath made a vow of continencie, and afterward would forsake, either should be compelled to keepe his vow, or else by lawfull authoritie should be deposed from his order.

And to bring this to passe, you shall not only haue me, but also all other of my order, to be helpers vnto you. But that you may vnderstand, that such which know not what a vow doth meane, are not to be violentlie compelled thereunto, heare what the apostle saith to Timothie: A bishop (saith he) must be irreprehensible, the husband of one wife. Which sentence lest you should turne and applie onely to the church; marke what he inferreth after: He that knoweth not (saith he) to rule his owne household and familie, how should he rule the church of God? And likewise the deacons (saith he) let them be the husbands of one wife, which haue knowledge to gouerne their owne house and children. And this wife, how she is woont to be blest of the priest, you vnderstand sufficientlie I suppose, by the decrees of holie Syluester the pope.

This decree is contrarie to the bishops and prelats in queene Maries time.

To these and such other holie sentences of the scripture agreeth also he that is the writer of the rule of the clergie, writing after this maner: A clerke must be chast and continent, or els let him be coupled in the bands of matrimonie, hauing one wife. Whereby it is to be gathered, that the bishop and deacon are noted infamous and reprehensible, if they be diuided in more women then one: otherwise, if they doe forsake one vnder the pretence of religion, both they together, as well the bishop as the deacon be heere condemned by the canonicall sentence, which saith: Let no bishop or priest forsake his owne wife, vnder the colour and pretence of religion. If he do forsake her, let him be excommunicat. And if he so continue, let him be degraded. S. Augustine also (a man of discreet holinesse) saith in these words: There is no offense so great or grieuous, but it is to auoid a greater euill.

Furthermore, we reade in the second booke of the tripartite historie: that when the councell of Nice, going about to establish the same decree, would enact that bishops, priests, and deacons, after their consecration, either should abstaine vtterlie from their owne wiues, or els should be deposed; then Paphnutius (one of those holie martyrs, whom the emperor Maximus had put out the right eie, and hockt their left legs) rising vp amongst thē, withstood their purposed decreement: confessing marriage to be honorable, and calling the bed of matrimonie to be chastitie, and so persuaded the councell from making that law, declaring thereby what occasion might come to themselues and their wiues of fornication. And thus much did Paphnutius (being vnmaried himselfe) declare vnto them. And the whole councell commending his sentence, gaue place thereto, and left the matter freelie without compulsion, to the will of euery man, to doe therein as he thought.

Notwithstanding there be some, which take S. Gregorie for their defence in this matter, whose temeritie I laugh at, and ignorance I lament: for they know not, being ignorantlie deceiued, ceiued, how dangerouſlie the decree of this hereſie was (being made of S. Gregorie) who afterwards well reuoked the ſame, with condigne fruite of repentance.

More then ſix thouſand heads of infants found in the popes mote through the wicked decree of the ſingle life of prieſts. Let prieſts note well the ſaying of Gregorie.

For vpon a certeine daie as he ſent vnto his fiſhpond to haue fiſh, & did ſee more than ſix thouſand infants heads brought to him, which were taken out of the ſame pond or mote, did greatlie repent in himſelfe the decree made before, touching the ſingle life of prieſts, which he confeſſed to be the cauſe of that ſo lamentable a murther. And ſo purging the ſame with condigne fruite of repentance, altered againe the things which he had decreed before, commending that counſell of the Apoſtle, which ſaith: It is better to marrie than to burne; adding moreouer of himſelfe thereunto, and ſaying: It is better to marrie than to giue occaſion of death.

Peraduenture if theſe men had read with me this, which ſo hapned, I thinke they would not be ſo raſh in their doing and iudging; fearing at leaſt the Lords commandement: Doe not iudge, that you be not iudged. And S. Paul ſaith, Who art thou that iudgeſt an other mans ſeruant? Either he ſtandeth or falleth to his owne maſter: but he ſhall ſtand; for the Lord is mightie and able to make him ſtand. Therefore let your holines ceaſe to compell and inforce thoſe, whom onelie you ought to admoniſh, leſt through your owne priuat commandement (which God forbid) you be found cõtrarie, as well to the old teſtament, as to the new. For as S. Auguſtine ſaith to Donatus, This is onelie that we do feare in your iuſtice, leſt (not for the conſideration of chriſtian lenitie, but for the greeuouſneſſe and greatneſſe of tranſgreſſions committed) you be thought to vſe violence in executing puniſhment of that which onelie we doe deſire you (by Chriſt) not to do. For tranſgreſſions are ſo to be puniſhed, that the life of the tranſgreſſors may repent. Alſo an other ſaying of Auguſtine we would you to remember, which is this: Nil nocendi fiat cupiditate, omnia conſulendi charitate, & nihil fiat immaniter, nihil inhumaniter; that is, Let nothing be done through the greedines of hurting, but all things through the charitie of profiting: neither let any thing be done cruellie, nothing vngentlie. Item, of the ſame Auguſtine it is written: In the feare and name of Chriſt I exhort you, which of you ſoeuer haue not the goods of this world, be not greedie to haue them. Such as haue them, preſume not too much vpon them. For I ſay, to haue them is no damnation; but if you preſume vpon them, that is damnation, if for the hauing of them you ſhall ſeeme great in your owne ſight, or if you do forget the common condition of man through the excellencie of any thing you haue. Vſe therefore therein due diſcretion, tempered with moderation, the which cup of diſcretion is drawne out of the founteine of the apoſtolike preaching, which ſaith: Art thou looſe from thy wife? Do not ſeeke for thy wife. Art thou bound to thy wife? Seeke not to be looſed from hir. Where alſo it followeth: Such as haue wiues, let them be as though they had them not, and they that vſe the world, let them be as not vſing it.

Auguſt. ad Donatum.

Note well the ſaying of Auguſtine.

What it is to marrie in the Lord.

Item, concerning the Widow, he ſaith: Let hir marrie to whom ſhe will, onlie in the Lord. To marrie in the Lord, is nothing elſe but to attempt nothing in contracting of Matrimonie, which the Lord doth forbid. Ieremie alſo ſaith: Truſt not in the words of lies, ſaying: The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord. The which ſaying of Ieremie, Hierome expounding, ſaith thus: This may agree alſo, and be applied to ſuch virgins, which brag and vaunt of their virginitie with an impudent face, pretending chaſtitie, when they haue an other thing in their conſcience, and know not how the apoſtle defineth the virgine, that ſhe ſhould be holie in bodie, and alſo in ſpirit. For what auaileth the chaſtitie of the bodie, if the mind inwardlie be deflowred? Or if it haue not the other vertues, which the propheticall ſermon doth deſcribe. The which vertues, forſomuch as we ſee partly to be in you, and becauſe we are not ignorant, that this diſcretion (although neglected in this part, yet in the other actions of your life to be kept honeſtlie of you) do not deſpaire, but you will alſo ſoone amend the little lacke which is behind. And therefore with as much grauitie as we can, we ceaſe not to call vpon you, to correct and amend this your negligence. For although according to our common calling, a biſhop is greater than a prieſt, yet Auſtin being leſſe then Hierome (notwithſtanding the good correction proceeding from the leſſer to the greater) was not to be refuſed or diſdained, eſpeciallie when he which is corrected, is found to ſtriue againſt the truth to pleaſe mẽ. For as S. Auguſtine ſaith, writing to Boniface: The diſputations of all men, be they neuer ſo catholike or approoued perſons, ought not to be had in ſtead of the canonicall ſcriptures. So that we may diſprooue or refuſe (ſauing the honor & reuerence which is due vnto them) any thing that is in their writings, if any thing there be found cõtrarie to truth. And what can be found more contrarie to the truth then this? When as the truth it ſelfe, ſpeaking of continencie, not of one onelie, but of all together (the number onlie excepted of them which haue profeſſed continencie) ſaith: He that can take, let him take: the which ſaying, theſe men (mooued, I cannot tell by what occaſion) do turne and ſay: He that cannot take, let him be accurſed. And what can be more fooliſh amõgſt men, then whẽ any Biſhop or Archdeacon run themſelues headlong into all kind of luſt, to adulterie & inceſt, & alſo ſodomitrie? yet ſhame not to ſaie, that the chaſt marriage of prieſts doth ſtinke before them: and as void of all compaſſion of true righteouſneſſe, doe not deſire or admoniſh their clerks, as their fellow ſeruants to abſteine, but to command them and inforce them as ſeruants, violentlie to abſteine. Vnto the which imperious commandement of theirs or counſell (whether you will call it) they ad alſo this fooliſh & filthie ſuggeſtion, ſaying: that, It is more honeſt, priuilie to haue to do with many women, then apertlie in the ſight and conſciences of many men to be bound to one wife. The which truly they would not ſay, if they were either of him, or in him, which ſaith: Wo to you Phariſies, which do all things before men: And by the Pſalmiſt: Becauſe they pleaſe men, they are confounded, for the Lord hath deſpiſed them. Theſe be the men, who rather ought to perſwade vs that we ſhould ſhame to ſin priuilie in the ſight of him, to whom all things be open, then ſeeme in the ſight of men to be cleane. Theſe men therefore, although through their ſinfull wickednes deſerue no counſell of godlines to be giuen them: yet we not forgetting our humanitie, ceaſe not to giue them counſell by the authoritie of Gods word, which ſeeketh all mens ſaluation, deſiring them by the bowels of charitie, and ſaying with the words of ſcripture: Caſt out (thou hypocrite) firſt the beame out of thine own eie, & then thou ſhalt ſee to caſt the mote out of the eie of thy brother.

The abſurd saying and contrarie doing of papiſts.

Moreouer, this alſo we deſire them to attend what the Lord ſaith of the adulterous woman: Which of you that is without ſin, let him caſt the firſt ſtone againſt her. As though he would ſay: If Moſes bid you, I alſo bid you. But yet I require you that be the competent miniſters and executors of the law, take heed what ye ad thereunto, take heed alſo (I pray you) what you are your ſelues: for if (as the ſcripture ſaith) thou ſhalt well conſider thy ſelfe, thou wilt neuer defame or detract another.

Moreouer, it is ſignified vnto vs alſo, that ſome there be of the, which (when they ought like vnto good ſhepherds to giue their liues for the Lords flock) yet are they puffed vp with ſuch pride, that without all reaſon they preſume to rend and teare the Lords flock with whippings and beatings, whoſe vnreaſonable doings S. Gregorie bewailing, thus ſaith: Quid fiat de ouibus quando paſtores lupi fiunt? that is: What ſhall become of the ſheepe when the paſtors themſelues be woolues? But who is ouercome but he which exerciſeth crueltie? Or who ſhall iudge the perſecutor, but he which gaue patientlie his backe to ſtripes? And this is the fruite which commeth to the church by ſuch perſecutors, alſo which commeth to the clergie by ſuch deſpightfull handling of their biſhops or rather infidels. For why may you not call them infidels, of whom S. Paul thus ſpeaketh, and writeth to Timothie? that, In the latter daies there ſhall certeine depart from the faith, giue heed to ſpirits of error and doctrine of diuels, of them that ſpeake falſe through hypocriſie, and hauing their conſciences marked with an hote iron, forbidding to marrie, and commanding to abſteine from meates, &c. And this is (if it be well marked) the whole handfull of the darnell and cockell growing amongſt the corne: this is the couent of all madneſſe, that whiles they of the clergie be compelled to relinquiſh the companie of their owne lawfull wiues; they become afterward fornicators and adulterers with other women, and wicked miniſters of other ſinfull filthineſſe. Theſe be they which bring into the church of God this hereſie (as blind guides leading the blind) that it might be fulfilled which the Pſalme ſpeaketh of, as foreſeeing the errors of ſuch men, & accurſing them after this maner: Let their eies be blinded that they ſee not, and bow downe alwaies their backe. For ſo much then (ô apoſtolical ſir) as no man which knoweth you, is ignorant, that if you through the light of your diſcretion had vnderſtood and ſeene what poiſoned peſtilence might haue come into the church through the ſentence of this your decree, they would neuer haue conſented to the ſuggeſtions of certaine wicked perſons. Wherefore we counſell you by the fidelitie of our due ſubiection, that with all diligence you would put away ſo great ſlander from the church of God: and through your diſcreet diſcipline, you will remoue this Phariſaicall doctrine from the flocke of God: ſo that this onely Sunamite of the Lords (vſing no more adulterous husbands) doe not ſeparate the holie people, and the kinglie prieſthood from hir ſpouſe which is Chriſt, through an vnrecouerable diuorcement: ſeeing that no man without chaſtitie (not onlie in the virgins ſtate, but alſo in the ſtate of matrimonie) ſhall ſee our Lord, who with the Father and the Holie Ghoſt liueth and reigneth for euer, Amen.

¶ By this epiſtle of biſhop Hulderike (aboue prefired) the matter is plaine (gentle reader) to conceiue what was then the ſentence of learned men concerning the marriage of miniſters: but that heere by the waie, the reader is to be admoniſhed, that this epiſtle which by error of the writer is referred to pope Nicholas the firſt, in my mind is rather to be attributed to the name and time of Nicholas the ſecond, or Nicholas the third.

After this pope Nicholas ſucceeded Adrianus the ſecond, Ioannes the ninth, Martinus the ſecond. After theſe came Adrian the third, & Stephan the fift. By this Adrian it was firſt decreed that no Emperour after that time ſhould intermeddle or haue any thing to do in the election of the Pope. And thus began the Emperours firſt decaie, and the papacie to ſwell and riſe aloft.

And thus much concerning Romish matters for this time.

Then to returne where we left, touching the storie of king Ethelwolfe. About the latter end of his reigne, the Danes which before had inuaded the realme, in the time of king Egbert, as is aboue declared, now made their reentrie againe, with three and thirtie ships arriuing about Hamshire: through the barbarous tyrannie of whom, much bloudshed and murther hapned heere among Englishmen, in Dorsetshire, about Portsmouth in Kent, in Eastangle, in Lindsie, at Rochester, about London, and in Westsex, where Ethelwolfe the king was ouercome, besides diuers other kings and dukes, whom the Danes dailie approching, in great multitudes, in diuers victories had put to flight. At length king Ethelwolfe, with his sonne Ethelbaldus warring against them in Southerie, at Okley, draue them to the sea, where they houering a space, after a while brast in againe with horrible rage and crueltie, as hereafter (Christ willing) shall be declared, so much as to our purpose shall serue, professing in this historie to write not of matters externe and politike, but onelie perteining to the church. The cause of this great affliction sent of God vnto this realme thus I found expressed and collected in a certeine old written storie, which hath no name: the words of which writer, for the same cause as he thought to recite them, writing (as he saith) Ad cautelam futurorum, I thought also for the same heere not to be omitted, albeit in all parts of his commendation I do not fullie with him accord. The words of the writer be these.

Ex vetusto exemplo historiæ Cariane. W. C. I.

In Anglorum quidem ecclesia primitiua, religio clarissimè resplenduit: ita vt reges & reginæ, & principes ac duces, consules, & barones, &c. In English thus.

The cause of Gods wrath, whereby the realme of England was scourged by the Danes.

In the primitiue church (saith he) of the Englishmen, religion did most cleerelie shine, in so much that kings, queenes, princes and dukes, consuls, barons, and rulers of churches, incensed with the desire of the kingdome of heauen, labouring and striuing among themselues to enter into monkerie, into voluntarie exile and solitarie life, forsooke all and followed the Lord. Where, in processe of time, all vertue so much decaied among them, that in fraud and trecherie none seemed like vnto them: neither was to them any thing odious or hatefull but pietie and iustice. Neither any thing in price or honor, but ciuill war and shedding of innocent bloud. Wherefore almightie God sent vpon them pagan and cruell nations, like swarmes of bees, which neither spared women, nor children, as Danes, Norwegians, Gothes, Sueuians, Vandals, and Frisians. Who, from the beginning of the reigne of king Ethelwolfe, till the comming of the Normans, by the space neere of two hundred and thirtie yeers, destroied their sinfull land frō the one side of the sea to the other, from man also to beast. For why? They inuading England oft times, of euery side, went not about to subdue and possesse it, but onely to spoile and destroy it. And if it had chanced them at any time to be ouercome of Englishmen, it auailed nothing, when as other nauies still with greater power in other places were readie, vpon a sudden and vnawares, to approch vpon them, &c. Historia Cariana.

Thus far haue you the words of mine author, declaring the cause which prouoked Gods anger: whereunto may be adioined the wickednesse, not onely of them but of their forefathers also before them, who falselie breaking the faith and promise made with the Britains, did cruellie murther their nobles, wickedlie oppressed their commons, impiouslie persecuted the innocent christians, iniuriouslie possessed their land and habitation: chasing the inhabitants out of house and countrie, besides the violent murther of the monks of Bangor, and diuers foule slaughters among the poore Britains, who sent for them to be their helpers. Wherefore Gods iust recompense falling vpon them from that time, neuer suffered them to be quiet from forren enimies, till the comming of William the Norman, &c.

Another cause rendred, why England was scourged of the Danes.

Moreouer, concerning the outward occasions giuen of the Englishmens parts, moouing the Danes first to inuade the realme, I find in certeine stories two most especiallie alligned. The one vniustlie giuen, and iustlie taken. The other not giuen iustlie, and vniustlie taken. Of the which two, the first was giuen in Northumberland by meanes of Osbright, reigning vnder-king of Westsaxons, in the north parts. This Osbright vpon a time iourneying by the way, turned into the house of one of his nobles called Buer. Who hauing at home a wife of great beautie (he being absent abrode) the king after his dinner (allured with the excellencie of her beautie) tooke her to a secret chamber, where he forceablie (contrarie to her will) did rauish her: whereupon she being greatlie dismaied, and vered in her mind, made her mone to her husband returning, of this violence & iniurie receiued. Buer consulting with his friends, first went to the king, resigning into his hands all such seruice and possessions which he did hold of him: that done, tooke shipping and sailed into Denmarke, where he had great friends, and had his bringing vp before. There making his mone to Godrinus the king, desired his aid in reuenging of the great villanie of Osbright against him and his wife. Godrinus hearing this, and glad to haue some iust quarrell to enter that land, leuied an armie with all speed; and preparing all things necessarie for the same, sendeth forth Inguar and Hubba two brethren, his cheefe captains, with an innumerable multitude of Danes into England; who first arriuing at Holdernesse, there burnt vp the countrie, and killed without mercie, both men, women and children, whom they could lay hands vpon. Then marching toward Yorke, entred their battell with the foresaid Osbright, where he with the most part of his armie was slaine. And so the Danes entred the possession of the citie of Yorke. Some others say, and is by the most part of storie writers recorded, that the chiefe cause of the comming of Inguar and Hubba with the Danes, was to reuenge king Edmund reigning vnder the Westsaxons ouer the Eastangles in Northfolke and Suffolke: for the murthering of a certeine Dane being father to Inguar and Hubba, which was falslie imputed to king Edmund. The storie is thus told.

Inguar and Hubba captains of the Danes.

An other cause of the comming of the Danes.

A certeine noble man of the Danes of the kings stocke called Lothbroke father to Inguar and Hubba, entring vpon a time with his hawke into a certeine schaffe or cockebote alone; by chance through tempest was driuen with his hawke to the coast of Northfolke named Rodham, where he being found and deteined, was presented to the king. The king vnderstanding his parentage, and seeing his case, entertained him in his court accordinglie, and euerie day more and more perceiuing his actiuities and great dexteritie in hunting and hawking, bare spectall fauour vnto him. In so much that the kings falconer, or maister of his game, bearing priuie enuie against him, secretlie as they were hunting togither in a wood, did murther him, and threw him in a bush. This Lothbroke, being murthered, within two or three daies began to be missed in the kings house: of whom no tidings could be heard, but onelie by a dog or spaniell of his, which continuing in the wood with the corps of his master, at sundrie times came & fawned vpon the king: so long that at the length they following the trace of ỹ hound, were brought to the place where Lothbroke lay. Whereupon inquisition being made, at length by certeine circumstances of words and other euidences, it was knowne how and by whom he was murthered, that was by the kings huntsman named Berike. Who thereupon being conuicted, was set into the same bote of Lothbroke, alone and without any tackling to driue by seas, either to be saued by the weither, or to be drowned in the deepe. And as it chanced Lothbroke from Denmarke to be driuen to Northfolke, so it hapned that from Northfolke he was carried into Denmarke, where the bote of Lothbroke being well knowne, hands were laid vpon him, and inquisition made of the partie. In fine in his torments, to saue himselfe, he vttered an vntruth of king Edmund, saying, that the king had put him to death in the countrie of Northfolke. Whereupon grudge first was conceiued, then an armie appointed, and great multitudes sent into England to reuenge that fact, where first they arriuing in Northumberland, destroied (as is said) those parts first. From thence sailing into Northfolke they exercised the like tyrannie there, vpon the inhabitants thereof, especiallie vpon the innocent prince, and blessed martyr of God, king Edmund. Concerning the farther declaration whereof heereafter shall follow (Christ our Lord so permitting) more to be spoken, as place and obseruation of time and yeeres shall require.

Lothbroke father to Inguar and Hubba.

What mischiefe enuie worketh.

Murther will out.

In the meane season, king Ethelwolfe in this chapter heere presentlie touched, when he had chased the foresaid Danes (as is aboue rehearsed) from place to place, causing them to take the sea, he in the meane while departeth himselfe both from land and life: leauing behind him foure sonnes, which reigned euerie one in his order, after the decease of their father. The names of whom were Ethelbaldus, Ethelbrightus, Etheredus, and Alueredus.

King Ethelwolfe deceaseth.

King Ethelbald.

KIng Ethelbald the eldest sonne of Ethelwolfe, succeeding his father in the prouince of Westsax, and Ethelbright in the prouince of Kent, reigned both together the terme of fiue yeeres, one with the other. Of the which two, Ethelbald the first left this infamie behind him in stories, for marrying and lying with his stepmother, wife to his owne father, named Iudith. After these two succeeded Ethelred, the third sonne, who in his time was so incumbred with the Danes, bursting in on euerie side, especiallie about Yorke (which citie they then spoiled and burnt vp) that he in one yeere stood in nine battels against them, with the helpe of Alured his brother. In the beginning of this kings reigne, the Danes landed in east England, or Northfolke and Suffolke. But (as Fabian writeth) they were compelled to forsake that countrie, and so tooke againe shipping, and sailed northward, and landed in Northumberland: where they were met of the kings then there reigning, called Osbright and Ella, which gaue to them a strong fight. But notwithstanding the Danes, with the helpe of such as inhabited the countrie, wan the citie of Yorke, and held it a certeine season, as is aboue foretouched.

Anno 867

King Ethelred. Yorke burned by the Danes.

In the reigne of this Ethelred, the Northumberlanders rebelling against the king, thought to recouer againe the former state of their kingdome out of the Westsaxons hand, by reason of which discord (as happeth in all lands where diuersion tion is) the strength of the English nation was thereby not a little weakened, and the Danes the more thereby preuailed.

About the latter time of the reigne of this Ethelred, which was about the yeare of our Lord 870, certeine of the foresaid Danes being thus possessed of the north countrie: after their cruell persecution and murther done there (as partlie is touched before) toke shipping from thence, intending to saile toward the Eastangles, who by the way vpon the sea met with a fleet of Danes: whereof the captains or leaders were named Inguar and Hubba. Who ioining all together in one counsell, made all one course,, and lastlie landed in east England, or Northfolke, and in processe of time came to Thetford. Therof hearing Edmund, then vnder-king of that prouince, assembled an host that gaue to them battell. But Edmund and his companie was forced to forsake the field, and the king with a few persons fled vnto the castell of Framingham, whom the Danes pursued. But he in short while after yeelded himselfe to the persecution of the Danes: answering in this maner to the messenger, that told him in the name of Inguar prince of the Danes; which most victorious (saith he) was come with innumerable legions, subduing both by sea and land manie nations vnto him: and so now arriued in those parts, requireth him likewise to submit himselfe, yeelding to him his hid treasures, and such other goods of his ancestors, and so to reigne vnder him: which thing if he would not doe, he should (said he) be iudged vnworthie both of life and reigne. Edmund hearing this proud message of the pagan, consulted with certeine of his friends: and amongst others, with one of his bishops, being then his secretarie, who seeing the present danger of the king, gaue him counsell to yeeld to the conditions. Vpon this the king pausing a little with himselfe, at length rendred this answer: bidding the messenger go to tell his lord in these words, that Edmund a christian king, for the loue of temporall life, will not submit himselfe to a pagan duke, vnles he before would be a christian. Incontinent vpon the same, the wicked and craftie Dane approching in most hastie speed vpon the king, incountred with him in battell (as some say) at Thetford: where the king being put to the worse, and pitying the terrible slaughter of his men, thinking with himselfe rather to submit his owne person to danger, then his people should be slaine, did flie (as Fabian saith) to the castell of Framingham, or (as mine author writeth) to Halesdon, now called S. Edmundsburie, where this blessed man, being on euerie side compassed of his cruell enimies, yeelded himselfe to their persecution. And for that he would not renie or denie Christ and his lawes, they therefore most cruellie bound him vnto a tree, and caused him to be shot to death: and lastlie caused his head to be smitten from his bodie, and cast into the thicke bushes. Which head and bodie at the same time was by his friends taken vp, and solemnlie buried at the said Halesdon, otherwise now named S. Edmundsburie. Whose brother named Edwoldus (notwithstanding of right the kingdome fell next vnto him) setting apart the liking and pleasure of the world, became an heremit at the abbeie of Cerum, in the countrie of Dorset.

After the martyrdome of this blessed Edmund, when the cruell Danes had sufficientlie robbed and spoiled that countrie, they toke againe their ships, & landed in Southerie, and continued their iourney till they came to the towne of Reading, and there wan the towne with the castell, where (as Cambrensis saith) within three daies of their thither comming, the foresaid Inguar and Hubba captains of the Danes, as they went in purchasing of their preies or booties, were slaine at a place called Englefield. Which princes of the Danes thus slaine, the rest of them kept whole together, in such wise that the Westsaxons might take of them none aduantage. But yet within few daies after, the Danes were holden so short, that they were forced to issue out of the castell, and to defend them in plaine battell. In the which (by the industrie of king Ethelred and of Alured his brother) the Danes were discomfited, and manie of them slaine: which discomfort made them flie againe into the castell, and there kept them for a certeine time. The king then committing the charge of them to Ethelwold duke of Baroke or Barkshire, so departed. But when the Danes knew of the kings departure, they brake suddenlie out of their hold, and toke the duke vnprouided, and slue him, and much of his people. And so adioining themselues with others that were scattered in the countrie, imbattelled them in such wise, that of them was gathered a strong host.

As the tidings hereof was brought vnto king Ethelred (which put him in great heauinesse) word also was brought the same time of the landing of Olrike, king of Denmarke: who with assistance of the other Danes had gathered a great host, and were imbattelled vpon Athdon. To this battell king Ethelred with his brother Alured (forced by great need) sped themselues to withstand the Danes. At which time the king a little staying behind, being yet at his seruice, Alured which was comen before, had entred alreadie into the whole fight with the Danes: who stroke together with huge violence. The king being required to make speed (he being then at seruice and meditations) such was his deuotion, that he would not stirre out one foot, before the seruice was fullie complet. In this meane while, the Danes so fiercely inuaded Alured and his men, that they wan the hill: and the christian men were in the vallete, and in great danger to lose the whole field. Neuertheless, through the grace of God, and their godlie manhood, the king comming from his seruice, with his fresh souldiors recouered the hill of the infidels: and so discomfited the Danes that daie, that in flying alway not onely they lost the victorie, but most part also of them their liues. In so much that their duke or king Olrike or Olege, and fiue of their dukes, with much of their people were slaine, and the rest chased vnto Reading towne.

After this, the Danes yet reassembled their people, and gathered a new host, so that within fifteene daies they met at Basingstoke, and there gaue battell vnto the king, and had the better. Then the king againe gathered his men, which at that field were disparkled, and with fresh souldiours to them accompanied, met the Danes within two moneths after at the towne of Merton, where he gaue them a sharp battell: so that much people were slaine as well of the christians, as of the Danes, but in the end the Danes had the honour of the field, and king Ethelred there was wounded, and therefore faine to saue himselfe.

After these two fields thus wonne by the Danes, they obteined great circuit of ground, and destroied man and child that would not yeeld to them. And churches and temples they turned to the vse of stables, and other vile occupations.

Thus the king beset with enemies on euerie side, seeing the land so miserablie oppressed of the Danes, his knights and souldiors consumed, his owne land of Westsaxons in such desolation, he being also wounded himselfe, but speciallie for that he sending his commissions into Northumberland, into Mercia, and Eastanglia, could haue of them but small or little comfort (because they through wicked rebellion were more willing to take the part of the Danes then of their king) was sore perplexed therewithall, as the other kings were both before him and after him, at that time. So that, as Malmesburie witnesseth, Magis optarent honestum exitium, quam tam acerbum imperium: that is, They rather wished honestlie to die, then with such trouble and sorrow to reigne. And thus this king not long after deceassed, when he had reigned (as Fabian saith) eight yeares, or as Malmesburie writeth, but fiue yeares. During which time of his reigne, notwithstanding his so great troubles and vexations in martiall affaires (as is in some stories mentioned) he founded the house or college of canons at Excester, and was buried at the abbeie of Winborne or Wiborne. After whose decease, for lacke of issue of his bodie, the rule of the land fell vnto his brother Alured.

AMong the Saxon kings hitherto in this storie afore mentioned, I find few or none to be preferred (or almost to be compared) to this Alured or Alfred, for the great and singular qualities in this king, worthie of high renowme and commendation: whether we behold in him the valiant acts and manifold trauels, which he continuallie from time to time sustained against his enimies in wars, during almost all the time of his reigne, for the publike preseruation of his people: or whether we consider in him his godlie and excellent vertues, ioined with a publike and tender care, and a zealous studie for the common peace and tranquillitie of the weale publike: appearing as well in his prudent lawes by him both carefullie set forth, & with the like care executed; as also by his own priuat exercises touching the vertuous institution of his life: or whether we respect that in him, which with equall praise matcheth with both the other before: that is, his notable knowledge of good letters, with a feruent loue and princelie desire to set forth the same through all his realme, before his time both rude and barbarous. All which his heroicall properties, ioined together in one prince, as it is a thing most rare, and seldome seene in princes now adaies: so I thought the same the more to be noted and exemplified in this good king. Thereby either to moue other rulers and princes in these our daies, to his imitation, or els to shew them what hath beene in times past in their ancestors, which ought to be, & yet is not found in them. Wherfore of these three parts to discourse either part in order, first we will enter to intreat of his acts and painefull trauels sustained in defence of the realme publike, against the raging tyrannie of the Danes, as they be described in the Latine histories of Roger Houeden, and Huntington: whom Fabian also seemeth in this part somewhat to follow. King Alfred therefore, the first of all the English kings, taking his crowne & vnction at Rome of pope Leo (as Malmesburie and Polychronicon do record) in the beginning of his reigne, perceiuing his lords and people much wasted and decaied, by the reason of the great wars of Ethelred had against the Danes: yet as well as he could, gathered a strength of men vnto him, and in the second moneth that he was made king, he met with the Danes beside Wilton, where he gaue to them battell. But being far ouermatched, through the multitude of the contrarie part, was put there to the worse: although not without a great slaughter of the pagan armie. Which armie then of the Danes, after that victorie, by compaction made with king Alfred, to depart out of his dominion of Westsax, remoued from Reading to London, don, where they abode all that winter. Where Halden their king, taking truce with Burthred king of Mercians, the next yeare following voided those parts, and drew to Lindsey, in robbing and spoiling the townes and villages as they went, and holding the common people vnder their seruage. From thence after to Repingdon, where they ioining with the three other kings of the Danes (called Surdzim, Osketell, and Hamond) grew thereby in mightie force and strength. Who then diuiding their armie in two parts, the one halfe remained with Halden in the countrie of Northumberland: the residue were with the other three kings, wintering & soiourning all the next yeare at Grantbridge, which was the fourth yeare of king Alfred. In the which yeare king Alfred his men had a conflict on the sea with six of the Danes ships, of which one they tooke, the other fled awaie. In this yeare went Rollo the Dane into Normandie, where he was duke thirtie yeares, and afterward was baptised in the faith of Christ, and named Robert. The foresaid armie of the three Dane kings aboue mentioned from Grantbridge returned againe to Westsaronie, and entred the castell of Warrham: where Alfred with a sufficient power of men was readie to assault them. But the Danes seeing his strength, durst not attempt with him, but sought delaies, whilest more aid might come. In the meane season they were constrained to intreat for truce: leauing also sufficient pledges in the kings hand, promising moreouer vpon their oth, to void the countrie of the Westsarons. The king vpon the suretie let them go. But they falselie breaking their league, priuilie in the night brake out, taking their iourney toward Exceter. In which iourney, they lost six score of their small ships, by a tempest at Sandwich (as Henrie Huntington in his storie recordeth.) Then king Alfred followed after the horsemen of the Danes, but could not ouertake them before they came to Exceter, where he tooke of them pledges and faire promises of peace, and so returned. Notwithstanding the number of the pagans did dailie more and more increase, in so much (as one of my authors saith) that if in one day thirtie thousand of them were slaine, shortlie after they increased double as manie againe. After this truce taken with king Alfred, the Danes then voided to the land of Mercia, whereof part of that kingdome they kept themselues, part they committed to one Ceolulphus: vpon condition that he should be vassall to them, and at their commandement, with his people at all times.

Anno 879

The next yeare insuing, which was the seuenth yeare of the reigne of Alfred, the Danes, who now hauing all the rule of the north part of England, from the riuer of Thames, with Mercia, London, and Exter; disdained that Alfred should beare anie dominion on the other side of Thames southward. Whereupon the foresaid three kings with all the forces and strength they could make, marched toward Chippenham in Wessex, with such a multitude, that the king with his people was not able to resist them. In so much that the people which inhabited there, some fled ouer the sea, some remained with the king, diuers submitted themselues to the Danes. Thus Alfred being ouerset with multitude of enemies, and forsaken of his people, hauing neither land to hold, nor hope to recouer that which he had lost, withdrew himselfe with a few of his nobles about him, into a certeine woodcountrie in Sommersetshire, called Etheling: where he had right scant to liue with, but such as he and his people might purchase by hunting and fishing.

King Alfred flieth into a desert wood.

Etheling, which is to say, the Ile of nobles.

This Edeling or Etheling, or Ethelingsey, standeth in a great maresse or more, so that there is no accesse vnto it without ship or bote: and hath in it a great wood called Selwood, and in the middle a little plaine, about two acres of ground, in which Ile is venison, and other wild beasts, with foule and fishes, great plentie. In this wood, king Alfred at his first comming, espied a certeine desert cotage of a poore swineherd, keeping swine in the wood, named Dunwolphus: of whom the king then vnknowne was interteined and cherished, with such poore fare as he and his wife could make him. For the which, king Alfred afterward set the poore swineherd to learning, and made him bishop of Winchester.

A swineherd made bishop of Winchester.

In the meane season, while king Alfred accompanied with a few, was thus in the desert wood, waiting the euent of these miseries, certeine stories record of a poore begger, which there came and asked his almes of the king. And the night following he appeared to the king in his sleepe: saying, his name was Cutbert, promising (as sent from God vnto him for his good charitie) great victories against the Danes. But to let these dreaming fables passe, although they be testified by diuers authors, as both Wilhelmus li. de reg. Polychronicon, Rog. Houeden, Iornalensis, and others more. Notwithstanding the king in processe of time was strengthened & comforted more, through the prouidence of God: respecting the miserable ruine of the Englishmen. First the brother of king Halden the Dane before mentioned, comming in with three and thirtie ships, landed about Deuonshire: where by chance being resisted by a bulwment of king Alfreds men (who for their safegard there laie in garrison) were slaine to the number of 1300 men, and their ensigne called the rauen was taken. Houedenus in his booke of Continuationes writeth, that in the same conflict both Inguar and Hubba were slaine among the other Danes. After this, king Alfred being better cheared, shewed himselfe more at large; so that dailie resorted to him men of Wiltshire, Sommersetshire, and Hamshire, till that he was strongle accompanied.

A bold aduenture or attempt of king Alfred, entring himselfe into the tents of the Danes.

Then the king put himselfe in a bold and dangerous venture, as writeth Wilhelmus lib. de reg. Polychron, and Fabian, which followed them both. For he apparelling him in the habit of a minstrell (as he was verie skilfull in all Saxon poems) with his instrument of musike entered into the tents of the Danes, lying then at Eddendun: and in shewing there his interlude and songs, espied all their sloth and idleneſſe, and heard much of their counsell; and after returning to his companie, declared vnto them the whole manner of the Danes. Shortlie vpon the same, the king suddenlie in the night fell vpon the foresaid Danes, and distressed and slue of them a great multitude, chased them frō that coast. In so much that through his strong and valiant assaults vpon his enemies, out of his tower of Edeling newlie fortified, he so incombered them, that he clearlie voided the countrie of them, betweene that and Selwood. His subiects estsoones, hearing of these his valiant victories & manfull deeds, drew to him dailie out of all coasts. Who through the helpe of God, and their assistance, held the Danes so short, that he wonne from them Wincheſter and diuers other good townes. Briefelie, at length he forced them to seeke for peace: the which was concluded vpon certeine couenants. Whereof one and the principall was, that the forenamed Gutrum their king should be christened. The other was, that such as would not be christened, should depart and void the countrie.

Ex Fabiano.

Upon these couenants, first the said Gutrum the Danish prince comming to Wincheſter, was there christened with twentie of his greatest dukes or nobles. To the which Gutrum king Alfred being his godfather at his baptisme, named him Athelstan. Who after a certeine season that he had feasted the said Danes, he according to his promise before made, gaue vnto their king the countrie of Eastanglia, conteining Northfolke and Suffolke, and part of Cambridgeshire. Moreouer (as saith Polychronicon) he granted to the Danes that were christened, the countrie of Northumberland. So the residue that would not be christened, departed the land, and sailed into France: where, what deration and harme they wrought, the chronicles of France doe partlie comprehend.

King Athelstan thus hauing the possession of these countries, had all Eastangles vnder his obedience. And albeit that he held the said prouince as in fee of the king, and promised to dwell there as his liege man: yet that notwithstanding, he continued more like a tyrant, by the terme of eleuen yeares, and died in the twelfth yeare. During the which space, king Alfred hauing some more rest and peace, repaired certaine townes and strong holds afore by the Danes impaired. Also he builded diuers houses of religion, as the house of nuns at Shaftesburie. An other religious house at Etheling he founded. Item an other in Wincheſter, named the new monasterie. Item he indued richlie the church of S. Cutbert in Dirham. He sent also to India to paie and performe his vowes to S. Thomas of Inde, which he made during the time of his distresse against the Danes.

About the fifteenth yeare of the reigne of Alfred, the Danes returning from France to England, landed in Kent, and so came to Rochester, and besieged that citie: and there lais so long, that they builded a tower of timber against the gates of the citie. But by strength of the citizens, that tower was destroied, and the citie defended, til king Alfred came and rescued them. Wherby the Danes were so distressed, and so neere trapped, that for feare they left their horses behind them, and fled to their ships by night. But the king when he was thereof ware, sent after them and tooke sixteene of their ships, and slue manie of the said Danes. This done, the king returned to London, and repared the same honorable (as saith Houedenus) and made it habitable, which before was sore decaied & feebled by the Danes.

The third yeare after this, which was the nineteenth yeare of the reigne of king Alfred, the foresaid Athelstan the Danish king of Northfolke (which by Alfred was christened before) deceased. Not long after this, about the one and twentith yeare of this kings reigne, the Danes againe landed in foure places of this land: which was, in Eastengland, in the North, and in the West, in two places. Before the landing of these Danes, it chanced king Alfred, hearing of the death of king Athelstan and of other complaints of the Danes, was then in Eastengland, when these tidings came to him.

Anno 892

When king Alfred was heereof ascertained, forsomuch as some of the Danes were landed in that coast, thinking with themselues the further they went in those parties, the lesse resistance to haue, and the more speed, as they were wont to haue before: Alfred therefore sending messengers in all hast to Ethelred duke of Mercia, to assemble to him an host, to withstand the Danes which landed in the West, made forth toward his enemies there, where he was in Eastanglia, whom he pursued so sharplie, that he droue them out from those parties. They then landed in Kent, whither the king with his people sped him, & in like maner draue the Danes frō thence, without anie great fight, so farre as in our authors we can see. After this this, againe the Danes toke shipping, and sailed into Northwales, and there robbed and spoiled the Britains, and from thence returned by the sea into Eastanglia, with an hundred ships, and there rested them, for so much as the king then was gone Westward.

The Danes driuen out of Chester.

The fourth host of the Danes the same yeare came to Chester, which at length they wonne, but then the countrie adioining, prested so sore vpon them, and besieged them so long, keeping themselues within the citie, that at ỹ last the Danes wearied with the long siege, were compelled to eat their owne horses for hunger. But by appointment, at last they gaue ouer the towne, and went about by Northwales to Northumberland, which was about the three and twentith yeare of king Alfred: Which Alfred in the meane while with his host sped him thitherward. Then the Danes, leauing their strong holds and castels, garnished with men and vittell, toke againe shipping, and set their course in such wise that they landed in Suller, and so came to the port of Lewes: and from thence toward London, and builded a towet or castell neere vnto the riuer of Luie, twentie miles from London. But the Londoners hearing thereof, manned out a certaine number of men of armes, who with the assistance of them of that countrie, put the Danes from that tower, and after beat it downe to the ground. Some after the king came downe thither, and to preuent the dangers that might insue, commanded the riuer of Luie to be diuided in three streames: so that where a ship might saile in times before, there a little bote might scantlie row. From thence the Danes, leauing their ships and wiues, were forced to flie that countrie, & toke their way againe toward Wales, & came to Quadrage neere to the riuer of Seuerne. Where, vpon the borders therof, they builded them a castell, there resting themselues for a time, whom the king ensuing with his armie pursued. In the meane time, the Londoners at Luie taking the Danes ships, some of them they brought to London, the rest they fired. During all these three yeares, from the first comming of the Danes to Luie, England was afflicted with three manner of sorrowes: with the Danes, with pestilence of men, and morreine of beasts. The which troubles notwithstanding, yet the king manfully resisted the malice of his enemies, and thanked God alwaies, what trouble soeuer fell to him, or vnto his realme, and sustained it with great patience and humilitie. Not long after this, king Alfred, when he had reigned nine and twentie yeares and six moneths, changed this mortall life.

{Anno 899}

And thus much (and more peraduenture than will seeme to this our ecclesiasticall storie apperteining) touching the painfull labours and trauels of this good king: which he no lesse valiantlie atchiued, then patientlie sustained, for the necessarie defence of his realme and subiects.

The vertues and godlie life of king Alfred described.

Now, if there be any prince, who listeth to see and follow the vertuous and godlie disposition of this king, both touching the institution of his owne life, and also concerning his carefull gouernement of the commonweale, thus the histories of him do record. That at what time he being yong, perceiued himselfe somewhat disposed to the vice of the flesh, and thereby letted from many vertuous purposes, did not as many yong princes and kings sonnes in the world be now wont to do, that is, to resolue themselues into all kind of carnall licence, and dissolute sensualitie, running and following without bridle whither soeuer their licence giuen doth leade them (as therefore not without cause the common prouerbe repeateth of them, that kings sonnes learne nothing well els, but onlie to ride.) Meaning thereby, that princes & kings sonnes hauing about them flatterers, which bolster them in their faults, onely their horses giue to them no more then to any other: but if they sit not fast, they will cast them. But this yong king, seeing in himselfe the inclination of his fleshlie nature, minding not to giue himselfe so much as he might take, but rather by resistance to auoid the tentation thereof, besought God that he would send to him some continuall sickenesse, in quenching of that vice, whereby he might be more profitable to the publike businesse of the commonwealth, and more apt to serue God in his calling. Cestren. lib. 5. cap. 1. Fab. cap. 17.

The godlie petition of king Alfred.

Then at Gods ordinance, he had the euill called Ficus, till he came to the age of twentie yeares, whereof at length he was cured (as is said in some stories) by the virgin called Modwen, an Irish woman. After this sickenesse being taken away, to him fell an other, which continued with him from the twentith yeare of his age, to fortie and fiue (according to his owne petition and request made vnto God) whereby he was the more reclamed and attempered from other more great inconueniences, and lesse disposed to that which he did most abhorre.

Moreouer, to behold the bountifull goodnesse ioined with like prudence in this man, in the ordering and disposing his riches and rents, it is not vnworthie to be recited, how he diuided his goods in two equall parts: the one apperteining to vses secular, the other to vses spirituall or ecclesiasticall. Of the which two principall parts, the first he diuided into three portions; the first to the behoofe of his house and familie, the second vpon the workemen and builders of his new works, whereof he had great delight and cunning: the third vpon strangers. Likewise the other second halfe vpon spirituall vses, he did thus diuide in foure portions: one to the releeuing of the poore, an other to monasteries, the third portion to the schooles of Orford, for the mainteining of good letters; the fourth he sent to forreine churches without the realme. This also is left in stories written to his commendation for his great tolerance and sufferance, that when he had builded the new monasterie at Winchester, and afterward his sonne Edward had purchased of the bishop & the chapter a sufficient piece of ground for certaine offices to be adioined vnto the same, and had giuen for euery foot of ground, Marcam auri pleni ponderis (which was as I thinke a marke of gold or more) yet Alfred therewithall was not greatlie discontented to see his coffers so wasted.

King Alfred how he diuided his goods in two parts. Polychron. lib. 5. cap. 1. Guliel. lib. de regibus.

The liberall heart of king Alfred.

Ouer and besides, how sparing and frugall he was of time (as of a thing in this earth most pretious) and how far from all vaine pastimes and idlenesse he was, this doth well declare, which in the storie of William de Reg. and other writers is told of him. That he so diuided the day and night in three parts, if he were not let by wars or other great businesse, that eight houres he spent in studie and learning, and other eight houres he spent in praier and almesdeeds, and other eight houres he spent in his naturall rest, sustenance of his bodie, and the needs of the realme. The which order he kept dulie by the burning of waxen tapers kept in his closet by certaine persons for the same purpose. Guliel.

How well and godlie this king spent his time.

How studious he was and carefull of the commonwealth, and maintenance of publike tranquillitie, his lawes most godlie set forth and deuised by him may declare. Wherein especiallie by him was prouided for the extirping and abolishing of all theft and theeues out of the realme. Whereby the realme through his vigilant care was brought into such tranquillitie, or rather perfection, that in euerie crosse or turning waie, he made be set vp a golden brouch, at least of siluer gilded, through his dominions, and none so hardie neither by day nor night to take it downe; for the more credit whereof, the words of the Latine storie be these: Armillas aureas iuberet suspendi, quæ viantium auiditatem irritarent, dum non essent qui eas abriperent, &c. Guliel. lib. de regibus Angl. And no great maruell therein, if the realme in those daies was brought in such an order, and that iustice then was so well ministred, when the king himselfe was so vigilant in ouerseeing the doings of his iudges and officers. Wherof thus also we reade in the said author testified: Iudiciorum à suis hominibus factorum inquisitor, perperàm actorum asperrimus corrector. i. He was (saith mine author speaking of the king) a vigilant inquisitor of the doings of his iudges, and a strict punisher of their misdoings. Iornalensis also writing vpon the same, thus saith: Facta ministrorum suorum & potissimè iudicum diligenter inuestigauit, adeo vt quos ex auaritia aut imperitia errare cognosceret, ab officio remouebat, that is: He did diligentlie search out the doings of his officers, and especiallie of his iudges, so that if he knew any of them to erre either through couetousnesse or vnskilfulnesse, them he remoued from their office.

The godlie lawes of king Alfred.

A notable example of theeuerie and felonie banished this realme.

Ex historia Iornalensi.

And thus much concerning the valiant acts and noble vertues of this worthie prince: whereunto although there were no other ornaments adioining besides, yet sufficient were they alone to set forth a prince worthie excellent commendation. Now besides these other qualities and gifts of Gods grace in him aboue mentioned, remaineth an other part of his no little praise and commendation, which is his learning and knowledge of good letters, whereof he not onely was excellentlie expert himselfe, but also a worthie mainteiner of the same through all his dominions, where before no vse of grammar or other sciences was practised in this realme, especiallie about the west parts of the land, there through the industrie of this king, schooles began to be erected, & studies to flourish. Although among the Britains in the towne of Chester in Southwales long before that in king Arthurs time, as Galfridus writeth, both grammar, and philosophie, with other toongs was then taught. After that, some writers record, that in the time of Egbert king of Kent, this Iland began to florish with philosophie. About which time some also think, that the Vniuersitie of Grantchester, neere to that which now is called Cambridge, began to be founded by Beda, following this coniecture therein, for that Alcuinus (before mentioned) which after went to Rome, and frō thence to France in the time of Charles the great, where he first began the Vniuersitie of Paris, was first traded vp in the exercise of studies, at the same schole of Grantchester. Beda lib. iii. cap. 18. writing also of Sigebert king of Eastangles, declareth how the said Sigebert returning out of France into England (according to the examples which he did there see) ordered and disposed schooles of learning, through the meanes of Felix then bishop, and placed in them maisters and teachers after the vse and manner of the Cantuarits. And yet before these times, moreouer it is thought to be

But howsoeuer it chanced that the knowledge and studie of good letters being once planted in this realme, afterward went to decay: yet king Alfred deserueth no little praise, for restoring or rather increasing the same. After whose time they haue euer since continued, albeit not continuallie through euerie age in like perfection. But this we may see, what it is to haue a prince learned himselfe, who seeling and tasting the price and value of science and knowledge, is thereby not onely the more apt to rule, but also to instruct and frame his subiects, from a rude barbaritie, to a more ciuill congruencie of life, and to a better vnderstanding of things: as we see in this famous prince to happen. Concerning whose first education and bringing vp, although it was somewhat late before he entred any letter: yet such was the apt towardnesse and docilitie of his nature, that being a child, he had the Saxon poems (such as were vsed then in his owne tongue) by heart & memorie. Who afterwards with yeares and time grew vp in such perfection of learning and knowledge, in so much that (as mine author saith) Nullus Anglorum fuerit vel intelligendo acutior, vel interpretando elegantior. The which thing in him the more was to be marueiled, for that he was twelue yeares of age before he knew any letter. Then his mother, carefull and tender ouer him, hauing by chance a booke in her hand, which he would faine haue, promised to giue him the same, so that he would learne it. Whereupon he for greedinesse of the booke, first learned the letters, hauing to his schoolemaster Pleimundus, after bishop of Canturburie. And so daily grew he more and more in knowledge, that at length, as mine author saith: Plurimam partem Romanæ bibliothecæ Anglorum auribus dedit, optimam prædam peregrinarum mercium ciuium vsibus conuertens, that is: A great part of the Latine librarie he translated into English, conuerting to the vses of his citizens a notable preie of forrein ware and merchandize, &c. Of which bookes by him and through him translated, was Orosius, Pastorale Gregorij, the historie of Beda, Boëtius de consolatione philosophiæ. Also a booke of his owne making & in his owne tongue, which in the English speech he called A handbooke, in Greeke called it Enchiridion, in Latin A manuell. Besides the historie of Beda translated into the Saxons tongue, he also himselfe compiled a storie in the same speech, called The storie of Alfred, &c. which both bookes in the Saxons tongue I haue seene, though the language I doe not vnderstand. And as he was learned himselfe excellentlie well, so likewise did he inflame all his countriemen to the loue of liberall letters, as the words of the storie reporteth: Illos præmijs, hos minis hortando, neminem illiteratum ad quamlibet curiæ dignitatem aspirare permittens: that is: He exhorted and stirred his people to the studie of learning, some with gifts, some by threats, suffering no man to aspire to any dignitie in the court, except he were learned. Moreouer an other storie thus saith, speaking of his nobles: Optimates quoque suos ad literaturam addiscendam in tantum prouocauit, vt sibi filios suos, vel saltem si filios non haberent, seruos suos, literis commendarent, that is: Also his nobles so much he did allure to the imbracing of good letters, that they set all their sonnes to schole: or if they had no sonnes, yet their seruants they caused to be learned. Whereby the common prouerb may be found not so common as true; Such as is the prince, such be the subiects. He began moreouer to translate the psalter in English, and had almost finished the same, had not death preuented him. Guliel. de regib. Angl. In the prologue of the booke intituled Pastorale Grego. thus he writeth: declaring the cause why he was so earnest and diligent in translating good bookes from Latine into English, shewing the cause therof why he so did, as followeth: Quòd ecclesiæ in quibus innumeræ priscæ bibliothecæ continebantur, cum libris à Danis incensæ sint: quódque in tota insula studium literarum ita abolitum esset, vt quisque minùs timeret capitis periculum, quàm studiorum exercitia adire. Quapropter se in hoc Anglis suis consulere, &c. that is; The cause was, for that innumerable ancient libraries, which were kept in churches, were consumed with fire by the Danes: and that men had rather suffer perill of their life, than to follow the exercises of studies: and therefore he thought thereby to prouide before for the people of the English nation, &c.

Bookes translated out of Latine by king Alfred.

None permitted to haue any dignitie in the court except he were learned. Polychron. lib. 6. cap. 1.

The psalter translated into English by king Alfred.

The cause why the king turned Latine bookes into English.

It is told of him both in Polychronicon, Malmesburie, Iornalensis, and other stories more, whereof I haue no names, that he seeing his countrie (namely Westward) to be so desolat of schooles and learning, partlie to profit himselfe, partlie to furnish his countrie and subiects with better knowledge, first sent for Grimbaldus a learned moonke out of France, to come into England. Also he sent for an other learned man out from the parts of Wales, whose name was Asserius, whom he made bishop of Shireborne. Item out of Mercia, he sent for Werefrithus, bishop of Worcester, to whom he put the dialogues of Gregorie to be translated. But chiefelie he vsed the counsell of Neotus, who then was counted for an holie man, and abbot of a certaine monasterie in Cornewall. By the aduisement of which Neotus, he sent for these learned men aboue recited: and also ordeined certaine schooles of diuers arts, first at Oxford, and also franchised the same with manie great liberties: Guliel. Iornalens. Fabi. cap. 171. Whereof perhaps the schole, now called the new college (first then begun of this Neotus) might take his name: which afterward peraduenture the bishops of Winchester after a larger maner did reedifie and inlarge with greater possessions.

Moreouer, among other learned men, which were about king Alfred, histories make mention of Johannes Scotus (a godlie diuine, and a learned philosopher) but not that Scotus whom now we call Duns. For that Johannes Scotus came after this manie yeares. This Johannes is described to be of a sharp wit, of great eloquence, and well expert in the Greeke tongue, pleasant & merrie of nature and conditions, as appeareth by diuers his doings and answers. First he comming to France out of his owne countrie of Scotland, by reason of the great tumults of warre, was there worthilie entertained, and for his learning had in great estimation of Carolus Calvus the French king, whom he commonlie and familiarlie vsed euer to haue about him, both at table, and in chamber. Upon a time the king sitting at meat, and seeing something (belike in this John Scot) which seemed not verie courtlie, cast forth a merrie word, asking of him what difference there was betwixt a Scot and a Sot. Whereunto the Scot sitting ouer against the king, somewhat lower, replied againe suddenlie, rather then aduisedlie (yet merilie) saying: Mensa tantùm, that is, The table onelie: importing thereby himselfe to be the Scot, and so called the king a Sot by craft. Which word how other princes would haue taken to stomach, I know not: but this Charles, for the great reuerence he bare to his learning, turned it but to a laughter among his nobles, and so let it passe.

Johannes Scotus.

The answer of Johannes Scotus to the French king.

An other time the same king being at dinner, was serued with a certaine dish of fish, wherein were two great fishes and a little one. After the king had taken thereof his repast, setteth downe to Johannes Scotus the foresaid fish, to distribute vnto the other two clerks, sitting there with him: which were two tall and mightie persons, he himselfe being but a little man. Johannes taketh the fish, of the which the two great he taketh and carueth to himselfe: the little fish he reacheth to the other two. The king perceiuing this his diuision thus made, reprehended the same. Then Johannes, whose manner was euer to find out some honest matter to delight the king, answered to him againe, proouing his diuision to stand iust and equall: For heere (saith he) be two great, and a little, pointing to the two great fishes and himselfe: and likewise heere againe is a little one and two great, pointing to the little fish, and two great persons. I pray you (saith he) what ods is there, or what distribution can be more equall? Whereat the king with his nobles, being much delighted, laughed merilie.

At the request of this Charles surnamed Bald the French king, this Scotus translated the booke of Dionysius, intituled De hierarchia, from Greeke into Latin, word for word, Quo fit (as my author saith) vt vix intelligatur Latina litera, quum nobilitate magis Græca, quàm positione construitur Latina. He wrote also a booke De corpore & sanguine Domini, which was afterward condemned by the pope In concilio Vercellensi.

Johannes Scotus translated Hierarchiam Dionysij from Greeke to Latine.

The same Johannes Scotus moreouer compiled a booke of his owne, giuing it a Greeke title, Περὶ φυσικῶν διαιρέσιων, that is, De naturæ diuisione. In which booke (as saith my foresaid author) is contained the resolution of many profitable questions; but so that he is thought to follow the Greeke church rather then the Latin, and for the same was counted of some to be an heretike: because in that booke some things there be, which in all points accord not with the Romish religion. Wherefore the pope writing to the said king Charles of this Scotus, complaineth, as in his owne words heere followeth:

The booke of Johannes Scotus called περὶ φυσικῶν.

Johannes Scotus addicted more to the Greeke church then the Latine.

Johannes Scotus accused of the pope for an heretike.

Relatum est apostolatui nostro, quòd opus Dionysij Areopagitæ, quod de diuinis nominibus, & de cœlestibus ordinibus, Græco descripsit eloquio, quidam vir Ioannes (genere Scotus) nuper transtulit in Latinum. Quod, iuxta morem ecclesiæ, nobis mitti, & nostro iudicio debuit approbari: præsertim quum idem Ioannes (licèt multæ scientiæ esse prædicetur) olim non sanè sapere, in quibusdam frequenti rumore dicatur, &c. That is: Relation hath beene made vnto our apostleship that a certaine man called Johannes a Scotish man, hath translated the booke of Dionysius the Areopagit, of the names of God, and of the heauenlie orders, from Greeke into Latin. Which booke, according to the custome of the church, ought first to haue been approued by our iudgement: namely, seeing the said John (albeit he be said to be a man of great learning and science) in time past hath beene noted by common rumor to haue beene a man not of vpright or sound doctrine, in certaine points, &c. For this cause, the said Scotus being constrained to remoue from France, came into England, allured (as some testifie) by the letters of Alured or Alfred, of whom he was with great fauour entertained, and conuersant a great space about the king, till at length (whether before or after the death of the king it is vncertaine) he went to Malmesburie, where he taught certaine schollers a few yeeres, by the which schollers at last most impiously he was murthered and slaine with their pennknifes, and so died, as stories say, a martyr, buried at the said monasterie of Malmesburie with this epitaph.

This Ethelwitha builded firſt the houſe of Nuns at Winchester.

King Alfred hauing theſe helps of learned men about him & no leſſe learned alſo himſelfe, paſt ouer his time not onely to great vtilitie and profit of his ſubiects, but alſo to a rare & profitable example of other chriſtian kings and princes for them to follow. This foreſaid Alfred had by his wife called Ethelwitha two ſonnes: Edward and Ethelward: and three daughters, Elfleda, Ethelgoza, and Ethelguida: Quas omnes liberalibus fecit artibus eruditi; that is, Whom he ſet all to their bookes and ſtudie of liberall arts, as my ſtorie teſtifieth. Firſt, Edward his eldeſt ſonne ſucceeded him in the kingdome: the ſecond ſonne Ethelward died before his father: Ethelgoza his middle daughter was made a nun, the other two were maried, the one in Mercland, the other to the erle of Flanders. Thus king Alfred the valiant, vertuous and learned prince, after he had thus chriſtianlie gouerned the realme the terme of nine and twentie yéeres and ſix moneths, departed this life, 5. kal. Nou. and lieth buried at Wincheſter, Anno Dom. 901. Of whom this I find moreouer greatlie noted and commended in hiſtorie, and not héere to be forgotten, for the rare example thereof touching this Alfred, that whereſoeuer he was, or whither ſoeuer he went, he bare alwaies about him in his boſome or pocket a little booke containing the pſalmes of Dauid, and certaine other oriſons of his owne collecting. Whereupon he was continuallie reading or praying whenſoeuer he was otherwiſe vacant, hauing leiſure thereunto. Finallie, what were the vertues of this famous king, this little table héere vnder written, which is left in ancient writing in the remembrance of his worthie and memorable life, doth ſufficientlie in few lines containe.

Moreouer in the hiſtorie of Henricus Huntingtonenſis theſe verſes I find written in the commendation of the ſame Alfred, made (as I ſuppoſe and by his words appéereth) by the ſaid author, whereof I thought not to defraud the reader: the words whereof héere follow.

Epitaphium regis Alfredi.

In the ſtorie of this Alfred, a little aboue, mention was made of Pleimundus ſcholemaſter to the ſaid Alfred, and alſo biſhop of Canturburie, ſucceeding Etheredus there biſhop before him. Which Pleimundus gouerned that ſée, the number of thirtie and foure yéeres. After Pleimundus ſucceeded Athelmus, and ſate twelue yéeres. After him came Ulfelmus thirteene yéeres. Then followed Odo a Dane borne in the ſaid ſée of Canturburie, and gouerned the ſame twentie yéeres, being in great fauour with king Athelſtan, king Edmund, and Edwine, as in proceſſe héereafter (Chriſt willing) as place and order doth require, ſhall more at large be expreſſed.

Etheredus, Pleimundus, Athelmus, Ulfelmus, Odo Archbiſhop of Canturburie.

As touching the courſe & proceedings of the romiſh biſhops there, where I laſt entred mention of them, I ended with pope Stephan the fift. After his time was much broile in the election of the biſhops of Rome, one contending againſt another: in ſo much that within the ſpace of nine yéeres, were nine biſhops. Of the which firſt was Formoſus, who ſucceeded next vnto the forenamed Stephan the fift, being made pope againſt the mind of certaine in Rome, that would rather Sergius then deacon of the church of Rome to haue béene pope. Notwithſtanding, Mars and monie preuailed on Formoſus part. This Formoſus, of whom partlie alſo is mentioned in other places of this eccleſiaſticall hiſtorie, being before biſhop of Portintake, had in times paſt (I know not on what cauſes) offended pope John the eight of that name; by reaſon whereof for feare of the pope, he bolted away and left his biſhoprike. And becauſe he being ſent for again by the pope, would not returne, therefore was he excommunicated. At length comming into France to make there his ſatisfaction vnto the pope, was degraded from a biſhop into a ſecular mans habit, ſwearing to the pope that he would no more reenter into the citie of Rome, nor claime his biſhoprike againe, ſubſcribing moreouer with his owne hand to continue from that time in the ſtate of a ſecular perſon. But then pope Martin (the next pope after John) releaſed the ſaid Formoſus of his oth, and reſtored him againe vnto his biſhoprike, whereby Formoſus entred not only into Rome againe, but alſo obtained ſhortlie after the papacie. Thus he being plaſed in the popedome, aroſe a great doubt or controuerſie among the diuines of his conſecration, whether it was lawfull or not: ſome holding againſt him, that for ſo much as he was ſolemnlie depoſed, degraded, vnpriеſted, and alſo ſworne not to reiterat the ſtate eccleſiaſticall, therefore he ought to be taken no otherwiſe then for a ſecular man. Others alleged againe, that whatſoeuer Formoſus was, yet for the dignitie of that order, & for the credit of them whom he ordered, all his conſecrations ought to ſtand in force, eſpeciallie ſéeing the ſaid Formoſus was afterward receiued and abſolued by pope Martin from that his periurie and degradation, &c. In the meane time (as witneſſeth Sigebertus) this Formoſus ſendeth for king Arnulphus for aid againſt his aduerſaries, who then marching toward Rome, was there reſiſted by the Romans from entering. But in the ſéege (ſaith the author) the Romans within ſo plaid the lions, that a poore hare (or ſuch a like thing) comming toward the citie, the hoſt of Arnulphus followed after with ſuch a maine crie, that the valiant Romans vpon the wals for very feare (where there was no hurt) caſt themſelues deſperatlie ouer the wals, ſo that Arnulphus with little labor ſcaled the wals & gat the citie. Thus Arnulphus obtaining the citie of Rome, reſcueth pope Formoſus, & beheadeth his aduerſaries; whom the pope to gratifie with like recompence againe, bleſſeth and crowneth him for emperor. Thus Formoſus ſitting faſt about the ſpace of foure or fiue yéeres, followed his predeceſſors: after whoſe time (as I ſaid) within the ſpace of nine yéeres were nine biſhops, as followeth. But in the meane time concerning the ſtorie of this Formoſus declared by Sigebert, and many other chronicles: this thing would I gladly aſke, & more gladly learne of ſome indifferent good catholike perſon, which not of obſtinacie, but of ſimple error being a papiſt, would anſwer his conſcience: Whether doth he thinke the holie order of prieſthood, which he taketh for one of the ſeuen ſacraments, to be Character indelebilis or not? If it be not Indelebilis, that is, If it be ſuch a thing, as may be put off, why then doth the popes doctrine ſo call and ſo hold the contrary, pretending it to be Indelebilis, vnremoueable? If it be in déed ſo as they teach & affirme, Indelebilis character; why then did pope John, or could pope John annihilat and euacuat one of his ſeuen pope-holie ſacraments, making of a prieſt a non prieſt or layman, vncharacering his owne order, which is (as he ſaith) a character, which in no wiſe may be blotted out, or remoued? Againe, howſoeuer pope John is to be iudged in this matter to do either well or not well: this would I know, if he did well in ſo diſprieſting and diſcharacering Formoſus for ſuch priuat offences? If yea, how then ſtandeth his doing with his owne doctrine which teacheth the contrarie? If he did not well, how then ſtandeth his doctrine with his doings to be true, which teacheth that the pope with his ſynod of cardinals cannot erre? Moreouer, if this pope John did not erre in his diſordering Formoſus, how then did Martinus his ſucceſſor not erre in repealing the ſaid doing of his predeceſſor? Or how did not pope Formoſus erre himſelfe, who being vnpriеſted by pope John, afterward without reiterating the character or order of prieſthood, toke vpon him to be pope, and made acts and lawes in the church? Againe, if Formoſus now pope did not erre, how then did pope Stephan his ſucceſſor afterward not erre, who did annihilat the conſecration, and all other acts of the ſaid Formoſus as erroneous? Or againe, if we ſay that this Stephan with his ſynod of cardinals did right, then how could it be that pope Theodore and pope John the tenth, which came after the foreſaid Stephan, did not plainlie erre, who approuing the conſecration of Formoſus, did condemne and burne the acts ſynodall of Stephan and his cardinals, which before had condemned Formoſus, according as in ſtorie héere conſequentlie may appéere?

Pope Iohn the tenth.

Stephan, reigned but twentie daies. Then ſat pope Iohn the tenth, who did fight & repugne againſt the Romans: and to confirme the cauſe of Formoſus more ſurelie, did hold a ſynod at Rauenna of 74 biſhops, with the French king Endo and his archbiſhops being preſent at the ſame. At the which councell were ratified all the decrees and doings of Formoſus, and the contrarie acts of the ſynod of Stephan the firſt were burned.

One councell burneth an others decrees.

This pope liued not pope fullie two yéeres, after whom ſucceded Benedictus the fourth, which kept the chaire three yéeres. After whom Leo the firſt was next pope, who within fortie daies of his papacie was with ſtrong hand taken & caſt in priſon by one Chriſtopher his owne houſhold chaplen, whom he had long norriſhed before in his houſe. Which thing (ſaith Platina) could not be done without great conſpiracie and much ſlaughter of men. Which Chriſtopher being pope about the ſpace of ſeuen moneths, was likewiſe himſelfe hoiſted from his papall throne by Sergius, like as he had done to his maſter before. And thus within the ſpace of nine yéeres had béene nine popes one after an other. Then Sergius after he had thruſt downe pope Chriſtopher, and ſhorne him monke into a monaſterie, occupied the roome ſeuen yéeres. This Sergius a rude man and vnlearned, very proud and cruell, had before béen put backe from the popedome by Formoſus aboue mentioned. By reaſon whereof to reuenge Formoſus againe being now in his papacie, cauſed the bodie of Formoſus where it was buried, to be taken vp, & afterward ſet in the papall ſée (as in his pontificalibus) firſt degraded him, then commanded his head to be ſmitten off, with the other three fingers that were left (as Sigebertus writeth) which done, he made his bodie to be throwne into Tiber, depoſing likewiſe all ſuch as by the ſaid Formoſus before had béene conſecrated & inueſted. This bodie of Formoſus thus throwen into Tiber, was afterward (as our writers ſay) found and taken vp by certaine fiſhers, and ſo brought into S. Peters temple. At the preſence whereof (as they ſay) certaine images there ſtanding by, bowed downe themſelues and reuerenced the ſame, with lie and all. But ſuch deceiuable miracles of ſtocks and images, in monkiſh and frierlie temples, be to vs no newes, eſpeciallie héere in England, where we haue béen ſo inured with the like & ſo many, that ſuch wilie practiſes cannot be to vs inuiſible, though this crowneſhorne generation thinke themſelues to dance in a net. But the truth is, while they thinke to deceiue the ſimple, theſe wilie beguilie moſt of all deceiue themſelues, as they will find except they repent. By this pope Sergius firſt came vp the vſe to beare about candles on Candlemas day, for the purifying of the bleſſed virgine; as though the ſacred conception of Jeſus the ſonne of God were to be purified as a thing vnpure, and that with candle light.

After Sergius entered pope Anaſtaſius, in whoſe time the bodie of Formoſus forenamed is thought to be found of fiſhermen in the riuer of Tiber, and ſo brought (as is ſaid) into the temple to be ſaluted of the images; which thing may quicklie be tainted as a lie. For how is it to be thought that the bodie of Formoſus ſo long dead before, & now lying ſeuen yéeres in the riuer, could remaine whole all that while, that fiſhers might take it vp, & diſcerne it to be the ſame? After Anaſtaſius had ſat two yéeres, followed pope Lando, the father (as ſome ſtories thinke) of pope John, which John is ſaid to be the paramour of Theodora a famous harlot of Rome, & ſet vp of the ſame harlot either againſt Lando, or after Lando his father to ſucceed in his roome. There is a ſtorie writer called Luithprandus, who writing De imperatoribus lib. 2. cap. 13. maketh there mention of this Theodora & pope John the eleuenth, and ſaith moreouer that this Theodora had a daughter named Marozia, which Marozia had by pope Sergius aboue mentioned a ſonne which afterward was pope John the twelfth. The ſame Marozia afterwards chanced to marrie with Guido marques of Tuſcia, through the means of which Guido & his friends at Rome, ſhe brought to paſſe that this pope John the eleuenth was ſmothered with a pillow laid to his mouth, after he had reigned thirteene yéers, & ſo the foreſaid John the twelfth her ſonne to ſucceed next after him. But becauſe the clergie & people of Rome did not agrée to his election, therefore was pope Leo the firſt in his place ſet vp. Thus pope John the ſonne of Sergius & Marozia being dejected, reigned pope Leo ſeuen months. After him pope Stephan two yéeres, who being poiſoned, then was pope John the twelfth aboue reherſed, the ſonne of Sergius & Marozia ſet vp againe in the papacie, where he reigned néere the ſpace of fiue yéers. Of the wickednes of this ſtrumpet Marozia, how ſhe maried two brethren, one after the death of the other, & how ſhe gouerned all Rome, & the whole church at that time, I let it paſſe. Although the Latin verſes wherwith the ſaid Luithprandus doth inuey againſt ſuch women as marrie two brethren, were neither worthie héere to be recited, and perhaps might be further applied then to that Marozia of Rome: but for shortnes I let them alſo paſſe. After John the twelfth followed pope Stephan three yéers, pope Leo three yéers and foure moneths, pope Stephan the eight three yéers & foure months, pope Martin three yéers and ſix months; after him pope Agapetus eight yéers and ſix months. About whoſe time or a litle before began firſt the order of monks called Ordo Cluniacenſis, &c. King Edward the elder.

AFter the reigne of the famous king Alfred, his ſonne Edward ſucceeded, ſurnamed the elder: where firſt is to be noted, that before the conqueſt of the Normans, there were in England three Edwards; firſt, this Edward the elder; ſecond, Edward the martyr; third, Edward the confeſſor, whereof héereafter (by the grace of Chriſt) ſhall follow in order as place ſhall giue to be declared. This Edward began his reigne the yéere of our Lord 901, and gouerned the land right valiantlie and noblie foure & twentie yéers. In knowledge of good letters and learning he was not to be compared to his father, otherwiſe in princelie renowme, in ciuill gouernment, and ſuch like martiall proweſſe, he was nothing inferior, but rather excelled him; through whoſe valiant acts firſt the principedome of Wales and kingdome of Scotland, with Conſtantine king thereof were to him ſubdued. He adioined moreouer to his dominion the countrie of Eaſtanglia, that is, of Northfolke, Suffolke, and Eſſex. All Merceland alſo he recouered and Northumberland out of the hands of the Danes. In all his wars he neuer lightlie went without victorie. The ſubiects of his prouinces & dominions were ſo inured and hardned in continuall practiſe and feats of war, that when they heard of any enimies coming (neuer tarying for any bidding from the king or from his dukes) ſtraightwaies they incountred with them, both in number & in knowledge of the order of war excelling alwaies their aduerſaries. Guliel. de regi. Ita hoſtes militibus contemptui, regi riſui erant; to meane, So was the comming & aſſaulting of their enimies to the people and common ſouldiers but a trifle, to the king but a ridicle. Among other aduerſaries which were buſie rather then wiſe, in aſſailing this king, was one called Clito Ethelwoldus a yong man, king Edwards vncles ſonne, who firſt occupying the towne of Wimborne (taking thence a nun with him, whom then he had maried) fled by night to Northumberland, to adioine himſelf vnto the Danes, who was made chiefe king & captain ouer them. Then chaſed fro thence, he fled ouer into France, but ſhortly returning againe into England, he landed in Eaſtengland, where the ſaid Clito with a companie of Danes of that countrie gathered to him, deſtroied & pilled much of the countrie about Crekinford and Crikeland. And ſo paſſing ouer Thames after he had ſpoiled the land there to Bradenelocke, returned againe to Northfolke and Suffolke, where he méeting with an ambuſhment of Kentiſhmen, which dragged and taried after the maine hoſt of Edward, contrarie to his commandement, incloſed them in, and ſlue the moſt part of them. Soone after the two hoſts méeting together, betweene the two ditches of S. Edmunds land, after a long fight Clito with many of the Danes were ſlaine, & the remnant were conſtrained to ſéeke for peace, which vpon certaine conditions, and vnder a tribute was to them granted.

Anno 904

In proceſſe, about the twelfth yéere of his reigne, the Danes repenting them of their couenants, and minding to breake the ſame, aſſembled an hoſt and met with the king in Staffordſhire at a place called Totenhall, and ſoone after at Wodneſfeld, at which two places the king ſlue two kings, two erles, and many thouſands of Danes that occupied the countrie of Northumberland.

Anno 913

Thus the importunat rage of the Danes being aſſwaged, king Edward, hauing now ſome leiſure giuen from wars to other ſtudies, gaue his mind to the building or reparing of cities, townes, and caſtles, that by the Danes were raced, ſhattred and broken. As firſt of Cheſter, which citie he double inlarged to that it was before, compaſſing the caſtle within the walls of the ſame which before ſtood without. That done, the king builded a ſtrong caſtle at Hereford in the edge of Wales. Alſo for the ſtrengthening of the countrie, he made a caſtle at the mouth of the water of Auen, & an other caſtle at Buckingham, and the third faſt thereby vpon the riuer of Muſe. Moreouer he builded or reedified the townes of Toceſter & Wigmore, and deſtroied the caſtle that the Danes had made at Demeſford. Likewiſe vpon the riuer of Trent againſt the old towne of Notingham, he builded a new towne on the ſouthſide, & made a bridge ouer the riuer betweene the ſaid two townes. Alſo by the riuer of Merce he builded a citie or towne in the north end of Mercia, & named it Thilwall, and after repared the citie of Manchelter, that ſore was defaced with wars of the Danes.

In this renewing & building of townes & caſtles for the more fortifying of his realme, his ſiſter Elfleda daughter of king Alfred, & maried to the duke of Mercia (as is afore mentioned) was no ſmall helper. Of this Elfleda it is firmlie of writers affirmed, that ſhe being (as is ſaid) maried to Ethelred duke of Mercia, after ſhe had once aſſaied the paines of women in trauelling with her child, ſo much ſhe abhorred euer after the imbracing of her huſband, that it ſéemed to her (the ſaid) not ſéemly for a noble woman to vſe ſuch fleſhly liking, wherof ſo great ſorow & trauell ſhould inſue. And yet notwithſtanding, the ſame Elfleda for all her delicat tendernes in eſchewing the naturall paſſion which neceſſitie giueth to women; ſo hardie ſhe was in warlike dangers which nature giueth not to women, that fighting againſt the Danes, ſo venturous ſhe was of ſtomach, that foure of her next knights which were gardians of her bodie, were ſlaine faſt by her. acts whereby she deserued praise, was a great helper and stirrer vp of her brother Edward, who builded and newlie repared many castles and townes, as Tamworth besides Lichfeeld, Stafford, Warwike, Shrewesburie, Watrisburie, Eidsburie, besides Chester in the forrest now destroyed. Also in the north end of Mercia, vpon the riuer of Merce, a castell called Rimcorne, also a bridge ouer Seuerne named Brimmisburie bridge.

The lawes of king Alfred and king Edward.

As touching the lawes and statutes of this Edward, as also of his father Alfred made before him, I omit here to record them for length of matter and wast of time: yet notwithstanding, this admonition by the way I thinke good to note, that in those dayes of these ancient kings reigning in England, the authoritie then both of conferring bishoprikes and spirituall promotions, and also of prescribing lawes as well to the churchmen as to the laitie, and of ordering and intermedling in matters meere spirituall, was then in the hands of kings ruling in the land, and not only in the hand of the pope, as appeareth by these lawes of Alfred.

Si quis fornicetur cum vxore aliena, &c.
Si quis in quadragesima sanctum velum in publico vel in lecto, &c.
Vt christiani Deum diligant & paganismo renuncient, &c.
Si quis christianitatem mutet, &c.
Si quis ordinatus sacris furetur, &c.
Si presbyter ad rectum terminum sanctum chrisma, &c.
Si duo fratres vel cognati cum vna aliqua fornicentur, &c.

Note how kings of England in times past had authoritie in spirituall causes.

By these and other such like constitutions of king Alfred, it may appeare, how the gouernance and direction of the church in those dayes depended not vpon monsieur le pope of Rome, but vpon the kings which here in their time (vnder the Lord) did gouerne the land. To this also the example of king Edwards time giueth testimonie: which Edward with Plemmundus (a boue mentioned) archbishop of Canturburie, and with other bishops in a synod assembled, assigned and elected seuen bishops in seuen metropolitan churches of the realme. Which were, the first Fridestan, the second Adelstan, the third Werstan, the fourth Adelelme, the fift Edulfus, the sixt Dernegus, the seuenth Kenulphus; in which election the kings authoritie seemed then alone to be sufficient, &c.

§ Anno 925 §

This Edward (as in the beginning was said) reigned 24. yeeres, who had three wiues, Egwin, Elfled and Ethelwid. Of Egwin he had his eldest sonne Adelstan, who next succeeded in the kingdome, and a daughter married after to the duke of Northumberland. Of Elfled he receiued two sonnes and six daughters, to wit Ethelwald and Edwin. Ethelwald was excellentlie well seene in all knowledge of learning, much resembling both in countenance and conditions his grandfather Alfred, and died some after his father. Of his six daughters, two of them, Elfled and Ethelhilda, were made nuns, the other foure were maried, Edgina to Charles the French king in his fathers time, Ethilda by king Ethelstan was maried to Hugo the sonne of duke Robert. Edgitha and Algina were both sent to Henricus prince of Almains. Of which two sisters the second the said Henricus maried to his sonne Otho, who was the first emperour of the Almains. The other sister, which was Edgitha, the foresaid Henricus maried vnto a certaine duke about the border of the Alps in Italy. Of his third wife Ethelwid he receiued two sonnes, Edmund and Edred, which both reigned after Adelstan, and two daughters, Egburga whom he made a nun, and Eadguina who was maried vnto Ludouicus, prince of Aquitania in France. These sonnes and daughters king Edward thus brought vp: his daughters he set to spinning and to the needle: Guliel. de reg: his sonnes he set to the studie of learning, Vt quasi philosophi ad gubernandam rempublicam non iam rudes procederent: that is, To the end that they being as first made philosophers, should be the more expert thereby to gouerne the commonwealth.

King Ethelstan, or Adelstan.

King Ethelstan or Adelstan.

ETHelstan or Adelstan, after the death of Edward his father, began his reigne in England, and was crowned at Kingston. He was a prince of worthie memorie, valiant and wise in all his acts, nothing inferiour vnto his father Edward. In like worldlie renowme of ciuill gouernment, ioind with much prosperous successe, in reducing this realme vnder the subiection of one monarchie. For he both expelled the Danes, subdued the Scots, and quieted the Welshmen, as well in Northwales, as also in Cornwall. The first enemie against this Ethelstan, was one Elfredus, who with a faction of seditious persons, conspiring against the said Ethelstan at Winchester, incontinently after the death of his father, went about to put out his eies. Notwithstanding, the king escaping that danger, thorough the help of God was at that time deliuered. Elfred vpon the same being accused, fled to Rome, there before the pope to purge himselfe by his oth. Who being brought to the church of S. Peter, & there swearing (or rather forswearing) himselfe to be cleare, which indeed was guiltie therof, suddenlie vpon his oth fell downe, & so brought to the English hostle in Rome, within three daies after departed. The pope sending word vnto king Ethelstan, whether he would haue the said Elfred buried among christians or not: at length through the perswasions of his friends and kinsfolks, it was concluded that he should be buried in christian buriall. This storie although I find in no other writers mentioned, but onely in the chronicles of Guliel. lib. de regib. yet for so much as it beareth the witnesse and words of the king himselfe, as testified in an old deed of gift, giuen to the monasterie of Malmesburie, I thought the same the more to be of credit. The words of the king proceed in this tenor as followeth.

§ Anno 927 §

In the second yeare of the reigne of king Ethelstan, for an vnitie and a peace to be had betweene the king and the Danes of Northumberland, he maried to Sithericus their king, his sister, whereof mention is made before; but shortly after within one yeare this Sithericus died. After whose death king Ethelstan seized that prouince into his owne hands, putting out the sonne of the foresaid Sithericus called Alanus, who with his brother Godfridus fled the one into Ireland, the other vnto Constantine king of the Scots. And when he had thus accorded with the Danes of Northumberland, he shortly made subiect vnto him Constantine king of Scots. But the said Constantine meeked himselfe so lowlie to the king, that he restored him to his former dignitie, saying, that it was more honour to make a king then to be a king.

Northumberland subdued to king Ethelstan.

The Scots subdued to the K. of England. It is more honour to make a king, then to be a king.

Not long after, the said Constantine king of Scots did breake couenant with king Ethelstan, wherefore he assembled his knights, and made towards Scotland, where he subduing his enemies, and bringing them againe vnto due subiection, returned into England with victorie. Here by the way, in some storie-writers (who forgetting the office of historicians, seeme to play the poets) is written & recorded for a maruell, that the said Ethelstan returning out of Scotland into England, came to Yorke, and so into the church of saint John of Beuerleie, to redeeme his knife, which before he had left there for a pledge at his going forth. In the which place he praying to God and to saint John of Beuerleie, that he might leaue there some remembrance, whereby they that came after might know that the Scots by right should be subdued to the Englishmen, smot with a sword (they say) vpon a great hard stone standing neere about the castle of Dunbar, that with the stroke thereof the stone was cut a large ell deepe (with a lie no lesse deepe also then was the stroke in the stone.) But of this poeticall or fabulous storie, albeit Polychronicon, Fabian, Iornalensis, and others more constantlie accord in the same, yet in Guliel. and Henricus no mention is made at all. But peraduenture he that was the inuentor first of this tale of the stone, was disposed to lie for the whetstone: wherefore in my mind he is worthie to haue it.

A fabulous miracle falselie reported of king Ethelstan.

Of like truth and credit seemeth also to be this that followeth, about the same yeare and time vnder the reigne of K. Ethelstan, being the eight yeare of his reigne, of one Brithanus bishop of Winchester, who succeeded Frithstanus in the same see, and gouerned that bishoprike foure yeeres. This Brithanus being a deuout bishop in prayer & contemplation, vsed much among his solitarie walks, to frequent late the churchyard, praying for the soules there, & all christian soules departed. Vpon a time the said Brithanus after his wonted maner proceeding in his deuotions, when he had done, came to Requiescant in pace.

Whereunto suddenlie a great multitude of soules answering together with one voice said, Amen. Of this miracle albeit I haue not much to say (hasting to other matters) yet this question would I aske of some indifferent papist, which were not wilfull, but of ignorance deceiued; If this multitude which here answered Amen, were the soules of them buried in the churchyard or not? If yea, then how were they in purgatorie, what time they were heard in that place answering Amen? Except we should thinke purgatorie to be in the churchyard at Winchester, where the soules were heard then so many answering and praying Amen. And yet this storie is testified by the accord of writers of that time, Guliel. Polychron. Houedenus, Iornalensis, and others more. Much like miracles and prophesies also we read of Elphegus which succéeded him; but because we hast to other things, let these fables passe.

A miracle of soules answering, Amen.

We heard a little before, how king Ethelstan after the death of Sithericus king of Northumberland, seized that land or province into his owne hand, and put out his sonne Alanus: who after flying into Scotland, married the daughter of Constantine king of Scots. By whose stirring and exhortation he gathered a companie of Danes, Scots, and others, and entred the mouth of Humber with a strong nauie of six hundred and fiftéene ships.

Whereof king Ethelstan with his brother Edmund hauing knowledge, prepared his armie, and at length ioining in fight with him and his people, at a place called Brunanburh or Brimford: where he fighting with them from morning till euening, after a terrible slaughter on both sides (as the like hath not béene séene lightlie in England) had the victorie. In the which battell were slaine fiue small and vnder-kings, with Constantine king of Scots, and twelue dukes, with the more part of all the strangers which at that time they gathered to them. Here also our writers put in another miracle in this battell, how king Ethelstans sword miraculouslie fell into his sheath through the prayer of Odo, then Archbishop of Canturburie.

A sore battell fought at Brimford.

Another vnlike miracle of king Ethelstans sword.

Odo archbishop of Canturburie.

Concerning this battell, I find in a certaine written chronicle these verses, which because they should not be lost, I thought not vnworthie here of rehersall.

After this victorie thus obtained of the Danes and Scots, king Ethelstan also subdued (or at least quieted) the north Britains, whom he conuenting together at Herford (or thereabouts) forced them to grant vnto him as a yearelie tribute, twentie pounds of gold, three hundred pounds of siluer, and of heads of neat fiue and twentie hundred, with hawks and dogs, to a certaine number. This done, he went to Excester, and there likewise subduing the south Britains about Excester and Cornewall, repared the walles of Excester with sufficient strength, and so returned.

The north Britains brought to tribute.

The south Britains subdued.

Among these victorious and noble acts of this king, one blot there is of him written and noted, wherein he is as much worthie to be reprehended, as in the other before to be commended; (that is) the innocent death & murther of his brother Edwin. The occasion thereof was this. King Edward aforenamed their father, in the time of his youth comming by a certaine village or grange where he had béene nursed and brought vp of a child, thought of courtesie to go sée how his nurse did, where he entring into the house, espied a certaine yong damsell beautifull and right séemelie attired, Egwina by name. This Egwina before being a poore mans daughter, had a vision by night, that of her bodie sprang such a bright light of the moone, that the brightnesse thereof gaue light to the realme of England, by reason whereof, she was taken into the foresaid house, and daintilie brought vp in stead of their owne daughter, for hope of some commoditie to ensue therby, as afterward it came to passe. For king Edward (as is declared) comming into the house, and rauished with the beautie of the maiden, begat of her the same night this Ethelstan. Wherefore the said Ethelstan being thus baselie borne of Egwina, the first wife to Edward (as is said) before he was married to her, & fearing his next brother Edwin, which was rightlie borne (especiallie being stirred thereunto through the sinister suggestion of his butler) did cast such displeasure to the foresaid Edwin his brother, being yet but yong, that (notwithstanding his innocent submission and purgation made against his accusers) he caused him to be set in an old rotten bote in the brode sea (onely with one esquier with him) without any tackling or other prouision to the same. Where the yong and tender prince being dismaid with the rage of winds & of the floods, and now wearie of his life, cast himselfe ouer bord into the sea, and so was drowned. Notwithstanding the esquier shifting for himselfe as he could, and recouering the bodie of his maister, brought it to Sandwich, where it was buried. Which done, the king afterwards comming to the remembrance of himselfe, was stricken with great repentance the space of seuen yéeres together, and at length was reuenged of him that was the accuser of his brother. This accuser (as is said) was the kings cupbearer, who (as God the righteous iudge of all things would haue it) vpon a certaine solemne feast, bearing the cup vnto the king, chanced in the middle of the floore to stumble with one foot, helping and recouering himselfe with the other, saying in these words, Thus one brother (as you sée) helpeth another. These words being thus spoken in the hearing of the king, so moued his mind, that forthwith he commanded the false accuser of his brother to be had out to execution. Whose iust recompense I would wish to be a warning to all men, what it is to sow discord betweene brother and brother.

R. Ethelstan seeketh the death of his owne brother.

A note to learne not to sow discord betwixt brother and brother.

King Ethelstan (besides his seuen yéeres lamentation for this act) builded the two monasteries of Middleton and of Michelnes for his brothers sake, or (as the stories say) for his soule. Whereby it may appeare what was the cause most speciall in those daies of building monasteries, to wit, for releasing the sinnes both of them departed, and them aliue: which cause how it standeth with the grace and veritie of Christs gospell, and of his passion, let the christian reader trie and examin with himselfe. This cruell fact of the king towards Edwin, caused him afterward to be more tender and carefull towards his other brethren and sisters left in his hands vnmaried. Which sisters, as is partlie in the chapter before declared, he richlie bestowed in great mariages, as one to the king of Northumberland Sithericus, another he gaue vnto Lewis king of Aquitanta, the third to Henricus duke of Almaine for his sonne Otho, who was the first emperour of the Germans. Whereby it is to be vnderstood, that the empire at this time began first to be translated from France (where it remained about one hundred yéeres and a halfe) vnto Germanie, where it hath euer since continued.

The cause of building abbies examined.

Otho first emperour of the Germans.

The fourth of his sisters being a virgin of singular beautie, Hugo the French king required to be giuen vnto him, sending to king Ethelstan pretious and sumptuous presents, such as were not before séene in England. Among the which presents and gifts, besides the rare odours of sundrie sauours and fine spices: and besides the pretious and costlie gems, namelie of smaradgs of most redolent grésne, besides also manie and great coursers and palfreies richlie trapped, especiallie of one iewell (as writers make mention) which was a certaine vessell finelie and subtillie made of the pretious stone onychinus, so radiantlie wrought, that in it appeared the liuelie corne growing, and mens images walking, &c. Ouer & besides was sent also the sword of Constantine the great, with the name of the possessor written in golden letters; where in the hast of the same all beaten in gold, was one of the iron nails wherewith our Sauiour on the crosse was nailed. Of the veritie whereof I am not disposed at this present much to say what I suspect; but that this in the ecclesiasticall storie of Eusebius is euident, that two of the foresaid nails of Christ were spent on the bridle of Constantine, the third he cast into the sea in a raging tempest. Wherefore, if Christ were nailed with foure nailes, perhaps this naile might be one. If he were nailed but with three, I sée not how this storie can stand with other stories, neither how this fourth naile can stand with the truth. Among the rest moreouer was the speare (as is reported) wherewith the side of our Sauiour was opened: which also the said Constantine was wont to carrie in the field against his enemies, with a portion likewise of the holie crosse inclosed in crystall: also a part of the crowne of thorne in like maner inclosed, &c. Of the which relikes, part was giuen to Winchester, part to the church of Malmesburie, where king Ethelstan was buried. As this king was indued and inlarged by the gift of God (the setter vp and disposer of all kings) with great victories of worldlie renowme, hauing hauing vnder his subiection both the Scots and Brittains, and the whole monarchie of the land: so he deuised diuers good and wholesome lawes for the gouernment of the same, as well concerning the state of the orders ecclesiasticall, as also of the secular or laie people. Whereby it is to be vnderstood, that the vsurped power of the bishop of Rome did not then extend it selfe so largelie, nor so proudlie to derogat from the authoritie of kings & princes, but that euery one in his owne dominion, had (vnder God, & not vnder the pope) the doing of all matters within the same his dominion contained, whether they were causes temporall or spirituall, as by the decrees and constitutions of this king (and also of other as well before him, as after him) may euidentlie be testified; as where he amongst other lawes thus ordaineth touching the bishop, in words as follow.

Episcopo iure pertinet, omnem rectitudinem promouere, Dei videlicet, ac seculi. In primis, debet omnem ordinatum instruere, quid ei sit agendum iure, & quid hominibus secularibus iudicare debeant.

Debet etiam sedulò pacem & concordiam operari cum seculi iudicibus, qui rectum velle diligunt, & in compellationum allegationem edocere, ne quis alij perperàm agat in iureiurando, vel ordalio.

Nec pati debet aliquam circumuentionem iniustæ mensuræ, vel iniusti ponderis. Sed conuenit vt per consilium & testimonium eius, omne legis rectum, & burgi mensura, & omne pondus sit secundum [a] ditionem eius, institutum valde rectum: ne quis proximum suum seducat, pro quo deridat in peccatum.

Et semper debet christianis prouidere contra omnia, quæ prædicta sunt, & ideo debet se de pluribus intromittere: vt sciat quomodo grex agat, quem ad Dei manum custodire suscepit, ne diabolus eum dilaniet, nec malum aliquod superseminet. Nunquam enim erit populo benè consultum, nec dignè Deo conuersabitur, vbi lucrum impium & magis falsum diligitur. Ideo debent omnes amici Dei quod iniquum est eneruare, & quod iustum est eleuare, nec pati vt propter falsum, & pecuniæ quæstum homines se forisfaciant erga verè sapientem Deum, cui displicet omnis iniustitia.

Christianis autem omnibus necessarium est, vt rectum diligant, & iniqua condemnent, & saltem sacris ordinibus euecti iustum semper erigant, & praua deponant.

Hinc debent episcopi cum iudicibus, iudicia dictitare & interesse, ne permittant (si possint) vt illinc aliqua prauitatum gramina pullulent. Et sacerdotibus pertinet in suo diœcesi, vt ad rectum sedulò quemcumque iuuent, nec patiantur (si possint) vt christianus aliquis alij noceat, non potens impotenti, non summus infirmo, non prælatus [b] subditis, non dominus hominibus suis, seruis, aut liberis. The law of king Ethelstan concerning tithes.

The said Ethelstan besides, prescribed other constitutions also, as touching tithes giuing, where he saith and proclaimeth: Ego Ethelstanus rex, consilio Vlfelmi archiepiscopi mei & aliorum episcoporum, mando præpositis omnibus in regno meo, in nomine Domini & sanctorum omnium, vt inprimis reddant de meo proprio decimas Deo, tam in viuente capitali, quàm in mortuis frugibus terræ: & episcopi mei similiter faciant de suo proprio, & aldermanni mei & præpositi mei, &c. That is, I Ethelstan king, charge and command all my officers thorough my whole realme, to giue tithes vnto God of my proper goods, as well in liuing cattell, as in the corne & fruits of the ground, and that my bishops likewise of their proper goods, and mine aldermen, and my officers and headmen shall doe the same. Item this I will, that my bishops and other headmen doe declare the same to such as be vnder their subiection, and that to be accomplished at the terme of saint John the Baptist. Let vs remember what Jacob said vnto the Lord, Of all things that thou giuest to me I will offer tithes vnto the Lord, &c. Also what the Lord saith in the gospell of saint Matthew, To him that hath it shall be giuen, and he shall abound. We must also consider how terrible it is written in bookes, that if we will not offer our tenths, from vs nine parts shall be taken away, and onely the tenth part shall be left vs, &c. And in the same place, after that he hath assigned the church rights to be paid in the place whereto they belong, it followeth thus: Facite etiam vt mihi mea propria capiatis, quæ mihi poteritis rectè acquirere. Nolo vt aliquid mihi iniustè conquiratis. Sed omnia vestra concedo vobis eo tenore, quo mihi mea similiter exoptetis. Cauete simul & vobis, & eis quos admonere debetis, ab ira Dei, & transgressione mea.

And thus much briefly concerning the historie of king Ethelstan, and things in his time done: who reigned about the space of sixteene years. And because he died without issue, therefore after him succeeded his brother Edmund, the yeare of our Lord 940, who reigned six yeares.

King Edmund.

EDmund the sonne of Edward the elder, by his third wife (as is declared) and brother of Ethelstan, being of the age of 20 yeares, entred his reigne, who had by his queene Elgina two sonnes, Edwin and Edgarus, surnamed Pacificus, which both reigned after him as followeth. This Edmund continued his reigne 6 yeares and a halfe. By him were expelled the Danes, Scots, Normans, and all forren enemies out of the land. Such cities & townes which before were in the possession of strangers, as Lincolne, Nottingham, Derbie, Stafford, and Leicester, he recouered out of their hands. Thus the realme being cleared of forren power for a time; then the king set his studie and mind in the redressing and maintaining the state of the church: which all stood then in building of monasteries, and furnishing of churches, either with new possessions, or with restoring the old which were taken away before. In the time of this Edmund, this I find in an old written storie borrowed of William Carie, a citizen of London, a worthie treasurer of most worthie monuments of antiquitie. The name of the author I cannot alledge, because the booke beareth no title, lacking both the beginning and the latter end; but the words thereof faithfully recited, be these: Huius regis tempore, facta est dispersio monachorum Eushmensis cœnobij, cum substitutione canonicorum per Athelmum, & Vlricum laicos, & Oswlphum episcopum, &c: that is: In the time of this king, there was a scattering or dispersion made of the monks out of the monastery of Eusham, & canons substituted in their place, through ỹ doing of Athelmus & Ulricus lay men, & of Oswlfus bishop, &c.

Anno 940. Edmundus K. of England.

Ex historiâ Cariana.

Monks put out of Eusham the yeare of our Lord 941.

Where, as concerning this matter betweene monks and others of the clergie, first it is to bee vnderstood, that in the realme of England heretofore, before the time of Dunstan, the bishops sees and cathedrall churches were replenished with no monks, but with priests and canons, called then clerks, or men of the clergie. After this beginneth to rise a difference or a sect betweene these two parties in strictnesse of life and in habit: so that they which liued after a stricter rule of holinesse, were called monks, and professed chastitie, that was, to liue from wiues (for so was chastitie then defined in those blind daies) as though holy matrimonie were no chastitie, according as Pathnutius did well define it in the councell of Nice. The other sort which were no monks but priests or men of the clergie so called, liued more free from these monkish rules and obseruances, and were then commonly (or at least lawfullie) married, and in their life and habit came nearer to the secular sort of other christians. By reason whereof great disdaine and emulation was among them, in so much that in many cathedrall churches, whereas priests were before, there monks were put in: and contrarie, sometime whereas monks were intruded, there priests and canons againe were placed, and monks thrust out; whereof more shall appeare hereafter (by the grace of Christ) when we come to the life of Dunstan. In the meane time, something to satisfie the cogitation of the reader, which peraduenture either is ignorant, or else would know of the first comming in of monks into this realme and church of England in the Saxons time: this is to be noted, according as I find in old chronicles, namely in the Latine historie of Gulielm. de gestis pontificum Anglorum, recorded touching the same. About this time of king Edmund, or shortly after, when hardnesse and strictnesse of life ioyned with superstition was had in veneration, and counted for great holinesse; men therefore, either to win publike fame with men, or merits with God, gaue themselues to leade a strict life, thinking thereby the stranger their conuersation was, and further from the common trade of vulgar people, the more perfect to bee towards God and man. There was at that time (and before that) a monasterie in France named Floriake, after the order and rule of Benedict: from the which monasterie did spring a great part of our English monks, who being there professed, and afterward returning into England, did congregate men daily to their profession. And so, partly for strangenesse of their rule, partly for outward holinesse of their strict life, partly for the opinion of holinesse that many had of them, were in great admiration, not onely with the rude sort, but with kings and princes, who founded their houses, maintained their rules, and inlarged them with possessions. Among the which order of monks comming from Floriake, especially was one

Oswaldus bishop of Yorke, a great patron of monkerie.

Oswaldus, first a monke of Floriake, then bishop of Worcester and of Yorke, a great patron and setter vp of monkerie. Touching the which Oswaldus, William in his booke De pontific. writing of his history, hath these words: Familiaris per id temporis Anglis consuetudo fuit, vt si qui boni afflati essent desiderio, in beatissimi Benedicti monasterio cœnobialem susciperent habitum: à quo religionis huiusce manauit exordium, &c. That is, it was a common custome at that time among Englishmen, that if any god men were well affected or minded toward religion, they went to the monasterie of blessed S. Benedict in France, and there receiued the habit of a monke, whereupon the first origin of this religion began, &c. But of this Oswald bishop of Yorke, and Dunstan bishop of Canturburie, and Ethelwald bishop of Winchester, how they replenished diuers monasteries and cathedrall churches with monks: and how they discharged married priests and canons out of their houses, to plant in monks in their cels, more shall bee spoken (by the grace of Christ) hereafter. Now let vs returne againe to the matter where we left, of king Edmund, who besides his noble victories against his enemies, and recouering the cities aboue expressed into his owne hands, did also subdue the prouince of Cumberland. And after he had put out the eyes of the two sonnes of Dunmaill king of Cumberland, hee committed the gouernance thereof to Malcolmus king of the Scots, vpon promise of his trustie seruice and obedience, when the king should stand in any need of him. In the time of this king, Dunstan was not yet archbishop of Canturburie, but onely abbat of Glastenburie: of whom many fabulous narrations passe among the writers, importing more vanitie then veritie, whereof this is one of the first. What time Edgarus called Pacificus was borne, Dunstan being the same time abbat of Glastenburie (as the monkish fables dreame) heard a voice in the aire of certaine angels singing after this tenor, and saying: Now peace commeth to the church of England in the time of this child and of our Dunstan, &c. This I thought to recite, that the christian reader might the better ponder with himselfe the impudent and abominable fictions of this Romish generation. Out of the same mint also haue they forged, how the said Dunstan should heare the angels sing the Kyrieleson, vsed to be sung at euen-song in the church: Guliel. de pontif. lib. 1. Which is as true as that the harpe hanging in a womans house, played by it selfe the tune of the antheme, called Gaudent in cœlis, &c. What would not these deceiuers faine in matters something likely, which in things so absurd and so inconuenient, shame not to lie and to forge so impudently and also so manifestly: Through the motion of this Dunstan, king Edmund builded and furnished the monasterie of Glastenburie, and made the said Dunstan abbat thereof.

Concerning the end and death of this king, sundrie opinions there be. Alfridus and Marianus say, that while this king Edmund indeuoured himselfe to saue his seruer from the danger of his enemies, which would haue slaine him at Pulcherchurch, the king in parting of the fray was wounded, and died shortly after. But Gulielmus de regibus lib. 2. saith, that the king being at a feast at Pulcherchurch vpon the day of saint Augustine, spied a fellon sitting in the hall named Leof, whom he before for his fellonie had exiled, and leaping ouer the table did flie vpon him, and plucked the thiefe by the haire of the head to the ground. In which doing, the fellon with a knife wounded the king to the death, and also with the same knife wounded many other of the kings seruants, and at length was all to hewed, and died forthwith.

The lawes of king Edmund touching as well the state spirituall as temporall.

By the lawes of king Edmund (ordeined and set forth, as well for the redresse of church matters, as also of ciuill regiment) it may appeare, that the state both of causes temporall and likewise spirituall, apperteined then to the kings right (the false pretended vsurpation of the bishop of Rome notwithstanding) as by these lawes is to be seene: where he by the aduice of his lords and bishops, did enact and determine concerning the chastitie and pure life of ecclesiasticall ministers, and such as were in the orders of the church, with the penalties also for them which transgressed the same.

Item, for tithes to be paid for euery christian man, and for the church fees, and almes fees, &c.

Item, for defloured of women professed, which wee call nuns, &c.

Item, for euery bishop to see his churches repared of his owne proper charge; and boldly to admonish the king, whether the houses of God were well maintained, &c.

Item, for flying into the church for sanctuarie, &c.

Item, concerning cases and determinations spousall, or matrimoniall, &c.

All which constitutions declare what interest kings had in those daies in matters as well ecclesiasticall as others, within their dominion, and that not onely in disposing the ordinances and rites, such as appertained to the institution of the church; but also in placing and setting bishops in their sees, &c.

Alstanus archbishop of Yorke Odo archbishop of Canturburie.

In the time of this Edmund, was Alstanus archbishop of Yorke, and Odo archbishop of Canturburie: which Odo being a Dane borne (as is before touched) was promoted to that see by king Ethelstan, for that (as they say) he being first bishop of Wilton, and present with king Ethelstan in the field against Analafus before mentioned, what time the said Ethelstan had lost his sword, he through his intercession vp to heauen did see a sword from heauen come downe into the sheath of the king. Whereof relation being made vnto the king by the foresaid bishop, Ethelstan vpon the same was so affected towards Odo, that not onely hee counted him for a patron of his life, but also made him primate of Canturburie after the decease of Ulfelmus. This Odo was the first from the comming of the Saxons, till his time, which was archbishop of Canturburie being no monke. For all the other before him were of the profession of monks, of whom a great part had been Italians vnto Bercualdus. Notwithstanding, this Odo being also a stranger borne, after hee was elected into the bishoprike, to answere to the old custome of others before him, sailed ouer into France, and there at Floriake (after the vsuall maner aboue mentioned of Englishmen) receiued the profession and habit of monkish religion, as saith my foresaid author. And like as the said Odo first being no monke, was made archbishop of Canturburie: so also Oistanus the same time being bishop of Yorke and of Worcester, differed from diuers his predecessors before him in profession and habit: of whom the forenamed author thus writeth in his third booke, speaking of Wistanus: Qui sanctitate discrepabat & habitu: that is, Hee differed in sanctimonie and in habit. Whereby is to bee collected, that in those daies was a difference in habit and garment, not onely betweene monks and bishops, but also betweene one bishop and another; albeit what difference it was, yet I do not find. But I returne againe to Odo, who by the description of his maners, might seeme not to be the worst that occupied that place, were it not that our lying histories fayning false miracles vpon him (as they do of others) make him indeed to seeme worse then he was. As where they imagine that hee should see from heauen a sword fall into the scabbard of king Ethelstan. Item, where he should couer and defend the church of Canturburie with his praiers from raine. And also where hee should turne the bread of the altar (as the writer learneth it) into liuely flesh, and from flesh into bread againe, to confirme the people which before doubted in the same. Where note againe (good reader) that albeit this miracle were true, as no doubt it is vntrue, yet is it to be noted that in those daies was a great doubt amongst Englishmen of the popish sacrament, and that transubstantiation was not receiued into the christian creed. The like iudgement is to be giuen also of that, where our English writers testifying of the same Odo, say that hee should prophesie long before of Dunstan to be his successor in the church of Canturbury. But to let these fantasies and idle stories passe, this which we find of Odo his owne writing is certaine, that the said Odo in the reigne of king Edmund, had a synod commensed of the chiefe prelats and men of the clergie in his time, to whom he directed this letter here following; the copie whereof I thought to expresse, for the reader to see what zealous care reigned in archbishops then toward the church of the Lord. The words of his epistle proceed in this tenor.

MIrabili cuncti potentis polorum præsulis clementia opitulante, ego Odo ecclesiæ saluatoris domini nostri Iesu Christi archiepiscopus, Douernienſis ciuitatis metropolitanus, coepiscopis fidei catholicæ compagatoribus, spirituali charitatis vigore meis confratribus, præsentium prosperitatem æthereiq; decoris beatitudinem, &c.

The same in English.

By the diuine grace of God, I Odo of the church of our Lord and sauiour Iesus Christ, archbishop and metropolitan of the citie of Douer, to my fellow bishops and fellow planters of the catholike faith, & my fellow brethren in the spirituall bond of charity, with greeting, wish prosperity in this world present, and in the world to come felicitie. If it were so, or by any meanes could be, that all the riches of this world were laid before mine eyes, so that I being emperor had all things vniuersally vnder my subiection, all those things would I gladly giue, yea & my selfe also would offer willingly for the health of your soules, as which also doe desire and trust likewise my selfe to be strengthened with the feruencie of your holinesse, as apperteining to those things wherein the Lord our God hath set vs to be workemen, &c.

And after a few other words of like effect, wherein he doth declare the heauie burthen of his office, it followeth after this maner.

Wherfore most humbly & one vnworthie, but yet a deuout fellow brother of yours, I beseech and exhort your holines, that you will not shew your selues cold & negligent in the cure and regiment of soules, so that in the time of the fearfull iudgement, the Lord do not complaine of you, saying; My shepheards did not feed my flocke, but they fed themselues. And againe; They were princes of my flocke, and I knew not of it. But rather let vs take heed and be diligent ouer the household of the Lord, ouer which he hath set vs to be the leaders, to giue them meate and true measure of corne in time conuenient: that is to say, whole-wholesome doctrine. And although vpon mine owne demerits or worthinesse I doe not presume to comfort or exhort any man: but as one being vnworthie and faultie in transgressions innumerable, am glad, and stand in need rather to bee strengthened by your brotherly admonitions: yet for the ancient authoritie of my predecessors, as of Augustine of happie memorie, and also of all other saints, by whose industrie the rule of christianitie did first flourish and spring from this metropolitan see vnto all quarters of England: therefore I haue thought good to direct vnto you these my letters to the profit of you all: especially, for that our renouned and princely king Edmund, with all his people, doth ioy to follow that which he heareth in you and of you: and also, for so much as all his subiects which be vnder his imperiall dominion, doe loue and delight to follow most ioyfully the fame and report of your sincere conuersation, &c.

Elfinus archbishop of Canturburie elect.

This Odo continued bishop the space of twentie yeares. After whom Elfinus was elected and ordained by the king to succeed through fauour and money: but in going to Rome for the popes pall, in his iourney through the Alps, he decaied and died for cold. Whereupon succeeded Dunstan, as in time and place (by the leaue of Christ) followeth to be declared.

S. Edmundsburie.

This Edmund gaue to S. Edmund the martyr before mentioned, the towne of Bedrichesworth, which is now called S Edmundsbury, with great reuenues and lands appertaining to the same. But concerning the friuolous miracles which our monkish storie-writers heare faine of this good Edmund, by the way (or rather out of the way) I let them passe.

The children of K. Edmund.

And thus much concerning the reigne of king Edmund, who after he had reigned six yeares and a halfe, was slaine, as is said, at Pulcherchurch, and buried at Glastenburie of Dunstan: leauing behind him two children, Edwin and Edgar, by his wife Elgina. But because the foresaid children were yet yong and vnder age, therfore Edred brother to king Edmund, and vncle to the children, gouerned as protector about the space of nine yeares and a halfe, till Edwin the eldest sonne came to age. This Edred with great moderation and fidelity to the yong children behaued himselfe, during the time of his gouernment. In his time Dunstan was promoted through the means of Odo the archbishop, from abbat of Glastenburie, to bee bishop of Worcester, and after of London. By the counsell of this Dunstan, Edred was much ruled, and too much thereto addicted: in so much that the foresaid Edred is reported in stories to submit himselfe vnto much fond penance and castigations, inflicted to him of the said Dunstan. Such zealous deuotion was then in princes, and more blind superstition in bishops. And here againe is another miracle as fantasticall as the other before, forged of Dunstan, that when that Edred being sicke, sent for Dunstan to be his confessor, by the way Dunstan should heare a voice declaring to him before, that Edred was already departed, at the declaring whereof Dunstans horse fell immediatly dead vnder him, with lie and all.

King Edwin.

K. Edwin.

EDwin the eldest sonne of king Edmund afore mentioned, after his vncle Edred, began his reigne about the yeare of our Lord 955, being crowned at Kingston by Odo the archbishop of Canterburie. Anno 955. Of this Edwin it is reported of diuers writers, that the first day of his coronation, sitting with his lords, he brake suddenly from them, & entred a secret chamber, to the companie of a certaine woman whom hee inordinately retained (being, as some say, another mans wife) whose husband he had before slaine, as others say being of his alliance, to the great misliking of his lords, and especially of the clergie. Dunstan was yet but abbat of Glastenburie, who following the king into the chamber, brought him out by the hand, and accused him to Odo the archbishop, causing him to be separat from the company of the foresaid partie; by the which Odo, the king was for his fact suspended out of the church. By reason whereof, the king being with Dunstan displeased, banished him his land, and forced him for a season to flie into Flanders, where he was in the monasterie of saint Amandus. About the same season the monasticall order of Benedict monks, or blacke monks (as they were called) began to multiplie and increase heere in England. In so much that where before time other priests and canons had been placed, there monks were in their roomes set in, and the secular priests (as they then were called, or canons) put out. But king Edwin, for the displeasure hee bare to Dunstan, did so ber all the order of the said monks, that in Malmsburie, Glastenburie, and other places more, he thrust out the monks, and set in secular priests in their stead.

The king suspended by the archbishop. Edwin an enemie vnto monks.

Monks put out, and secular priests placed in their roomes.

Notwithstanding, it was not long but these priests and canons were againe remoued, and the said monks in their stead restored, both in the foresaid houses, and in diuers other churches cathedrall besides, as in the nert storie of king Edgar (Christ willing) shall more at large appeare.

In fine, king Edwin being hated by reason of certaine his demeanors of all his subiects (especially the Northumbrians and Mercians) was by them remoued from his kingly honor, and his brother Edgar in his stead receiued, so that the riuer of Thames diuided both their kingdoms. Which Edwin after he had reigned about the tearme of foure yeares departed, leauing no heire of his body. Wherefore the rule of the land fell vnto Edgar his yonger brother.

The death of king Edwin.

King Edgar.

EDgar the second sonne of Edmund and brother to Edwin, being of the age of sixteene yeares, began his reigne ouer the realme of England, in the yeare of our Lord 959. but was not crowned till foureteene yeares after: the causes whereof here vnder follow (Christ willing) to be declared. In the beginning of his reigne hee called home Dunstan, whom king Edwin before had exiled. Then was Dunstan, which before was abbat of Glastenburie, made bishop of Worcester, and then of London. Not long after, this Odo the archbishop of Canterburie deceaseth, after hee had gouerned that church 24 yeares. After whom Brithelinus bishop of Winchester first was elected; but because he was thought not sufficient to furnish that rome, Dunstan was ordeined archbishop, the other sent home againe to his old church. Where note by the way, how in those daies the donation and assigning of ecclesiasticall dignities remained in the kings hand, only they set their pall from Rome as a token of the popes confirmation. So Dunstan being by the king made archbishop, toke his iourney to Rome for his pall of pope John the 13. which was about the beginning of the kings reigne. Thus Dunstan obtaining his pall, shortly after his returne againe from Rome, intreateth king Edgar, that Oswaldus (who, as is said, was made monke at Floriake, and was nephue to Odo late bishop of Canterburie) might bee promoted to the bishoprik of Worcester; which thing to him was granted. And not long after, through the meanes of the said Dunstan, Ethelwoldus (whom stories doe feigne to be the great patron of monkerie) first monke at Glastenburie, then abbat of Abendon, was also made bishop of Winchester. Of this Ethelwaldus, Gulielmus libro de gestis pontificum recordeth, that what time he was a monke in the house of Glastenburie, the abbat had a vision of him, which was this: How that there appeared to him in his sleepe a certaine great tree, the branches whereof extended throughout all the foure quarters of the realme, which branches were all couered with many little monks coules, wher in the top of the tree was one great master coule, which in spreading it selfe ouer the other coules, inclosed all the rest: which master coule in the tree top, mine author in the interpretation applieth to the life of this Ethelwold. Of such prodigious fantasies our monkish histories be full; and not only our histories of England, but also the heathen stories of the gentiles bee stuffed with such kind of dreames of much like effect.

Monkish dreames.

Of such a like dreame we read of the mother of Achelstan, how the moone did spring out of hir wombe, and gaue light to all England. Also of king Charles the emperor, how hee was led by a third to see the torments of hell. Likewise of Furceus the heremite mentioned in the third booke of Beda, who saw the ioyes of heauen & the foure fires that should destroy the world: the one of lying, for breaking our promise made at baptisme; the second fire was of the couetous; the third of dissention; the fourth was of the fire of impietie and wrongfull dealing. Item, in like sort of the dreame of Dunstan, and of the same Ethelwold, to whom appeared the three bishops, Brithanus, Birinus, and Swithinus, &c. Of the dreame of the mother of this Ethelwold, who being great with him, did see a golden eagle flie out of hir mouth, &c. Of the dreame likewise, or the vision of king Edgar concerning the falling of the two apples, and of the pots, one being full of water, the other emptie, &c. Also of king Edward the confessor, touching the ruine of the land by the conqueror of the Normans. We reade also in the historie of Asiages, how hee dreamed of Cyrus, and likewise of many other dreames in the bookes of the monks, and of the ethnike writers. For what cannot either the idle vanitie of mans head, or the deception of the lying spirit worke by man, in foreshewing such earthly euents as happen commonly in this present world? But here is a difference to bee vnderstood betweene these earthly dreames, speaking of earthly things, and matters of humaine superstition; and betweene other spirituall reuelations sent by God touching spirituall matters of the church pertaining to mans saluation. But to our purpose, by this dreame, and by the euent which followed after, it may appeare how and by what meanes the multitude of monks, began first to swarme in the churches of England: that is, in the daies of this Edgar, by the meanes of these three bishops, Dunstan, Ethelwold, and Oswold. Albeit Dunstan was the chiefest ringleader of this race; yet Ethelwold being now bishop of Winchester, and Oswold bishop of Worcester, were not much behind for their parts. By the instigation and counsell of these three aforesaid, king Edgar is recorded in histories to build either new out of the ground, or to redifie monasteries decayed by the Danes more then forty. As the house of Elie, Glastenburie, Abbington, Burga by Stamford, Thorney, Ramsey, Milton, Wenton, Winchcombe, Thanckoke in Deuonshire, with diuers more. In the setting vp and building of the which the foresaid Ethelwold was a great doer and a founder vnder the king. Moreouer, through the motion of this Dunstan and his fellowes, king Edgar in diuers great houses and cathedrall churches, where prebendaries and priest were before, displaced the priests and set in monks. Whereof we read in the chronicles of Roger Houeden, in words and forme as followeth: Hic namque Ethelwoldus regem, cuius eximius erat consiliarius, ad hoc maximè prouocauit, vt clericos à monasterijs expelleret, & monachos sanctimonialésq; in eis collocaret, &c: that is, Ethelwold bishop of Winchester, who was then one of the kings counsell, did vrge the king chiefly to expell clerkes out of monasteries, and in their romes to bestow monks and nuns, &c. Whereunto accordeth likewise Historia Iornalensis, conteining the like effect in these words: Hoc anno Ethelwoldus Wint. & Oswaldus Wigornienſis, episcopi, iussu regis Edgari (clericis de quibusdam maioribus ecclesijs expulsis) monachos instituerunt, aut de eisdem clericis & alijs monachos in eisdem fecerunt. Gulielmus also writing of the time of Dunstan, maketh the matter somewhat more plaine, where he saith: Itaq; clerici multarum ecclesiarum data optione, vt aut amictum mutarent, aut locis valedicerent, melioribus habitacula vacuefacientes: surgebant itaque in tota insula religiosorum monasteria, cumulabantur mole pretiosi metalli sanctorum altaria, &c. Thus the secular priests being put to their choice, whether to change their habit, or to leaue their romes, departed out of their houses, giuing place for other better men to come in. Then the houses and monasteries of religious men through all the realme went vp apace, &c.

After the kings mind was thus persuaded and incited by these bishops to aduance monkery, then Oswoldus bishop of Worcester, and also made archbishop of Yorke after the decease of Dskitellus, Sui voti compos effectus (as Houeden writeth) hauing his see in the cathedrall church there of S. Peter, began first with faire persuasions to assay the minds of the canons and priests, whether they could be content to change their profession and to be made monks, or no. Which when hee saw it would not take effect, he practised this policie with them: Here to the said church of S. Peter, within the churchyard he erected another church of our Ladie, which when hee had replenished with monks, there he continually frequented, there hee kept, there he sat, and was euer there conuersant. By reason whereof the other church was left naked and desolate, and all the people gathered there where the bishop was. The priests seeing themselues so to bee left and neglected both of the bishop and of the people, to whom nothing remained but shame and contempt, were driuen of shame either to relinquith the house (such as would not enter the monkish profession) or else to become monks, such as had nothing else to stay vpon. After the like superstition (although not after the same subtiltie) did Ethelwold also driue out the canons and priests from the new monasterie in Winchester, afterward called Hyda, and placed his monks. So in Oxford and in Mildune, with diuers other places more, the secular priests with their wiues were expelled, to giue place to monks. The cause wherof is thus pretended in certaine storie writers, whom I see also Fabian to follow: for that the priest and clerkes were thought slacke and negligent in their church seruice, and set in vicars in their stead, while they liued in pleasure, & misspent the patrimony of the church after their owne lust. Then king Edgar gaue to the vicars the same land which before belonged to the prebendaries, who also not long after shewed themselues as negligent as the others. Wherfore king Edgar (as mine authors write) by the consent of pope Iohn the thirteenth voided cleerely the priests, and ordained there monks. Although certaine of the nobles, and some of the prelats were therewith not well contented, as in the chapter following may partly appeare.

But for so much as wee haue entred into the mention of monks and nuns, and of their profession, which I see so greatly in our monkish stories commended: lest perhaps the simple reader may be deceiued therby, in hearing the name of monks in all histories of times to be such an ancient thing in christian life (euen from the primitiue church after the apostles time) both commonly recited & well receiued; therefore to helpe the iudgement of the ignorant, and to preuent al error herein, it shal not be vnprofitable, in following the present occasion here giuen (by way of a little digression) to intermeddle somewhat concerning the originall institution of monks, what they were in the old time which were called Monachi, wherein the monks of the primitiue time did differ from the monks of the middle time, and from these our monks now of this latter age: moreouer, wherin all these three do differ from priests (as we call them) and from men of the clergie. Wherfore to answere to the superstitious scruple of such, which allege the old antiquity of the name & title of monks: first I grant the name and order of monks to be of old continuance, during neere from the time of 300 yeres after Christ. Of whom diuers old authors do record, as Augustinus, Hieronymus, Basilius Magnus, who was also himselfe one of the first institutors and commenders of that superstition, Chrysostomus, Nazianzenus, Euagrius, Sozemenus, Dionysius, and diuers others. In the number of these monks (which then were diuided into heremits or anachorits, and into Coenobits) were Antonius, Paulus, Johannes, with diuers other recluses. Among the which was Hierome, Basil, Macharius, Isidorus, Pambus, Nilammon, Simeon, with infinite others both in Palestina, Syria, Thebaide, Mesopotamia, in Egypt, in Africa and in Scythia. In so much that Cassianus lib. 2. cap. 4. De Canon. Noctur. orat. maketh mention of a certaine monasterie in Thebaide, wherein were aboue 5000 monks, vnder the gouernment of one abbat. And here also in England mention is made before of Bangor, wherein were two thousand and two hundred monks vnder one mans ruling, in the yeare of our Lord 596. Whereby it appeareth that monks were then, and two hundred yeares before, in the primitiue time of the church. But what monks these were, is to be considered: such as either by tyrannie of persecution were driuen into solitarie and desert places; or else such as not constreined of any, but of their owne voluntarie deuotion (ioyned with some superstition among, for the loue they had vnto spirituall contemplation, and for hatred of the wicked world) withdrew themseues from all companie, either hauing nothing to themselues proper, or else all things common with others. And all these were then nothing else but lay men: of which laymen, there were two sundrie sorts, one of the vulgar and common people, which onely were partakers of the sacraments; the other in following a monasticall kind of life, were called monks (being nothing but lay men) leading a more seuere and stricter trade of life then the others, as may sufficiently appeare by August. lib. de moribus ecclesiæ, cap. 13. Item, lib. de operibus monachorum. Item, epistola ad Aurelium. Also by Hierome ad Heliodorum, writing these words: Alia monachorum est causa, alia clericorum; clerici pascunt oues, ego pascor, &c: that is, One thing pertaineth to monks, an other thing vnto them of the clergie; they of the clergie feed their flock, I am fed, &c. Et ex Dionysio. Also the same appeareth likewise by the fourth canon of the councell of Chalcedon, where it is prouided, Ne monachi se ecclesiasticis negotijs immisceant: that is, That monks should not intermeddle with matters of the church, &c. Et Leo epistola 62. vetat monachos & laicos, etsi scientiæ nomine glorientur, admitti ad officium docendi & concionandi.

Monks forbidden to intermeddle with matters ecclesiastical.

By these foresaid authors allcaged, it is euident, that monks in the former age of the church, albeit they liued a solitarie life, yet they were then no other but onely lay men, differing from priests, and differing from the other monks which succeeded them afterwards in the middle age of the church, and that in three points: First, they were tied and bound to no prescript forme either of diet or apparell, or any thing else, as we may see testified by the words of saint Augustine, which be these: Neque inter hæc nemo vrgetur in aspera, quæ ferre non potest: nulli quod recusat imponitur. Nec ideo contemnitur à cæteris, in quod eis imitandis se fatetur inualidum. Meminerunt enim quantoperè commendata sit in scripturis charitas. Meminerunt omnia munda mundis, &c. Non quod intrat in os coinquinat hominem, sed quod exit. Itaque non reijciendis generibus ciborum, quasi pollutis, sed concupiscentiæ perdomandæ, & dilectioni fratrum retinendæ inuigilat omnis industria. And Sozomen. lib. 3. cap. 16. speaking of the monks of the same time, which in cities had seuerall mansions from others, saith: Alij in turba ciuitatum conuersabantur, sic seipsos gerentes, vt nullius momenti viderentur, & à multis nihil differrent, &c. Some liue in cities so behauing themselues, as seeming nothing worth, and they differed nothing from the multitude, &c. The second point wherein they were discrepant from the latter monks was, in that they remained no other but in the order of lay men (onely being of a stricter life then the rest) and had nothing to doe in matters and charges ecclesiastical; which was afterward broken by pope Boniface the fourth, as followeth (the Lord willing) to be seene and said. Thirdly, the foresaid monks of that age (albeit the most part of them liued sole and single from wiues) yet some of them were married: certes none of them were forbidden or restrained from marriage. Of such as were married speaketh Athanasius in epistola ad Dracontium, qui ait se nouisse & monachos & episcopos coniuges & liberorum patres, &c: that is, Which saith, that he knew both monks and bishops married men, and fathers of children, &c.

And yet the said monks of the old time, though they were better then the other which followed them; yet all that notwithstanding, superstition with them and among them began then to creepe into the church through the craftie subtiltie of Satan, and all for the ignorance of our free iustification by faith in Iesus Christ. Examples do declare the vaine and prodigious superstition of these monastical sort of men; which examples doe not lacke, if leisure rather did not lacke to bring them in. But two or three shall suffice for many, which I purpose (the Lord willing) here to insert, to the intent the mind of the godly reader may the better consider and vnderstand, how shortly after the time of Christ and his apostles, the doctrine of christian iustification began to be forgotten, true religion turned to superstition, and the price of Christs passion to bee obscured through the vaine opinion of mens merits, &c. A certaine abbat named Moses thus testifieth of himselfe in the collations of Cassianus, that he so afflicted himselfe with much fasting & watching, that sometimes for two or three daies together, not onely hee felt Superstition crept in with monkerie.

The ignorance of our free iustification by Christ is the cause of all superstition.

no appetite to eat, but also had no remembrance of any meat at all, and by reason thereof was driuen also from sléep. In so much that hee was caused to pray to God but for a little refreshing of sléepe to be giuen him some péece of the night. In the same author mention is made of a certaine old man an heremit, who because he had conceiued in himselfe such a purpose neuer to eat meat, without he had some ghest or stranger with him, sometime was constrained to abstaine fiue daies together vntill sunday, while he came to the church, and there brought some stranger or other home with him.

Cassianus lib. de spiritu gastrimarg. cap. 40.

Two other examples yet more will I adde out of the said Cassianus, to declare how the subtilty of Satan through superstition and false colour of holinesse, blindeth the miserable eies of such, which rather attend mens traditions then the word of God. In the fortith chapter of the said author, in his book De gastrimargia, is told of a certaine abbat named Joannes, in the desert wildernes of Scythia, who sent two of his nouices with figs vnto one that was sicke in the wildernesse eighteen miles off from the church. It chanced these two young nouices missing the way, wandered so long in the wilde forrest or wildernesse and could not find the cell, that for emptinesse and wearinesse they waxed faint and tired: and yet rather would they die then take the figs cõmitted to them to cary, and so did: for shortly after they were found dead, their figs lying whole by them.

Superstition.

Cassian. lib. 6. cap. 2.

Another story he also reciteth of two monasticall brethren, who making their progresse in the desert of Thebaide, purposed with themselues to take no sustenance but such as the Lord should minister himselfe vnto them. It happened as they were wandering desolat in the desert, and fainting almost for penury, certaine Nazites, a kind of people by nature fierce & cruell, notwithstanding being suddenly altered into a new nature of humanity, came forth, and of their owne accord offered bread vnto them: which bread the one thankfully receiued as sent of God, the other as counting it sent of man, and not of God, refused it, and so for lacke perished.

Hereunto might I also anner the story of Mucius, who to declare his obedience, did not sticke at the commandement of his abbat, to cast his sonne into the water, not knowing whether any were appointed there ready to rescue him from drowning; so far were the monks in those daies drowned in superstition. What is this, but for mans traditions and commandements to transgresse the commandement of God, which saith: Thou shalt do no murther; Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God? What man is so blind that séeth not by these and infinit examples more, what pernicious superstition hath begun by reason of this monkery, almost from the beginning, to creep into the church? Whereat I cannot maruell enough, séeing that age of the church had in it so many learned doctors, who not only did approue and allow these monasticall sects of life, but also certaine themselues were the authors and institutors of the same, yea and of mens traditions made the seruice of God. In number of whom may be reckoned Basilius Magnus, and Nazianzenus, who with immoderate austerity did so plucke downe themselues, that when they were called to the office of bishops, they were not able to sustaine the labor thereof.

Monkery mother of superstition and hypocrisie.

Basilius Magnus. Nazianzenus.

After these foresaid monks of that time aboue rehearsed, followed other monks of the middle age of the church; who as in multitude, so also in superstition increasing, began by little and little from their desolat dens in the vast wildernesse, to approch more neere to great townes; where they had solemn monasteries founded by kings & quéenes, and kings daughters, and other rich consuls, as is partly before touched; and the causes also touched withall, for the which they were first founded, as these: Pro remedio animæ meæ, pro remissione peccatorum meorum, pro redemptione peccatorum meorum, & pro salute regnorum, quique meo subiacent regimini populorum, in honorem gloriosæ virginis, &c. For all these impious and erroneous titles and causes we find alleged in stories, as in Malmesburiensis, Jornalensis, Henricus, & others more. In which histories I also note, that the most part of these aforesaid monasteries were erected first vpon some great murther, either by war in the field, or priuatly committed at home, as shall well appeare to them which read their books whom I haue alleged. But to returne to our monks againe, who (as is said) first began to crép from the cold field into warme townes and cloisters, from townes then into cities, and at length from their close cels and cities into cathedral churches (as here appeareth by this story of king Edgar) where, not only they did abound in wealth and riches (especially these monks of our latter time) but much more did swim in superstition and Pharisaicall hypocrisie, being yoked and tied in all their doings, to certaine prescript rules and formall obseruances: in watching, in sléeping, in eating, in rising, in praying, in walking, in talking, in loking, in talking, in touching, in handling, in their gestures, in their vestures, euery man apparelled not as the proper condition of others would require, nor as the season of the yéere did serue, but as the coacted rules and order of euery sect did inforce them. The number of which sects was infinitly diuers: some after Basilius rule went in white: some after Benets rule in blacke: some Cluniacenses, first set vp by Otho in the time of this king Edgar, wearing after the rule of Benets order: some after Hieromes rule, leather girdled, and coped aboue their white cote: some Gregorians, copper coloured: some De valle vmbrosa, gray monks: some Grandimontenses, wearing a cote of mailes vpon their bare bodies, with a black cloke thereupon: some Cistercians, who had white cochets on a black cote: some Celestines all in blew, both cloke, coule and cap: some Charter monks, wearing haircloth next their bodies: some Flagellants going bare foot in long white linnen shirts, with an open place in the backe, where they beat themselues with scourges on the bare skin euery day before the peoples eies, til the blood ran downe, saying that it was reuealed to them by an angell, that in so scourging themselues, within thirty daies and twelue houres, they should be made so pure from sinne, as they were when they first receiued baptisme: some starred monks: some Jesuits with a white girdle and a russet coule. Briefly, who can reckon the innumerable sects & disguised orders of their fraternities? some holding of S. Benet, some of S. Hierome, some of S. Basil, some of S. Bernard, some of S. Bridget, some of S. Bruno, some of S. Lewis, as though it were not enough for christians to hold of Christ only. So subiect were they to seruile rules, that no part of christian liberty remained among them; so drowned and sunke in superstition, that not only they had lost Christs religion, but also almost the sense and nature of men. For where men naturally are and ought to be ruled by the discreet gouernment of reason in all outward doings, wherein no one rule can serue for all men: the circumstance of time, place, person, and businesse being so sundry and diuers; contrary among these, no reason but only the knocke of a bell ruled all their doings; their rising, their sléeping, their praying, their eating, their comming in, their going out, their talking, their silence, and altogether like insensible people, either not hauing reason to rule themselues, or else as persons vngratefull to God, neither inioying the benefit of reason created in them, nor yet vsing the grace of Christs liberty, whereunto he redeemed them.

Monkes are subiect and rulde by the knock of a bell.

Thus thou séest (gentle reader) sufficiently declared, what the monks were in the primitiue time of the church, and what were the monks of the middle age, and of these our latter daies of the church. Whereunto ioyne this withall, that where the monks of elder time (as is said) were meere lay men and no spirituall ministers; afterward Bonifacius the fourth made a decrée, An. 606, that monks might vse the office of preaching, of christening, of hearing confessions, and also of absoluing them of their sinnes, &c. So then monks, who in the beginning were but lay men, and no spirituall ministers, forbidden by the generall councell of Chalcedon (as is aboue related) to intermeddle with matters ecclesiasticall; afterward in processe of time, did so much incroch vpon the office of spiritual ministers, that at length the priests were discharged out of their cathedral churches, and monks set in their places: because that monks in those daies leading a stricter life, and professing chastity, had a greater countenance of holinesse among the people then the priests, who then in the daies of king Edgar had wiues (at least so many as would) no law forbidding them to the contrary, till the time of Hildebrand, now called Gregory the seuenth, whereof more shall be said (Christ willing) in the booke next following.

Monkes made spirituall ministers, contrary to the old decrees and custome of the church.

Priests in king Edgars time had wiues.

And thus much by the way, as touching the order and profession of monks. Now to turne in againe from whence we digressed (that is) to the matter of king Edgar, who following the counsell and leading of Dunstan, and the foresaid Ethelwold bishop of Winchester, was somewhat thereby inclined to superstition: but otherwise of his owne nature well giuen to all vertues and princely acts worthy of much commendation and famous memory. So excellent was hee in iustice, and sharp in correction of vices (as well in his magistrates as other subiects) that neuer before his daies was lesse sellony by robbers, nor lesse extortion or bribery by false officers. Such prouinces and lordships as were not yet come vnder the kings subiection, hee united and adioyned to his dominion: and so made one perfect monarchy of the whole realme of England, with all the Ilands and borders about the same. Such as were wicked, he kept vnder, he repressed them that were rebels, the godly he maintained, he loued the modest, hee was deuout to God, and beloued of his subiects, whom he gouerned in much peace and quietnesse. And as he was a great seeker of peace, so God did blesse him with much abundance of peace and rest from all wars: so that as the story recordeth of him, Nullas insidias domesticorum, nullum exterminium alienorum senserit, for the which he was called Pacificus. He neither talked of any priuy treason among his subiects; nor of any inuasion of forren enemies. So studious he was of the publike profit of his realme, and fruitfull in his gouernment, that as the said story testifieth of him, Nullus ferè annus in chronicis præterijt, quo non magnum & necessarium patriæ aliquid fecerit: No yeere passed in all the time of his raigne, wherein he did not some singular and necessary commodity for the commonwealth, &c. A great maintainer he was of religion and learning, not forgetting heerein the foresteps of king Alfred his predecessor. Among his other princely vertues this chiefly is to bee regarded, that whereas other princes commonly in much peace and quietnes are wont to growe into a dissolute negligence of life, or oblivion of their charge committed vnto them: this king in continuance of peace (that notwithstanding) kept euer with him such a watch, and a vigilant seuerity ioined with a seemely clemencie, that I cannot here but recite the witnesse of our story-writers, testifying of his diligent care ouer the commonwealth, which was so great, Vt nullum cuiuscunque dignitatis hominem leges eludere impunè permitteret: that is, That hee would suffer no man, of what degrée of nobilitie so euer hee were, to dally out his lawes without condigne punishment, &c. And followeth more in the same author: Nemo eius tempore priuatus latro, nemo popularis prædo, nisi qui mallet in fortunas alienas grassari propriæ vitæ dispendio, &c. In all his time there was neither any pryuy picker, nor open theefe, but he that in stealing other mens goods, would venture and suffer (as he was sure) the losse of his owne life, &c. Guliel. de reg.

A note for men of nobility to marke.

A notable example of a prince, to admonish all princes what to doe.

More ouer, as the studious industry of this prince was forward in all other points, so his prudent prouision did not lacke in this also, in driuing out the deuouring and rauening wolues throughout all his land. Wherein he vsed this policie, in causing Ludwallus prince or king of Wales, to yeeld to him yerly by way of tribute three hundred wolues. By means whereof, within the space of foure yeers after in England & Wales, might scantly be found one wolfe aliue.

Wolues first driuen out of England.

This Edgar among other of his politike deeds, had in readinesse 3600 ships of warre, to scowre the seas in the summer time, whereof 1200 kept the east seas, as many to defend the west side, againe as many on the south seas, to repulse the inuasion of forren enemies. Moreouer, in winter season, the vse and manner of this vertuous king was this: During all the time of his life, to ride ouer the land in progresse, searching and inquiring diligently (to vse here the words of mine author) Quomodo legum iura, & suorum statuta decretorum obseruarentur: & ne pauperes à potentibus præiudicium passi opprimerentur: that is, How his lawes and statutes by him ordained were kept, and that the poore should suffer no preiudice, or be oppressed any manner of waies by the mightier, &c. Briefly, as I see many things in this worthy prince to be commended, so this one thing in him I cannot but lament, to see him like a phenix to flie alone, that of all his posterity so few there be that seeke to keepe him company. And although I haue shewed more already of this king, then I thinke will well be followed, yet this more is to bee added to the worthinesse of his other acts, that whereas by the multitude of the Danes dwelling in diuers places of England, much excessiue drinking was vsed, whereupon insued drunkennesse and many other vices, to the euill example and hurt of his subiects; hee therefore to preuent that euill, ordained certaine cups with pins or nailes set in them, adding thereunto a law, that what persons drank past that marke at one draught, should forfet a certaine peny, whereof one halfe should fal to the accuser, and the other halfe to the ruler of the borough or towne, where the offence was done.

The prouision of king Edgar in keeping the seas.

A notable example in a prince for all good princes to marke and to follow.

The deuice of king Edgar to auoid drunkennesse.

It is reported of this Edgar by diuers authors, that about the thirteenth yeere of his raigne, hee being at Chester, eight kings (called in histories Subreguli) to wit, petie kings, or vnder kings, came and did homage to him. Of whom the first was the king of Scots, called Kinadius, Macolinus of Cumberland, Mackus or Malcolinus king of Mona, and of diuers other Ilands, and all the kings of Wales, the names of whom were Dufnall, or Dunewaldus, Sifreth, Hywall, Jacob, Aikel, Juchel. All which kings after they had giuen their fidelity to Edgar, the next day following (for a pompe or roialty) he entred with these aforesaid kings into the riuer of Dée, where he sitting in a boat, toke the role of the helme, and caused these eight kings, euery person taking an ore in his hand, to row him vp and downe the riuer to and from the church of S. John, vnto his palace againe, in token that he was master and lord of so many prouinces: whereupon hee is reported to haue said in this manner. Tunc demum posse successores suos gloriari, se reges Angliæ esse, cùm tanta prærogatiua honorum fruerentur. But in my mind this king had said much better, if he had rather said with S. Paul, Absit mihi gloriari, nisi in cruce Domini nostri Iesu Christi.

Eight kings do homage to king Edgar.

The glory of king Edgar reprehended.

Wherein kings ought to glory.

And thus yee haue heard hitherto touching the commendation of king Edgar, such reports as the old monkish writers thought to bestow vpō him, as vpon the great patron of their monkish religion, who had builded so many monasteries for them, as were sundaies in the yeere (as some say) or as Edmer reporteth, but forty and eight.

King Edgar a superstitious vpholder of monkery. Ex Edmero.

Now on the other side, what vices in him were reigning, let vs likewise consider, according as we finde in the said authors described, which most write to his aduancement. Whereof, the first vice is noted to be cruelty, as well vpon others, as namely vpon a certaine earle being of his secret counsell, called Ethelwold. The storie is this: Ordgarus duke of Deuonshire, had a certaine daughter named Elfrida, whose beautie being highly commended to the king, he being inflamed therewith, sent this foresaid Ethelwold (whom he especially trusted) to the partie, to see and to bring him word againe and if her beauty were such as was reported, willing him also to make the match betweene them. Ethelwold well viewing the party, and seeing her beauty nothing inferior to her fame, and thinking first to serue his owne turne, told all things contrarie vnto the king. Whereupon the king withdrawing his mind otherwise, in the end it came to passe that Ethelwold himselfe did marry her.

Vices noted in king Edgar.

King Edgar circumuented by one of his counsell.

Not long after, the king vnderstanding further by the complaints and rumors of certaine how he was preuented and beguiled, set a faire face vpon the matter before Ethelwold, and merily telling with him, told him how he would come and see his wife, and indeed appointed the day when he would be there. Ethelwold the husband perceiuing this matter to goe hardly with him, made hast to his wife, declaring to her the comming of the king, and also opening the whole order of the matter how he had done, desired her of all loue, as she would saue his life, to disgrace and deforme her selfe with garments and such attire, as the king might take no delighting in her. Elfrida hearing this, what did she, but contrary to the request of her husband, and promise of a wife, against the kings comming, trimmed her selfe at the glasse, and decked her in her best aray. Whom when the king beheld, he was not so much enamored with her, as in hatred with her husband, who had so deceiued him. Whereupon the king shortly after, making as though he would go to hunt in the forrest of Hartwood, sent for Ethelwold to come to him vnder the pretence of hunting, and there ran him thorow and slew him. After this, the bastard son of Ethelwold comming to him, the king asked him how hee liked that hunting? Who answered againe, that which pleaseth the king, ought not to displease him: for the death of which Ethelwold, Elfrida afterward builded a monastery of nuns in remission of sinnes.

Cruelty in king Edgar noted.

Another fault which Malmsbury noteth in him, was the comming in of strangers into this land, as Saxons, Flemmings and Danes, whom he with great familiarity retained to the great detriment of this land, as the foresaid story of Malmsbury recordeth, whose words be these: Vnde factū est, vt fama eius per ora omniū volitante, alienigenæ, Saxones, Flandricæ, ipsi etiam Dani huc frequenter annauigarent, Edgaro familiares effecti. Quorū aduentus magnum prouincialibus detrimentū peperit. Inde meritò iureq; reprehendunt eum literæ, &c. That is: Whereby it happened that diuers strangers out of forren countries allured by his fame came into the land, as Saxons, Flemmings, and Danes also, all which he retained with great familiarity. The comming of which strangers bred great damage to the realme, and therefore is Edgar iustly blamed in stories, &c. With the which reprehension, all the Saxon stories also do agree.

Great detriment happning in this realme by king Edgar.

W. Malm.

The third vice to him obiected, was his incontinent and lasciuious lust in deflowring maids, as first of a dukes daughter being a nun, and a virgin named Wilfrida, or Wilfrude; of which Wilfride was borne Editha a bastard daughter of Edgar. Also of another certaine virgin in the towne of Andeuar, who was priuily conueied into his bed by this meanes: The lasciuious king comming to Andeuar not far from Winchester, and thinking to haue his pleasure of a certaine dukes daughter, of whose beauty he heard much speaking, commanded the maid to be brought vnto him. The mother of the virgin greening to haue her daughter made a concubine, secretly by night conueied to the kings bed in stead of her daughter, another maiden of beauty and fauour not vncomely: who in the morning rising to her worke, and so being knowne of the king what shee was, had granted vnto her of the king such liberty and freedome, that of a seruant shes was made mistresse both to her master, and also to her mistresse. Ex Matthæo Paris. lib. de regib.

The incontinent life of king Edgar.

Editha base daughter of Wilfred the kings leeman.

Another concubine he had also besides these aforesaid, which was Egelfleda or Elfleda, called Candida, the white daughter of duke Ordmere (as Guliel. Malmsbur. recordeth) she being also a professed nun, of whom he begat Edward in bastardy; for the which hee was inioined by Dunstan seuen yeeres penance. After which penance being compleat, then he toke to him a lawfull wife (as Malmsb. saith) Elfritha, the mother of Edmund and Ethelred, or otherwise called Egelred, whereof more shall be said (the Lord willing) hereafter.

Edward borne in bastardy of Elfled king Edwards concubine.

Ouer and beside all these vices noted and obiected to king Edgar in our monkish story-writers, I also obserue another no lesse, or rather greater vice then the other afore recited, which was, blind superstition and idolatrous monkery brought into the church of Christ, with the wrongfull expulsing of lawfull married priests out of their houses. Whereupon what inconueniences insued after in this realme, especially in the house of the Lord, I leaue it to the consideration of them which haue heard of the detestable enormities of those religious votaries: the occasion whereof, first and chiefly began in this Edgar, through the inligation of Dunstan and his fellowes, who after they had inueigled the king, and had brought him to their purpose, they caused him to call a councell of the clergy: where it was enacted, that the canons of diuers cathedrall churches, colleginars, persons, vicars, priests and deacons, with their wiues and children, either should giue ouer that kind of life, or else giue roome to monks, &c. For execution of which decree, two principall visitors were appointed; Athelwold or Ethelwold bishop of Winchester, and Oswold bishop of Worcester, as is partly before touched. And

And thus much concerning the hiſtory of king Edgar, and of ſuch things as in his time hapned in the church; which Edgar after he had entred into the parts of Britannie to ſubdue the rebellion of the Wellſhmen, and there had ſpoiled the country of Glamorgan, and waſted the country of Mon; within ten daies after, when he had raigned the ſpace of ſixteen yeeres, died, and was buried at Glaſtenbury, leauing after him two baſtards, to wit, Editha and Edward, and one ſonne lawfully begotten named Ethelred, or otherwiſe by corruption called Egelred, for Edmund the Elder ſonne died before his father.

The death of king Edgar.

You heard before how king Edgar is noted in all ſtories to be an incontinent liuer in deflouring maids and virgins. Of which virgins, three notoriouſly are expreſſed in authors, to wit, Wilfrude or Wilfride, the ſecond was the dukes maid at Andeuar, neere to Wincheſter, the third was Elfled mother of Edward, for the which Elfled he was ſtaied & kept backe from his Coronation by Dunſtan archbiſhop of Canturbury, the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres; and ſo the ſaid king beginning his raigne in the ſixteenth yéer of his age, being the yeere of the Lord, 959, was crowned at his age one and thirty, An. Dom. 974. as is in the Saxon chronicle of Worceſter church to be proued. For the more euident declaration of which matter, concerning the coronation of the king reſtrained, and the preſumptuous behauior of Dunſtan againſt the king, and his penance by the ſaid Dunſtan iniоined, ye ſhall heare both Oſberne, Malmeſb. and other authors ſpeake in their owne words, as followeth.

Ex chronico Saxonico eccleſia Wigornenſis.

Ex Oſberno in vita Dunſtani.

Perpetrato itaque in virginem velatam peccato, &c. After that Dunſtan had vnderſtanding of the kings offence perpetrated with the profeſſed nun, and that the ſame was blazed amongſt the people, with great ire and paſſion of mind hee came to the king, who ſéeing the archbiſhop comming, eſtſoones of gentlenes aroſe from his regall ſeat towards him, to take him by the hand and to giue him place. But Dunſtan refuſing to take him by the hand, and with ſterne countenance bending his browes, ſpake after this effect of words (as ſtories import) vnto the king: You that haue not feared to corrupt a virgin maid hand-faſt to Chriſt, preſume you to touch the conſecrated hands of a biſhop? You haue defiled the ſpouſe of your maker, and thinke you by flattering ſeruice to pacifie the friend of the bride-groome? No ſir, his friend will not I be, which hath Chriſt to his enemy. &c. The king terrified with theſe thundering words of Dunſtan, and compuncted with inward repentance of his ſinne perpetrated, fell downe with weeping at the feet of Dunſtan: who after he had raiſed him vp from the ground againe, began to vtter to him the horribleneſſe of his fact: and finding the king ready to receiue whatſoeuer ſatiſfaction he would lay vpon him, iniоined him this penance for ſeuen yeeres ſpace, as followeth: That he ſhould weare no crowne all that ſpace, that he ſhould faſt twice in the weeke, he ſhould diſtribute his treaſure left to him of his anceſtors liberally vnto the poore, he ſhould build a monaſtery of nuns at Shaftsbury, that as he had robbed God of one virgin through his tranſgreſſion, ſo ſhould he reſtore to him many againe in times to come. Moreouer he ſhould expell clerks of euill life (meaning ſuch prieſts as had wiues and children) out of churches, and place couents of monks in their roome, &c.

Dunſtan refuſeth to take the king by the hand.

The words of Dunſtan to king Edgar.

Penance iniоined to king Edgar by Dunſtan.

It followeth then in the ſtory of Oſberne, that when the ſeuen yeeres of the kings penance were expired, Dunſtan calling togither all the peéres of the realme, with biſhops, abbats, and other eccleſiaſticall degrées of the clergy, in the publike ſight of all the multitude, ſet the crowne vpon the kings head at Bathe, which was the one and thirtith yéere of his age, and the thirteenth yéere of his raigne; ſo that hee raigned onely but three yéeres crowned king. All the other yéeres beſides, Dunſtan belike ruled the land as he liſted. Furthermore, as touching the ſonne of the ſaid Elfled, thus the ſtory writeth: Puerum quoq; ex peccatrice quondam progenitum, ſacro fonte regeneratum lauauit, & aptato illi nomine Edwardo in filium ſibi adoptauit. i. The child alſo which was gotten of the harlot, he baptiſed in the holy fountaine of regeneration, and ſo giuing his name to be called Edward, did adopt him to be his ſonne, &c. Ex Osberno.

King Edward reigned but three yeeres crowned king.

Elfled proued a nun, and Edward her ſonne proued a baſtard.

By the which narration of Oſberne, agréeing alſo with the ſtory of the Saxon booke aboue mentioned, is conuinced a double vntruth or error, either negligently ouerſéene, or of purpoſe diſſembled in our latter monkiſh ſtory writers, as in Malmeſbury, Matth. Paris, Matth. Weſtm. and other more. Who to conceale the fault of king Edgar, or to beare with Dunſtans fact, in ſetting vp Edward for the maintenance of their monkiſh order: firſt do falſly affirme, that Editha the daughter of Ulfride was borne after Edward, and that for her this penance was iniоined to king Edgar. Which neither is, nor can be ſo, in proceſſe hereafter (the Lord willing) ſhall appeare.

Errors in Malmeſbury, and certaine other monks ſtories.

The firſt error.

The kings penance not iniоined for Edith, but for Edward.

The ſecond error.

Secondly, they are deceiued in this, that they affirme king Edgar to haue two wiues, and that Elfleda the mother of Edward was not a profeſſed nun indéed, but diſſembled ſo to be to auoid the violence of the king: whereas indéed the truth of the ſtory both giueth her to be a nun, and her ſonne to be baſe, and ſhe her ſelfe neuer to be maried vnto the king.

Elfled the mother of Edward proued to be a profeſſed nun.

The lying miracles of Elfled, Dunſtan, and Editha reproued.

Now forſomuch as we haue hitherto entred mention of Elfleda and Editha, alſo of Alfred and Dunſtan, here would not be let paſſe to ſpeake ſome thing of their lying miracles, falſly forged, to the great ſeduction of chriſtian people by ſuperſtitious monks, who cared not what fables and lies they brought into the church, ſo they might haue the vantage of poore mens purſes and oblations. And firſt here commeth in the fabulous miracles wrought at the tombe of Elfleda the kings concubine, which William Malmeſbury in theſe verſes expreſſeth:

Idolatrous worſhipping the tombe of Elfled.

Nam nonnullis paſſa annis morborum moleſtiam,
Defacatam & excoctam Deo dedit animam.
Functas ergo vitæ fato beatas exuuias,
Infinitis clemens ſignis illuſtrauit Deitas.
Inops, viſus & auditus ſi adorant tumulum,
Sanitati reſtituti probant ſanctæ meritum.
Rectum greſſum refert domum, qui acceſſit loripes,
Mente captus redit ſanus, boni ſenſus locuples.

The Engliſh of which verſes is needleſſe here to be recited. Briefly, the effect is this: That both the blind, deafe, halt, and ſuch as be mad, receiue their health againe, if they worſhip the tombe of this Elfleda, &c.

The like fainings and monſtrous miracles we read alſo in chronicles of doting Dunſtan, drowned in all ſuperſtition, if he were not alſo a wicked ſorcerer. Firſt, how he being yet a boy, chaſed away the diuell, ſet about with a great company of dogs, and how the angels did open the church doore for him to enter. Then how the lute or harpe hanging vpon the wall, did ſing or play without any finger theſe words: Gaudent in cœlis animæ ſanctorum, qui Chriſti veſtigia ſunt ſequuti, & qui pro eius amore ſanguinem ſuum fuderunt: ideo cum Chriſto regnabunt in æternum. Item where a certaine great beame or maſterpoſt was loſed out of the place, he with making the ſigne of a croſſe, ſet it in right frame againe. Moreouer, how the ſaid Dunſtan being tempted vpon a time of the diuell with the cogitation of women, caught the diuell by the noſe with a hot paire of tongs, and held him faſt. Item, how oft heauenly ſpirits appeared to him, and vſed to talke with him familiarly. Item how he prophecied of the birth of king Edgar, of the death of king Egelred, of the death of Editha, and of Ethelwald biſhop of Wincheſter. Alſo how our lady with her fellowes appeared viſibly to him ſinging this ſong: Cantemus domino ſociæ, cantemus honorem; Dulcis amor Chriſti perſonet ore pio. Againe, how the angels appeared to him, ſinging the hymne called Kyrie rex ſplendens, &c. And yet theſe prodigious fantaſies with other more are written of him in chronicles, and haue been beléeued in churches.

The idle fantaſies and forged miracles of Dunſtan.

A doubt whether Dunſtan was a ſorcerer.

Dunſtan a poſt-ſetter.

Dunſtan caught the diuell by the noſe with an hot paire of tongs.

Our lady appeareth to Dunſtan.

What marueil if certain books and epiſtles be falſly intituled to the doctors, when the papiſts ſhame not to aſcribe other mens verſes alſo to the Virgin Mary her ſelfe?

Among manie other falſe and lying miracles, forged in this corrupt time of monkerie, the fabulous or rather fruitleſſe legend of Editha were not to be ouerpaſſed, if for ſhame and honeſtie it might well be recited. But to caſt the dirt of theſe pope holy monkes in their owne face, which ſo impudently haue abuſed the church of Chriſt, and ſimplicitie of the people, with their vngratious vanities; let vs ſée what this miracle is, and how honeſtlie it is told. Certaine yeares after the death of Editha, ſaith William of Malmeſburie, which yeares Capgraue in his new legend reckoneth to be thirtéene, the ſaid Editha and alſo S. Denis holding her by the hand, appeared to Dunſtan in a viſion, willing and requiring him that the bodie of Editha in the church of Wilton, ſhould be taken vp and ſhrined, to the intent it might be honored héere in earth of her ſeruants, according as it is worſhipped of her ſpouſe in heauen. Dunſtan vpon this comming frō Saliſbury to Wilton, where Editha was interred, commanded her body to be taken vp with much honor and ſolemnitie. Who there in opening her tombe (as both Malmeſburie and Capgraue with ſhame enough record) found all the whole body of this Editha conſumed to earth, ſaue onely her thumbe, her belly, and the part vnder the belly. Whereof the ſaid Editha expounding the meaning, declared that her thumbe remained ſound, for the much croſſing ſhe vſed with the ſame. The other parts were incorrupted for a teſtimonie of her abſtinence, and integritie, &c. Ex Malmeſ. & Capgrauo. What ſatan hath ſo enuied the true ſinceritie of chriſtian faith and doctrine, ſo to contaminat the ſame with ſuch impudent tales, ſuch filthy vanities, and idolatrous fantaſies as this? Such monkes with their deteſtable houſes, where Chriſts people were ſo abominably abuſed and ſeduced to worſhip dead carcaſes of men and women, whether they deſerued not to be raced and plucked downe to the ground, let all chaſt readers iudge. But of theſe matters enough and too much.

King Edward called the Martyr.

§ Anno 975 §

The ſtory of king Edward. Ex Simone Dunham.

AFter the death of Edgar no ſmall trouble aroſe amongſt the lords and biſhops for ſucceſſion of the crowne: the principall cauſe whereof roſe vpon this occaſion, as by the ſtory of Simon of Durham, and Roger Houeden, is declared. Immediatly after the deceaſe of the king, Alferus duke of Mercia, and many other nobles which held with Egelred or Ethelred the only right heire and lawfull ſonne of Edgar, miſliking the placing and intruding of monks into churches, and the thruſting out of the ſecular prieſts, with their wiues & children out of their ancient poſſeſſions, expelled the abbats and monks, and brought in again the foreſaid prieſts with their wiues. Againſt whom, certaine other there were on the contrary part, that made reſiſtance, as Ethelwine duke of Eaſtangles, Elfwoldus his brother, and the earle Brithnothus, ſaying in a councell togither aſſembled, that they would neuer ſuffer the religious monks to be expelled and driuen out of the realme, which held vp all religion in the land; and thereupon eftſoones leuied an armie, whereby to defend by force the monaſteries, ſuch as were within the precinct of Eaſtanglia.

Contention amongſt the lords about the putting in of monks.

Contention amongſt the lords for chooſing the king.

In this hurly burly amongſt the lords about the placing of monks and putting out of prieſts, roſe alſo the contention about the crowne, who ſhould be their king; the biſhops and ſuch lords as fauoured the monks, ſeeking to aduance ſuch a king as they knew would incline to their ſide: ſo that the lords thus diuided, ſome of them would haue Edward, and ſome conſented vpon Egelred the lawful ſonne. Then Dunſtan archbiſhop of Canturbury, and Oſwold archbiſhop of Yorke, with other their fellow biſhops, abbats, and diuers other lords and dukes aſſembled in a councell togither. In the which councell Dunſtan comming in with his croſſe in his hand, and bringing Edward before the lords, ſo perſwaded them, that in the end Edward by Dunſtans meanes was elected, conſecrated, and annointed for their king.

Edward the baſtard made king, and the right heire put backe.

Ex Oſberno, Nic. Triuet, Ioan. Pariſ. Vincentio, Antonino.

And thus haſt thou (good reader) the very truth of this ſtorie, according to the writing of authors of moſt antiquity which liued neereſt to that age, as Oſberne & others; which Oſberne liuing in the daies of William Conqueror, wrote this ſtory of Dunſtan through the motion of Lanfrancus, and allegeth or rather tranſlateth the ſame out of ſuch Saxon ſtories as were written before his time. Beſides which Oſberne we haue alſo for witneſſe hereof, Nicolas Triuet in his Engliſh ſtory written in French, and alſo Ioannes Paris in his French ſtory written in the Latin tongue, where he plainly cal'eth Edward, Non legitimum filium, that is, No lawfull ſonne. Whereunto adde moreouer the teſtimony of Vincentius and Antoninus, who in plaine termes likewiſe report the ſame.

Editha proued not to be the child for whom king Edgar was inioined penance.

Now hauing laid the foundation for the truth and ground of this matter, let vs come to examine how truly our latter writers do ſay, which write that Editha, and not Edward, was the child for who Dunſtan inioined to the king ſeuen yeers penance, and alſo how truly they report Edward to be a lawfull heire, and Elfled to be a lawfull wife to king Edgar.

For firſt touching Editha, this is confeſſed by the ſaid writers themſelues, that ſhe was of good yeres at what time Edgar her father was inioined his penance. After the which ſeuen yeres of his penance expired, hee liued at the moſt but three yeres and a halfe, which ſeuen yers and three yers and a halfe, do make in all but ten yeres and a halfe. But now the ſaid authors themſelues do grant, that ſhe was made abbeſſe by her father, he being then aliue. And how can this then ſtand with her legend, which ſaith that ſhe was not leſſe then fifteen yers of age? By which account it muſt needs fall out, that ſhe could not be ſo little as fiue yeres old, before the birth of that child for whom the king did penance.

The yeeres of Editha and Edward, caſt by the ſupputation of legends and ſtories.

And thus much touching Editha. Now in like manner to conſider of the time of Edward. Firſt, this by all writers is granted, that hee was ſlaine in the fifteenth yere of his age. Which yeres do well agree to that child which king Edgar begat in baſtardy, and for the which he did his penance: for the more euidence whereof, let vs come to the ſupputation of yers in this ſort.

First, the penance of the king after the birth of this child, laſted ſeuen yeres. Then the king after the ſame liued three yeres and a halfe. After whoſe death Edward raigned other three yeres and a halfe, which in all make the full ſumme of fourteen yeres. About the count of which age, the ſaid Edward going on his fifteenth yere, by their owne reckoning was ſlaine.

King Edward called martyr, proued to be a baſtard.

And thus haue ye by manifeſt demonſtration proued by the right caſting of the yeres, after their owne grant and reckoning, that Editha daughter of Elfride in no caſe can be the child which was borne after Edward, and for whom the king was inioined penance; but that Edward rather was borne after Editha, and was the child for whom the penance was inioined: contrary to the opinion commonly receiued in the church, which for ignorance of the ſtory hath hitherto holden Edward to be an holy martyr, and right heire vnto the crown. Which error and opinion how it firſt ſprang and by whom, albeit it pertaine not to my ſtory to diſcuſſe, yet were it no hard matter to coniecture.

The cauſe yet depended, why this ſtory of king Edward is ſo falſly corrupted in monkiſh ſtories.

Firſt, after that Dunſtan and Oſwold with other biſhops, abbats, and certaine lords and dukes of that faction, for the maintenance of monkery, had aduanced Edward to be king, againſt queene Alfrith mother of Ethelred, and Alferus duke of Mercia, and certaine other nobles which held the contrary ſide of the prieſts againſt the monks; in proceſſe of time the monks that came after to write ſtories, perceiuing Dunſtan to be reputed in the church of Rome for an holy ſaint, and the ſaid king Edward for an holy martyr, and partly alſo to bolſter vp their owne religion of monkery ſo much as they could, to the intent therefore they might ſaue both the credit of Dunſtan and of the king, and eſpecially bearing fauour to their owne religion, and partly that the reputation of the church of Rome ſhould not be diſſeined by opening the truth of this matter, either did not ſee, or would not confeſſe herein what they knew; but rather thought beſt to blanch the ſtory, and colourably to hide the ſimple truth thereof, making the people falſelie beleeue that Elfleda the mother of Edward, was wife to king Edgar, and Edward to be lawfully borne, and alſo that Editha was borne after Edward, and to be the child for which the king was inioined penance. All which is falſe and contrarie both to the order of time aboue declared, and alſo to the plaine words of Malmeſbury, which ſpeaking of king Edgars laſt concubine, ſaith in plaine words: Dilexit vnicè integram lecto vni deferens fidem, quoad legitimam vxorem accepit Elfthridem, filiam Ordgari: that is, He had a concubine whom he loued intirely, keeping true faith of his bed to her alone, vntill the time hee maried for his lawfull wife Elfride the daughter of duke Ordgar, &c. Whereby we haue to vnderſtand, that whatſoeuer concubine this was which Malmeſbury ſpeaketh of, certaine it is that Edgar liued in whoredome till time hee maried his lawfull wife. Further more, and finally to conclude, beſide theſe arguments and allegations aboue recited, let this alſo be perpended, how the ſaid Dunſtan with his complices, after the killing of king Edward, leauing the right heire of the crowne (which was Ethelred) went about (as Capgraue and their owne legend confeſſeth) to ſet vp Editha the other baſtard to poſſeſſe the crowne, but that ſhe more wiſe then her brother Edward, refuſed the ſame. Wherby what is to be thought of the doings of Dunſtan, and what ſhould be the cauſe why he preferred both Edward and Editha to the crowne, rather then the lawfull heire, I leaue to all indifferent readers thereof to iudge.

Malmsb. in lib. de regibus.

Dunſtan ſuborneth Editha the baſtard, to take the crown from the right heire. Ex Capgraue in vita ſanctæ Edithæ.

After that Dunſtan and his fellowes had thus ſet vp Edward for their king, they were now where they would be, ſuppoſing all to be ſure on their ſide, & that they had eſtabliſhed the kingdome of monkery for euer, through the helpe of the young king, and the duke of Eaſtangles, and certaine other nobles whom they had drawen to their part. Howbeit this matter paſſed not ſo well with them as they hoped. For ſhortly after the coronation of this yong king, Alferus duke of Mercia, who followed much the deeds of the queene with other great men, ſtoutly ſtanding on the contrary ſide, droue out the monkes from the cathedrall churches, which king Edgar before had ſet in, and reſtored againe the prieſts (as Ranulphus ſaith) with their concubines: but in the hiſtory of the library of Iornall, I find it plainly expreſſed, with their wiues. The words of the verie author be theſe: Alferus princeps Merciorum, cæteríque plures, eiectis monachis de magnis monaſterijs, quos rex Edgarus nuper inſtituerat, clericos cum vxoribus reduxerunt: that is, Alferus duke of Mercia with other great men more, droue out the monks from the great monaſteries, whom king Edgar had there ſet in before, and reſtored againe the prieſts with their wiues.

Duke Alferus.

Prieſts with their wiues reſtored.

Hiſtoria Iornalenſis in vita Edgari.

Whereby it doth euidently appeare, that prieſts in thoſe daies were maried & had their lawfull wiues. The like before that in king Inas time is plaine, that biſhops then had wiues & children, as appeareth by the words of the law then ſet forth, extant in the hiſtory of the ſaid Iornalenſis, which bee theſe: Si quis filiolum alterius occidat vel patrinum, ſit ſimile cognationi, & creſcat emendatio ſecundum Weram eius regi, ſicut cognationi. Si de parentela ſit qui occidit eum, tunc excedat emendatio patrini, ſicut mandata Domini. Si epiſcopi filiolus ſit, ſit dimidium hoc, &c. And thus much by the way for prieſts wiues and their children.

Biſhops and prieſts in thoſe daies maried in England.

Iornalenſe.

Now to the purpoſe againe of our matter, which is to declare how the duke & nobles of England expelled the monks out of the monaſteries after the death of king Edgar: whereof let vs heare what the monkiſh ſtory of the abby of Croiland recordeth: Monachis de quibuſdam monaſterijs eiectis, clerici ſunt introducti, qui ſtatim monaſteriorum maneria ducibus terræ diſtribuebant, vt ſic in ſuas partes obligati, eos contra monachos defenſarent. Tunc de monaſterio Eueſhamenſi, monachis expulſis, clerici fuerunt introducti. Terræque tyranni de tetris eccleſiæ præmiati ſunt, quibus regina nouercali nequitia, ſtans cum clericis in regis opprobrium, fauebat. Cum monachis autem rex, & ſancti epiſcopi perſiſtebant. Sed tyranni fulti reginæ fauore & potentia, ſuper monachos triumphabant. Multus inde tumultus in omni angulo Angliæ factus eſt. Ex chronico Ingulphi abbatis de Crouland, &c. that is; The monks being expelled out of certaine monaſteries, the clerks againe were brought in, who diſtributed the manors or farmes of the ſaid monamonasteries, to the dukes and lords of the land, that they being obliged to them should defend them against the monks. And so were the monks of Euelham thrust out, and the secular clerks placed, and the lands of the church giuen to the lords, with whom the queene, the kings stepmother holding the same time, toke part also with the said clerks against the king. On the contrarie part stood the king and the holie bishops taking part with the monks. Howbeit, the lords and peeres of the realme staying vpon the fauour and power of the queene, triumphed ouer the monks, &c.

Great businesse in the land about placing of monks, and displacing priests.

A controuersie betweene priests and monks.

Thus as much adoe there was through all quarters of the realme about the matter among the lords, so arose no lesse contention betweene the priests and monks of England. The priests complaining to the king and Dunstan, laid for themselues that it was vncomelie, vncharitable, yea and vnnaturall, to put out an old knowen dweller for a new vnknowen; and that God was not pleased, that to be taken from the ancient possessor which by God was giuen him; neither that it could be of any good man accepted, to suffer any such iniurie to be done, lest peraduenture the same thing wherein he was prejudiciall to an other, might after reuert and redound vpon himselfe at length. The monks on the other side laid for their part, that Christ allowed neither the old dweller, nor the new commer, nor yet looked vpon the person, but who so would take the crosse of penance vpon him, and follow Christ in vertuous liuing, should be his disciple.

The answer of monks against the priests.

These and such other were the allegations of the monks. But whether a monks coule or a wiuelesse life make a sufficient title to enter into other mens possessions or no, I refer it to the iudgement of the godlie. The troublous cares in mariage, the necessarie prouision for housekeeping, the vertuous bringing vp of children, the dailie helping of pouertie and bearing of publike charges, with other manifest perturbations & combrances dailie incident vnto matrimonie, might rather appeere to godlie wise men to come neerer to the right crosse of penance, then the easie and loittering idlenesse of monkerie. In the end, vpon this controuersie was holden a councell of bishops and other of the clergie. First, at Reading or at Winchester (as Guliel. saith) where the greater part both of the nobles and commons iudged the priests to haue great wrong, & sought by all meanes possible, to bring them againe to their old possessions and dignities. Iornalensis heere maketh rehersall of an image of the crucifix, or a rod standing vpon the Frater wall, where the councell was holden. To this rod Dunstan requireth them all to pray, being belike not ignorant of some spirituall prouision before hand. In the midst of their prayer the rod (or els some blind monke behind it in a trunke) through the wall, is reported to speake these words: Absit hoc vt fiat, absit hoc vt fiat: iudicastis bene, mutaretis non bene. In remembrance whereof these verses were written vnder the rods feet.

A vaine miracle of Dunstans rood that spake.

Humano more crux præsens ædidit ore,
Cœlitus affata, quæ perspicis hic subarata,
Absit vt hoc fiat, & cætera tunc memorata.

Heere lacked a Thomas Cromwell to trie out false iugling.

Of this Dunstanicall or rather Satanicall oracle, Henricus maketh no mention, nor Ranulphus, nor yet Houedenus, nor Fabian in their histories. Gulielmus in his booke De regibus reporteth it but by hearelay, in these words, saying: Aliæ literæ docent, &c. Wherefore the lesse it seemeth to be of credit. Albeit if it were of credible truth, yet it proueth in this matter nothing els but Dunstan to be a sorcerer, as Polydor Virgil also himselfe seemeth to smell something in this matter.

Notwithstanding for all this, yet the strife ceased not: in so much that a new assemblie of the clergie and other was appointed after at a place called the street of Calue, where the councell was kept in an vpper loft. In this councell many grieuous complaints were obiected (as Malmesb. saith) against Dunstan: but yet he kept his opinion, and would not there remoue from that which he began to maintaine. And while they were in great contention and argument which way should be admitted and allowed (if it be true that in the stories is written) suddenlie the ioises of the loft failed, and the people with the nobles fell downe, so that certaine were slaine, and many hurt. But Dunstan (they say, only, standing vpon a post of the sollar which remained vnbroken) escaped without danger. Which thing whether it so hapned to portend before the ruine of the realme and of the nobles (as Henry Huntington doth expound it) which after insued by the Danes, or whether it was so wrought by Dunstans sorcerie (as was not vnpossible) or whether it were a thing but feigned of the monkish writers, and not true; all this I leaue to the readers, to thinke therein what them liketh. The stories say further, that vpon this the matter ceased, and Dunstan had all his will.

Henricus lib. 5. Guliel. Ranulph. Iornalensis, Fabian.

These things thus done at Calue, it hapned not long after the same, that king Edward, whom the writers describe to be a vertuous and a meeke prince, much pitifull and beneficiall to the poore, about the fourth yeere of his reigne came vpon a season from hunting in the forrest alone, without the companie of his seruants to the place in the west countrie, where Alfrith his mother with her sonne Egelred did lie. When the queene the mother was warned of his comming by her men, anon she calleth a seruant of hers which was of her speciall trust, opening to him all her conceiued counsell, and shewing him all points how and what to do for the accomplishing of her wicked purpose. Which thing so done, she made towards the king, and receiued him with all courtesie, desiring him to tarie that night; but he in like courtesie excused himselfe, and for speed desired to see his brother, and to drinke vpon his horse sitting, the which was shortlie brought.

The horrible wickednes of a queene-mother.

King Edward traiterouslie murthered by his stepmother and her seruant.

Now while the cup was at his mouth, the seruant of the queene (being informed) strake him in the bodie with a long two edged dagger. After the which stroke the king toke the horse with the spurs, and ran toward the way where he supposed to meet with his companie, but he bled so sore, that with faintnesse he fell from his horse, his one foot being in the stirrup. By reason whereof he was drawen of his horse ouer fields and lands till he came to a place named Corfigate, where he was found dead: and for that neither the maner of his death, (nor yet he himselfe for the king) was knowen, was buried vnhonorablie at the towne of Warham, where the body remained the space of three yeeres, and then after was taken vp by duke Alfer aboue mentioned, and with pompe and honor accordinglie was remoued to the minster of Shaftsburie, and there bestowed in the place called Edwardstow. Many tales run (more perchance then be true) concerning the finding and taking vp of his bodie, which our most common histories ascribe to miracles and great wonders wrought about the place where the king was buried. As first, how a poore woman borne blind, receiued her sight by the meanes of S. Edward, there where he did lie. Also how a pillar of fire from heauen descended ouer the place of his buriall. Then how the foresaid queene Alfrith taking her horse to go to the place, was stopped by the way, that neither her horse could be driuen by any meanes, nor she her selfe on foot was able to approch neere to the place where the corps of S. Edward was. Furthermore, how the said queene in repentance of her fact, afterward builded two nunries, one at Amesburie by Salisburie; the other at Merewell, where she kept her selfe in continuall repentance all the daies of her life. And thus, as ye haue heard, was this vertuous yong king Edward murthered, when he had reigned almost foure yeeres, leauing no issue behind him, whereby the rule of the land fell to Egelredus his brother.

But here by the way is to be noted (vpon the name of this Edward) that there were three Edwards before the conquest. The first, was king Edward the senior: the second, king Edward the martyr, which was this king: the third, was king Edward called the Confessor, whereof hereafter shall follow (Christ willing) to be declared.

Three Edwards kings before the conquest.

In the order and course of the Romane bishops, mention was made last of Agapetus the second, after whom next succeeded pope Iohn the thirteenth, of whom Dunstan archbishop of Canturburie receiued his pall, as in the storie of king Edgar is before minded. This pope is noted to be very wicked and infamous, repleat from his first bringing vp with abominable vices: a whoremaster, an adulterer, incestuous, libidinous, a gamester, an extortioner, periured, a fighter, a murtherer, cruell and tyrannous. Of his cardinals, some he put out their eies, from some he cut off their tongs, some their fingers, some their noses, &c. In a generall councell before the emperor Otho the first of that name (who was the first emperor of the Germans) after the empire was translated out of France to Germanie by pope Agapetus (as is aboue histories) these obiections were articulat against him. First, that he neuer said his seruice, that in saying his masse he did not communicat, that he ordained deacons in a stable, that he committed incest with two of his sisters, that playing at dice he called for the diuell to helpe, that for monie he made boyes bishops, that he deflowred virgins and strangers, that of the palace of Lateran he made a stewes, that he lay with Stephana his fathers concubine, likewise with Ramera and with Anna and her neese, that he put out the eies of the bishop Benedict, that he caused houses to be set on fire, that he brake open houses, that he dranke to the diuell, that he neuer crossed himselfe, &c. For the which causes (and worthilie) he was deposed by the consent of the emperor with the prelats, and pope Leo was substitute in his place. But after his departing (through the harlots of Rome and their great promises) the said pope Iohn was restored againe to his place, and Leo (set vp by the emperor) was deposed. At length about the tenth yeere of the popedome of this Iohn; he being found without the citie with another mans wife, was so wounded of her husband, that within eight daies after he died.

After him the Romans elected pope Benedictus the fift, without the consent of the emperor: whereupon the said Otho the emperor being not a little displeased for displacing of Leo, whom he had before promoted, and for the chosing also of Benedict, came with his armie and laid siege to Rome, and so set vp pope Leo againe, the eight of that name; which Leo to gratifie his benefactor againe, crowned Otho for emperor, and intituled him to be called Augustus. Also the power which Carolus Magnus had giuen before to the clergie & people of Rome, this Leo by a synodall decree granted to the emperor and his successors: that is, touching the election of the bishop of Rome. The emperor againe restored to the see of Rome all such donations

Pope Iohn, the fourteenth.

After pope Leo had reigned a yéere and three moneths, succéeded pope Iohn the fourtéenth, against whom (for holding with the emperor) Petrus the head captaine of the citie, with two consuls, twelue aldermen, and diuers other nobles, gathering their power together, laid hands vpon him in the church of Lateran, and clapt the pope in prison eleuen months. The emperor hearing this, with all speed returned with his armie againe to Rome, who after execution done vpon the authors and chiefe doers of that fact, among other committed the foresaid Petrus to the popes arbitrement, whom he caused first to be stript naked, then his beard being shauen, to be hanged by the haire a whole day together, after that to be set vpon an asse (his face turned backward, and his hands bound vnder the asses taile) and so to be led through the citie, that all men might see him: that done, to be scourged with rods, and so banished the citie. Thus ye see how the holie father followeth the iniunction of the gospell: Diligite inimicos vestros, Loue your enemies, Luke the first, &c. From this pope proceeded first the christening of bels, An. 971.

Pope Donus the second.

Then came pope Donus the second, after whom Bonifacius the seuenth was pope, who likewise séeing the citizens of Rome to conspire against him, was constrained to hide himselfe, and séeing no place there for him to tarie, toke the treasure of S. Peters church, and so priuilie stole to Constantinople. In whose stead the Romans set vp pope Iohn the fiftéenth. Not long after, Boniface returning againe from Constantinople, by his monie and treasure procured a garrison or companie to take his part: by whose meanes the foresaid poe Iohn was taken, his eies put out, and so throwen in prison, where he was, as some say, famished; some say he was slaine by Ferrucius. Neither did Boniface reigne many dayes after, but suddenlie died, whose carcase after his death was drawen by the feet through the streets of Rome after a most despitefull maner, the people shrieking and exclaming against him, Anno 976.

Next pope after him was Benedictus the seuenth, by the consent of the emperor Otho the second, and reigned nineteene yéeres. In the time of this pope, Hugh Cappet the French king toke Charles (the right heire to the crowne) by the treason of the bishop of Laon, and when he had imprisoned him, he also committed to prison Arnoldus archbishop of Raines, and placed in his rome Gilbertus a monke of Floriake (a necromancer) who was schoolemaster to doctor Robert the kings sonne. But this pope Benedictus called a councell at Remis, restored the said Arnoldus againe, and displaced Gilbertus, which after by the help of Otho was made archbishop of Rauenna, and at length was pope, as in processe hereafter (Christ granting) shall be declared.

After Benedictus succéeded in the sée of Rome pope Iohn the sixteenth, and died the eight month of his papacie; next to whom came Iohn the seuentéenth, and after him Gregorie the fift in the yéere of our Lord, 995. This Gregorie (called before Bruno) was a German borne, and therefore the more maliced of the clergie and people of Rome. Whereupon, Crescentius with the people and clergie consenting against the said Gregorie, set vp Iohn the eightéenth. Gregorie vpon the same sped himselfe in all conuenient hast to the emperor Otho the third in Germanie; who hearing the complaint of Gregorie, and vnderstanding his wrongs, set forward with his armie well appointed to Italie, gat the citie, and there toke both Crescentius the consull, and Iohn the pope. Which Iohn the first hauing his eies put out, was depriued after of his life. Crescentius the consull was set vpon a vile horse, hauing his nose and eares cut off, and so was led through the citie, his face being turned to the horse taile, and afterward hauing his members cut off, was hanged vpon a gibbet.

Pope Gregorie thus being restored to his former state, reigned foure yéeres in his papacie (although Marianus Scotus and Martinus say that he sat but two yéeres) &c. During the which time he assembled a councell in Rome: where he, to stablish the empire in his owne countrie (by the consent and counsell of Otho) ordeined seuen princes of Germanie to be electors of the emperor, which order yet to this day remaineth. What be the names of these seuen electors, and what is their office, thus I find in these verses expressed.

This constitution being first begun, An. 997. was after established in Germanie by Otho the emperor, the yéere of our Lord, 1002. And thus much by the way, or rather digression, concerning the rages and tumults of the Romish church. Now to our matter againe.

King Egelred, or Elred.

King Egelred. Anno 979

KIng Edward thus being murthered, as is aforesaid, the crowne fell next to Egelred his yonger brother, and sonne to king Edgar by the foresaid quéene Alfrith, as we haue declared. This Egelred had a long reigne giuen him of God, which dured the terme of eight and thirtie yéeres, but very vnfortunat and full of great miseries; and he himselfe (by the histories) séemeth to be a prince, not of the greatest courage to gouerne a common wealth. Our English stories writting of him thus report of his reigne: that in the beginning it was vngratious, wretched in the middle, & hatefull in the latter end. Of this Egelred it is read, that when Dunstan the archbishop should christen him, as he did hold him ouer the font, something there happned that pleased not Dunstan, whereupon he sware, Per sanctam Mariam, iste ignauus homo erit, By the mother of Christ he will be a prince vntoward and cowardlie: Chron. de Crowland. I find in William of Malmesburie, Lib. 2. de regib. that this Egelred being of the age of ten yéeres, when he heard his brother Edward to be slaine, made such sorow and wéeping for him, that his mother falling therewith in a rage, toke wax candles (hauing nothing els at hand) wherewith she scourged him so sore (well neere till he swounded) that after the same he could neuer abide any wax candels to burne before him. After this, about the yéere of our Lord, 981 (the day of his coronation being appointed by the quéene, the mother, and the nobles) Dunstan the archbishop of Canturburie (who first refused so to do) with Oswald archbishop of Yorke, were inforced to crowne the king, and so they did at Kingston. In doing whereof, the report of stories go, that the said Dunstan should say, thus prophesying vnto the king: that for so much as he came to the kingdome by the death of his brother, and through the conspiracie of the wicked conspirators and other Englishmen, they should not be without bloudshéding and sword, till there came a people of an vnknowen tongue, and should bring them into thraldome, neither should that trespasse be clensed without long vengeance, &c.

Anno 981

The coronation of Egelred.

The prophecie of Dunstan as monkish stories giue it.

In the chronicles of Crowland I find these words: Quoniam ascendisti ad thronum tuum per mortem fratris tui, quem occidit mater tua, propterea audi verbū Domini: Hoc dicit Dominus, non deficiet gladius de domo tua, sæuiens in te omnibus diebus vitæ tuæ, & interficiens de semine tuo, & de gente tua, vsque dum regnum tuum transferatur in regnum alienum: cuius ritum & linguam gens tua non nouit, nec expiabitur nisi longa vindicta, & multa sanguinis effusione peccatum matris tuæ, & peccatum virorum pessimorum, qui consenserunt consilio eius nequam, vt mitterent manum in Christum Domini ad effundendum sanguinem innocentem: Chron. de Crowland.

Not long after the coronation of this king, a cloud was séene throughout the land, which appéered the one halfe like bloud, and the other halfe like fire, and changed after into sundrie colours, and vanished at the last in the morning. Shortlie after the appéerance of this cloud, in the third yéere of his reigne the Danes arriuing in sundrie places of the land, first spoiled Southhampton, either slaying the inhabitants, or leading them captiue away. From thence they went to the ile of Thanet, then they inuaded Chester, from thence they proceeded to Cornwall and Deuonshire, and so to Sussex, where in those coasts they did much harme, & so retired to their ships againe. Roger Houeden writing hereof, saith; that London the same time, or (as Fabian saith) a great part of London was consumed with fire. About this time fell a variance betweene the foresaid Egelred and the bishop of Rochester: in so much that he made war against him, and besiéged the citie. And notwithstanding that Dunstan required the king sending him admonishment to giue ouer for the sake of S. Andrew: yet continued he his siége, till the bishop offered him an hundred pounds of gold; which he receiued, and so departed. The Danes séeing the discord that then was in the realme, and especiallie the hatred of the subiects against the king, rose againe, and did great harme in diuers places of England: in so much that the king was glad to grant them great summes of monie for peace to be had. For the assurance of which peace, Analaffe captaine of the Danes became a christian man, and so returned home to his countrie and did no more harme. Besides these miseries before recited, a sore sickenesse of the bloudie flix, and hot feuers fell among the people, whereof many died; with a like murren also among the beasts. Moreouer, for lacke of iustice, many théeues, rioters, and bribers were in the land, with much miserie and mischiefe.

After him Elfricus, as affirmeth Guliel. lib. 1. de pontif. But as Polydorus saith, Siricius. After him Elfricus came, but Siricius after the mind of Guliel. lib. 1. but Polydor saith Aluricius, then Elphegus &c.

About the same time in the yeare of our Lord 995. Aldunus bishop translated the bodie of saint Cuthert from Chester (which (which first was in a northerne land, then at Rochester) to Durelme or Dunelme. Whereupon the bishops see of Durelme first began.

Not long after the death of Dunstan, the Danes againe entred England, in many and sundrie places of the land: in such sort, that the king was to seeke to which coast he should go first to withstand his enemies. And in conclusion, for the auoiding of more harme, he was compelled to appease them with great sums of money. But when that money was spent, they fell to new robbing of the people, and assailing the land in diuers places, not onely about the countrie of Northumberland, but also besieged the citie of London at the last. But being from thence repelled by the manhod of the Londoners, they strayed to other countries adioyning, as to Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hamshire, burning and killing wheresoeuer they went: so that for lacke of a good head or gouernor, many things in the land perished. For the king gaue himselfe to the vice of leccherie, and polling of his subiects, and disinherited men of their possessions, and caused them to redeeme the same againe with great summes of money, for he payed great tributs to the Danes yearely, which was called Danegilt. Which tributes so increased, that from the first tribute of 10000 pounds, it was brought at last in processe of fiue or six yeres to 40000 pounds. The which yearely (during to the comming of S. Edward, and after) was leuied of the subiects of this land.

To this sorrow moreouer was ioyned hunger and penury among the commons, in so much that euery one of them was constrained to plucke and steale from others. So that, what for the pillage of the Danes, and what by inward theeues and bribers, this land was brought into great affliction. Albeit, the greatest cause of this affliction (as to me appeareth) is not so much to be imputed to the king, as to the dissension among the lords themselues, who then did not agree one with another. But when they assembled in consultation together, either they did draw diuers waies; or if any thing were agreed vpon any matter of peace betweene the parties, sone it was broken againe; or else if any good thing were deuised for the preiudice of the enemie, anon the Danes were warned thereof by some of the same counsell. Of whom, the chiefe doers were Edrike duke of Mercia, and Alfrike the admirall or captaine of the ships, who betrayed the kings naule to the Danes. Wherfore the king apprehending Alfagarus sonne of the said Alfrike, put out his eyes, and so did he after to the two sonnes of duke Edrike in like manner.

The sorrowfull affliction of the English nation.

What dissension and discord doth among the nobles in a realme.

The pride and wretchednesse of the Danes toward the Englishmen.

The Danes thus preuailing more and more ouer the Englishmen, grew in such pride and presumption, that when they by strength caused the husbandmen to eare and sow the land, and to doe all other vile labour belonging to the house, they would sit at home, holding the wife at their pleasure, with daughter and seruant. And when the husbandman came home, he should scantly haue of his own, as his seruants had: so that the Dane had all at his will, and fill, saring of the best; when the owner scantly had his fill of the worst. Thus the common people being of them oppressed, were in such feare and dread, that not onely they were constrained to suffer them in their doings, but also glad to please them, and called euery one of them in the house where they had rule, lord Dane. Which word after (in processe of time, when the Danes were voided) was for despite of the Danes turned of the Englishmen to a name of opprobrie, that when one Englishman would rebuke another, hee would for the more part call him Lurdane.

Lord Dane.

Lurdane.

And thus hitherto (through the assistance of Christ) we haue brought this historie to the yeare of our Lord 1000. During now and continuing these great miseries vpon this English nation, the land being brought into great ruine by the grieuous tributes of the Danes, and also by sustaining the manifold villanies and iniuries, as well by them as by other oppressions within the realme: this yeare which was the yeare of our sauiour 1000, this Egelred through the counsell of certaine his familiars about him, in the one and twentith yeare of his reigne, began a matter, which was occasion either giuen by the one, or taken by the other, of a new plague to insue vpon the Saxons, who had driuen out the Brittains before; that was in ioyning with the Normans in mariage. For the king this yeare aboue said, for the more strength (as hee thought) both of him and the realme, married Emma the daughter of Richard duke of Normandie. Which Richard was the third duke of the Normans, and the first of that name. By reason of which mariage, king Egelred was not a little inhanced in his owne minde: and by presumption thereof, sent secret and strict commissions to the rulers of euery towne in England, that vpon S. Brices day at an houre appointed, the Danes should bee suddenly slaine. And so it was performed, which turned after to more trouble.

The Danes by secret commission, slaine in euery towne of England.

After that tidings came into Denmarke of the murther of those Danes, anon after, Suanus king of Denmarke with a great host and naule landed in Cornwall: where, by treason of a Normane named Hugh, which by fauour of queene Emma was made earle of Deuonshire, the said Swanus tooke Excester, and after beat downe the wals. From thence proceeding further into the land, they came to Wilton and Shireborne, where they cruelly spoiled the countrie, & slue the people. But anon Swanus, hearing that the king was comming to him with the power of his land, tooke his ships and set about to Norfolke: where, after much walking of that countrie, and spoiling the citie of Norwich, and burning the towne of Thetford, and destroying the countrie therabout, at length duke Vlketell met him and beat him, and slue many of the Danes. Wherefore Swanus for that yere returned to Denmarke, and there made great prouision to reenter the land againe the next yeare following; and so did, landing at Sandwich about the fiue and twentith yeare of the reigne of king Egelred, and there spoiled that countrie. And as sone as he heard of any host of Englishmen comming toward him, then he tooke shipping againe. So that when the kings armie sought to meet him in one coast, then would he suddenly land in another. And when the king prouided to meet with him vpon the sea, either they would faine to flee, or else they would with gifts blind the admiral of the kings naule. And thus wearied they the Englishmen, and in conclusion, brought them into extreame and vnspeakeable misery. In so much that the king was faine to take peace with them, and gaue to king Swanus 30000 pounds. After which peace thus made, Swanus returned againe to Denmarke.

But this peace continued not long. For the yeare next following, king Egelred made Edricus aboue mentioned duke of Mercia, who was subtill of wit, gloseing & eloquent of speech, vntrustie, and falle to the king and the realme. And soone after one Turkillus (a prince of the Danes) landed in Kent with much people, and there did such harme, that the Kentishmen were faine to make peace with great gifts, and so thence departed. But this persecution of the Danes (in one countrie or other in England) neuer ceased, nor the king did euer giue to them any notable battell. For when he was disposed to giue them battell, this Edricus would euer counsell him to the contrarie, so that the Danes euer spoiled and robbed, and waxed rich, and the Englishmen euer pore and bare.

After this Swanus being in Denmarke, and hearing of the increase of his people in England, brake his couenants before made, and with a great armie and naule in most defensible wise appointed, landed in Northumberland, proclaiming himselfe to be king of this land. Where after much veration when he had subdued the people, and caused the earle with the rulers of the countrie to sweare to him fealtie; he passed the riuer of Trent to Gainsburgh, and to Northwatling street, and subduing the people there, forced them to giue him pledges: which pledges he committed with his naule vnto Canutus his sonne to keepe, while he went further into the land; and so with a great host came to Mercia, killing and slaying. Then he tooke by strength Winchester and Oxford, and did there what him liked. That done, hee came toward London, and hearing the king was there, passed by the riuer Thames, & came into Kent, and there besieged Canterburie, where hee was resisted the space of twenty daies. At length by treason of a deacon called Almaricus (whom the bishop had preserued from death before) wan it, and tooke the goods of the people, and fired the citie, and tithed the monkes of S. Augustines abbeie (that is to meane, they slue nine by cruell torment, and the tenth they kept aliue as for their slaues.) So they slue there of religious men, to the number of 900 persons; of other men, women, and children, they slue aboue 8000. And finally, when they had kept the bishop Elphegus in strait prison the space of seuen moneths, and because he would not condescend to giue vnto them 3000 pounds; after many villanies vnto him done, they brought him to Greenwich, and there stoned him to death.

The Danes proceeded still in their furie and rage, and when they had wone a great part of Westsaxonie, they returned againe to London. Whereof hearing, the Londoners sent vnto them certaine great gifts & pledges. At last the king about the fiue and thirtith yeare of his reigne, was chased vnto the ile of Wight, and with a secret companie he spent there a great part of the winter, and finally, without cattell or comfort sailed into Normandie to his wife. Swanus being ascertained thereof (inflamed with pride) reared exceeding impositions vpon the people. And among other he required a great summe of money of S. Edmunds lands, which the people there claming to be free from kings tributes, denied to pay. For this Swanus entred the territorie of S. Edmund, and walked and spoiled the countrie, despiling the holy martyr, and menacing also the place of his sepulture. Wherefore the men of that countrie fearing his tyrannie fell to prayer and fasting, so that shortly after Swanus died suddenly, crying and yelling among his knights. Some say that hee was stricken with the sword of saint Edmund, whereof hee died the third day after.

England when they were crowned, sent their crownes for an offering to S. Edmunds shrine, and redeemed the same againe afterwards with a condigne price.

King Egelred returneth into England. Canutus cutteth off the noses and hands of his pledges.

When king Egelred heard of the death of Swanus, hee he made prouision, and returned into England. Of whose sudden comming Canutus being vnprouided fled to Sandwich, and there cutting off the noses and hands of the pledges, which his father left with him, sailed into Denmarke; who the next yeare returned againe with a great nauie, and landed in the south countrie. Wherefore the eldest son of king Egelred called Edmund Ironside, made prouision with the aid of Edrike duke of Mercia to meet him. But Edrike fayning himselfe sicke came not, but deceiued him. For as it was after proued, Edrike had promised his allegiance to Canutus. By reason whereof, Canutus entred the countrie of Westsaxon, and forced the people to be sworne vnto him, and to giue him pledges. In this season, king Egelred being at London, was taken with great sickenesse, and there died, and was buried in the northside of Paules church behind the quire, after he had reigned vnprosperously thirtie and sir yeares; leauing after him his said eldest son Edmund Ironside, and Alfred, and Edward which were in Normandie, sent thither before as is aboue rehearsed. This Egelred although hee was miserablie impugned and vexed of his enemies, yet hee with his counsell gaue forth wholesome lawes, whereof this is one parcell, containing good rules and lessons for all iudges and iustices to learne and follow.

OMnis iudex iustus misericordiam & iudicium liberet in omnibus, & inprimis per rectam scientiam dicat emendationem secundum culpam, & eam tamen admensuret propter indulgentiam. Quædam culpæ reputantur à bonis iudicibus secundum rectum emendandæ. Quædam per Dei misericordiam condonandæ. Iudicia debent esse sine omni haderunga, quod non parcatur diuiti alicui; vel egeno amico, vel inimico ius publicum recitari. Nihil autem iniustius est, quàm susceptio munerum pro iudicio subuertendo: Quia munera excæcant corda sapientum, & subuertunt verba iustorum. Dominus Iesus dixit: In quo iudicio iudicaueritis, iudicabimini. Timeat omnis iudex ac diligat Deum iudicem suum, ne in die iudicij mutus fiat, & humiliatus ante oculos iudicis cuncta videntis. Qui innocentem opprimit, & dimittit noxium pro pecunia, vel amicitia, vel odio, vel quacunque factione, opprimetur ab omnipotente iudice. Et nullus dominus, nulla potestas, stultos aut improbos iudices constituant, quia stultus per ignauiam, improbus per cupiditatem vitat, quam didicit veritatem. Grauiùs enim lacerantur pauperes à prauis iudicibus, quàm à cruentis hostibus. Nullus hostis acerbior, nulla pestis efficacior quàm familiaris inimicus. Potest aliquoties homo fuga, vel defensione vitare prauos inimicos. Non ita possunt iudices, quoties aduersus subditos malis desiderijs inflammantur. Sæpe etiam boni iudices habent malos vicarios & ministros nephandos, quorum reatibus ipsi domini constringuntur, si nó eos coerceant, & à rapacitate cohibeant. Quia Dominus & minister sæculorum ait: Non solùm malè agentes, sed omnes consentientes digni sunt æterna morte. Sæpe etiam praui iudices iudicium peruertunt, vel respectant, & non finiunt causam, donec voluntas eorum impleatur. Et quando iudicant, non opera, sed munera considerant. Impij iudices, iuxta verbum sapientum, sicut rapaces lupi vespere nil residuant vsque mane, id est, de præsenti solum vita cogitant, de futura nihil considerant. Malorum præpositorum mos est, vt quicquid possunt, auferant, & vix necessarium parum quid relinquant sustentationi. Iracundus iudex non potest attendere rectam iudicij satisfactionem. Nam per furoris excæcationem, non perspicit rectitudinis claritatem. Iustum iudicium, vbi non persona consideratur. Scriptum est: Non attendas personam hominis in iudicio, nec pro aliquo facies, vt à vero declines, & iniustè iudices. Susceptio muneris est dimissio veritatis. Ex historia bibliotheca Iornal.

Of this king Egelred I find noted in the booke of Roger Houeden, that he deposed and depriued from all possessions, a certaine iudge or iusticer named Walgeatus, the sonne of one Leonet, for false iudgement and other proud doings, whom notwithstanding he loued aboue all others.

Edmund Ironside a Saxon, and Canutus a Dane, kings together in England.

Anno 1016

Edmund Ironside sonne of Egelred, king.

Canutus sonne of Swanus, king.

The battels betweene Edmundus and Canutus.

AFter the death of Egelred, variance fell betweene the Englishmen for the election of their king. For the citizens of London, with certaine other lords, named Edwin the eldest sonne of Egelred (a yong man of lustie and valiant courage) in martiall aduentures both hardie and wise, and could very well indure all paines; wherefore he was surnamed Ironside. But the more of the lords fauoured Canutus the sonne of Swanus, especially the abbats, bishops, and men of the spiritualtie which before had sworne to his father. By meanes whereof, betweene these two martiall princes were fought many great battels first in Dorsetshire, where Canutus was compelled to flie the field. And after that they fought an other battell in Worcestershire, so sore, that none could tell who had the better; but either for wearinesse or for lacke of day they departed one from the other, and on the next morow fought againe: but then Canutus was compelled to forsake the field. After this they met in Mercia, and there fought againe, where Edmund (as stories say) by the treason of that false Edrike duke of Mercia (whom hee before had receiued to fauour) had the worse. Thus many great conflicts there were betweene these two princes. But vpon a season, when the hosts were readie to ioyne, and a certaine time of truce taken before battell, a knight of the partie of Edmund stood vp vpon a high place, and said these words.

A witte oration to stay blood betweene two armies.

Daily we die, and none hath the victorie: and when the knights be dead on either part, then the dukes compelled by need shall accord; or else they must fight alone. And this kingdome is not sufficient for two men, which sometime sufficed seuen. But if the couetousnesse of lordship in these twaine be so great, that neither can bee content to take part and liue by the other, nor the one vnder the other; then let them fight alone that will be lords alone. If all men fight still, at the last all men shall be slaine, and none left to be vnder their lordship, nor able to defend the king that shall be, against strange enemies and nations.

Two kings fight hand to hand.

These words were so well allowed of both the hosts and princes, that both were content to trie the quarrell betweene them two onely. Then the place and time was appointed where they both met in sight of both hosts. And when either had assaied other with sharpe swords and strokes, first by the motion of Canutus (as some write) hastily they were both agréed, and kissed each other to the comfort of both hosts. And shortly after they agréed vpon partition of the land, and after that, during their liues they loued as brethren. Soone after, a sonne of wicked Edricus, by the mind (as appeared afterward) of his father, espied, when king Edmund was at the draught, and with a speare (some say with a long knife) thrust him into the fundament, whereof the said Edmund shortly after died, after that he had reigned two yeares. He left behind him two sonnes, Edmund and Edward, whom Edrike the wicked duke, after the death of their father, tooke from their mother (not knowing yet of the death of Edmund hir husband) and presented them to king Canutus, saluting him in these words, Aue rex solus. Thus Canutus after the death of Edmund Ironside, was king alone of the whole realme of England; and afterward by the aduice of his counsell, hee sent the foresaid sonnes of Edmund Ironside to his brother Swanus king of Sweueland to be slaine, who abhorring that deed, sent them to Salomon king of Hungarie, where Edmund being married to the kings daughter died, Edward was married to Agatha daughter of his brother Henrie the fourth emperor.

The wicked murther of king Edmund.

Two sonnes of Edmund Ironside.

When Canutus was stablished in the kingdome, he called a parlament at London, where (among other things there debated) it was propounded to the bishops, barons, and lords of the parliament there present, whether that in the composition made betweene Edmund and Canutus, any speciall remembrance was made for the children or brethren of Edmund, for any partition of any part of the land. Whereunto the English lords fallie flattering the foren king, and speaking against their owne minds, as also against their native countrie, answered and said; Nay: affirming moreouer with an oth (for the kings pleasure) that they to the vttermost of their powers, would put off the blod of Edmund in all that they might. By reason of which answere and promise, they thought (many of them) to haue purchased with the king great fauour. But by the iust retribution of God it chanced farre otherwise. For many of them, or the most part (such especially as Canutus did perceiue to be sworne before time to Edmund, and his heires, and also considering that they were native Englishmen) hee mistrusted and disdained euer after. In so much that some hee exiled, a great sort he beheaded, and some by Gods punishment died suddenly. Among whom wicked Edrike also the traitor (although with his sugred words hee continued a while in the kings fauour) at length escaped not condigne reward for his deceiuable dealing. For (as the history of Iornalensis recorded) as the king was in his palace beyond Thames, this Edrike (being belike accused, or else suspected of the king before) comming vnto him, began to reckon vp his benefits and labours bestowed for his sake. First, in forsaking and betraying Egelred, then in slaying king Edmund his sonne, with many such other deeds more, which al for his sake he hath done. Well, saith the king, thou hast here rightly iudged thy selfe, and worthily thou shalt die for slaying thy naturall prince, and my sworne brother. And so commanded him to bee bound immediately hand and foot, and to be throwne into the Thames. Some stories say, that when he had saluted the king with Aue rex solus, and shewed him the slaying of Edmund, Canutus (promising that he would make him therefore higher then all the lords of the realme) commanded his head to be stricken off, and to be set vpon London bridge, and his body to be cast into the towne ditch, and thus with shame ended he his wretched life, as al they commonly doe, which with like dissimulation seeke the destruction of their prince and of their countrie.

slaine by certaine of the kings secretaries or seruants. Also, through the counsell of the said Edrike, and of Emma his wife, he sent the twos sonnes of Edmund Ironside, Edmund and Edward) to his brother Swanus king of Denmarke, to be slaine, as is abouesaid.

In this meane time, Swanus king of Denmarke, brother to Canutus, died. Wherefore that land fell to Canutus, which anon after sailed thither, and toke thereof possession. And after he had set it in an order, he returned into England, and married Emma, late wife before of Egelred, and by hir had a sonne called Hardeknight or Hardeknoutus. Moreouer this Canutus assembled a parliament at Oxford, where it was agreed, that Englishmen and Danes should hold the lawes made by king Edgar, because they were thought so good and reasonable aboue any other lawes.

Thus the Danes being in England, began by little and little to be christian men. And Canutus went to Rome, and so returning againe to England, gouerned that land the space of twentie yeares, leauing after him two sonnes, Harold and Hardeknoutus, which Hardeknoutus was made king of Denmarke in his fathers time.

Harold Harefoot king of England a Dane.

Anno 1039

Harold (called Harefoot for his deliuernes and swiftnesse) sonne to Canutus by Elgina his first wife, began his reigne ouer England, in the yeare 1039. Of him is little left in memorie, for he reigned but foure yeares, saue that hee banished his stepmother Emma, and toke hir goods & iewels from hir.

Hardeknout last king of the Danes that reigned in England.

Earle Godwin.

Hardeknoutus, being king of Denmarke, and second sonne to Canutus by his last wife Emma, was next king of England. In the time of these Danish kings, there was one Godwin an earle in England, which had been before in great fauour with Canutus, for his acts done in Denmarke against the Norwegians: and afterward married the sister (some say the daughter) of Canutus. This Godwin was of a cruell and subtill wit, as hee declared no lesse by the two sons of king Egelred. For when these two aforesaid (whose names were Alfred and Edward) came from Normandy into England, to visit their mother Emma, and brought with them a great companie of Normans: this Godwin (hauing a daughter called Godith, whom he thought to marrie to Edward, and set him vp to bee king, to bring his purpose about) vsed this practise, that is, to persuade king Hardeknout and the lords, not to suffer those Normans to bee within the realme for ieopardie, but rather to punish them for example: by which meanes hee gat authoritie to order the matter himselfe. Wherfore he met them on Guild downe, and there most wretchedly murthered, or rather martyred the most number of the Normans, and that innocently. For as Swanus before had tithed the monks of Canterburie: so he with the cruell companie of English souldiers, slue nine of the said Normans, and saued the tenth. And yet passing the furie of Swanus (as not contented with that tyrannie) he tithed againe the said tith, & slue euery tenth knight, and that by cruell torment, as winding their guts out of their bodies, as writeth Ranulphus. And among others, put out the eyes of the elder brother Alfredus, and sent him to an abbey of Elie: where he being fed with bread and water, indured not long after. Of some writers it was recorded, that he was there slaine with the forenamed torment, and Edward was conueied by some other vnto his mother, who fearing the treason of Godwin, sent him soone ouer the sea into Normandie againe. This cruell fact of Godwin and his men against the innocent Normans, whether it came of himselfe, or of the kings setting on, séemeth to me to be the cause, why the iustice of God did shortly after reuenge the quarrell of these Normans, in conquering and subduing the English nation by William Conqueror, and the Normans which came with him. For so iust and right it was, that as the Normans comming with a naturall English prince, were murthered of Englishmen: so afterward the Englishmen should bee slaine and conquered by the Normans, comming with a forren king, being none of their naturall countrie.

The miserable wretchednesse of Godwin against the Normans.

The Normans tithed, and yet the tenths retithed againe.

Alfredus son of Egelred, right heire of the crowne, tormented with cruell death.

The cause expended, why God suffered this land to be conquered by the Normans.

Example of Gods righteous iudgement.

Then it followeth in the storie, that this king Canute or Hardeknout, when he had reigned two yeres (being merrie at Lambeth) suddenly was stricken dumbe, and fell downe to the ground, and within eight dates after died without issue of his body, who was the last that reigned in England of the blood of the Danes.

The death of king Hardeknout.

This foresaid Godwin, had by the daughter of Canutus his wife, but one sonne, which was drowned. Of his second wife he receiued six sonnes, to wit, Swanus, Harold, Tostius, Wilmotus, Sirth or Surth, and Leofricus, with one daughter called Goditha, which after was married to king Edward the Confessor.

The sons of earle Godwin.

Concerning the storie of this Alfred, I find it something otherwise reported in our English chronicles, that it should bee after the death of Hardeknout; for so much as the earles and barons after his death, assembled and made a councell, that neuer after, any of the Danes blod should bee king of England for the despite that they had done to Englishmen. For euermore before, if the Englishmen and the Danes had happened to meet vpon a bridge, the Englishmen should not be so hardie to moue a foot, but stand still, till the Dane were passed forth. And moreouer, if the Englishmen had not bowed downe their heads to do reuerence vnto the Danes, they should haue been beaten and defiled. For the which despites and villanies they were driuen out of the land after the death of Hardeknout, for they had no lord that might maintaine them. And after this manner auoided the Danes out of England, that they neuer came againe.

The storie of Alfred repeated.

Taken out of the English storie or chronicle compiled of certaine English clerkes.

The earles and barons, by their common assent and counsell, sent vnto Normandie for these two brethren, Alfred and Edward; intending to crowne Alfred the elder brother, and to make him king of England. And to this the earles and barons made their oath: but the earle Godwin of Westsax (fallsie and traiterouslie) thought to slay these two brethren, assone as they came into England, to that intent to make Harold his sonne king: which sonne hee had by his wife Hardeknouts daughter that was a Dane. And so this Godwin went priuilie to Southhampton, to meet there with the two brethren at their landing. And thus it fell, that the messengers that went (saith mine author) into Normandie, found but onely Alfred the elder brother. For Edward his yonger brother was gone to Hungarie, to speake with his cosin the outlaw, which was Edward Ironsides sonne.

When Alfred had heard these messengers, and perceiued their tidings, he thanked God, and in all hast sped him to England, ariuing at Southhampton. There Godwin the false traitor (hauing knowledge of his comming) welcommed and receiued him with much ioy, pretending to leade him vnto London, where the barons waited for to make him king, and so they together passed forth toward London. But when they came to Guild downe, the traitor commanded all his men to slay all that were in Alfreds companie, which came with him from Normandie; and after that to take Alfred, and to leade him into the ile of Elie, where they should put out both his eyes; and so they did. For they slue all the companie that were there, to the number of twelue gentlemen, which came with Alfred from Normandie; and after that they toke Alfred, and in the ile of Elie they executed their commission. That done, they opened his body, toke out his bowels, set a stake into the ground, and fastened an end of his bowels thereunto, and with needels of iron they pricked his tender bodie, thereby causing him to goe about the stake, till that all his bowels were drawne out. And so died this innocent Alfred or Alured, being the right heire of the crowne, through treason of wicked Godwin. When the lords of England heard thereof, and how Alfred, that should haue been their king, was put to death through the false traitor Godwin, they were wondrous wroth; and sware betweene God and them, that he should die a worse death then did Edrith which betraied his lord Edmund Ironside, and would immediatly haue put him to death, but that the traitor fled thence into Denmarke, and there held him foure yeares and more, and lost all his lands in England.

Alfred or Alured sonne of king Egelred.

An other Latin storie I haue (bearing no name) which saith that this comming in of Alfred and the Normans, was in the time of Harold Canutus sonne. And how Godwin (after hee pretended great amitie to them) suddenly in the night came vpon them at Gilford, and after he had tithed the Normans, sent Alfred to Harold at London, who sent him to the ile of Elie, and caused his eies to be put out.

Ex historia ignoti autoris.

And thus much of Canutus and of his sons, Harold and Hardecanutus. Besides these two sonnes, Canutus had also a daughter named Gunilda, married to Henricus the emperour. Of whom some write, that she being accused to the emperor of spouse-breach, and hauing no champion or knight that would fight for hir (after the maner of that countrie) for triall of her cause, a certaine little dwarfe or boy, whom shee brought with hir out of England (stirred vp of God) fought in her cause against a mightie big Germane of a monstrous greatnesse, which sillie dwarfe, cutting by chance the sinews of his leg, after stroke him to the ground, and so cut off his head, and saued the life of the quéene, if it be true that Gulielmus and Fabianus reporteth.

Of this Canutus it is storied, that he following much the superstition of Achelnotus archbishop of Canterburie, went on pilgrimage to Rome, and there founded an hospitall for English pilgrims. He gaue the pope precious gifts, & burdened the land with a yearely tribute called the Rome-shot. He shrined the body of Berinus, and gaue great lands & ornaments to the cathedrall church of Winchester; he builded S. Benets in Northfolke, which was before an heremitage. Also S. Edmundsbury, which king Athelstan before ordeined for a colledge of priests, he turned to an abbey of monks of S. Benets order.

Henricus archdeacon of Huntington, lib. 6. maketh mention of this Canutus, as doth also Polydor. lib. 7. That he after his comming from Rome, walking vpon a time by the port of Southhampton, but as Polydor saith, and Fabian affirmeth the same, that it was by the Thames side of London, when his flatterers comming about him, began to exalt him vp with high words, calling him a king of all kings (most mightie) who had vnder his subiection both the people, the land, and also the sea: Canutus reuoluing this matter in his mind (whether for pride of his heart exalted, or whether to trie and refell their flattering words) commanded his chaire of estate to bee brought to the sea side, at what time it should begin to flow.

Flatterers and clawbacks about princes.

N.i. Polydor

Canutus chargeth the sea to stand backe, but it would not be.

Polydor saith that no seat was brought: but sitting vpon his garments being folded togither vnder him, there charged and commanded the flouds arising and comming towards his feet, that they should not touch neither him, nor his clothes. But the water keeping his ordinarie course, came nearer and nearer: first to his feet, and so growing higher began to wash him well fauoredly. Wherewith the king abashed, and partly also afeard start backe, and loking to his lords; Lo (saith hee) ye call me such a mighty king, and yet can I not command backe this little water to stay at my word, but it is readie to drowne me. Wherefore all earthly kings may know, that all their powers be but vaine, and that none is worthy to haue the name of a king, but he alone which hath all things subiect to the power and authority of his word, which is the Lord of heauen and earth, the creator aboue of all things, the father of our Christ and Lord, who with him for euer is to bee glorified: him let vs worship and extoll for our king for euer. After this (as histories witnesse) he neuer suffered the crowne to come vpon his head, but went to Winchester, or (as some say) to Canterburie: but both those may be true; for his going to Canterburie, was to acknowledge that there was a Lord much higher, and of more power then he himselfe was, and therewithall to render vp his crowne for euer. With that, Egelnothus archbishop of Canturburie informed him of the image of the crucifix before mentioned, which dissolued the matter betweene married priests and life of monks, and did many other miracles more, being then at Winchester. Wherewith the king prouoked to goe to Winchester to the rood, there resigned vp his regall crowne, and made the rood king ouer all the land.

A lesson notable for kings and princes.

God onely the king of all kings and Lord of lords.

The kings crowne put on a rood.

Here is also to be noted in this Canutus, that although (as is said) hee condescended in the beginning of his reigne, vpon king Edgars lawes: yet after in processe of time, he set forth peculiar lawes of his owne. Among which, diuers there bee that concerne as well causes ecclesiasticall, as also temporall. Whereby it may appeare, that the gouernment of spirituall matters not to depend then of the bishop of Rome: but to appertaine to the lawfull authoritie of the temporall prince, no lesse then of matters and causes temporall. As for example, by these ordinances of the foresaid Canutus may be well considered as here follow: Pecunia sepulturæ iustum est vt aperta terra reddantur. Si aliquod corpus a sua parœchia deferatur in aliam, pecunia sepulturæ, &c. In English.

Kings of England haue as much right in causes spirituall as temporall.

And here an end of the Danish kings. Now to the English kings againe, whose right line commeth in againe in Edward here following.

Anno 1043 King Edward the Confessor.

For so much as God of his mercie and prouidence, who is onely the maker of heires, thought it so good, after the wofull captiuitie of this English nation, to grant now some respit of deliuerance, in taking away the Danish kings without any issue left behind them: who reigning here in England, kept the English people in miserable subiection, about the space of eight and twentie yeares, and that from their first landing in the time of king Brightricus, walking and vexing this land the terme of 255 yeares. Now their tyrannie here comming to an end, the next election and right of the crowne fell (as appertained) to Edward the yonger sonne of king Egelred and Emma, a meere Englishman: who had been now long banished in Normandie, as is aboue declared; a man of gentle and soft spirit, more appliable to other mens counsels, then able to trust to his owne; of nature and condition so giuen from all war and bloodshed, that being in his banishment, hee wished rather so to continue all his life long in that priuat estate, then by war or bloodshed to aspire to any kingdome. This Edward after the death of Canutus the second, or Hardicanute, being sent for of the lords into Normandie to take possession of the realme, although he something mistrusted the vnconstant and tickle heads of Englishmen (yet hauing sufficient pledges laid for him in Normandie) came ouer, with a few Normans accompanied, and not long after was crowned at Winchester, in the yeare 1043, by Edsius then archbishop of Canterburie.

England afflicted by the Danes the space of 255 yeares.

King Edward crowned.

And not long after that, he maried Goditha, or Edithy, daughter of earle Godwin, whom he intreated after such sort, that he neither put hir from his bed, nor yet dealt with her fleshly. Whether it were for hate of her kin (as most like it was) or for loue of chastitie, it remaineth vncertaine. But most writers agree that he continued his life without offence with women, for the which he is highly exalted among our storie writers, and called holy king Edward. After he had thus taken vpon him the gouernment of the realme, he guided the same with much wisedome and iustice, the space of foure and twentie yeares, lacking two moneths, from whom issued (as out of a fountaine) much godlinesse, mercie, pitie, and liberalitie toward the poore: gentlenesse and iustice toward all men, and in all honest life he gaue a vertuous example to his people. Hee discharged the Englishmen of the great tribute called Dane-gilt, which beforetime was yearely leuied to the great impouerishing of the people. He subdued the Scots and the Welshmen, which in their borders began to rebell against him. In much peace hee continued his reigne, hauing no forren enemie to assault him: albeit, as some chronicles doe shew, certaine Danes and Norgwaines there were, which intended to set vpon England. But as they were taking shipping, there was brought to them first one boll, then an other, of meed or methe, to drinke vpon a boun voyage. Thus one cup comming after an other, after drinke came drunkennesse, after drunkennesse followed iangling, of iangling came strife, and strife turned vnto stripes; whereby many were slaine, and the other returned to their home againe. And thus the mercifull prouidence of the Lord dispatched that iourney.

Holy king Edward a virgin in mariage.

Methe in Greeke signifieth drunkennesse.

In the time of this Edward, Emma his mother was accused to be familiar with Alwin the bishop of Winchester: vpon which accusation (by counsell of earle Godwin) hee toke from her many of her iewels, and caused her to bee kept somedeale more strictly in the abbey of Warwell, and the bishop committed to the examination of the clergie. Polydor saith, they were both in prison at Winchester, where she sorrowing the defame both of her selfe and of the bishop, and trusting vpon her conscience, desireth them of iustice, offering her selfe ready to abide any lawfull triall, yea although it were with the sharpest.

Then diuers of the bishops made labour to the king for them both, and had obtained, had not Robert then archbishop of Canterbury stopped the sute. Who not well contented with their labour, said vnto them; My brethren, how dare ye defend her which is no woman but a beast? She hath defamed her owne son the king, and taken her lecherous leman the bishop. And if it be so, that the woman will purge the priest, who shall then purge the woman, that is accused to be consenting to the death of her sonne Alphred, and procured venom to the poysoning of her sonne Edward? But whether she be guiltie or guiltlesse; if she will goe barefoted for her selfe foure steps, and for the bishop fiue, continually vpon nine plough shares fire hot; then if she escape harmelesse, he shall bee assoiled of this challenge and she also.

Accusation of the archbishop against Emma the kings mother.

To this she granted: the day was appointed; at which day the king and a great part of his nobles were present, except onely Robert the archbishop. This Robert had been a monke of a house in Normandie, and an helper of the king in his exile, and so by the lending for of the king, came ouer and was made first bishop of London, after archbishop of Canterburie. Then was she led blindfold vnto the place betweene two men, where the irons lay burning hot, and passed the nine shares vnhurt. At last, saith she; God Lord when shall I come to the place of my purgation? When they then opened her eyes, and she saw that she was past the paine, she kneeled downe giuing God thanks.

False accusation purged by hot iron.

A strange thing if it were true, and without false conueiance.

Then the king repented (saith the storie) and restored vnto her that he had before taken from her, and asked her forgiuenesse. But the archbishop fled into Normandie.

Neere about this time, about the tenth yeare of his reigne, fell passing great snow from the beginning of Januarie to the seuenteenth day of March. After which insued a great mortalitie of men, murren of cattell, and by lightning the corne was wonderfully blasted and wasted.

Great snow and mortalitie in England.

Not long after this a certaine earle of Bologne, who had maried king Edwards sister, came into England; through the occasion of whom, when execution should bee done vpon the citizens of Douer, for a fray betweene them and the earles men, variance happened betweene king Edward and earle Godwin, who perceiuing that he could not withstand the kings malice (although he gathered a great company to worke therein what he could) fled into Flanders, & was outlawed with his fiue sons. King Edward repudiated his wife, the daughter of the said Godwin: but the second yeare after by mediators she was reconciled to the king againe and called from banishment, and for his good abearing hee gaue for pledges his two sonnes, Biornon and Tostius, which were sent to the duke of Normandie there to be kept.

William D. of Normandie came to England to king Edward.

England to see king Edward, and was honorablie receiued. To whom the king made great cheere, and at his returne inriched him with great gifts and pleasures; and there (as some write) made promise to him, that if he died without issue, the said William should succeed him in the kingdom of England.

Marianus Scotus; when he liued.

In this kings reigne liued Marianus Scotus the storie writer. As concerning the end of earle Godwin, the cruell murtherer of Alfred and of the Normans, although diuers histories diuerslie do varie, yet in this the most part do agree, that as he sat at the table with king Edward at Windsor, it happened one of the cup-bearers, one of earle Godwins sonnes, to stumble and recouer againe, so that he shed none of the drinke, whereat Godwin laughed; and said, how the one brother had sustained the other. With which words the king calling to mind his brothers death that was slaine by Godwin, beheld the earle, saying, So should my brother Alfred haue holpen me, had not Godwin been. Godwin then fearing the kings displeasure to be newly kindled, after many words in excusing himselfe, said; So might I safely swallow this morsell of bread, as I am guiltlesse of the deed. But as soone as hee had receiued the bread, forthwith he was choked. Then the king commanded him to be drawen from the table, and so was conueied by Harold his son to Winchester, and there buried.

About the thirteenth yere of this kings reigne, the said king Edward sent Aldred bishop of Worcester to the emperor Henricus the fourth, praying him that he would send to the king of Hungarie, that his cosin Edward sonne of Edmund Ironside might come into England, for so much as he intended to make him king after him, which was called Edward outlaw. The which request was fulfilled, so that he came into England with his wife Agatha, and with his children, to wit, Edgar Adelling, Margaret, and Christina. But the yeare after his returne into this realme, this Edward deceased at London, and was buried at Winchester, or as Iornalensis saith, at Pauls church in London. After whose decease the king then receiued Edgar Adelling his sonne, as his owne child, thinking to make him his heire. But fearing partly the inconstant mutabilitie of the Englishmen, partly the pride and malice of Harold the son of Godwin, and of others (perceiuing thereby that he could not bring that his purpose so well to passe) directed solemne ambassadors vnto William duke of Normandie his kinsman, admitting and assigning him to bee his lawfull heire, next to succeede after him to the crowne.

Edward the outlaw sonne of Edmund Ironside, sent for to England. Anno 1056

The death of Edward, son of Edmund Ironside.

William D. of Normandie admitted heire to the crowne.

After the death of Godwin, Harold his sonne waxed so in the kings fauour, that he ruled the most and greatest causes of the realme, and was lieutenant of the kings armie, who with his brother Tostan or Tostius (sent by the king against the Welshmen) subdued their rebellion. But afterward, such enuie grew betweene these two brethren, for that Tostius saw his brother Harold so greatly aduanced in the kings fauour, that at Herford the said Tostius slue all his brothers men. Whom when he had cut in pieces, he powdred their quarters and mangled parts in barrels of salt, vineger, wine, and other liquors. That done, he made a power against his brother Harold (being king) with the aid of certaine Danes and Norwegians, and fought a battell with him in the north, as after shall follow (God willing) to be seene. So vngracious were these wicked children of earle Godwin, that if they had seene any faire mansion or maner place, they would slay the owner thereof with all his kindred, and enter the possession thereof themselues.

At length it came in the mind of this Harold to saile ouer the sea (as Polydor saith) into Normandie, to see his brother Wilnotus, as also his cosin Hacus, whom the king had sent thither to be kept for pledges, as ye heard before. Polydor saith these pledges were Tosto and Biornon; but that cannot be, for Tostius was then in England. But as Henricus archdeacon of Huntington saith, his iourney was into Flanders, as seemeth more like. For it is not to be thought, that Harold, who was a doer in the cruell murther of Alfred, and of the Normans, would venture into Normandie: and therefore more like it is, that his sailing was into Flanders. But as the storie procedeth, he being in the course of his sailing, was weather driuen by tempest into the prouince of Pountith, where he was taken as prisoner, and sent to duke William of Normandie, to whom he was made to sweare, that hee in time following should marrie his daughter: and that after the death of king Edward, he should keepe the land of England to his behoofe according to the will and mind of Edward (after some writers) and so to liue in great honor and dignitie next vnto him in the realme. This promise faithfully made to the duke, Harold returneth into England (with his cosin Hacus the sonne of his brother Swanus being deliuered vnto him.) But Wilnotus brother of Harold, the duke keepeth still for performance of the couenants. Thus Harold, I say, returning home, sheweth the king all that he had done in the foresaid matters, wherewith the king was well contented. Whereby it may bee gathered, that king Edward was right well willing, that duke William should reigne after him, and also seemeth not vnlike, but that he had giuen him his promise thereunto before.

Which freedome there was obtained by meanes of his wife Godina, by riding (as the fame goeth) after a strange maner through the towne. This Leofricus with his wife Godina builded also the abbey of Couentrie and indued the same with great lands and riches.

You heard a little before of the comming ouer of Edward called the outlaw, son of king Edmund Ironside, whom king Edward had purposed to haue made king after him; but soone after his comming ouer, hee deceased at London. This Edward had by his wife Agatha, a sonne and a daughter called Edgar Adeling, and Margaret. Which Margaret being married afterward to the king of Scots, was the mother of Matild or Mawd the queene of England, and of Dauid king of Scots, &c.

This vertuous and blessed king Edward, after he had reigned three and twentie yeares and seuen moneths, died, and was buried in the monasterie of Westminster, which he had greatly augmented and repaired: but afterward was more inlarged after this forme which it hath now, by Henrie the third sonne of king John.

They that write the history of this king, here make mention of a dreame or reuelation that should bee shewed to him in time of his sickenesse: how that because the peeres and bishops of the realme were seruants not of God, but of the diuell; God would giue this realme to the hand of others. And the king desired vtterance to be giuen him, that he might declare the same to the people, whereby they might repent. It was answered againe, that neither would they so doe, or yet if they did, it should bee giuen to another people. But because it is a dreame, I let it passe.

Ex Historia Richardi 2. iussu composita.

Diuers lawes were before in diuers countries of this realme vsed, as the law first of Dunuallo Melmucius, with the lawes of Mercia called Mercenelaga: then the lawes of Westsaron kings, as of Iue, Offa, Alfred, &c: which was called Westsarenelaga: the third were the lawes of Canutus, and of Danes, called Danelaga. Of all these lawes, which before were diuerslie in certaine particular countries vsed and receiued, this Edward compiled one vniuersall and common law for all people through the whole realme, which were called king Edwards lawes: which lawes being gathered out of the best and chiefest of the other lawes, were so iust, so equall, and so seruing the publike profit and wealth of all estates, that mine authors say the people long after did rebell against their heads and rulers, to haue the same lawes againe (being taken from them) and yet could not obtaine them.

The lawes of king Edward.

Furthermore, I read and find in Mathew Paris, that when William Conqueror at his comming in, did sweare to vse and practise the same good lawes of Edward, for the common lawes of this realme: afterward (being established in his kingdome) he forswore himselfe, and placed his owne lawes in their roome, much worse and obscurer then the other were, &c.

Ex Mat. Paris. William Conqueror sworne to K. Edwards lawes, yet went from it.

Notwithstanding, among the said lawes of Edward, and in the first chapter and beginning thereof, this I find among the ancient records of the Guildhall in London; The office of a king, with such other appurtenances as belong to the realme of Britain, set forth and described in the Latine stile, which I thought here not vnmeet to be expressed in the English tongue, for them that vnderstand no Latine. The tenor and meaning whereof thus followeth.

De iure & appendijs regni Britanniæ, & quod sit officium regis.

REx autem, quia vicarius summi regis est, ad hoc est constitutus, vt regnum terrenum & populum domini, & super omnia sanctam eius veneretur ecclesiam & regat, & ab iniuriosis defendat, & maleficos ab eo auellat & destruat, & penitus disperdat. Quod nisi fecerit, nomen regis non in eo constabit, verùm papa Iohanne testante, nomen regis perdit: cui Pipinus & Carolus filius eius nec dum reges, sed principes sub rege Francorũ stulto scripserunt querentes: si ita permanere deberent Francorum reges, solo regio nomine contenti. A quo responsum est, illos decet vocare reges, qui vigilanter defendunt & regunt ecclesiam Dei & populum eius, &c. In English thus.

The king, because he is the vicar of the highest king, is appointed for this purpose, to rule the earthly kingdome, and the Lords people, and aboue al things to reuerence his holy church, to gouerne it, and to defend it from iniuries: to plucke away wicked doers, & vtterly to destroy them. Which vnlesse he do, the name of a king agreeth not vnto him but he loseth the name of a king, as witnesseth pope John: to the which pope, Pipinus and Carolus his sonne (being not yet kings but princes vnder the French king being not very wise) did write, demanding this question, whether the kings of France ought so to continue, hauing but onely the name of a king. Vnto whom pope John answereth againe, that it was conuenient to call them kings, which vigilantly do defend and gouerne the church of God and his people, following the saying of king Dauid the psalmographer: He shall not dwell in my house which worketh pride, &c.

conserue fully and wholly in all amplenesse without diminution, all the lands, honors, dignities, rights, and liberties of the crowne of his kingdome. And further to reduce into their pristine state, all such things as haue been dispersed, walked, and lost, which appertaine to his kingdome. Also the whole and vniuersall land with all ilands about the same vnto Norweie and Denmarke, be appertaining to the crowne of his kingdome, and be of the appurtenances and dignitie of the king: making one monarchie and one kingdome, which sometime was called the kingdome of Britains, and now the kingdome of England: such bounds and limits as is abouesaid be appointed and limited to the name of this kingdome.

The limits of the kingdome of England how farre they do extend.

The office of a king further described.

Moreouer, in the foresaid lawes of this king Edward, it followeth in the same booke where the foresaid Edward, describing the office of a king, addeth in these words: A king, saith he, ought aboue all things to feare God, to loue and to obserue his commandements, and cause them to bee obserued through his whole kingdome. Hee ought also to keepe, cherish, maintaine, and gouerne the holy church within his kingdome, with all integritie and libertie, according to the constitutions of his ancestors and predecessors: and to defend the same against all enemies, so that God aboue all things bee honoured, and euer be before his eyes. He ought also to set vp good lawes and customs, such as be wholesome and approued: such as bee otherwise, to repeale them, and thrust them out of his kingdome. Item, he ought to doe iudgement and iustice in his kingdome, by the counsell of the nobles of his realme. All these things ought a king in his owne person to doe, taking his oath vpon the euangelist, and the blessed reliks of saints, swearing in the presence of the whole state of his realme (as well of the temporaltie as of the spiritualtie) before hee bee crowned of the archbishops and bishops. Three seruants the king ought to haue vnder him as vassals: fleshly lust, auarice, and greedie desire, whom if he keepe vnder as his seruants and slaues, hee shall reigne well and honorablie in his kingdome. All things are to be done with good aduisement and premeditation: and that properly belongeth to a king. For hastie rashnesse bringeth all things to ruine, according to the saying of the gospell: Euery kingdome diuided in it selfe shall be desolate, &c.

Three slaues and seruants a king ought to haue vnder his subiection.

After the dutie and office of princes thus described, consequently followeth the institution of subiects, declared in many good and necessarie ordinances, very requisite and conuenient for publike gouernment. Of the which lawes William Conqueror was compelled, through the clamor of the people, to take some, but the most part he omitted, contrarie to his owne oath at his coronation, inserting and placing the most of his owne lawes in his language, to serue his purpose: and which as yet to this present day in the same Normane language doe remaine. Now (the Lord willing) let vs proceed in the storie as in order followeth.

¶ King Harold.

Anno 1066

Harold last king of Saxons.

HArold the second sonne of earle Godwin, and last king of the Saxons, notwithstanding that diuers of the nobles went with Edgar Adeling, the next heire after Edmund Ironside: yet he through force and might contemning the yong age of Edgar, and forgetting also his promise made to duke William, tooke vpon him to be king of England, Anno 1066. When Harold Harefager, sonne of Canutus king of Norway and Denmarke, heard of the death of king Edward, hee came into England with three hundred ships or more: who then ioyning with Tostius, brother to the said Harold king of England, entred into the north parts, and claimed the land after the death of Edward. But the lords of the countrie arose and gaue them battell, notwithstanding the Danes had the victorie. And therfore Harold king of England prepared toward them in all hast, and gaue them another strong battell, and there had the victorie, where also Harold the Dane was slaine by the hand of Harold king of England; and Tostius was also slaine in the battell. After this victorie, Harold waxed proud and couetous, and would not diuide the preyes to his knights that had deserued it, but kept it to himselfe; whereby he lost the fauour of many of his knights and people.

Harold king of Denmarke and Tostius slaine.

In this meane time William duke of Normandie sent ambassage to Harold king of England, admonishing him of the couenants that were agreed betweene them: which was, to haue kept the land to his vse after the death of Edward. But because that the daughter of duke William (that was promised to Harold) was dead, Harold thought him thereby discharged, and said, that such a nice foolish promise ought not to be holden (concerning an others land) without the consent of the lords of the same: and especially for that he was thereunto for need or for dread compelled.

The pope sendeth a banner to duke William vpon boun voyage into England.

Vpon these answers receiued, duke William in the meane while that the messengers went & came, gathered his knights, and prepared his nauie, and had the assent of the lords of his land to aid and assist him in his iourney. And ouer that sending vnto Rome to pope Alexander, concerning his title and voyage into England, the pope confirmeth him in the same, and sent vnto him a banner, willing him to beare it in the ship, wherein himselfe should saile. Thus duke William, being prouided of all things concerning his iourney, sped him to the sea side, and tooke shipping at the hauen of S. Valerie, where he tarried a long time ere he might haue a conuenient wind, for the which his souldiers murmured, saying it was a wodnesse, and a thing displeasing God, to desire to haue an other mans kingdome by strength, and namely when God was against it in sending contrarie wind, &c. At the last the wind shortly after came about, and they tooke shipping with a great company, and landed at Hastings in Sussex.

Duke William landeth at Hastings.

For three causes duke William entred this land, to subdue Harold. One was, for that it was to him giuen by king Edward his nephue. The second was to take wreke for the cruell murther of his nephue Alfred, king Edwards brother, and of the Normans, which deed he ascribed chiefly to Harold. The third was, to reuenge the wrong done to Robert archbishop of Canterburie, which was exiled by the meanes and labour of Harold, in the time of king Edward.

Three causes why duke William entred England.

Thus, while Harold was in the north, duke William made so great speed, that he came to London before the king; out of which he was holden, till he had made good suretie, that he and his people should passe through the citie without tarying: which promise he well obseruing, passed the bridge, and went ouer to Sussex, from whence he sent a monke vnto Harold, and profered him three maner of waies. First, either to render to him the possession of the land, and so to take it againe of him, vnder tribute reigning vnder him; secondly, or else to abide and stand to the popes arbitrement betwixt them both; or thirdly, to defend his quarrell in his owne person against the duke, and they two onely to trie the matter by dint of sword, without any other bloodshedding.

Three conditions offered to Harold by D. William.

But Harold refused all these offers, saying it should be tried by dint of swords, and not by one sword: and so gathered his people and ioyned battel with the Normans, in the place where afterward was builded the abbey of Battell in Sussex. In the beginning of which fight the Englishmen kept them in good aray like to vanquish the Normans: wherefore duke William caused his men to giue backe as though they fled, whereby the Englishmen followed fast and brake their aray. Then the Normans fiercely giuing a charge vpon them, in conclusion obtained the victorie through the iust prouidence of God. Where king Harold who before had murthered Alfred the true heire of the crowne, with his companie of Normans so cruelly, was now wounded of the Normans in the left eye with an arrow, and thereof incontinent died: although Gerardus saith hee fled away to Chester, and liued after that a monke in the monasterie of S. James. Which is not like, but rather that hee was there slaine after that he had reigned nine moneths, and was buried at Waltham (which proueth that hee died not at Chester) and so was he the last that reigned in England of the blood of Saxons, the which continued (to reckon from Hengistus his first reigne in Kent) by the space of 591 yeares: and if it be reckoned from the yeares of the Westsaxons, then it indured the space of 565 yeares.

The fight betwixt Harold and duke William.

King Harold slaine.

This duke William and king Edward were by the fathers side cosin germans remoued. For Richard the first of that name which was the third duke of Normandie after Rollo, was father to duke Richard the second of that name, and brother to Emma mother to king Edward. Which duke Richard the second was father to duke Robert, this duke Williams father.

The consanguinitie betweene king Edward and William the Conqueror.

Albeit in this matter other some may gather otherwise and better, perchance; yet if I may say what I thinke, verily I suppose, that there is no consanguinitie so much here the cause why God of his vnknowen iudgements suffered the Normans here to preuaile, as was rather the cruell murther of Alfred and of the innocent Normans, wrought by the cruell despite of Harold and the Englishmen, as is before declared. The which mercilesse murther, God here iustly in this conquest recompensed.

Murther iustly recompensed.

Now remaineth also to these forren affaires of kings and princes, to adde some thing likewise concerning the continuation of the archbishops of Canterburie, beginning there where we last left: that is, with Elphegus, whom we declared a little before to be stoned by the Danes at Greenewich. After which Elphegus next succeeded Liningus, after him Egelnothus also aboue mentioned. Then Robertus a Norman a great doer (as is declared) about king Edward, and a faithfull counsellor vnto him, but who abode not long. After whom Stigandus inuaded the see (as they report) by simonie, being both archbishop of Canterburie, bishop of Winchester, and also abbat in an other place, wherein he continued a great space, gathering and heaping goods togither, till at length duke William clapt him in prison, and there kept him, placing in his rome Lanfrancus a Lombard borne, of whom more shall follow (Christ willing) hereafter to be declared.

inconuenience: partly through the comming in of Mahumet, partly through the increaſe of wealth & riches, partly through the decreaſe of knowledge and diligence in ſuch as ſhould be the guides of Chriſts flocke: yet the infection and corruption of that time (though it were great) did not ſo abound in ſuch exceſſiue meaſure, as afterward in the other latter times now following, about the thouſand yeers expired after Chriſt, whereof we haue to intreat, Chriſt ſo permitting. About which time and yeere came Sylueſter, the ſecond of that name, who next ſucceeded after Gregory the fifth, before mentioned: and occupied the ſea of Rome about the yeere of our Lord 1000. lacking one or two.

Pope Sylueſter the ſecond.

This Sylueſter was a ſorcerer, which after the ſort of them that work by familiars (as they call them) and by coniuration, compacted with the diuell to be made pope. And ſo hee was (through the operation of Satan) according to his requeſt. Which things ſome hiſtories ſay, hee did greatly repent before his death. But for a more ample declaration hereof, I will bring in the words of Johannes Stella, a Venetian, tranſlated from Latine into Engliſh, concerning the ſaid Sylueſter: to the intent that our inchanters & ſorcerers now adaies (whereof there be too many in England) may the better through his example be admoniſhed. The words of Stella be theſe, agreeing alſo with the narration of Benno, Platina, and many others. Sylueſter, the ſecond of that name, being pope, and a Frenchman, called Gibertus, ſate in his papacy foure yeeres, one month, & eight daies. He entred into his papacie through wicked and vnlawfull meanes: who from his youth being a monke, and leauing his monaſtery, gaue himſelfe wholly to the diuell, to obtaine that which he required. And firſt comming to Hiſpalis a citie in Spaine, there applied his booke and profited alſo, in ſo much that he was made doctor, hauing amongſt his auditors, Otho the emperors ſonne, and Robert the French king, Lotharius archbiſhop of Senon, with diuers other more. By whoſe aduancement hee was promoted, firſt biſhop of Rheme, afterward biſhop of Rauenna, and at laſt, through the operation of Satan, was exalted to the papacie of Rome, vpon this condition, that after his death he ſhould giue himſelfe to the diuell, by whoſe procurement he came to that promotion. Vpon a certaine time hee demanded an anſwer of the diuell, how long he ſhould inioy his popedom. To whom he anſwered againe, Vntill thou ſay maſſe in Jeruſalem thou ſhalt liue. At length the fourth yeere of his popedome, ſaying maſſe at Lent time, in the temple of the holy croſſe, being called then Jeruſalem, there hee knew the time was come when hee ſhould die. Whereupon being ſtruck with repentance, confeſſed his fault openly before the people: deſiring all men to cut his body all in peeces (being ſo ſeduced by deceits of the diuell) and ſo being hewen in peeces, they would lay it vpon a cart, and bury it there whereſoeuer the horſes would carie it of their accord. And ſo the ſaying is to be, that by the prouidence of God (whereby the wicked may learne yet hope of remiſſion with God, ſo that they will repent them in their life) the horſes of their owne accord ſtaied at the church of Laterane, and there he was buried: where as commonly by the ratling of his bones within the tombe, is pretended the death of popes, as the common report goeth. Thus much out of Johannes Stella concerning Sylueſter. By whom our ſorcerers & inchanters, or magicians may learne to beware of the deceitfull operation of Satan, who at the end deceiueth and fruſtrateth all them that haue to do with him: as the end of all ſuch doth declare commonly, which vſe the like art or trade. The Lord and God of all mercy, through the ſpirit of Jeſus our redéemer, diſſolue the works of Satan, and preſerue the harts of our nobles, and of all other Engliſhmen from ſuch infection, Amen.

Sylueſter the ſecond a foule ſorcerer.

Ex Iohan. Stella.

An admonition for ſorcerers and wicked conturers.

After Sylueſter, ſucceeded John the nintéenth, by whom was brought in (as Volateran ſaith) the feaſt of All ſoules in the yeere 1004, through the means and inſtigation of one Odilo, abbat of Cluniake, to be celebrate next after the feaſt of All ſaints. This monke Odilo, thinking that purgatory (as he heard) ſhould be in the mount Aetna, dreamed vpon a time in the country of Sicill, that hee by his maſſes had deliuered diuers ſoules from thence: ſaying moreouer, that hee did heare the voices and lamentations of diuels, crying out for that the ſoules were taken from them by the maſſes & dirges funerall. Ex Bakenthorpo. in prolo. 4. lib. ſentent. And not long after him came John the twentith, and Sergius the fourth. After whom ſucceeded Benedictus the eighth; then John the one and twentith, who being promoted by art magicke of Theophylact his nephew, Gratianus, Brazutus, & other ſorcerers brought in firſt the faſt of the euen of John Baptiſt & S. Laurence. After him followed pope Benedictus the ninth, likewiſe aſpiring to his papacie by like magick, practiſing inchantments and coniuration in woods, after a horrible maner, who reſiſting the emperor Henricus the third, ſonne to Conradus, and placing in his roome Petrus the king of Hungary with this verſe, Petra dedit Romam Petro, tibi Papa coronam: afterward, for feare of Henricus preuailing in battell, he was faine to ſell his ſeat to his ſucceſſor Gratianus, called Gregorius the firſt, for 1500 pounds. At which time were three popes together in Rome raigning and raging one againſt another; Benedictus the ninth, Sylueſter the third, and Gregorius the firſt. For the which cauſe Henricus, ſurnamed Niger, the emperor, comming to Rome, diſplaced theſe three monſters at one time, placing for them Clement the ſecond, and thereupon inacting that there ſhould no biſhop of Rome henceforth be choſen, but by the conſent and confirmation of the emperour. Which conſtitution, though it was both agreeable, and alſo neceſſary for publike tranquillitie of that citie, yet the cardinals would not ſuffer it long to ſtand, but did impugne it afterward by ſubtill practiſe and open violence, as in proceſſe (the Lord permitting) ſhall appeare, in the time of Henricus the fourth and the fifth. In the time of this Clement, the Romans made an oth to the emperor, concerning the election of the biſhops, themſelues to intermeddle no further therein, but as the aſſent of the emperour ſhould go withall. Howbeit the emperor departing thence into Germany againe, by and by they forgot their oth, and within nine months after poiſoned the biſhop. Which fact, ſome impute to Stephen his ſucceſſor, called Damaſus the ſecond. Some impute it to Brazutus, who (as hiſtories record) within thirtéen yeeres, poiſoned ſix popes, that is, Clement the ſecond, Damaſus the ſecond, Leo the ninth, Victor the ſecond, Stephanus the ninth, Nicholaus the ſecond.

A conſtitution, no pope to be choſen, but by the confirmation of the emperor.

Pope Clement the ſecond.

Thus Clement being poiſoned, after him ſucceeded Damaſus the ſecond, neither by conſent of the people, nor of the emperor elected, but by force and inuaſion, who alſo within three and twenty daies being poiſoned, in the yeere 1049, much contention and ſtriuing began in Rome about the papall ſeat. Whereupon the Romans through the counſel of the cardinals ſent to the foreſaid emperor, deſiring to giue them a biſhop, and ſo he did, whoſe name was Bruno an Almain, & biſhop of Tullen, afterward called Leo the ninth. This Bruno being a ſimple man, and eaſie to be led with euill counſell, comming from the emperor towards Rome in his pontificall apparell like a pope: there meeteth him by the way the abbat of Cluniake, and Hildebrand a monke, who ſeeing him ſo in his pontificalibus, began to rate him, laying to his charge, that he would ſo take his authoritie of the emperor, and not rather of the clergy of Rome, and the people thereof, as other his predeceſſors were wont to do: and ſo counſelled him to lay downe that apparell, and to enter in with his owne habit, till he had his election by them. Bruno following their counſell, and confeſſing his fault before the clergy of Rome, obteined their fauour, and ſo was nominat Leo the ninth, whereby Hildebrand was made a cardinall, and put in high roome. Under this pope Leo were two councels; one kept at Mercellis, where the doctrine of Berengarius againſt the reall preſence in the ſacrament was firſt condemned, although Berengarius yet recanted not, which neuertheleſſe was done after in the councell of Lateran, vnder Nicholaus the ſecond, in the yeere 1060. The other was kept at Moguntia, where amongſt many other decrées, was enacted, prieſts to be excluded and debarred vtterly from mariage. Item, that no lay man might giue benefice or biſhoprick, or any ſpirituall promotion, &c.

This Leo being at Wormes with the emperor vpō Chriſtmas day, did excommunicat the ſubdeacon, becauſe in reading the epiſtle, he did it not in the Roman tune, he being there preſent. The archbiſhop moued therewith, departed from the altar (being then at maſſe) ſaying, he would not proceed any further in his ſeruice, vnleſſe his ſubdeacon were reſtored; whereupon the pope commanded him to be releaſed, and ſo they went forward in their ſeruice.

After the death of Leo, whom Brazutus poiſoned the firſt yeere of his popedom, Theophylactus did ſtriue to be pope: but Hildebrand to defeat him, went to the emperor (partly alſo being ſent by the Romans for feare of the emperors diſpleaſure) who aſſigned another biſhop a German, called Victor the ſecond. This Victor hauing a councel at Florence, depoſed diuers biſhops and prieſts for ſimonie and fornication: for ſimonie, in that they tooke of ſecular men their dignities for mony: for fornication, in that contrary to their canon, they were married, &c. The ſecond yeere of his papacie, and little more, this pope alſo followed his predeceſſors, being poiſoned by the foreſaid Brazutus, through the procurement of Hildebrand and his maſter.

Concilium Florentinum.

Here now began the church and clergy of Rome to wring out of the emperors hand the election of the pope: electing Stephen the ninth for pope, contrary to their oth, and to the emperors aſſignement. Here was the church of Millan firſt brought to obedience of the Romiſh church, by this Stephanus the ninth biſhop of Rome, who alſo ſhamed not to accuſe the emperor Henry (of whom mention is made before) of hereſie, for miniſhing the authoritie of the Roman ſea. So this was their hereſie at that time, not to maintaine the ambitious proceedings of the Romiſh prelat. And ſimonie they called this, to take and inioy any ſpirituall liuing at a ſecular mans hand. Wherefore Stephen hearing this ſimony to raigne in diuers places, namely in the churches of Burgundy and Italy, ſent forth the cardinall Hildebrand to reforme the matter: who was no leſſe earneſt in that kind of commiſſion to helpe the matter forward.

companies and orders of the clergie together, making them to sweare that they should admit none to bee bishop, but which should be appointed by the publike consent of them al together. This being done, Hildebrand taketh his iourny into Florence, belike to fetch the bishop of Florence, to stall him bishop: the clergy swearing vnto him, that no bishop should be ordained before his returne againe. But the people of Rome not suffering the election to stand so long, after the death of Stephen, elected one of their own city, called Benedictus the tenth. Hildebrand hearing of this, was not a little offended: wherefore returning to Rome with one Garhardus bishop of Florence, caused the clergy to proceed to a new election, saying, that Benedictus was not lawfully called, but came in by force and bribing. But the clergy not daring to attempt any new election at Rome, went to Sene, and there elected this Garhardus bishop of Florence, whom Hildebrand brought with him. So were two popes in Rome togither: But Garhardus, named Nicolas the second, holding a councel at Sutrium, through the help of duke Godfride and Guibert, and other bishops about Italy, caused the other pope to be deposed. Benedictus vnderstanding them to be set against him through the meanes of Hildebrand, vnpoped himselfe, and went to Melitras, liuing there more quietly then he should haue done at Rome.

The glosse of the popes decrees refuted.

Here is to be touched by the way, the error of the glosse vpon the three and twentith distinction, which falsly allegeth out of the chronicles; that Benedictus the tenth, which succeeded Stephen, was deposed: after whom came Iohannes bishop of Sabine for mony, and he againe deposed. Benedictus was then restored, and after displaced againe, and then Iohannes archdeacon Ad portam latinam, was made pope, and he againe deposed by the emperor, and all in one yeere. Which story neither is found in any chronicle, nor agreeth vpon any Benedictus, saue only that Benedictus the ninth, which was deposed, & then raigned three popes togither, Benedictus the ninth, Syluester the third, and Gregorius the firth, which before was called Iohannes ad portam latinam, whom the emperor deposed (all three togither.) But that Benedict neither was the tenth, neither did he succeed pope Stephen, as the glosse recordeth. Nicolas thus being set vp without the mind both of the emperor and of the people of Rome, after his fellow pope was driuen away, brake vp the synod of Sutrium, and came to Rome, where he assembled another councell, called Concilium Lateranum. In which councell first was promulgat the terrible sentence of excommunication mentioned in the decrees, and beginneth: In nomine Domini nostri, &c. The effect whereof is this. First, that he after a subtill practise (as far & as plainly as he durst speake) undermineth the emperors iurisdiction, and transferreth to a few cardinals, and certaine catholike persons, the full authoritie of chusing the pope. Secondly, against all such as doe creep into the seat of Peter by mony or fauor, without the full cõsent of the cardinals; he thundereth with terrible blasts of excommunication, accursing them and their children with diuels, as wicked persons, to the anger of almighty God, giuing also authoritie and power to cardinals, with the clergy and laity, to depose all such persons, and call a councell generall, where soeuer they will against them.

A terrible curse of pope Nicolas.

Berengarius driuen to recantation.

Item, in the said councell of Laterane, vnder pope Nicolas the second, Berengarius Andegauensis, an archdeacon, was driuen to the recantation of his doctrine, denying the reall substance of Christs holy body and blod to be in the sacrament, otherwise then sacramentally and in mystery.

Transubstantiation brought into the church.

In the same councell also was hatched and inuented the new found deuice and terme of transubstantiation.

Naucl. Platina, Eneas Sil.

It were to long here to declare the confederation betwixt this Nicolas and Robertus Guiscardus, whom this pope (contrary to all right and god law displacing the right heire) made duke of Apulia, Calabria, Sicilia, and captaine generall of S. Peters lands: that through his force of armes and violence, he might the better subdue all such as should rebell to his obedience, and so did. Now let all men iudge and vnderstand (which be godly wise) how this standeth with the doctrine of Christ, the example of Peter, or the spirit of a christian bishop, by outward armes and violence to conquer christian men and countries, vnder the obedience of a bishops sea. Thus pope Nicolas the second well answering to his Greeke name, by might & force continued three yeeres and a halfe. But at length he met with Brazutus cup, and so turned vp his heeles.

Potentia papae coactiua standeth not with the gospell.

Anno 1062

At the beginning of this Nicolas, or somewhat before, about the yeere of our Lord 1057, Henricus the fourth, after the deceasse of Henry the third, was made emperour, being but a child, and raigned fiftie yeeres: but not without great molestation and much disquietnesse, and all through the vngratious wickednesse of Hildebrand, as hereafter (the Lord so permitting) shall be declared.

Henricus the fourth emperor.

Heere by the way commeth to bee noted an example, whereby all princes may learne and vnderstand, how the pope is to be handled, whosoeuer loketh to haue any goodnesse at his hand. If a man stand in feare of his curse, he shall be made his slaue: but if he be despised of you, you shall haue him as you lust. For the popes curse may well bee assimiled to Domitians thunder: If a man giue eare to the noise and cracke, it seemeth a terrible thing: but if you consider the causes and effect thereof, it is a most vaine ridicle.

The popes curse compared to Domitians thunder.

In the raigne of this Nicolas, in the yeare 1060, Aldredus bishop of Worcester, after the deceasse of Kinsius his predecessor should be made archbishop of Yorke, who comming to Rome with Tostus earle of Northumberland for his pall (as the manner was) could not obtaine it, but was depriued of all his dignitie, for some default (I cannot tell what) in his answer; and furthermore, after his reuersion home, was spoiled also of all that he brought with him. Whereupon he returning againe to Rome with Tostius the foresaid earle, there made his complaint, but could not be heard: till Tostius, a man of stout courage, taking the matter in hand, told the pope to his face, that his curse was not to be feared in far countries, which his owne neighbors, yea and most vile vagabonds derided and despised at home. Wherefore he required the pope, either to restore Aldredus againe to his goods lost, or else it should be knowne that they were lost through his meanes and subtiltie. And furthermore, it would come to passe, that the king of England hearing this, would debar him of S. Peters tribute, taking it for a great shame to him and his realme, if Aldredus should come from Rome both depriued of dignitie, and spoiled also of his goods, &c. In fine, the pope thus persuaded by the argument of his purse, was content to send home Aldredus with his pall, according to his request.

After the death of Nicolas, the Lombards being oppressed before by pope Nicolas, and brought vnder feare, were the more desirous, and thought it good to haue a bishop of their companie; and so elected the bishop of Parmen called Cadolus, to be pope: sending to the emperor, and desiring his fauor and supportation therein; for the election of the pope (said they) most properly appertained vnto him.

Cadolus a Lombard made pope by the emperor.

The emperor well pleased and content, giueth his good leaue and voice withall. Hildebrand, no lesse a wicked necromancer, then a stout maintainer of popish liberties against good emperors, hearing this, setteth vp by a contrary faction, another bishop, Anselmus, after called Alexander the second. Cadolus thus elected by the emperor and the cardinals, setteth forward to Rome with a sufficient army and strength of men. Alexander also no lesse prepared, there receiued him with another armie, where they had a great conflict, and many slaine on both sides. But Cadolus as he had the better cause, so had he the worse fortune: who being repelled, yet repaired himselfe and came againe with a greater power: albeit hee preuailed not. The emperor seeing this hurly burly; to take vp the matter, sent thither his ambassador Otho archbishop of Tullen, who comming to Rome, beginneth sharply to chide the pope for taking so vpon him without the leaue or knowledge of the emperor, declaring how the election of that see ought chiefely to appertaine to the right of the emperor, as it hath done for the most part in the time of his predecessors tofore. But Hildebrands all set on wickednesse and ambition, and also puft vp not a little with his late victories; not suffering the ambassador to tell to the end, interrupted him in the middle of his tale, affirming, that if they should stand to law & custome, the liberty of that election should rather belong to the clergie then to the emperor. To make short, Otho the ambassador bearing (belike) more with the clergie then with the emperor, was content to be persuaded: only required this in the emperors name, a councell to be had, to decide the matter: whereat the emperor should be present himselfe; and so he was. In the which councell being kept at Mantua, Alexander was declared pope, the other had his pardon granted. In this councell amongst many other considerations, was concluded concerning priests to haue no wiues: such as haue concubines to say no masse: priests children not to be secluded from holy orders: no benefices to be bought for money: alleluia to be suspended in time of Lent out of the church, &c. This also was decreed (which made most for Hildebrands purpose) that no spirituall man, what soeuer he be, should enter in any church by a secular person, and that the pope should be elected only by the cardinals, &c. Benno Cardinalis writeth thus of Alexander, that after hee perceiued the frauds of Hildebrand, and of other emperors enemies; and vnderstanding that he was set vp and vnthronised but only for a purpose; being at his masse, as he was preaching to the people, told them he would not sit in the place, vnlesse he had the licence of the emperor. Which when Hildebrand heard, he was stricken in such a furie, that scarcely he could keepe his hands off him, while masse was done. After the masse being finished, by force of soldiors and strength of men he had him into a chamber, and there all to be pomild pope Alexander with his fists, rating and rebuking him for that he would seeke for fauor of the emperor. Thus Alexander being kept vp in custodie, and being stinted to a certaine allowance, as about fiue grotes a day, Hildebrand incroacheth all the whole reuenues of the church to himselfe, procuring thereby much treasure. At length Alexander vnder the miserable indurance of Hildebrand, died at euentide after eleuen yeares and a halfe of his popedome. And thus much of Romish matters.

These things thus discoursed concerning the matters of Rome; now returning againe to our owne countrie storie, the order thereof would require to enter againe into the raigne of William Conqueror, the next king following in England.

But

But as a certaine oration of king Edgars, which should haue been placed before, chanced in the meane time to come to my hands, not vnworthy to be read: I thought by the way in the end of this booke to insert the same (although out of order) yet better I iudge it out of order, then out of the booke.

The oration of king Edgar to the clergy.

BEcause God hath shewed his great mercy to worke with vs: it is meet (most reuerend fathers) that with worthy works we should answer his innumerable benefits. For we possesse not the land by our owne sword, and our owne arme hath not saued vs: but his right hand and his holy arme, because he hath bin delighted in vs. Therefore it is meet that we should submit both our selues and our soules to him, that hath subiected all these things vnder our gouernment: and that we ought stoutly to labor, that they whom he hath made subiect to vs, might be subiect to his lawes. It belongs to me to rule the lay people with the law of equitie, to do iust iudgement between a man and his neighbor, to punish church robbers, to hold vnder rebels, to deliuer the helpelesse from the hand of the stronger, the needy also and the poore from them that rob them. It belongs also to my care, to prouide necessary things to the ministers of the churches, to the flocks of the monks, to the company of virgins, and to prouide for their peace & quiet. The examining of all whose maners belongeth vnto vs: whether they liue chastlie, if they behaue themselues honestly toward them that be without, whether they be diligent at Gods seruice, if they be earnest to teach the people, if they be sober in eating and drinking, if they keep measure in apparell, and if they be discreet in iudgement. If yee had regarded these things with a triall of them (O reuerend fathers, by your leaues I speake) such horrible and abominable things of the clerks, should not haue come vnto our ears. I omit to speake how their crowne is not brode, nor their rounding conuenient: the wantonnes in your life, your pride in your gesture, the filthinesse in your words, doe declare the euill of the inward man.

Psal. 43.

Furthermore, what negligence is in Gods seruice, when scarse they will be present at the holy vigils? And when they come to masse, they seeme rather to bee gathered to play and laugh then to sing. I wil tell that, that good men be sory for, and the euill laugh at. I will speake with sorrow (if so be I may expresse it) how they be riotous in bankettings, in chambering, drunkennes, and vnshamefastnes: that now clerks houses may be thought to be a stewes of harlots, and a couent of plaiers. There be dice, there is dancing and singing, there is watching to midnight, with crying & shouting. Thus the goods of kings, the almes of princes, yea (and that is more) the price of that pretious blood is not esteemed. Haue our fathers then spent their treasures for this purpose? Hath the kings coffers decaied by taking away many reuenewes, for this cause? Hath the kings liberalitie giuen lands and possessions to Christs Churches for this intent, that clerks harlots should be decked with the same? that riotous feasts might be dressed? that hounds & hawks and such other toies might be gotten? The souldiers cry out of these things, the people grudge, minstrels sing & dance, and yet ye regard it not, ye spare it, ye dissemble it. Where is the sword of Leuie, and the zeale of Simeon, which killed the Sichemits, and the circumcised, which bare the figure of the that defile Christs church with filthy deeds, because they abused Iacobs daughter as an harlot? Where is Moses spirit, which spared not his owne kinsfolke that worshipped the head of the calfe?

Gen. 34. Exod. 32.

Where is Phinees the priests dagger, which pacified Gods anger by his holy zeale, when he killed him that plaied the harlot with the Madianit? Where is Peters spirit, by whose power couetousnesse is destroied, and simoniacall heresie is condemned? Be earnest ye priests, be earnest to follow the waies of the Lord, and the righteousnes of our God. It is time to do against them that haue broken the law of God. I haue Constantines sword, and ye haue Peters sword in your hands; let vs ioyne right hands, let vs couple sword to sword, that the lepers may be cast out of the temples, that the holy place of the Lord may be purged, and the sonnes of Leuie may minister in the temple, who said to his father and mother, I know you not, and to his brothers, I know not you. Go to diligently I pray you, lest we repent to haue done that we haue done, and to haue giuen that we giue. If we shall see that to be spent not in Gods seruice, but on the riotousnes of wicked men, through vile & corrupt liberty of life, for lacke of chastisement; let the relikes of holy Saints which they despise, & the holy altars, before which they play the mad men, moue you. Let the great deuotion of our ancestors moue you, whose almes the madnes of the clerks doth abuse. My great grandfather (as ye know) gaue the tenth part of all his lands to churches and abbies. My great great grandfather, Alfredus of holy memory, thought it not meet to spare his treasures, his goods, no costs, nor rents, that he might inrich the Church. My grandfather the elder, Edward, your fatherhood is not ignorant how great things he gaue to the churches. It becommeth you to remember with what gifts my father and his brothers did inrich Christs altars. O father of fathers, Dunstan, behold (I pray thee) the eies of my father looking on thee, from that bright place of heauen: hearken to his complaining words sounding in thine eares, thus pitifully lamenting! O father Dunstan, thou, thou (I say) gauest me counsell to build abbies and Churches, thou wast my helper & fellow worker in all things: I chose thee as a shepheard & bishop of my soule, and a keeper of my maners. When did I not obey thee? What treasures did I prefer in respect of thy counsels? What possessions did I not despise, if thou badst me? If thou thoughtst meete to giue any thing to the poore, I was ready. If thou thoughtst meet to giue any thing to churches, I deferred not. If thou complainedst that monkes or clerks wanted any thing, I supplied. Thou saidst that almes lasted for euer, and that there was none more fruitfull then that which was giuen to abbies or churches. For with that, both Gods seruants are sustained, and that which remaineth is giuen to the poore. O worthy almes! O worthie price of the soule! O wholesome remedie for our sinnes, which now doth stinke in the sweet furs of priests lemmans, wherewith they adorne their eares and decke their fingers, apparelling their delicat bodies with silke and purple! O father, is this the fruite of mine almes, is this the effect of my desire, and of thy promise? What wilt thou answere to this complaint of my fathers? I know, I know: When thou didst see a theefe, thou runnest not with him, neither hast thou put thy portion with adulterers. Thou hast rebuked, thou hast exhorted, thou hast blamed them: but words haue been despised; now we must come to stripes of correction. Thou hast heere with thee the worshipfull father Edward bishop of Winchester. Thou hast the reuerend prelat Oswold bishop of Worcester. I commit this businesse to you, that both by bishoplie correction, and the kings authoritie, the filthie liuers may bee cast out of the churches, and they that liue orderly may be brought in, &c.

In this oration of king Edgar aboue prefixed, three things are chiefly to be noted and considered of them that haue iudgement to marke and vnderstand, to wit: The religious zeale and deuotion of kings, both in giuing to the church, and also in correcting the maners of churchmen. Secondly, the dissolute behauior and wantonnes of the clergy, then abusing the great donations and patrimonies of princes bestowed vpon them. Thirdly, the blinde ignorance and superstition of that time in both states, as well ecclesiasticall as temporall, in esteeming Christs religion chiefly to consist in giuing to churches, and in maintaining of monkery, falsly being perswaded that remission of their sinnes, and remedy of their soules therein, did lie in building monasteries, erecting churches and cloisters, and in placing monks in the same, & such other almsdeeds, and works of deuotion. Wherein appeareth how ignorant that time was of the true doctrine of Christs faith, and of free grace of the gospell, which promiseth life, remedy, and iustification, not by any deuout merits of ours, nor by any works either of the law of God, or of the inuentions of man, but onely and freely by our faith vpon Christ Iesus the sonne of God, in whom only consisteth all the promises of God, Amen.

The doctrine of iustification vnknowne.

WIlliam Duke of Normandie, surnamed Conqueror, base sonne of Duke Robert, the first Duke of Normandie, and nephew vnto king Edward, after the foresaid victory against Harold and the Englishmen obtained, was receiued king ouer the realme of England, not so much by assent, as for feare and necessitie of time. For else the Londoners had promised their assistance to Edgar Atheling to the vttermost of their power. But being weakned and wasted so greatly in battels before, and the Duke comming so fast vpon them, fearing not to make their party good, submitted themselues. Whereupon the said William (of a duke made a king) was crowned vpon Christmas day in the yeere of our Lord 1067. by the hands of Aldredus archbishop of Yorke; for as much as at that time Stigandus archbishop of Canterbury was absent, or else durst not, or would not come in the presence of the king. A little before the comming in of this duke, a terrible blazing starre was seene the space of seuen daies, which was the yeere before. In record whereof, as well of the conquest of the duke, as of the blazing starre, these verses yet remaine:

{Anno 1067}

A blazing starre.

Sexagenus erat sextus millesimus annus,
Cum percunt Angli, stella monstrante cometa.

Which king thus being crowned, did reigne ouer the realme of England the space of one and twenty yeres and one moneth, with great seueritie and cruelnesse toward the Englishmen, burthening them with great tributes and exactions; which was, to pay of euery hide of ground containing twenty acres, six shillings. By meanes whereof certaine parts of the land rebelled, and specially the citie of Excester. But at last William ouercame them, and won the citie, & punished them grieuously. But for that and for other sterne deeds of William, diuers of the lords departed into Scotland: wherefore hee kept the other lords that tarried the straiter, and exalted the Normans, giuing to them the chiefe possessions of the land. And forsomuch as he obtained the kingdome by force & dint of sword, hee changed the whole state of the gouernance of this commonweale: and ordeined new lawes at his own pleasure, profitable to himselfe, but grieuous and hurtfull to the people: abolishing the lawes of king Edward, whereunto notwithstanding he was sworne before, to obserue and maintaine. For the which, great commotions and rebellions remained long after among the people (as histories record) to haue the said lawes of king Edward reuiued againe.

Tribute.

Rebellion. Earle Marcarus, and Earle Edwin, Edgar Atheling, with his mother and two sisters, Margaret & Christian fled into Scotland.

New king, new lawes.

King William forsworne in abolishing king Edwards lawes.

Where by the way speaking of lawes, this is memorable, that euen in this kings time the authoritie of the temporall magistrat was distinct from that of the church; but yet in such sort, that if need required, he should deale in causes ecclesiasticall, and be assistant to the bishop; whose iurisdiction what it was, and how qualified by king William now holding the sterne of gouernment in his hand, the words following doe declare.

Turris Lond.

✠ Willielmus gratia Dei rex Anglorum, comitibus, vicecomitibus, & omnibus Francigenis & Anglis, qui in episcopatu Remigy episcopi terras habent, salutem. Sciatis, &c. In English thus.

William by the grace of God king of England, to all shiriffes, vndershiriffes, and to all Frenchborne & English, which in the bishoprick of Remigius the bishop haue lands, greeting. Know you all, and the rest my faithfull subiects which abide in England, that the bishops lawes which haue bin not well, nor according to the precepts of holy canons, euen to my time in the kingdom of England; by the common counsel and the counsell of mine archbishops, and the rest of bishops and abbats; with all the princes of my kingdome I haue iudged to bee amended. Wherefore I command, and by my royall authority giue in charge, that no bishop or archdeacon do hold any more pleas of law in the hundred by the bishops lawes, nor bring any cause which pertaineth to the cure of soules vnto the iudgment of secular men: but whosoeuer according to the bishops lawes, about any sute or default be troubled, shall come to the place, which to this end the bishop shall chuse and name, and there answer his cause, and not according as in the hundred, but according to the canons and lawes of the bishop they shall do right vnto God and to their bishop. And if any puffed vp with pride, being called once, twice and thrice to the court of pleas, refuseth to come, and will not so be drawne to amendment, let him be excommunicat. And if need be to correct and reuenge this, this, let the power and iustice of the kings vndershiriffe be vsed: And he which being called or summoned to the bishops court, will not come, for euery calling shall be put to his answer before the bishop, and make amends. And this I defend, and by mine authoritie forbid, that no vndershiriffe, or prouost, or officer of the king, nor any layman, meddle or make with the laws belonging to the bishop; nor that any layman bring or sue another out of the bishops court of iustice vnto iudgement. And as for iudgement, let it be giuen in no place but in the bishops see, or in that place which in this behalfe the bishop shall appoint.)

By this euidence of record it is manifest (as you see) that duke William (now king) hauing assumed vnto himselfe the absolute authoritie roiall, indeuored to establish a forme of gouernement both in the church and commonwealth answerable to his owne mind: howbeit this is to be noted, that he allowed vnto the clergie a kind of iurisdiction of conuenting persons before them, and likewise of exercising such ecclesiasticall discipline as the qualitie of that age and time did vse. Wherein we will not stand to debate any thing at large, but proceed in the course of our storie, as the spirit of God shall vouchsafe to direct vs.

Ouer and besides this, the foresaid William, as he was a warrior, so he delighting in forts and bulworks, builded foure strong castles; two at Yorke, one at Notingham, and another at Lincolne, which garrisons he furnished with Normans.

About the third yeere of his reigne, Harold and Canutus sonnes of Swanus, king of Denmarke, entred into the north countrie. The Normans within Yorke, fearing that the Englishmen would aid the Danes, fired the suburbs of the towne. Whereof the flame was so big, and the wind so strong, that it tooke into the citie, and burnt a great part therof, with the minster of S. Peter, where no doubt many worthie works and monumets of bokes were consumed. In the time whereof the Danes by the fauor of some of the citizens entred the citie, and slue more then three thousand of the Normans. But not long after king William chased them out, and draue them to their ships, and tooke such displeasure with the inhabitants of that countrie, that he destroyed the land from Yorke to Durham, so that nine yeeres after the prouince lay wast and vnmanured, onely except S. Johns land of Beuerlie, and the people therof so strictlie being kept in penurie by the war of the king, that (as our English storie saith) they eat rats, cats, and dogs, with other vermin.

Also in the fourth yeere of this king, Malcome king of Scots entred into Northumberland, and destroied the countrie, and slue there many of the people both of men, women and children after a lamentable sort, and tooke some prisoners. But within two yeeres after, king William made such war vpon the Scots, that he forced Malcolme their king to do him homage.

And thus much concerning the outward calamities of this realme vnder this forren Conquerour, which is now the first time that the said land, with the inhabitants thereof hath beene scourged by the hand of God. First by the Romans in the time of Julius Cesar. Then by the Scots and Picts (as hath beene shewed) afterward by the Saxons. Againe, the Saxons or Englishmen did not enioy the possession of Britaine with long quiet, but were brought in as much subiection themselues vnder the Danes, as they had brought the Britains before (and that much more) in so much that throughout all England, if an Englishman had met a Dane vpon a bridge, he might not stir one foot, before the lord Dane (otherwise Lurdane) were past. And then if the Englishman had not giuen low reuerence to the Dane at his comming by, he was sure to be sharplie punished (with more) as aboue hath beene declared. And this subiection almost continued from the reigne of king Ethelwolfus 230 yeeres, till the reigne of king Edward. And yet the indignation of God thus ceased not, but stirred vp the Normans against them, who conquered & altered the whole realme after their owne purpose, in so much that besides the innouation of the lawes, coines, and possessions, there was in no church of England almost any English bishop, but only Normans and forreners placed through all their diocese. To such miserie was this land then brought, that not onely of all the English nobilitie not one house was standing; but also it was thought reprochfull to be called an Englishman. This punishment of God against the English nation, writers do assigne diuerslie to diuers causes (as partlie before is touched) of whom, some assigne this to be the cause, as followeth in the words of the storie: In primitiua Anglia ecclesia religio clarissimè splenduit, ita vt reges & regina, duces & episcopi, vel monachatum, vel exiliũ pro Dei amore appeterent: processu verò temporis adeo omnis virtus in eis emarcuit, vt gentem nullam proditione & nequitia sibi parem esse permitterent, &c. The meaning wherof is this: That whereas kings and queenes, dukes and prelats, in the primitiue time of the English church, were readie for religion to forsake either libertie or countrie, and giue themselues to a solitarie life: in processe of time they grew to such dissolutenesse, that they left no other realme like vnto them in iniquitie, &c. Againe, some writing of the vision of king Edward a little before the inuasion of the Normans, telleth, how the king reporting of his owne vision should heare, that for the great enormity and misbehauior of the head dukes, bishops, and abbats of the Realme, the kingdome should be giuen to the hand of their enemies after the decease of him, for the space of one hundred yeeres & one day. Which space was also seene by William Conqueror, to be one hundred and fiftie yeeres: and that his progeny so long should continue. Againe, some writers intreating of this so great wrath of God vpon the English people, declare the cause thereof as followeth: Nam sicut Angli Britones quos Deus disterminare proposuerat (peccatis suis exigentibus) humiliauerãt, & à terra Angliæ minus iniustè fugauerant: sic ipsi duplici persecutione, &c. Like as the Englishmen did subdue the Britans (whom God proposed for their deseruings to exterminate) and them vniustly did dispossesse of their land: so they should likewise be subdued and scourged with a double persecution; first by the Danes, and after by the Normans: &c. Moreouer, to these iniuries and iniquities done and wrought by the Englishmen, hitherto recited, let vs ad also the cruell villany of this nation, in murthering and tithing of the innocent Normans before: who comming as strangers with Alfred the lawful heire of the crowne were despightfully put to death. Which seemeth to me no little cause why the Lord (whose doings be alway iust and right) did suffer the Normans so to preuaile. By the comming in of the which Normans, and by their quarrel vnto the realm, three things wee may note and learne. First, to consider and learne the righteous retribution and wrath of God from heauen, vpon all iniquitie and vnrighteous dealing of men. Secondly, we may thereby note, what it is for princes to leaue no issue or sure succession behind them. Thirdly, what dangers often doe chance to realmes publikely by forren marriage with other princes, &c.

In the same fourth yeere of this king, betweene Easter and Whitsontide, was holden a solemne Councell at Winchester of the Clergy of England. At the which councell were present two cardinals sent frõ Pope Alexander the second, Peter and John. In this councell, the king being there himselfe present, were deposed diuers bishops, abbats, and priors, (by the means of the king) without any euident cause: to the intent his Normans might be preferred to the rule of the Church, as he had preferred his knights before to the rule of the temporalitie, thereby to stand in more surety of the land. Amongst whom also Stigandus archbishop of Canterbury was put downe for three causes against him pretended.

The first was, for that he had holden wrongfully that bishopricke, while Robert the archbishop (aboue mentioned) was liuing.

The second was, for that he had receiued the pall of Benedict bishop of Rome, the fift of that name. Which Benedict, for buying his popedome, had been deposed, as is shewed before.

The third cause, for that he occupied the said pall without licence and lawfull authority of the court of Rome.

Then Stigandus well proued the benevolence of king William. For where before the king seemed in friendly countenance to make much of him, and did vnto him great reuerence: then he changed all his mildnesse into sternnesse, and exercised himselfe by the bishop of Romes authoritie. So that in the end, Stigandus was deprined of his dignitie, and kept in Winchester as a prisoner during his life. This Stigandus is noted for a man so couetous and sparing, that when he would take nothing of his owne, and swearing that he had not a pennie, yet by a key fastened about his necke, was found great treasure of his vnder the ground.

At the same time was preferred to the archbishopricke of Yorke, Thomas a Norman, and canon of Baion.

At which time also Lanfrancus abbat of Cadomonencie (a Lombard, and Italian borne) was sent for, & made archbishop of Canterbury, betweene which two archbishops about their consecration first began a contention, for giuing and taking the oth of obedience: but that contention was at that time appeased by the king; and Thomas was contented to subscribe to the archbishop of Canterburies obedience.

After this it followed within short space, that the said Lanfrancus and Thomas archbishop of Yorke, who first builded the minster of Yorke, and gaue possessions thereunto, came to Rome with Remigius bishop of Dorcester for their pals, as the maner was; without which no archbishop nor bishop could be confirmed, although their election were neuer so lawfull. This pall must be asked no where but of ỳ pope or his assigns, and that within three moneths: also it must be asked not faintly, but mightily: Dist. 100. cap. prisca. Which, as it was a chargeable thing to other nations (especially such as were far from Rome) so it was no small gaine to the Romish sea, so as they did order it. For although at the beginning the pall was giuen without mony, according to the decree, Dist. 100. or for little, as percase in this time of Lanfranke: yet in processe of yeers it grew to such excesse, that where ỳ bishoprick of Mentz was wont to giue to Rome but ten thousand florens: afterward it arose so, that hee which asked his confirmation, could not obtain it, without twenty thousand. And from thence it exceeded to fiue and twenty thousand, and at length to seuen and twenty thousand florens: which summe, Jacobus archbishop of Mentz was priest to pay, a little before the councell of Basil; sil: insomuch that the said Jacobus, at his departing (which was within foure yeares after) said that his death did not so much greeue him, as to remember his poore subiects, which should be constrained to pay so terrible a fine for the popes pall. Now by this, what riseth to the pope in whole Germanie, conteining in it aboue fiftie bishoprikes, it may bee easilie coniectured. Lanfrancus thus comming to Rome, with the other two bishops: he for the estimation of his learning, obtained of Alexander two pals, one of honor, the other of loue. Item, he obtained for the other two bishops also their confirmation. At which time, they being there present before Alexander: the controuersie began first to be moued (or rather renewed) for the primacie betwixt the two metropolitans, that is, betwixt the archbishop of Canterburie, and the archbishop of Yorke, whether of them should haue preheminence aboue the other. For Canterbury challenged to himselfe the prerogatiue and primarie ouer whole Britain and Ireland: the which contention continued a long season betwixt these two churches, and was often renewed in the daies of diuers kings after this: as in the reigne of Henrie the first, betwixt Thurstinus of Yorke, and Radulphus of Canterburie. And againe in the seuen and twentith yeare of the said king, at his second coronation: for Radulphus would not suffer the first coronation to stand, because it was done by the bishop of Yorke, without his assent. Also in the reigne of Henrie the second, where Alexander pope made a letter decretall betwixt these two metropolitans, for bearing the crosse in the yeare 1159. Also another time, in the reigne of the said king, betwixt Richard of Canterburie, and Roger of Yorke. Againe, about the yeare of our Lord 1170. when Thomas Becket hearing the king to be crowned of Roger bishop of Yorke, complained thereof grieuously to pope Alexander the third. Item, another time in the yeare 1176 betwixt Richard and the said Roger, whether of them should sit on the right hand of cardinall Hugo in his councell at London. Moreouer, in the beginning of ỹ reigne of king Richard in the yeare 1190. betwixt Baldwinus of Canterburie, and Godfridus of Yorke, &c.

Jacobus archbishop of Mentz.

Eneas Siluius writeth to be fiftie bishoprikes in Germanie.

Now to proceed in the storie hereof. After this question was brought (as is said) to the popes presence, he (not disposed to decide the matter) sent them home into England, there to haue their cause determined. Whereupon they speeding themselues from Rome to England in the yeare 1070. and in the sixth yeare (as is said) of this William: brought the matter before the king & the clergie at Windsore. Wheras Lanfranke first alleging for himselfe, brought in, from the time of Austin, to the time of Beda (which was about 140 yeres) how that the bishop of Canterburie had euer the primacie ouer the whole land of Britain and Ireland: how he kept his councels diuers times within the precincts of Yorke: how hee did call and cite the bishops of Yorke thereto: whereof some hee did constitute, some he did excommunicate, and some he did remoue: besides also he alleaged diuers priuiledges granted by princes and prelats to the primacie of that see, &c.

To this Thomas archbishop of Yorke replieth againe, and first beginning with the first originall of the Britains church, declareth in order of time, how the Britains, &c.

Lucius the first king of Britain christened. Thenus first archbishop of London.

¶ The Brittans first possessioners of this kingdome of Britain, which indured from Brutus and Cadwalader 2076 yeares, vnder an hundred and two kings, at length receiued the christian faith in the yeare 162. in the time of Lucius their king. Eleutherius bishop of Rome sent Faganus and Damianus preachers vnto them, at which time after their conuersion, they assigned and ordained in the realme eight and twentie bishops, with two archbishops, Theonus the archbishop of London, and Theodosius archbishop of Yorke. Vnder those bishops and archbishops the church of Britain was gouerned after their conuersion almost 300 yeares, till at length the Saxons being then infidels, with Hengistus their king, subduing the Britains by fraudulent murther, inuaded their land, which was about the yeare of our Lord 440. After this the Britains being driuen into Cambria (which we now call Wales) the Saxons ouerrunning the land, diuided themselues into seuen kingdomes. And so being infidels & pagans, continued til the time that Gregorie bishop of Rome sent Austin to preach vnto them: which Austin comming first to Douer, being then the head citie of Kent, called in Latine Dorobernia, and there planting himselfe, conuerted first the king of Kent, called Edilbertus, who had then subdued certaine other kings vnto Humber. By reason whereof Austin was made archbishop of Douer, by the appointment of Gregorius, who sent him certaine pals with his letter from Rome, as before is expressed. Which letter being recited, then Thomas expounding vpon the same, beginneth to declare for himselfe, how the meaning of Gregorie in this letter was, to reduce the new church of Saxons or Englishmen to the order that was in the old time among the Britains: that is, to be vnder two metropolitans, one of London, the other of Yorke: for so the church was ordered in the time of the Britains, as is before declared. Notwithstanding, hee giueth to Austin this prerogatiue during his life time, to haue authoritie and iurisdiction, not onely ouer his twelue bishops, but vpon all other bishops and priests in England. And after his decease then these two metropolitans, London and Yorke, to ouersee the whole clergie, as in times past amongst the Britains: whom he ioineth together after the death of Austin, to constitute bishops, and to ouersee the church. And that he so meaneth London to be equall in authoritie with Yorke, it appeareth by foure arguments. First, that he will London to be consecrat by no bishop, but of his owne synod. Secondlie, in that he willeth no distinction of honour to be betwixt London and Yorke, but according only to that as ech one of them is elder in time. Thirdlie, for that he matcheth these two together in common councell, and with one agreement to consent together in doing and disposing such things as they shall consult vpon in the zeale of Christ Iesu: and that in such sort, that one should not dissent nor discord from the other. What meaneth this, but that they should gouerne together, whom he would not to dissent together? Fourthlie, where he writeth, that the bishop of Yorke should not be subiect to the bishop of London; what meaneth this, but that the bishop of London should be equiualent with the metropolitan of Yorke, or rather superiour vnto him?

Lanfrancus replieth.

And thus he expounded the meaning of Gregorie to be in the foresaid letter. To whom Lanfrancus againe answereth, that he was not the bishop of London, and that the question pertained not to London. Thomas replieth, hauing on his part many fautors, that this priuilege was granted by Gregorie to Austin alone, to haue all other bishops subiect to him: but after his decease, there should be equalitie of honour betwixt London and Yorke, without all distinction of prioritie; saue the onely prioritie of time should make superioritie betweene them. And although Austin translated the see from London to Kent, yet Gregorie, if his mind had beene to giue the same prerogatiue to the successors of Austin (which he gaue to him) would expressie haue vttered it in the words of his epistle, writting thus to Austin: That which I giue to thee Austin, I giue also and grant to all thy successors after thee. But in that he maketh heere no mention of his successors, it appeareth thereby, that it was not his mind so to do.

Thomas argueth.

To this Lanfrancus argueth againe: If this authoritie had beene giuen to Austin alone, and not to his successors, it had beene but a small gift, proceeding from the apostolike see, to his speciall & familiar friend: especiallie seeing also that Austin in all his life did constitute no bishop of Yorke, neither was there any such bishop to be subiect to him. Againe, we haue priuileges from the apostolike see, which confirme this dignitie in the successors of Austin, in the same see of Douer. Moreouer, all Englishmen thinke it both right and reason, to fetch the direction of well liuing from that place, where first they tooke the sparkle of right beleeuing. Further, whereas you say, that Gregorie might haue confirmed with plaine words the same thing to the successors of Austin, which he gaue vnto him; all that I grant: yet notwithstanding, this is nothing preiudiciall to the see of Canturburie. For, if you know your logike, that which is true in the whole, is also true in the part: and what is true in the more, is also true in the lesse. Now the church of Rome is as the whole, to whom all other churches be as parts therof; and as Homo mankind is Genus the generall, in a certaine respect to all his Indiuidua, to all particular persons, and yet in euery particular person lieth the propertie of the generall: so in like maner, the see of Rome in a certaine respect is the generall and the whole to other churches, and yet in euery particular church is contained the whole fulnesse of the whole christian faith. The church of Rome is greater then all churches; that which is wrought in it ought to worke in the lesse churches also: so that the authoritie of euery chiefe head of the church ought to stand also in them that do succeed; vnlesse there be any precise exception made by name. Wherefore, like as the Lord said to all bishops of Rome the same thing which he said to Peter, so Gregorie in like maner said to all the successors of Austin, that which he said to Austin. So thus I conclude; Likewise as the bishop of Canturburie is subiect to Rome, because he had his faith from thence, so Yorke ought to be in subiection to Canturburie, which sent the first preachers thither. Now, whereas you allege that Gregorie would Austin to be resident at London, that is vtterlie vncertaine. For how is it to be thought, that such a disciple would do contrarie to the mind of such a master? But grant (as you say) that Austin remoued to London, what is that to me, which am not bishop of London? Notwithstanding, all this controuersie ceasing betwixt vs, if it shall please you to come to some peaceable composition with me (all contention set apart) you shall find me not out of the way, so far as reason and equitie shall extend.

Lanfrancus replieth.

The dignitie of Canturburie confirmed by priuileges.

Well replied of an Italian.

If this similitude were formed into a sylogisme, neither were the maior true: and specially the minor were vtterlie false.

With these reasons of Lanfranke Thomas gaue ouer, condescending that the first of his prouince should begin at Humber. Whereupon it was then decreed, that Yorke from that time should be subiect to Canturburie in all matters appertaining to the rites and regiment of the catholike church: so that whersoeuer within England, Canturburie should or would hold his councell, the bishop of Yorke should resort thither with his bishops, and be obedient to his decrees canonicall.

Order taken betweene Lanfrancus bishop of Canturburie, and Thomas bishop of Yorke.

Prouided moreouer, that when the bishop of Canturburie should decease, Yorke should repaire to Douer, there to consecrat with others the bishop that should be elect. And if Yorke should decease, his successor should resort to Canturburie, or else els where the bishop of Canterbury should appoint, there to receiue his consecration, making his profession there, with an oath of canonicall obedience. Thomas being content withall, Lanfrancus the Italian triumpheth with no small ioy, and putteth the matter forthwith in writing, that the memory thereof might remaine to the posteritie of his successors. But yet that decree did not long stand. For shortly after the same scar so superficially cured, brast out againe. In so much that in the reigne of king Henrie the first, An. Dom. 1121. Thurstinus archbishop of Yorke could not bee compelled to sweare to the archbishop of Canterburie; and yet notwithstanding by the letters of Calixtus the second was consecrated without any profession made to the said bishop, with much more matter of contention, all which to recite it were too long. But this I thought to commit to history, to the intent men might see the lamentable decay of true christianity amongst christian bishops, who inflamed with glorious ambition, so contended for honor, that without meere forcement of law no modesty could take place.

Of such like contentions among prelats of the clergie for superioritie, we reade of diuers in old chronicles, as in the historie intituled Chronicon Hirsfeldense, where is declared a bloodie conflict, which twice hapned in the church of Gollaria, betweene Hecelon bishop of Hildesheime, and Wederatus bishop of Fulda, and all for the superior place, who should sit next to the emperor; the emperor himselfe being there present, and loking on them, and yet not able to stay them.

Thus I haue described the troublous contention betweene Lanfrancus & Thomas metropolitan of Yorke in the daies of Alexander, of which controuersie & of the whole discourse thereof, Lanfrancus writeth to pope Alexander, beginning thus:

A letter of Lanfrancus sent to pope Alexander.

Domino totius christianæ religionis summo speculatori Alex. papæ, Lanckfrancus sanctæ Doroberneusis ecclesiæ antistes, debitam cum omni seruitute obedientiam. In concilio quod Angliæ per vestram autoritatem coactum est, vbi querelæ Thomæ archiepiscopi prolatæ & ventilatæ sunt, allata est ecclesiastica gentis Anglorũ historia, quam Eboracensis ecclesiæ presbyter, & Anglorum doctor composuit: and so forth in a long processe of words which follow. Among which in the middle of the epistle speaking of Douer and Canterburie, he hath these words. Vrbs námque, quæ nunc Cantuarberia nominatur, antiquis temporibus, ab ipsius terræ incolis Doroberuia vocabatur, &c. with many other words in the said epistle, which for breuitie here I ouerpasse.

In the story before of king Egelred was declared about the yeare of our Lord 1016, how the bishoprike of Lindasfarne otherwise named Holy land, in the sloud of Tweed, was translated to Durham: so likewise in the daies of this Lanfrancus archbishop of Canterburie, An. 1076, diuers bishops sees were altred and remoued from townelships to greater cities. As the bishoprike of Selese was remoued to Chichester; out of Cornwall to Excester; from Welles to Bathe; from Shireborne to Salisburie; from Dorcester to Lincolne; from Lichfield to Chester, which bishoprike of Chester, Robert being then bishop, reduced from Chester to Couentrie. Likewise after that in the reigne of William Rufus, An. 1095. Herbert bishop of Thetford from thence reduced the see to Norwich, &c.

Bishops sees translated into England.

As concerning Douer and Canterburie, whether the see was likewise translated from the towne of Douer to the citie of Canterburie in the time of Theodosius: or whither Canturburie by old time had the name of Dorobernia (as the letter of Lanfrancus to pope Alexander aboue mentioned doth pretend) I find it not in histories expressly defined, saue that I read by the words of William being yet duke of Normandie, charging then Harold to make a well of water for the kings vse in the castle of Dorobernia, that the said Dorobernia then was taken for that which we now call Douer; but whether Dorobernia and the citie of Canterburie be both one or diuers, the matter is not great. Notwithstanding this I reade in the epistle of pope Bonifacius to king Ethelbert, as also to Iustinus archbishop. Item, in the epistle of pope Honorius, to bishop Honorius. Item, of pope Vitalianus to Theodorus; of pope Sergius to king Ethelred, Alfred and Adulphus, and to the bishops of England. Likewise of pope Gregorie the third, to the bishops of England. Item, of pope Leo to Athelard archbishop of Canterburie. Of Formosus to the bishops of England, and of pope John to Dunstan, that the name of Dorobernia and of Canterburie indifferently are taken for one matter.

Dorobernia and Canturburie taken both for one.

In this time (and by the procuring of this Lanfrancus) the ninth yeare of this king, a councell was holden at London, where among the acts thereof, these were the principall things concluded.

A councell holden at London, and what were the acts thereof.

First, for the order of sitting, that the archbishop of Yorke should sit on the right hand, and the bishop of London on the left hand: or in the ablence of Yorke, London should haue the right, and Winchester the left hand of the archbishop of Canterburie sitting in councell.

2 The second, that bishops should translate their sees from villages into cities, whereupon those sees aboue named were translated.

3 That monks should haue nothing in proper: and if any so had, he dying vnconfessed, should not be buried in the churchyard.

4 That no clerke or monke of any other diocesse should bee admitted to orders, or reteined without letters commendatorie or testimoniall.

5 That none should speake in the councell except bishops and abbats, without leaue of the archmetropolitans.

6 That none should marrie within the seuenth degree, with any either of his owne kindred or of his wiues departed.

7 That none should either buy or sell any office within the church.

8 That no sorcerie nor any diuination should be vsed or permitted in holy church.

9 That no bishop nor abbat, nor any of the clergie should be at the iudgement of any mans death or dismembring, neither should be any fautor of the said indicants.

Moreouer, in the daies of this Lanfrancus, diuers good bishops of the realme began to take part with priests against the monks, in displacing these out of their churches, and to restore the married priests againe: in so much that Walkelmus bishop of Winchester had placed aboue fortie canons in stead of monks for his part; but this godly enterprise was stopped by stout Lanfranke the Italian Lombard. This lucky prelat sat nineteene yeares, but at his latter end he was not so fauoured of William Rufus, and died for sorrow. Although this Italian Franke being archbishop had little leisure to write, yet something hee thought to doe to set out his famous learning, and wrote a booke against Berengarius, intituling it Opus scintillarum. The old church of Canterburie hee plucked downe and builded vp the new.

Bishops of England about to driue out monks and to place priests againe in their stead.

Opus scintillarium Lanfranci.

After the death of pope Alexander aboue mentioned, next to him followed Hildebrand surnamed Gregorie the seuenth. This Hildebrand as he was a sorcerer, so was he the first and principall cause of all this perturbation that is now and hath beene since his time in the church: by reason that through his example all this ambition, stoutnesse and pride, entred first into the church of Rome, and hath euer since continued. For before Hildebrand came to Rome working there his feats, setting vp and displacing what bishops hee liked, corrupting them with pernicious counsell, and setting them against emperors, vnder pretence of chastitie destroying matrimony, and vnder the title of libertie breaking peace and resisting authoritie: before this (I say) the church of Rome was in some order, and bishops quietly gouerned vnder christian emperors, and also were defended by the same: as Marcellus, Meltiades, and Siluester were subdued, and vnder obedience to Constantinus, An. 340. Siricius to Theodosius, An. 388. Gregorius to Mauricius, An. 600. Hilarius to Iustinian, An. 528. Adrianus and Leo to Carolus Magnus, An. 801. Paschalis and Valentius to Ludouicus Pius, An. 830. Sergius the nine and twentith to Lotharius, An. 840. Benedictus the third and Ioannes the ninth vnto Ludouicus, son of Lotharius An. 856. But against this obedience and subiection Hildebrand first began to spurne, and by his example taught all other bishops to do the like.

Anno 1074

Hildebrandus seu Gregor. 7.

Hildebrand the cause of all this stoutnesse and pride in prelats.

In so much that at length they wrought and brought to passe, to be lawfull for a few curtisans and cardinals (contrarie to ancient ordinance and statutes decretall) to chuse what pope they list, without any consent of the emperor at all. And whereas before it stood in the emperors gift, to giue and to grant bishoprikes, archbishoprikes, benefices and other ecclesiasticall preferments within their owne limits, to whom they list: now the popes through much wrestling, wars, and contention, haue extorted all that into their owne hands, and to their assignes: yea haue plucked in all the riches and power of the whole world; and not content with that, haue vsurped and preuailed so much aboue emperors, that (as before) no pope might bee chosen without the confirmation of the emperor: so now no emperor may bee elected without the confirmation of the pope, taking vpon them more then princes, to place or displace emperors at their pleasure for euery light cause: to put downe, or to set vp when and whom they liked, as Fredericus Primus, for holding the left stirrup of the popes saddle, was persecuted almost to excommunication. The which cause moueth me to straine more diligence here, in setting out the story, acts, and doings of this Hildebrand, from whom, as the first patron and founder sprang all this ambition and contention about the liberties and dominion of the Roman church: to the intent, that such as cannot read the Latin histories, may vnderstand in English, the originall of euils; how, and by what occasion they first began, and how long they haue continued.

What popes haue done.

Popes more then princes.

Frederike the first shent for holding the popes left stirrup.

And first how this Hildebrand hitherto had behaued himselfe before he was pope, I haue partly declared. For though he was not yet pope in name, yet hee was then pope in deed, and ruled the pope and all their doings as him liked. Item, what waies and fetches he had attempted euer since his first comming to the court of Rome, to magnifie and maintaine false libertie against true authoritie: what practise he wrought by councels, what factions and conspiracies hee made, in stirring vp popes against emperors, striuing for superioritie: and what warres followed thereof, I haue also expressed. Now let vs see further (by the helpe of Christ) the worthie vertues of this princely prelate, after hee came to bee pope, as they remaine in histories of diuers and sundrie writers described.

The tragicall historie of Gregorie the seuenth, otherwise named Hildebrand.

Gregorie the seuenth. Ex Auentino.

THe words of the Latine historie be these: Hactenus pontifices Romani in comitijs curiatis calatis à sacerdotibus, equitatu, plebe, senatu, &c. In English.

Hitherto the bishops of Rome haue been elected by voices, and suffrages, of al sorts and degrees, as well of the priests and the clergie, as of the nobilitie, people, and senate, all conuenting and assembling togither. And this election so I find to stand in force, if so be it were ratified and confirmed by the consent of Roman emperors, who had authority to cal and to assemble al these, as well as a bishops, togither vnto councels as case required. Under the authority and iurisdiction of these emperors, were contained both in Germany, France, Italie, and through the whole dominion of Rome, all patriarchs, bishops, masters of churches and monasteries by the decrée of councels, according to the old custom of our ancestors, as is declared in a certaine storie in the life of Carolus Magnus. The holy and ancient fathers (like as Christ our Lord with his disciples and apostles both taught and did) honored and esteemed their emperors as the supreme potestate next vnder God in earth, set vp, ordained, elected and crowned of God, aboue all other mortall men, and so counted them, and called them their lords. To them they yéelded tribute and paid their subsidies, also prayed euery day for their life. Such as rebelled against them they woke as rebels and resisters against God his ordinance and christian piety. The name of the emperor then was of great maiesty, and receiued as giuen from God. Then these fathers of the church neuer intermedled nor intangled themselues with politike affaires of the common weale: much lesse they occupied martiall armes and matters of chiualrie. Onely in pouertie and modestie was all their contention with other christians, who should be poorest and most modest among them. And the more humblenes appeared in any, the higher opinion they conceiued of him. The sharpe and two edged sword they woke, giuen to the church of Christ to saue, and not to kill; to quicken, and not to destroy; and called it the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, the life and light of men, and reuoketh from death to life, making of men, gods; of mortall, immortall. Far were they from that to thrust out any prince or king (though hee were neuer so far out of the way, yea an Arrian) from his kingdome, or to curse him, to releale his subiects from their oath and their allegiance, to change and translate kingdomes, to subuert empires, to pollute themselues with christian blod, or to war with their christian brethren for rule and principalitie. This was not their spirit and manner then, but rather they loued and obeyed their princes. Againe, princes loued them also like fathers and fellow princes with them of the soules of men. Now this Gregorius the seuenth, otherwise named Hildebrandus trusting vpon the Normans which then ruffled about Apulia, Calabria, and Campania, trusting also vpon the power of Mathilda, a stout woman there about Rome; and partly againe, bearing himselfe bold for the discord among the Germans: first of all others (contrarie to the maner of elders) contemning the authoritie of the emperor, inuaded the cathedrall sée of Rome, vanting himselfe as hauing both the ecclesiasticall and temporall sword committed to him by Christ, and that fulnesse of power was in his hand to bind and loose what so hee liked. Whereupon thus he presumed to occupie both the regiments, to challenge all the whole dominion both of the east and west church, yea and all power to himselfe alone, abiding none to be equall, much lesse superior vnto him, derogating from others, and arrogating to himselfe their due right and honor, setting at light Cesars, kings and emperors, and who reigned but by his owne godamercie. Bishops and prelats as his vnderlings he kept in awe, suspending and cursing, and chopping off their heads, stirring vp strife and wars, sowing of discord, making factions, releasing oths, defeating fidelity and due allegiance of subiects to their princes. Yea and if hee had offended or iniured the emperor himselfe, yet notwithstanding hee ought to bee feared, as he himselfe gloryeth in a certaine epistle, as one that could not erre, and had receiued of Christ our sauiour & of Peter, authority to bind and vnbind at his wil & pleasure. Priests then in those daies had wiues openly and lawfully (no law forbidding to the contrary) as appeareth by the déed and writings of thir chapter seales and donations, which were giuen to temples and monasteries, wherein their wiues also bee cited with them for witnesse, and were called Presbyteriſſæ. Also for bishops, prelats, persons of churches, gouernors of the clergie, masters of monasteries, and religious houses; all these were then in those times in the emperors ordination, to assigne by voice or consent to whom hee would. Now these two things Gregorius this pope could not abide; for the which two causes onely was all his striuing and driuing from his first beginning, to abolish the marriage of priests, and to translate the authoritie imperiall to the clergie. For to this scope onely tended all his labour, practises and deuices, as appeared before in the councell of Lateran vnder pope Nicolas, and also in the councell of Mantua vnder Alexander, making their marriage heresie, and the other to be simony. And that which before he went about by others, now he practiseth by himselfe, to condemne ministers that were married for Nicolaitans, and to receiue any spirituall regiment of secular persons for simonie; directing forth his letters vpon the same to Henricus the emperor, to dukes, princes, potestats, tetrarchs: namely, to Berchtoldus, to Rodulphus of Sweuia, to Whelpho, Adalberon, and their wiues. Item, to bishops, archbishops, to priests, and to all the people: in the which letters hee denounceth them to bee no priests, so many as were married, forbidding men to salute them, to talke, to eate, to companie with them, to pay them tithes, or to obey them if they would not be obedient to him. Amongst all others, hee directed speciall letters to Otho bishop of Constance, concerning this matter. But Otho perceiuing the vngodly and vnreasonable pretence of Hildebrand, would neither separate them that were married from their wiues, nor yet forbid them to marrie which were vnmarried, &c.

Hildebrand a mortall enemie against priests marriage.

The copie of the letter of Hildebrand sent to the bishop of Constance against priests mariages.

GRegorie bishop, seruant of seruants of God, to the clergy & laitie, both more and lesse within the dioceſie of Constance, saluation and benediction. Wee haue directed to our brother Otho your bishop, our letters exhortatorie: wherein we inioyned him, according to the necessitie of our dutie, by the authoritie apostolicall, that hee should vtterly abolish out of his church the heresie of simonie, and also should cause with all diligence to be preached the chastitie of priests. But hee neither moued with reuerence of S. Peters precept, nor yet with the regard of his dutie, neglected to doe these things, whereunto we so fatherly haue exhorted him, incurring thereby a double offence, not only of disobedience, but also of rebellion, in that he hath gone and done cleane contrarie to our commandement (yea rather the commandement of blessed S. Peter) so that hee hath permitted his clergie not onely such as had wiues, not to put them away, but also such as had none, to take vnto them. Whereupon, we being truly informed therof, and greeued therwith, haue directed to him another letter, declaring the motion of our displeasure and indignation. In which letters also wee haue cited him vp to our councell at Rome, there to appeare and giue account of his disobedience, in the audience of the whole synod. And now therefore we thought it best to signifie this to you (our deare children) wherby in this behalfe we might the better prouide for your health and saluation. For if your bishop shal continue so obstinatly to repugne & resist against our commandement, he is not meet to sit ouer you, &c. Wherefore these shall be to command you, and all them that be obedient to God, and to blessed S. Peter, by our apostolicall authoritie, that if this your bishop shall persist in his obstinacie, you that be his subiects hereafter giue to him no seruice nor obedience. For the which thing doing, wee here discharge you before God and your soules. For if your bishop shall seeme contrarie to the decreements and iniunctions apostolicall, wee through the apostolicall authoritie of S. Peter, discharge and absolue you from the band of your allegiance to him. So that if you be sworne to him, so long as hee is a rebell against God and the apostolike seat, we loose you from the peril of your oath, that you shal not need to feare therein any danger, &c.

Otho cited to appeare for suffering priests with their lawfull wiues.

The pope dispenseth for disobedience.

Otho bishop of Constance thus being cited, whether he did appeare personally himselfe, I doe not read. Thus I read and find, that in the said councell holden at Rome, Hildebrand with other bishops of Rome did then enact among many others, these three things most spectall. First, that no priest hereafter should marrie wiues. Secondly, that all such as were married should be diuorced. Thirdly, that none hereafter should bee admitted to the order of priesthood, but should sweare perpetuall chastitie, &c. This councell of Rome being ended, forthwith the act of Hildebrand concerning the single life of priests was proclaimed and published in all places, and strait commandement giuen to bishops to execute the same.

Three things enacted by Hildebrand. Here commeth in the vow of chastitie.

The copie of his bull sent into Italie and Germanie was this.

GRegorie the pope, otherwise Hildebrand, the seruant of the seruants of God, sendeth the apostles blessing to all them within the kingdomes of Italie and Germany that shew their true obedience to S. Peter. If there be any priests, deacons and subdeacons, that still will remaine in the sinne of fornication, we forbid them the churches entrance, by the omnipotent power of God, and by the authority of S. Peter, till time they amend and repent. But if they perseuere in their sin, wee charge that none of you presume to heare their seruice: for their blessing is turned into cursing, and their praier into sinne, as the Lord doth testifie to vs by his prophets, I will turne your blessing, &c.

The bishops of France being called vpon daily with the popes letters, were compelled to obey the decrée of the councell; but the residue of the clergie manfully and stoutly withstanding the popes decrée, & inforcement of their bishops, would not agrée, but repined thereat & said, that the councell did manifestly flatly repugne against the word of God, and that the pope did take from priests that which both God and nature had giuen them; and therefore that person to be an heretike, and author of a wicked doctrine, which ruled and gouerned not by the spirit of God but by Satan. The decree and act set forth to tend directly against the word of God and the saying of Christ: Non omnes capiunt verbum hoc: All men haue not the gift and capacitie of the word. Item, to be against the sound doctrine of S. Paul writing these words: As concerning virginitie, I haue no commandement of the Lord, &c. Againe, Hee that cannot otherwise liue continently, let him marrie. Item, that it was against the canons both of the apostles and of Nicen councell. Moreouer, that it was against the course of nature which hee required, that men being sequestred from their naturall wiues and women, should be coacted to liue as angels: that is, to performe that which nature doth not giue. And therefore the bishop therein did open a pernicious window to vncleannesse and to fornication. In summe, giuing vp their answere, thus they concluded, that they had rather giue vp their benefices, then to forsake their naturall and lawfull wiues against the word of Christ. And finally, if married priests could not please them, they should call downe angels from heauen to serue the churches. But Hildebrand nothing moued neither with honest reason, nor with the authoritie of holy scripture, nor with the determination of Nicen councell, nor any thing else, followeth this matter; calleth vpon the bishops still, with his letters and legats doth solicitate their minds, accuseth them of negligence and dastardnesse, threatneth them with excommunication, vnlesse they cause their priests to obey his decree inioyned them. Whereupon a great number of bishops for feare of the popes tyrannie, laboured the matter with their priests, by all meanes possible to bereaue them of their accustomed matrimonie.

Bishop of Mentz. Ex Lambeito Scafnaburgen. in hist. Germanorum.

Amongst other the archbishop of Mentz, perceiuing this act of taking away priests mariage, might breed him no little trouble; talketh with his clergie gentlie, admonitheth them of the popes mind and decree, and giueth them halfe a yeares respit to deliberate vpon the case, exhorting them diligently to shew themselues obedient to the pope and to him, and to grant with good will that which at length (will they nill they) needs they must be forced vnto, and therefore of their owne accord to stand content therewith, lest the pope should bee compelled to attempt waies of sharper seueritie. The time of deliberation expired, the archbishop assembleth his clergie at Erpsford, the moneth of October, & there willeth then according to the pontificall decree, either to abiure for euer all matrimonie, or else to renounce their benefices and ecclesiasticall liuings. The clergie againe defend themselues against the popes decree with scriptures, with reason, with the acts of generall councels, with examples of ancestors by diuers strong arguments, declaring the popes decree not to be consonant, nor ought to take effect. But the archbishop said he was compelled so of the pope, and could not otherwise doe, but to execute that which was inioyned him.

The priests of Germanie stout against the popes vnlawfull proceedings.

The clergie seeing that no reason, nor prayer, nor disputation would serue, laid their heads together, consulting among themselues what was best to be done: some gaue counsell not to returne againe to the synod, some thought it good to returne and to thrust out the archbishop from his see, and to giue him due punishment of death for his deseruing, that by the example of him, others may be warned hereafter neuer to attempt that thing any more to the prejudice of the church, and the rightfull libertie of ministers. After that this was signified to the archbishop by certaine spies that were amongst them, what the clergie intended to do, the archbishop to preuent and salue the matter, sendeth to the priests as they were comming out, certaine messengers, bidding them be of good hope, & to returne againe to the metropolitan, and they should haue that should content their minds. So being perswaded, they come againe to the councell. The bishop promiseth he would doe his indeauor what hee could, to reuoke and turne the mind of the bishop of Rome from that sentence, willing them in the meane time to continue as they had done in their cure & ministerie. The next yeare following, Hildebrand the souldier of Satan sendeth his legat (a certaine bishop called Curiensis) vnto the archbishop of Mentz, and assembled there a councell. In the which councell the archbishop againe propoleth the matter, commanding all the clergie vnder paine of the popes curse, there perpetually either to abrenounce their wiues, or their liuings. The clergie defended their cause againe with great constancie. But when no defension could take place, but all went by tyrannie & meere extortion, it burst in the end to an vprore and tumult, where the legat and the archbishop being in great danger, hardly escaped with their liues, and so the councell brake vp. By this schisme and tumult it followed, that the churches after that in chusing their priests would not send them to the bishops (the enemies and suppressors of matrimonie) to be confirmed and inducted, but did elect them within themselues, and so put them in their office without all leaue or knowledge of the bishops, who then agreed and were determined to admit no priests, but such as should take an oth of perpetuall singlenesse, neuer to marrie after. And thus first came vp the oth and profession of single priesthood. Notwithstanding, if other nations had followed the like constancie and concord of those Germane ministers, the diuelish drift and decree of this Hildebrand (or rather Helbrand) had been frustrat and auoided. But this greedinesse of liuings in weake priests made them to yeeld vp their godly libertie to wicked tyrannie. Yet this remaineth in these Germans to bee noted, what concord can doe in repressing the vnordinate requests of euill bishops if they constantly stand to truth, and hold together. And thus much for banishing of matrimonie. Now let vs proceed to the contents betweene wicked Hildebrand and the godly emperor. But before by the way of digression it shall not be much wide from the purpose, to touch a little of the properties of this pope, as we find them described in certaine epistles of Benno a cardinall, writing to other cardinals of Rome: which Benno liued in the same time of Hildebrand, and detecteth the prodigious acts and doings of this monstrous pope.

Single priesthood how it began.

Examples of concord in priests and ministers.

Firſt, declaring that he was a sorcerer most notable, and a necromancer, an old companion of Siluester, of Laurentius and Theophylactus, called otherwise Benedictus nonus. Amongst others Benno Cardinalis writeth this history of him: How vpon a certaine time this Gregorius, comming from Albanus to Rome, had forgot behind him his familiar booke of necromancie, which he was wont commonly to carrie alwaies with him. Whereupon remembring himselfe, entring the port of Lateran, he calleth two of his most trustie familiars to fet the booke, charging them at no hand to looke within it. But they being so restrained, were the more desirous to open it, & to peruse it, and so did. After they had read a little the secrets of the satanicall booke, suddenly there came about them the messengers of Satan, the multitude and terror of whom made them almost out of their wits. At length they comming to themselues, the spirits were instant vpon them to know wherefore they were called vp, wherefore they were vexed: quickly (said they) tell vs what ye would vs to doe, or else we will fall vpon you if ye retaine vs longer. Then spake one of the yong men to them, bidding them goe and plucke downe yonder wals, pointing vnto certaine high wals there nigh to Rome, which they did in a moment. The yong men crossing them for feare of the spirits (scarce recouering themselues) at length came to their master. And it followeth moreouer in the epistle of the said Benno to the cardinals.

Ex Benno cardinali.

Pope Hildebrand forsaken of diuers of his cardinals.

We haue made mention to you before of diuers colleges of the church of Rome, which refused to communicate with him; as Leo then archpriest of the cardinals, Benno, Vgobaldus, Iohannes the cardinall, Peter chancellor and cardinall, being all instituted before this Hildebrand. These three also being consecrated by him, that is, Natro, Innocentius and Leo, forlooke him, cursing the detestable errors which hee held. In like case Theodinus whom hee constituted archdeacon, and other cardinals more, Iohannes surnamed Primicerius, Petrus Oblationarius, with all that appertained to them, sauing one onely man. And now, when this Hildebrand saw that the bishops also would forsake him, hee called vnto him the laie men, and made them priuie of his counsell, thinking thereby to separate the bishops, that they should haue no conference with the cardinals. After that he called together those bishops, and being garded with bands of laie men, hee inforced the bishops partly for feare, and partly for his menacing words, to sweare vnto him, that they should neuer disagree vnto that which hee would haue done, that they should neuer defend the kings quarrell, and that they should neuer fauour or obey the pope that should in his stead be instituted. Which thing being done, he sent them by meanes of the prince of Salernites, into Campania, and thus did he separate them from the companie of the cardinals, and from the citie of Rome. And not onely the bishops, but also the priests of the citie and clerks of inferior orders, as also the laie men he bound by their oaths, that at no time nor for any cause, they should condescend vnto the king.

Pope Hildebrand compelleth the bishops and priests of Rome to sweare vnto him.

As soone as pope Alexander was dead, which died somwhat before night, the same day contrarie to the canons, he was chosen pope of the lay men. But the cardinals subscribed not to his election. For the canons prescribe (vnder paine of cursing) that none should be chosen pope before the third day after the buriall of his predecessor. But he (by sinister meanes thus climing to the see) remoued the cardinals of the said see, from being of the councell. But with what persons hee consulted night and day, Rome well heard and saw. And hee now putting the cardinals from his councell, his life, faith and doctrine, no man could accuse or beare witnesse of: whereas in the canons is commanded, that in euery place wheresoeuer the pope is, should be with him three cardinals being priests, and two deacons, because of his ecclesiasticall testimonie and stile of veritie: of which canonicall decree looke gentle reader before. He violently wrested the sacred scriptures to couer his falshood, which kind of idolatrie how great it is, manifestly throughout all the scripture it appeareth. Contrarie to the minds and counsell of the cardinals, and besides the determinate order of pronouncing iudgement by the canons, he rashly did excommunicate the emperor, being in no synod solemnly accused before. The sentence of which excommunication, after rehearsall of these presents, shall also bee manifested (Christ willing) willing) to the which excommunication, ſaith Benno, none of the cardinals would ſubſcribe. As ſoone as he aroſe out of his ſeat papal, to excommunicate the emperor, the ſame ſeate (being made but a little before with big timber) ſuddenly by the appointment of God was rent and ſhiuered in pieces: ſo that all men might plainely vnderſtand, what and how great and terrible ſchiſms that lubber had ſowen againſt the church of Chriſt, againſt the ſeate of S. Peter, and how cruelly he had diſperſed the chaire of Chriſt, in defiling the lawes of the church, ruling by might and auſteritie in that his ſo perillous and preſumptuous excommunication.

The emperor wrongfully excommunicated.

The popes chaire brake vnder him as he roſe to excommunicate the emperor.

The pope diuideth the vnitie of the church.

In the deſcription of the ſame excommunication hee inſerteth thoſe things wherein he himſelfe erred, when hee abſolued the emperor being vniuſtly excommunicat, and the biſhops alſo communicating with him, and to the vttermoſt thus cutting and mangling the vnitie of the church & thoſe that communicated with the, did as much as in him lay to make two churches.

Alſo the ſame bold merchant commanded that the cardinals ſhould faſt, to the intent that God would reueale whoſe opinion was better (either of the church of Rome, or of Berengarius) touching the controuerſie of the Lords body in the ſacrament. And hereby he proued himſelfe to be a manifeſt infidell, for that in the Nicen councell it is written, he that doubteth is an infidell.

Of this miracle we read in no approued hiſtorie.

Further, he ſought after a ſigne to eſtabliſh his faith concerning the article of the Lords bodie, as did Gregorie to confirme the womans faith, when the conſecrated bread was tranſubſtantiated into the forme of a fleſhly finger. He alſo ſent two cardinals (Attones and Cunones) vnto Anaſtaſe; that with the archprieſt of the ſame church they ſhould begin a faſt of three daies ſpace, and that euery of them (euery day during thoſe three daies) ſhuld ſay ouer the pſalter, & ſing maſſes, that Chriſt would ſhew vnto them ſome ſuch like ſigne of his bodie, as he did to the foreſaid Gregorie; which thing they could not ſee.

The pope hireth one to ſlay the emperor.

The emperor was wont oftentimes to go to S. Maries church in the mount Auentine to pray. Hildebrand when hee had by his eſpials ſearched out and knew all the doings of the emperor, cauſed the place where the emperor was accuſtomed (either ſtanding or proſtrate on his face to pray) to be marked, and for money he hired a naughtiepacke (like himſelfe) to gather and lay togither a heape of great ſtones directly ouer the place in the vaut of the church, where the emperor would ſtand, that in throwing the ſame downe vpon his head, he ſhould ſlay the emperour. About which purpoſe as the hireling haſted, and was buſie, remouing to the place a ſtone of great hugeneſſe and weight, it broke the planke wheron it lay, and the hireling ſtanding thereupon, both togither fell downe from the roofe to the pauement of the church, and with the ſame ſtone was daſht all in pieces. And after the Romans had vnderſtanding of the handling of this matter, they faſtened a rope to one of the feet of this hireling, and cauſed him to bee drawne through the ſtreets of the citie three daies together in example to others. The emperor notwithſtanding, according to his wonted clemencie, cauſed him to be buried.

Iohannes biſhop of Portua (being one of the ſecret counſell of Hildebrand) came vp into the pulpit of S. Peter, and amongſt other things in the hearing both of the clergy and people, ſaid: Hildebrand and wee haue committed ſuch a fact and ſo horrible, for the which we are all worthie to be burne : aliue (meaning of the ſacrament of the bodie of Chriſt) which ſacrament, Hildebrand when he thereof inquired a diuine anſwere againſt the emperor and would not ſpeake, threw into the fire & burned it, contrarie to the perſuaſion of the cardinals that were preſent, and would haue reſiſted the ſame.

Hildebrand caſteth the ſacrament of the lords body in the fire, becauſe it would giue him no anſwere.

In the ſecond holy day in the Eaſter weeke, when the clergie and the people were aſſembled at S. Peters church to heare maſſe, after the goſpell he went vp into the pulpit as hee was in his pontificall attire, and in the preſence of diuers biſhops and cardinals (a great company both of the ſenate and the people of Rome being gathered together) openly preached (among many other words of diuination) that the king whoſe name was Henrie, ſhould die (without all peraduenture) before the feaſt of S. Peter next inſuing: or elſe at leaſtwiſe that he ſhould be ſo deiected from his kingdome, that hee ſhould not bee able any more to gather together aboue the number of ſix knights. This he preached to the biſhops and cardinals, and all that were preſent, crying out of the pulpit in theſe words: Neuer accept me for pope any more, but plucke me from the altar if this propheſie be not fulfilled by the day appointed. About the ſame time he went about by helpe of priuie murtherers to kill the emperor, but God preſerued him. And many there were euen at that time which thought pope Hildebrand to be guilty, & to be the deuiſer of the treaſon, becauſe that then he (before the deed put in execution) preſumed of the death of the king, being by him falſly prophecied of before; which words of his wounded many mens hearts. And it came to paſſe that Hildebrand by his words was openly condemned in the congregation, which (as is ſaid) gaue iudgement of himſelfe to be no pope, neither that he would be counted for pope any longer; but thought to bee both a belier and a traitor, vnleſſe that before the feaſt of S. Peter next comming the emperor ſhould die, or elſe ſhould be depriued of all kingly honor, in ſo much as he ſhould not be able to make aboue ſix knights on his part. And thus by the appointment of God it came to paſſe, that by his owne mouth hee was condemned for an heretike.

The pope a falſe prophet.

The pope ſeeketh againe to murther the emperor.

The pope by his owne mouth condemned for an heretike.
